Accompanying this report will be found a highly interesting report from the Light-House Board, which presents in a condensed form a history of their operations from 1852, the date of the organization of the board, to the present time. In no branch of the service have more skill and ability been displayed than in this, and in none have the outlays been productive of more satisfactory results.

The work under the Coast Survey has been prosecuted during the past year with accustomed energy, and its operations have been recommenced on the coast where they have been for some years past interrupted. The importance of these surveys was fully established during the recent civil war, and they cannot fail to be of constantly increasing value to commerce. The work is steadily advancing toward completion, and the Secretary recommends for it the proper and necessary appropriations.

For the detailed operations of the Mint and branches, I respectfully refer to the report of the Director of the Mint.

The total value of the bullion deposited at the Mint and branches during the fiscal year was $38,947,156 88, of which $27,223,640 17 was in gold and $1,723,516 71 in silver. Deducting the redeposits, the amount of actual deposits is $31,911,719 24.

The coinage for the year was, in gold coin, $28,313,944 90; gold bars, $9,115,485 46; silver coin, $680,264 50; silver bars, $916,382 08; cents coined, one, two, three, and five-cent pieces, $646,570. Total coinage, $29,640,779 40. Total bars stamped $10,031,867 50.

The gold deposits, of domestic production, were, at Philadelphia, $2,815,616 34; San Francisco, $17,436,499 18; New York, $8,557,664; Denver, $160,982 94. The silver deposits were, at Philadelphia, $56,118 81; San Francisco, $623,682 21; New York, $213,481.

The gold and silver deposits of foreign production were $2,047,674 76.

The amount of gold coined at Philadelphia was $10,096,645; at San Francisco, $18,217,300; of silver, at Philadelphia, $399,314 50; at San Francisco, $230,950; of bronze and nickel and coppers, at Philadelphia, $680,264 50.

The law enacted at the last session of Congress, providing for the reorganization of the system of appraisements at the port of New York, has been carried into effect. So little time has elapsed since the new board was organized that the necessary reforms have not yet been consummated; but they have been undertaken with so much energy and judgment by the appraiser, Mr. Thomas McElrath, that the best results are confidently anticipated from the reorganization.

Recent calamities at sea, especially the disaster to the steamship Evening Star, on the 3d of October last, whereby two hundred and fifty lives were lost, indicate a necessity for the enactment of judicious laws for the government of our mercantile marine, with especial reference to the more complete security of passengers. It is believed that in this particular we are far behind some other nations; and while this is the case we shall not attain that maritime strength and prosperity to which we should aspire.

An inquiry into the cause of the disaster to the Evening Star, made by Captain W. M. Mew, under instructions from this Department, elicited several facts, to which earnest attention is invited, showing as they do the radical defects in existing laws, and indicating the legislation required to prevent loss of life, and to enhance the value and security of property in ships. A copy of Captain Mew's report is herewith transmitted.

The attention of Congress is respectfully called to the accompanying interesting reports of the heads of the respective bureaus, all of which contain valuable information and suggestions, and indicate the satisfactory manner in which the general business of the Department is being conducted under existing laws and regulations. The efficiency of all the bureaus would, however, have been greatly increased and the expenses thereof would doubtless have been reduced by the passage of the bill for their reorganization, which was under consideration at the last session. The machinery of the Department, sufficient for the prompt and proper performance of the public business before the war, is insufficient now. The bureaus need reorganization, and justice and economy demand higher compensation to officers and clerks.

The Secretary is under obligations to the officers and clerks of the Department for the very satisfactory manner in which, with few

Report of the Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON CITY, November 14, 1866.

MR. PRESIDENT: Disbandment of the volunteer forces in service at the time the rebel armies surrendered; collecting the arms, ordnance, and military stores scattered over the vast theater of war; the sale and disposition of unserviceable material; storing in arsenals, magazines, and depots that which might be used; settling and adjusting war claims; recruiting and organizing the regular Army under the recent act; the establishment of posts and garrisons on the frontier and in the Indian country; testing the various improvements of breech-loading small-arms, and supplying them to the Army; practical experiments to determine the destructive power of projectiles and the comparative resisting qualities of materials; completing sea-board defenses and providing them with armaments; planning and carrying on harbor and river improvements; these, with the administration of the laws relating to refugees, freedmen, and abandoned lands, have constituted the chief operations of the War Department during the past year.

The entire number of volunteer troops to be mustered out was, on May 1, 1865, 1,034,064, and my last annual report recounted the operation of disbanding this force until November 15, 1865, when 800,963 troops had been transported, mustered out, and paid. The work was actively continued after that date, and on January 20, 1866, 918,722 volunteers had been mustered out; February 15, 952,452; March 10, 967,887; May 1, 986,782; June 30, 1,010,670; November 1, 1,023,021 — leaving in service 11,043 volunteers, white and colored. The aggregate reduction of the colored troops during the year has been 75,024, and at this date one regiment of artillery and thirteen of infantry, numbering about 10,000 officers and enlisted men, remain in the service. Commenced in May, 1865, the work of discharging and returning to their homes 1,034,064 volunteers would have been completed within three months but for the necessity of retaining in service part of that force. Past experience shows that, should any national emergency require a larger force than is provided by the peace establishment, armies could be swiftly organized to at least the full strength of a million men.

The reduction of the Army has been attended by a corresponding reduction of material and retrenchment of expenditures. The advanced depots of the quartermaster's department, which had been established as bases of operations, have been broken up; the greater part of the material sold at advantageous rates or concentrated in five principal depots and arsenals; and all unnecessary employes discharged. From May 1, 1865, to August 2, 1866, over 207,000 horses and mules were sold for $15,239,075 54. About 4,400 barracks, hospitals, and other buildings have been sold during the year for $447,873 14. The sale of irregular and damaged clothing in store produced during the fiscal year the sum of $902,770 45. The fleet of 590 ocean transports in service on July 1, 1865, at a daily expense of $82,400, was reduced before June 30, 1866, to 53 vessels, costing $3,000 per diem, and most of these have since been discharged, ocean transportation being now almost entirely conducted by established commercial lines of steamers. Of 262 vessels which had been employed in inland transportation, at an expense of $3,193,533 28, none were remaining in service on June 30, 1866; sales of river transports, steamers, and barges during the year are reported as amounting to $1,152,895 92. The rates of wagon transportation in the Indian country have also been reduced by favorable contracts. The military railroads, which were operated during the war at a total expenditure of $45,422,719 15, and which are officially reported to have reached an extent of 2,630½ miles, and to have possessed 433 engines and 6,605 cars, have all been transferred to companies or boards of public works, upon condition of the adoption of loyal organizations of directors. Cash sales of railroad equipment to the amount of $3,466,739 83 are reported, and credit sales of $7,444,073 22; upon the latter there have been paid, principal and interest, $1,200,085 18; leaving due to the United States, on June 30, 1866, principal and interest, $6,570,074 05. The military telegraph, which attained an extent of 15,880 miles of lines constructed during the period of hostilities, with a total expenditure of $3,219,400 during the war, and $567,637 during the last fiscal year, has been discontinued, the material sold and disposed of, and the employes discharged, only a few confidential operators being still retained for cipher correspondence with commanders of important districts.

Such subsistence stores as could not be retained for supplying the reduced Army have for the most part been sold at satisfactory prices.

The sale of unserviceable and surplus stores pertaining to the Signal corps has been effected; most of the officers have been mustered out, and the employes discharged.

All the temporary ordnance depots established during the war, with the exception of that at Hilton Head, where the work is in progress but not completed, have been discontinued, and the supplies have been sent to arsenals for storage, or, when not worth the cost of transportation, have been sold. The expenditures at arsenals have been greatly diminished, and their operations limited.

General hospitals, hospital transports, and railroad trains, ambulance corps, and a number of medical purveying depots have been dispensed with, and all perishable articles of medicines and hospital supplies, in excess of the requirements of a peace establishment, have been disposed of by public sale at advantageous rates, and the reserved supplies concentrated at five depots. The proceeds of old or surplus medical and hospital property amount to $4,041,261 59.

But the sale and disposition of these large amounts of unserviceable and perishable stores still leave on hand an adequate supply of war material to meet any emergency that can possibly arise. The stock of clothing, equipage, quartermaster, subsistence, hospital, and ordnance stores, arms, ammunition, and field artillery is sufficient for the immediate equipment of large armies. The disbanded troops stand ready to respond to the national call, and, with our vast means of transportation and rapid organization developed during the war, they can be organized, armed, equipped, and concentrated at whatever points military emergency may require. While, therefore, the war expenses have been reduced to the footing of a moderate and economical peace establishment, the national military strength remains unimpaired and in condition to be promptly put forth.

While the reduction of the volunteer force and the advantageous disposition or concentration of war material were thus successfully accomplished without diminishing the military power of the country, recruiting and reorganizing the regular Army favorably progressed. In consequence of the difficulty in procuring enlistments for the regular while so many men were required for the volunteer service, one hundred and fifty-three companies of the regular Army, as then authorized, were unorganized on May 31, 1865, but in the middle of the following July these companies had been completed. Under the act of July 28, 1866, the regular Army now comprises ten regiments, or one hundred and twenty companies, of cavalry, five regiments, or sixty companies, of artillery, and forty-five regiments, or four hundred and fifty companies, of infantry; of which two cavalry and four infantry regiments are composed of colored men, and four infantry regiments of men who were wounded in the line of their duty. One regiment of white cavalry had been fully recruited on September 15; the other regiment, assigned to the Pacific coast, is very nearly completed. Forty-eight of the fifty-four companies required to convert into regiments the single battalions of the nine three-battalion regiments of the former organization have been completed and sent to their regiments. The four Veteran Reserve regiments have been assigned to districts where the men may be usefully employed in guarding storehouses and cemeteries, and on similar duties. The colored regiments will be recruited, as far as possible, from the colored volunteers still in service. The law authorizes an assignment of one hundred privates to a company as the maximum, fifty being the minimum, and the maximum strength of the Army is thus placed at 75,382, rank and file. The present strength of companies is fixed at sixty-four privates for cavalry, artillery, and infantry, and one hundred and twenty-two privates for light batteries of artillery, making an aggregate strength of 54,302. As soon as the ranks shall be well filled, it is designed to increase the efficiency of the military force by raising the standard of qualifications.

The troops in service were regularly paid, and the demands of those discharged and mustered out promptly met. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866, $10,431,004 42 were disbursed to the Army and Military Academy, $248,943,313 36 to volunteers; and in the disbursement of millions of dollars in small sums, and amid great difficulties and hazards, the total cost to the Government in expenses of every character is but a fractional portion of one per cent.

Every effort has been made to promote the comfort and health of the Army, and to give the best medical treatment to the wounded and sick. Well-grounded apprehensions of the appearance of Asiatic cholera as an epidemic, early in the present year, required prompt action for the protection of our troops. A rigid military quarantine was established on the southern Atlantic coast, and sanitary precautions enforced. The adoption of these measures availed to control or eradicate the disease, at the recruiting depots and forts where it appeared, before it assumed its usual alarming epidemic form; and official recognition has been given to the meritorious services of medical officers whose fidelity, energy, and skillful administration succeeded in averting or diminishing the horrors of wide-spread pestilence. In other respects the general health of the troops has been good. Among white troops the proportion of deaths, from all causes, to cases treated, has been one to every fifty-two. Among colored troops the proportion of cases taken sick has been greater than with the white troops, and the mortality rate one death to every twenty-nine cases treated. There were remaining in general hospitals, June 30, 1865, and admitted during the year, 64,488 patients, of whom, on June 30, 1866, only 97 remained under treatment. The comfort and proper medical treatment of the sick and wounded are secured in well-arranged post hospitals, of which there are at present 187, with a total capacity of 10,881 beds.

Measures have been adopted for the purpose of providing suitable shelter for the troops now stationed on the plains, and for those which may be ordered thither, and to prevent suffering during the winter. The Army has been well supplied with forage, about one half the quantity having been supplied from the stock remaining on hand at the cessation of hostilities; the consumption for the year has been 3,300,000 bushels of oats, 5,061,000 bushels of corn, 136,000 tons of hay, 2,700 tons of straw.

Subsistence stores of good quality have been supplied to the Army, and though the larger part has been obtained at the principal market centers of the northern States, yet the general return of the citizens, North and South, to the productiveness of peace, and the consequent reopening of the customary channels and sources of trade, have enabled a partial resumption of the course of procuring supplies at the points where they are to be consumed. Eighty-nine contracts for fresh beef have been made in the southern States, at a general average price of 11.06 cents per pound, and in the interior of those States other articles to a small extent have been purchased. The market at New Orleans is now so well furnished, and has so far resumed a healthful mercantile condition, as to render it possible to procure there, at satisfactory prices, most of the subsistence stores required in the department of the Gulf. On the Pacific coast, for several years after California was admitted to the Union, all the supplies for troops there stationed were required to be shipped from New York, but an ample and reliable market, comprising the products of California and Oregon, and the foreign countries bordering upon the same ocean, is now found in San Francisco, and most of the subsistence stores for troops in the division of the Pacific have been there obtained. In general the subsistence supplies purchased during the year have been procured upon contracts, concluded in pursuance of advertisements for sealed proposals, written proposals, and acceptances.

The importance of speedily providing the Army with breech-loading small-arms of the best pattern has been recognized and acted upon. By an order of January 3, 1866, a board of competent officers was convened for the purpose of examining, testing, and reporting on the various models of original breech-loaders, and the various plans for the conversion into breech-loaders of the arms heretofore borne by our troops. This board met on March 10, and continued in session until June 4, when its report was submitted, and directions have been given the ordnance department for the speedy manufacture of breech-loading arms. In view of the great number of small-arms on hand, it has been deemed advisable to convert Springfield rifle-muskets, at a comparatively small cost, into efficient breech-loaders, rather than to incur the cost of the entire manufacture of new arms of that description, at a time, too, when the invention may not have been perfected. This alteration of the Springfield musket has been effected so successfully as to render it an arm believed to be better in all respects than the Prussian needle-gun, while its metallic ammunition is regarded as superior to that of the latter. The Department has already on hand breech-loaders of approved patterns adequate for the supply of the cavalry, and mounted and light infantry.

Besides the measures that have been mentioned to provide for the comfort and promote the efficiency of the Army, stated monthly inspections have been made in every military command during the year, with a view to bring to notice and promptly remedy any irregularities and defects; and numerous special inspections have also been made throughout the whole country for the purpose of correcting abuses, suggesting improvements, and effecting retrenchment in the service. The inspection service has not been changed by the return to peace; the system developed during the war, meeting the requirements as nearly as practicable, is still continued.

The present organization of military departments and divisions is as follows:

The department of the East, Major General George G. Meade to command, to embrace the New England States, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Fort Delaware. Headquarters at Philadelphia.

The department of the Lakes, Brigadier and Brevet Major General Joseph Hooker to command, to embrace the States of Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, and Wisconsin. Headquarters at Detroit.

The department of Washington, Brigadier and Brevet Major General E. R. S. Canby to command, to embrace the District of Columbia, Alexandria and Fairfax counties, Virginia, and the States of Maryland and Delaware, except Fort Delaware. Headquarters at Washington.

The department of the Potomac, Brigadier and Brevet Major General John M. Schofield to command, to embrace the States of Virginia, except Alexandria and Fairfax counties, and West Virginia. Headquarters at Richmond.

The department of the South, Major General Daniel E. Sickles to command, to embrace the States of North and South Carolina. Headquarters at Charleston.

The department of the Tennessee, Major General George H. Thomas to command, to embrace the States of Kentucky, Tennessee, Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi. Headquarters at Louisville.

The department of the Gulf, Major General Philip H. Sheridan to command, to embrace the States of Florida, Louisiana, and Texas. Headquarters at New Orleans.

The department of the Arkansas, Brigadier and Brevet Major General E. O. C. Ord to command, to embrace the State of Arkansas and Indian Territory west. Headquarters at Little Rock.

The department of the Missouri, Major General Winfield S. Hancock to command, to embrace the States of Missouri and Kansas, and the Territories of Colorado and New Mexico. Headquarters at Fort Leavenworth.

The department of the Platte, Brigadier and Brevet Major General Philip St. George Cooke to command, to embrace the State of Iowa, the Territories of Nebraska and Utah, so much of Dakota as lies west of the one hundred and fourth meridian, and so much of Montana as lies contiguous to the new road from Fort Laramie to Virginia City, Montana. Headquarters at Omaha.

The department of Dakota, Brigadier and Brevet Major General A. H. Terry to command, to embrace the State of Minnesota and all the Territories of Dakota and Montana not embraced in the department of the Platte. Headquarters at Fort Snelling.

The department of California, Brigadier and Brevet Major General Irvin McDowell to command, to embrace the States of California and Nevada, and the Territory of Arizona. Headquarters at San Francisco.

The department of the Columbia, Major General Frederick Steele to command, to embrace the State of Oregon and the Territories of Washington and Idaho. Headquarters at Portland.

The principal movements of troops have been in Texas, on the Mexican frontier, and in the Territories, the details of which are given in the accompanying report of General Grant, commanding the armies of the United States, and the reports of division and department commanders, to which reference is made. General Grant reports that a military force has been kept in all the lately rebellious States for the purposes of insuring the execution of law and protecting life and property against the acts of those who, as yet, will acknowledge no law but force—a class smaller, in his opinion, than could have been expected after such a conflict as that through which we have passed, but sufficiently formidable to justify the course which has been pursued. Military movements have also been directed with a view to the protection of emigrants on their way to the mountain Territories against the hostility and opposition of the Indians.

Besides the operations thus recapitulated, of reduction, concentration, retrenchment, and reorganization of the military establishment, and payment, complete equipment, and disposition of the Army, other matters of national importance and interest have received the careful attention of the War Department.

The permanent defenses of the country have been strengthened. Their efficiency has already been much increased by substituting cannon of larger caliber and improved model for lighter guns, and wrought-iron for wooden gun-carriages. This work is still in progress, and will be continued. Diligent and careful efforts, based upon the designs and recommendations of competent boards of engineers, have been made to adapt old works, as well as those in process of construction, to more powerful armaments. Construction has been suspended upon some works, in order to await the completion of important experiments having in view the extensive use of iron shields or armor for the protection of guns and gunners; the results already attained give the promise of a practical and highly beneficial application of the knowledge obtained by these trials.

Surveys of the lakes have been continued, and progress has already been made in improving the harbors and rivers of the country. The work will be energetically prosecuted under the liberal appropriations made at the last session of Congress.

Active and careful measures have been instituted for successfully and speedily carrying into effect the generous provisions of Congress for the benefit of surviving soldiers of the war for the Union. The subject of the payment of extra bounties to discharged soldiers, and extra pay to discharged officers, has received assiduous attention. The recent law devolving upon the War Department, instead of the accounting officers of the Treasury, the duties of examination and settlement of claims of this nature, imposed a vast accumulation of labor, and required the consideration of numerous acts of Congress, and the regulations and practice of several bureaus; upon the proper performance of these extraordinary labors depends the disbursement of nearly eighty million dollars among more than a million claimants. Soon after the adjournment of Congress a competent board of officers was organized to prepare rules and regulations for the payment of the authorized bounties. Diligent application was given to the work, and the regulations, having been found to be in strict accordance with law, were promptly approved, published, and directed to be carried into effect. To the same board the subject of bounties for colored soldiers was also referred, with a view to provide any additional checks that might guard the bounty from fraudulent assignees and secure it to colored soldiers, and protect the Treasury against fraud; and when the report was received, payment of the bounties was ordered. As to the other class of bounties, the Paymaster General regards it impracticable to make payment until all applications shall have been received, and claims classified and registered by States and organizations; but by this preliminary process the ultimate payment of all will, it is believed, be greatly expedited. Attempted otherwise, probably the work would never be fully accomplished. Of the valuable public records by which the validity of the bounty claims is to be tested, there is in the archives of the Government but one copy, already much worn, for each period. An examination for each individual case would soon reduce them to illegible shreds.

The duty of the Government to the soldiers who have been maimed or have fallen in its defense has not been neglected. Much care has been taken, by precautions and practical tests, to secure for the former the most durable, useful, and comfortable artificial limbs. From July 16, 1862, the date of the act of Congress authorizing artificial limbs to be furnished, to July 1, 1866, there have been supplied to disabled soldiers 3,981 legs, 2,240 arms, 9 feet, 55 hands, 125 surgical apparatus, and it is supposed that not more than 1,000 limbs remain still to be supplied, at an estimated cost of $70,000. In order to include unfortunate cases in which, from the nature of the injury or operation, no limb or other surgical appliance can be advantageously adopted, the Surgeon General has recommended that, if the appropriation for this purpose shall be continued, the money value of an artificial limb, in lieu of an order for the apparatus, be given to the maimed soldier. Forty-one national military cemeteries have been established, and into these had already been gathered, on June 30, the remains of 104,526 Union soldiers. The sites for ten additional cemeteries have been selected, and the work upon them, for some time delayed by the climate and a threatened epidemic, is now in course of vigorous prosecution. Although it may not be desirable to remove the remains of those now reposing in other suitable burial grounds, it is estimated that our national cemeteries will be required to receive and protect the remains of 249,397 patriotic soldiers whose lives were sacrificed in defense of our national existence. The average cost of the removals and reinterments already accomplished is reported at $9 75, amounting in the aggregate to $1,144,791; and it is believed that an additional expenditure of $1,609,294 will be necessary. It is proposed, instead of the wooden head-boards heretofore used, to erect at the graves small monuments of cast iron, suitably protected by zinc coating against rust. Six lists of the dead, containing 32,666 names, have been published by the Quartermaster General, and others will be issued as rapidly as they can be prepared.

Documents submitted by the chiefs of bureaus, and accompanying this report, contain detailed information relative to the operations of the War Department and the requirements of its respective branches.

The total estimate of military appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, is $25,205,669 60.

The Adjutant General's office has immediate supervision of recruiting for the regular Army, and disbanding the volunteer force, and charge also of the records and unfinished business of the Provost Marshal General's Bureau, which, in accordance with act of July 28, 1866, was discontinued on August 28. Arrangements have been made for the prompt settlement of the undetermined questions formerly pertaining to that bureau, and for the removal to Washington of the records of its offices in the various States. The estimated appropriation required for the purposes of the Adjutant General's office is $300,000.

The officers of the Inspector General's department are now those of the regular establishment, and they are all engaged in their legitimate duties of stated and special inspections. No appropriation is required for this service.

In the Bureau of Military Justice during the past year 8,148 records of courts-martial and military commissions have been received, reviewed, and filed; 4,008 special reports made as to the regularity of judicial proceedings, the pardon of military offenders, the remission or commutation of sentences, and upon the miscellaneous subjects and questions referred for the opinion of the bureau; including also letters of instruction upon military law and practice to judge advocates and reviewing officers. The number of records of military courts received at this bureau reached a minimum soon after the adoption of the recent Army act, and since that time has increased with the military force. The other business of the office, as an advisory branch of the War Department, will also, it is believed, continue to be augmented until the peace establishment shall be completely organized and the new Army fully recruited; and the fact that, in a large number of important cases, commanders of departments and armies are not authorized to execute sentences in time of peace, and that such cases can no longer be summarily disposed of without a reference to the Executive, will also require from the bureau a very considerable number of reports which heretofore have not been called for. Its aggregate business will, it is thought, not be reduced in proportion to the reduction of the military force.

In the quartermaster's department the returns and accounts of officers responsible for clothing and equipage during the year have been examined and transmitted to the Treasury for final settlement. The erection of the fire-proof warehouse at Philadelphia, for which Congress made an appropriation on July 28, will be commenced so soon as the proposals now invited by public advertisement shall have been received and compared; and authority is desired for the purchase of a site and erection of a similar structure at Jeffersonville, Indiana. During the fiscal year ocean transportation has been furnished for 131,581 men; inland transportation for 1,016,300 persons, 138,389 animals, 10,370 wheeled vehicles, and 420,000 tons of stores of all kinds; and the greater part of the bills for transportation during the war have been settled and paid. Claims, principally under the act of July 4, 1864, have been filed during the year to the amount of over $11,000,000, upon which about $1,000,000 have been paid. No further appropriations are required for the regular service of the quartermaster's department, as it is believed that the balances now available, and the sums received and to be received, will suffice for the next fiscal year. For contingencies the sum of $100,000 is requested.

The subsistence department is engaged, under the joint resolution of July 25, 1866, in paying, upon certificates given by the Commissary General of Prisoners, commutation of rations to those United States soldiers who were held as prisoners of war. Tobacco is now furnished to the enlisted men of the Army, under proper regulations. The settlement of accounts of officers who have performed duty with the subsistence department has rapidly progressed. Claims under the act of July 4, 1864, which have been filed in the subsistence office, amount in the aggregate to $1,758,031 04, on which $85,343 10 have been allowed. Claims amounting to $1,021,123 70 await final examination and decision. The total amount of money drawn from the Treasury and disbursed by the subsistence department during the past fiscal year was $7,518,872 54, including payment of claims under the act of July 4, 1864. The amount disbursed during the fiscal years of the war was:

From July 1, 1861, to June 30, 1862.....	$48,799,521 14
From July 1, 1862, to June 30, 1863.....	69,537,582 78
From July 1, 1863, to June 30, 1864.....	98,661,018 50
From July 1, 1864, to June 30, 1865.....	144,782,969 41
From July 1, 1865, to June 30, 1866.....	7,518,872 54
Total amount.....	$369,305,864 37

No appropriation is required for the next fiscal year.

Arrangements will soon be consummated by the medical department for the permanent security of its valuable mortuary records, including 16,000 folio volumes of hospital registers, 47,000 burial records, 16,000 hospital muster and pay rolls, alphabetical registers of the dead, containing 250,000 names of white and 20,000 of colored soldiers, and the pathological collection constituting the Army medical museum. During the year official evidence, obtainable from no other source, of cause of death, or of discharge for disability, has been furnished in 49,212 cases, and 210,027 discharges upon certificates of disability have been examined and classified. The total number of surgical cases classified and recorded is, of wounds 133,952, and of operations 28,438. The preparation for publication of the Medical and Surgical History of the War has been prosecuted with energy, much of the manuscript and several of the illustrations for the first volume being completed. The Army medical museum continues to increase in value and usefulness, and the greater security and additional accommodations of the building to which it will be shortly removed, admit of the addition of a great number of interesting and instructive specimens not hitherto available for want of space. A small appropriation will be required to continue the work of classification and preservation of this national collection. The number of casualties from the commencement of the war to the present time, in the regular and volunteer medical staff, is ascertained to be 336, including 29 killed in battle, 12 killed by accident, 10 died of wounds, 4 died in rebel prison, 7 died of yellow fever, 3 died of cholera, 270 died of other diseases. During the war 35 medical officers were wounded in battle. The distribution of troops in small bodies over so large an extent of country necessitates the employment of acting assistant surgeons temporarily, but the number of these has been reduced from 1,997 on July 1, 1865, to 264 on July 1, 1866, and will be still further diminished when existing vacancies in the grade of assistant surgeons, created by the act of Congress of July 28, 1866, are filled; a corresponding decrease in the number of hospital stewards, for general service, has also been effected; and in every branch of the department reduction and retrenchment have been rigidly enforced. An aggregate expenditure of $267,391 92 was incurred by the medical department in furnishing officers and supplies to the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, which had under its control, during the fiscal year ending July 1, 1866, no appropriation applicable to the purpose; and though, under a decision of the Treasury Department, reimbursement was not made from subsequent appropriations for the Freedmen's Bureau, no embarrassment arose and no legislation is required. The funds at the disposal of the medical and hospital department, during the year ending June 30, 1866, were as follows:

Balance of appropriations remaining in the Treasury, July 1, 1865.....	$1,161,181 24
Amount of Treasury draft No. 1,544, on war warrant 3,205, issued May 3, 1865, in favor of Assistant Surgeon J. B. Brinton, lost in the mail, and subsequently refunded.....	10,000 00
Proceeds of sales of old or surplus medical and hospital property.....	4,044,261 59
Amount refunded on account of supplies furnished for the use of prisoners of war.....	22,163 34

The pay department remains without material change. In consequence of additional labors imposed upon this branch of the War Department by recent congressional enactment, and in order to promptly pay the large issue of Treasury certificates, it was necessary to retain temporarily a number of additional paymasters. The financial summary exhibits—

A balance on hand at the beginning of the fiscal year.....	$120,106,999 32

The estimated appropriations of the pay department amount to $17,728,560 60 for pay of the Army for the next fiscal year.

The corps of engineers at the close of the fiscal year consisted of ninety-five officers, the battalion of engineer troops, and the Military Academy. Thirteen officers were on detached duty, serving in command of military departments, on special service connected with the levees of the Mississippi river, on the Light-House Board, with the Department of the Interior upon duties relating to the Pacific railroad, on military surveys and staffs of the General-in-Chief and commanding general of the military division of the Gulf; the remainder were diligently engaged in the duties of their profession, officers of desirable experience and practice having direct supervision of the more important works. The engineer troops were distributed between the Military Academy and the two depots of engineer supplies located at Willett's Point, New York, and at Jefferson Barracks, Missouri. The condition of the battalion with regard to discipline and instruction is reported as satisfactory. At the two engineer depots much valuable war material has been collected from points where it had remained after the close of active operations in the field, and it is proposed to keep on hand a complete outfit, on a moderate scale, of such engineer, bridge, and siege equipage as would be most likely to come into requisition to supply unforeseen demands in the field. The chief of Engineers suggests a modification of the act of June 23, 1866, in respect to the manner of procuring labor and material for improvements of harbors and rivers. The estimated appropriation required by the Engineer Bureau for the next fiscal year is $5,140,000.

The ordnance department now limits the operations at arsenals to the construction of wrought-iron sea-coast carriages and such ordnance supplies as are needed for immediate use; preservation of the ordnance stores left on hand at the close of the war; breaking up unserviceable ammunition; and completing unfinished buildings. Fire-proof workshops have been completed at Watervliet, Frankford, and Alleghany arsenals; three magazines, with a capacity for storing 15,000 barrels of gunpowder, have been built at St. Louis arsenal, and one of the same capacity at each of the arsenals at Washington city and Benicia. A board of officers is engaged in examining suitable sites for depositories of gunpowder, provided for by an appropriation of the last session of Congress; and the erection of such magazines as will furnish secure and suitable storage for all our powder, ammunition, and niter will be commenced early next spring. The arsenals at the South which were seized by the rebels, having been retaken, are reoccupied, excepting the North Carolina arsenal, which was destroyed; the Harper's Ferry armory, the workshops of which were burned, and which has been used as an ordnance depot; the arsenal in Florida, which has been transferred temporarily to the Freedmen's Bureau; and the arsenal in Arkansas, which is occupied by troops of the line. The chief of Ordnance is of opinion that it is not advisable to rebuild the North Carolina arsenal or to reestablish the armory at Harper's Ferry, and the sale of both is recommended. All the small-arms and some of the other supplies which were collected at Baton Rouge, San Antonio, Augusta, Charleston, and Mount Vernon arsenals have been removed, and the only supplies which have been sent to them were such as were required for immediate issue to troops.

The commission appointed under the act of April 19, 1864, to examine and report the value of property on Rock Island taken by the United States by authority of that act, has entered upon its duties. As soon as good titles to the property shall have been acquired, the construction of the armory and arsenal, as required by law, will be hastened as fast as the appropriations will admit. It is important that this establishment should be built up as rapidly as possible, and a considerable sum has been estimated for that purpose during the next fiscal year. It is believed that all of it is necessary and can be judiciously and advantageously expended. The operations at the national armory at Springfield, Massachusetts, during the past year have been confined to cleaning and repairing arms used during the war, and to making the requisite preparations for converting the Springfield muskets into breech-loaders. The power and endurance of the 8-inch and 12-inch cast-iron rifle cannon have been subjected to practical tests, and the experiments will be continued. The ordnance returns for three consecutive years, including a period of active service and ordinary repairs, show an average duration of five years for cavalry carbines, of four years for cavalry pistols, sabers, and accouterments, of seven years for infantry muskets, and of six years for infantry accouterments. From January 1, 1861, to June 30, 1866, the ordnance department provided 7,892 cannon; 11,787 artillery carriages; 4,022,120 small-arms; 2,362,546 complete sets of accouterments for infantry and cavalry; 539,544 complete sets of cavalry horse equipments; 28,164 sets of horse artillery harness; 1,022,176,474 cartridges for small-arms; 1,220,555,435 percussion caps; 2,862,177 rounds of fixed artillery ammunition; 14,507,682 cannon primers and fuses; 12,875,294 pounds of artillery projectiles; 26,440,054 pounds of gunpowder; 6,395,152 pounds of niter, and 90,416,295 pounds of lead. In addition to these, there were immense quantities of parts provided for repairing and making good articles damaged, lost, or destroyed in the service. The fiscal resources of the Ordnance Bureau for the year amounted to $35,301,062 56, and the expenditures to $16,551,677 58, leaving a balance of $18,749,385 18, of which $18,043,804 28 were undrawn balances in the Treasury, and $705,580 90 were to the credit of disbursing officers in the Government depositories on June 30, 1866. The estimated appropriation required by the Ordnance office, including only such objects as require early attention, is $1,593,242.

In the office of the Commissary General of Prisoners a reduced force has been engaged in receiving and completing the records relating to prisoners of war, in furnishing information required by the various bureaus, and in the investigation of claims for commutation of rations to United States soldiers while held as prisoners of war.

The clerical force at the office of the Signal Corps is employed in arranging and putting in durable form messages and reports which passed through or emanated from the corps during the war. The expenditures for the signal service during the year ending September 30, 1866, were $8,900 15; the total amount appropriated and still available for signal service September 30, 1866, was $252,565 97. No appropriation was requested of last Congress, and none will be required for the next fiscal year.

At the last examination the corps of Cadets at the Military Academy numbered two hundred and twenty-eight members, and forty cadets of the graduating class completed the course of studies and were commissioned lieutenants in the Army. Under the provisions of the acts of Congress approved, respectively, July 13 and 28, 1866, the Military Academy was separated from the corps of Engineers, which, together with certain professors and cadets, had heretofore constituted the institution, and the officers of which had exercised exclusive supervision and control over it. Brevet Major General Edmund Schriver, Inspector General, has been assigned as inspector, and Colonel T. G. Pitcher, of the forty-fourth infantry, appointed Superintendent. The report of the Board of Visitors for 1867 bears ample testimony to the usefulness and excellent condition of the Academy, and recommends the increase of the number of cadets to four hundred. With the present number of cadets but one graduate can be supplied to each regiment every second year, after the ordinary demands of the staff corps are met. During the past session of Congress important measures were adopted respecting the Academy, raising the standard of qualifications for admission, and requiring that appointments be hereafter made one year in advance of the date of admission. The inspector, from personal observation, reports the authorities of the institution as most assiduous in their efforts to advance the interests of the Academy and its cadets. Its administration is characterized by economy, and habits of frugality are inculcated. Excellent discipline is maintained and judiciously enforced. The estimated appropriation for the Military Academy is $243,867.

In the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands the Commissioner reports that there is no material change of organization, but business is facilitated and vexed questions settled by the law of 1866. The jurisdiction of assistant commissioners coincides generally with department and district commands, but is distinct in Maryland and the District of Columbia. Under the new law Maryland and Kentucky are embraced, and these States seem to require aid from the bureau in promoting the interests of justice and education. In the northern cities employment offices, of little expense to the Government, and not a source of revenue, have been established with a view to obtain work and homes for dependent freed people and to relieve crowded localities. The importance of self-support has been urged by proper means upon the laboring classes. Wages have been determined, not by orders of bureau officers, but by circumstances ordinarily affecting the price of labor in different localities. The education of freedmen and refugees has been carried on vigorously, under the immediate patronage of benevolent societies. A superintendent of education, devoting his whole time to his work, is stationed at the bureau headquarters in each State, and all bureau officers cooperate with him. It is estimated that one hundred and fifty thousand freedmen and their children are now attending school in the southern States. Schools for refugee white children are also established. Their formation is everywhere encouraged by the bureau.

There has been but little uniformity of action in different States in respect to the administration of justice. Assistant commissioners have been instructed to transfer military jurisdiction as rapidly as possible to State judicial tribunals. This has been done completely in some States, while in Virginia, Louisiana, and Texas, bureau courts are still in existence. A claim division instituted in March last, and aided by officers and agents throughout the States, has sought to prevent frauds upon colored soldiers in their efforts to collect unpaid claims. One hundred and ninety-five claims were paid through the office of the Commissioner; 723 rejected at his office; 1,532 are in process of adjustment. The aggregate amount collected and paid is $10,539 00. Detailed reports are given of the operations of the bureau in each State and the District of Columbia. Transportation is reported as furnished to 6,352 destitute freed people and 387 refugees. Thirteen million four hundred and twelve thousand two hundred and seventy-three rations were issued between June 1, 1865, and September 1, 1866. The average number per month to refugees and freedmen was 894,569; the average number per day 29,819. The issue to whites increased until June 30, 1866, when issues to freedmen and refugees were about equal. From June 30, 1866, to September 1, the number supported of both classes has diminished. Rigid scrutiny has been exercised to prevent issues to any but the absolutely destitute, and parts of the ration not actually needed were cut off. Officers were directed to hold each plantation, county, parish, and town responsible for the care of its own poor, but to very little purpose, for with few exceptions the State authorities have failed to contribute to the relief of the class of persons supported by the Government. Owing to the failure of crops the requirements of Circular 10, of August 22, could not be rigidly enforced. Upon the application of State officials, special issues are being made to certain States for the support of their pauper population. Rations are sold to teachers and agents of benevolent societies under the same rules that apply to such purchases made by commissioned officers. Bureau hospitals receive the usual freedmen's ration. The amount of land now in possession of the bureau is 272,231 acres, to be increased by 228 tracts in Tennessee, of which the number of acres has not been reported. The aggregate number of parcels of town property, not included in the above, which have been in possession of the bureau is 3,724, of which 2,605 have been restored, leaving a balance of 1,119 parcels of town property.

In compliance with recent enactments of Congress, commissioners to assess the value of slaves enlisted into the United States Army during the war have been appointed for Missouri, Maryland, Kentucky, and Tennessee, but their reports have not yet been received.

In conclusion, it gives me pleasure to again express my obligations to the chiefs of bureaus and their subordinates, who, in reducing the War Department to a peace establishment, have evinced the same diligence, ability, and fidelity to the interests of the Government that distinguished them during the labors, anxiety, and vicissitudes of the war, and contributed so much to its successful termination.

EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

Report of General U. S. Grant, Commanding Army.

HEADQUARTERS ARMIES OF THE UNITED STATES,
WASHINGTON, November 21, 1866.

SIR: Since my report for 1865, the volunteer force then in service has been almost entirely replaced by the regular Army, mostly organized under the act of Congress, approved 28th July, 1866. The report of the Adjutant General of the Army gives exact statistics on this subject.

Passing from civil war of the magnitude of that in which the United States has been engaged to government through the courts, it has been deemed necessary to keep a military force in all the lately rebellious States to insure the execution of law, and to protect life and property against the acts of those who, as yet, will acknowledge no law but force. This class has proven to be much smaller than could have been expected after such a conflict. It has, however, been sufficiently formidable to justify the course which has been pursued. On the whole, the condition of the States that were in rebellion against the Government may be regarded as good enough to warrant the hope that but a short time will intervene before the bulk of the troops now occupying them can be sent to our growing Territories, where they are so much needed.

I respectfully refer you to the reports of Generals Sherman, Halleck, Meade, Sheridan, Thomas, Sickles, McDowell, Pope, and Steele, herewith, for full information of the condition of the States and Territories under their command. The last of these reports is but this moment received. The time has passed when they should be in the hands of the Printer to prepare them for presentation to Congress on its assembling. To make a full report I would have to get my facts from these reports. Time not permitting, I beg to refer to them in lieu of their condensation by me.

With the expiration of the rebellion, Indian hostilities have diminished. With a frontier constantly extending and encroaching upon the hunting-grounds of the Indian, hostilities, opposition at least, frequently occur. To meet this, and to protect the emigrant on his way to the mountain Territories, troops have been distributed to give the best protection with the means at hand. Few places are occupied by more than two, and many by but a single company. These troops are generally badly sheltered, and are supplied at great cost. During the past summer inspections were made by Generals Sherman, Pope, Ingalls, Sackett, and Babcock, to determine the proper places to occupy to give the best protection to travel and settlements, and to determine the most economical method of furnishing supplies. The labor of putting up temporary quarters is performed by the troops intending to occupy them. In the course of the next season more permanent buildings will have to be erected, however, which will entail an expense for material at least. I would respectfully suggest, therefore, that an appropriation for this special purpose be asked.

The permanent peace establishment being much larger than has been heretofore provided for, an appropriation for building barracks, storehouses, &c., to meet present wants, seems to be required. The reports of the heads of the staff departments of the Army, particularly that of the Quartermaster General, may cover this point.

I would respectfully suggest for the consideration of Congress the propriety of transferring the Indian Bureau from the Interior to the War Department, and the abolition of Indian agencies, with the exception of a limited number of inspectors. The reason for this change seems to me both obvious and satisfactory. It would result in greater economy of expenditure, and, as I think, diminution of conflict between the Indian and white races.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,
your obedient servant,

U. S. GRANT, General.

HON. E. M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

HEADQUARTERS

ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI,
November 5, 1866.

GENERAL: On my return from a two months' tour on the plains, I had the honor to receive the letter from your headquarters of October 8, 1866, calling for a report of the operations of the troops of my command during the past year. Having in the mean time been called to Washington, and now again being under orders that will compel my departure to-morrow, I am forced to slight the task.

Upon the close of the great war of the rebellion, June 27, 1865, the whole territory of the United States was divided into five great military divisions, of which that styled the military division of the Mississippi fell to my share. It was composed of the department of the Ohio, Major General Ord commanding; the department of the Missouri, Major General Pope commanding, and the department of Arkansas, Major General J. J. Reynolds commanding. The first business that demanded our attention was the disbandment of the vast armies that had been formed in the war, and the reduction of the depots of accumulated stores. This progressed with great rapidity under the orders of the War Department; but, still, on the 31st of October, 1865, there remained in service 1,487 commissioned officers, and 25,487 enlisted men. They were composed of a small proportion of the old Army, and of volunteers who had been enlisted for the war and who claimed their discharge; but they were stationed in remote districts where they could not be replaced during the winter season, and we had no regular troops available for the purpose. Still the reduction of all irregular troops was pushed as fast as the season would permit, even at the risk of public property; so that by the 31st of October, 1866, the aggregate troops in the military division was reported 678 commissioned officers and 13,953 enlisted men.

By general orders of the War Department of August 6, 1866, an entire change in the territorial commands was made. This military division became that of the Missouri. The department of the Ohio was taken out entirely, and the territory lying west of the Mississippi and east of the Rocky mountains was divided into four departments, namely: department of Dakota, Major General Terry commanding; department of the Platte, Major General Cooke commanding; department of the Missouri, Major General Hancock commanding, and department of the Arkansas, Major General Ord commanding. This remains the case at this time, and as all irregular troops have been discharged, I have distributed the regular troops as follows:

Department of Dakota: the tenth, thirteenth, twenty-second, and thirty-first regiments of infantry, and two hundred Indian scouts.

Department of the Platte: battery C, third artillery, second regiment cavalry, the eighteenth, twenty-seventh, and thirty-sixth regiments of infantry, and two hundred Indian scouts.

Department of the Missouri: battery B, fourth artillery, third and seventh regiments of cavalry, eight companies tenth cavalry, (colored,) the third, fifth, thirty-seventh, thirty-eighth (colored) regiments of infantry, and one hundred and fifty Indian scouts.

Department of the Arkansas: battery B, fifth artillery, four companies tenth cavalry, (colored,) nineteenth and twenty-eighth regiments of infantry, and fifty Indian scouts.

This distribution of troops was made rather with a view to the future than to the immediate condition of affairs, and when these regiments are fully organized, armed, and instructed, I think they will secure the general peace and security of the country, and of the national interests intrusted to my keeping. The act of Congress providing the new military peace establishment passed at so late a date that we could hardly expect the new troops to be ready this year; but as much progress has been made in the enlistment and organization of the new regiments as could have been expected.

In order to an understanding of the great military problem to be solved, I must state in general terms that this military division embraces the vast region from the Mississippi river to the Rocky mountains, of an average breadth (east and west) of one thousand three hundred and fifty miles, and length (north and south) of over one thousand miles, namely, from the south border of New Mexico to the British line. On the east are the fertile and rapidly improving States of Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, and Arkansas. Immediately on the west are the Territories and States of Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, and the Indian Territory. The land on this eastern border is fertile and well adapted to settlement; but their western parts are a vast prairie, with good grasses, but generally devoid of trees or minerals, are subject to droughts, and are not inviting to settlers. Next in order are the mountainous Territories of Montana, Utah, Colorado, and New Mexico, composed of high plateaus and mountains, containing minerals of every kind, with forests of timber and numerous valleys susceptible of high cultivation, either by means of the ordinary rains, or the more certain system of irrigation that has been begun within a comparatively recent period, and has been pushed with an energy and success that promises the best results. These new and mountain Territories present a most interesting feature in our future development as a nation, and are, in my judgment, worthy the liberal and fostering care of the General Government. Between these mountain Territories and those of the river border lie the great plains of America, which have been well mapped and described by the hundreds of explorers that have traversed them from the time of the expeditions of Pike, and Lewis and Clark, as early as 1803, until the present moment. These plains can never be cultivated like Illinois, never be filled with inhabitants capable of self-government and self-defense as against Indians and marauders, but at best can become a vast pasture-field, open and free to all for the rearing of herds of horses, mules, cattle, and sheep. The mountain Territories seem to be more rapidly improving and assuming a condition of self-protection and defense, because the people can acquire fixed habitations, and their property is generally grouped in valleys of some extent, or in localities of mines capable of sustaining a people strong enough to guard themselves against the predatory bands of nomadic Indians. Still they occupy at this time an isolated position, presenting a thinly-settled frontier in every direction, with a restless people branching out in search of a better place, or of better mines. To defend them perfectly is an utter impossibility, and all we can do is to aid the people in self-defense, until in time they can take care of themselves, and to make the roads by which they travel or bring their stores from the older parts of our country as safe as the case admits of.

This brings me to the consideration of the question of the Indians, who, in nomadic and predatory bands, infest the whole country described, sometimes in one place and then in another. These Indians are universally, by the people of our frontier and of our isolated Territories, regarded as hostile, and we, the military, charged with a general protection of the infant settlements and long routes of travel, have to dispose our troops and act as though they were hostile; while by the laws of Congress, and the acts of our executive authorities, these Indians are construed as under the guardianship and protection of the General Government, through civilian agents. This whole subject has heretofore been so ably reported on by General Pope and others, well qualified to judge, that I will not here renew the discussion, but merely state as the result of my own judgment that the entire management of the Indians should be controlled by the military authorities, and that the commanding officers of the troops should have, not only the surveillance of these Indians, but should supervise and control the disbursement of moneys and distribution of presents to the tribes under past and future treaties. Indians do not read, and only know of our power and strength by what they see, and they always look to the man who commands soldiers as the representative of our Government. The complaints of short payment by the agents are universal, and the Indians themselves would be more likely to receive the ample annuities appropriated by Congress if the agents were required to make the semi-annual payments subject to the inspection and control of the military commanders, who, as a rule, are not so liable to be corrupted by the chances of gain and speculation as temporary appointees.

The Indians who have heretofore been located on reservations, such as the Wyandotts, Shawnees, Pottawatomies, Pawnees, Cherokees, Choctaws, Creeks, &c., have given little or no trouble the last year, and do not come within our supervision more than our own people. But the wandering Sioux, who rove from Minnesota to Montana, and down as far as the Arkansas, have done acts of predatory hostility almost impossible to foresee or to prevent. In like manner the Arapahoes and Cheyennes, Kiowas, Comanches and Apaches, Navajoes and Utes, though supposed to be restricted to reservations, will not settle down, but they roam according to their habits, over the vast plains, and they too have done acts of hostility, though the old men and chiefs of the tribes deny the acts altogether, or charge them on their young men, who, when absent on the hunt, are beyond their control.

I propose the coming year, (with your consent, and with that of the Secretary of the Interior, in whose control these Indians are supposed to be,) to restrict the Sioux north of the Platte, west of the Missouri river, and east of the new road to Montana which starts from Laramie for Virginia City by way of Forts Reno, Philip Kearney, C. F. Smith, &c. All Sioux found outside of these limits without a written pass from some military commander, defining clearly their object, should be dealt with summarily. In like manner I would restrict the Arapahoes, Cheyennes, Comanches, Kiowas, Apaches, and Navajoes south of the Arkansas and east of Fort Union. This would leave for our people exclusively the use of the wide belt, east and west, between the Platte and the Arkansas, in which lie the two great railroads, and over which passes the bulk of travel to the mountain Territories. As long as these Indians can hunt the buffalo and antelope within the described limits we will have the depredations of last summer, and, worse yet, the exaggerations of danger raised by our own people, often for a very base purpose. It is our duty, and it shall be my study, to make the progress of construction of the great Pacific railways that lay in this belt of country as safe as possible, as also to protect the stage and telegraph lines against any hostile bands, but they are so long that to guard them perfectly is an impossibility, unless we can restrict the Indians as herein stated. I beg you will submit this proposition to the honorable Secretary of the Interior, that we may know that we do not violate some one of the solemn treaties made with these Indians, who are very captious, and claim to the very letter the execution on our part of those treaties, the obligation of which they seem to comprehend perfectly.

39TH CONG....2D SESS.

Report of the Secretary of War.

SENATE &amp; HO. OF REPS.

In the department of Dakota I propose that General Terry shall make the Missouri river as safe to boats as possible, and that he shall open and protect the new route from Minnesota to Montana, and afford the stages and wagons that travel that long and exposed route all the assistance in his power.

In the department of the Platte I propose that General Cooke shall continue to cover the building and engineering operations of the Pacific railway that is under construction up the Platte, and has accomplished two hundred and seventy-five miles of road, substantially, this year; that he shall next year complete the wagon road from Fort Laramie to Virginia City, which the Indians give notice they will resist. They represent it as passing through the only remaining hunting-grounds they have; but this road is necessary to Montana, and must be finished and made safe. It is on this road that we have encountered most trouble this year, and the Indians have killed Lieutenant Daniels, eighteenth infantry, twenty-four soldiers, and about twenty citizens connected with trains. All these deaths must be avenged next year. By reason of the discharge of all volunteers, and the late period at which we were provided a regular Army, we were too weak to attempt it this year, and must do so the next.

In the department of the Missouri General Hancock is charged with the protection of the Smoky Hill and Arkansas routes, and of the exposed settlements of Colorado and New Mexico. This is a most difficult problem. He will, of course, continue to give every assistance to the construction of the Union Pacific railway, now done to Fort Riley, and under contract for two hundred and fifty miles beyond; and he will do all that is possible to encourage and protect the settlements on the tributaries of the Upper Arkansas and along the eastern base of the Rocky mountains. These are most important in a military sense, and they hold out the promise of a country that can now partially, and will soon be able to feed the men and horses needed in that hitherto desolate region at reasonable prices. Denver is already an important city, and the valleys of the Cache-la-Poudre, Thompson's creek, Boulder, Fontaine-qui-bouille, Huerfano and Purgatoire already present beautiful farms, and will, with some assistance and protection, soon be able to defend themselves as against any band of Indians likely to threaten them. But from all I can learn, New Mexico does not hold out the same hopes. It has been settled longer than Ohio, and yet remains poor and exposed, with but a thin line of fields along the banks of the Rio Grande, liable at all times to be swept by the inroads of the nomad Indians that surround it. The whole Territory seems a pastoral land, but not fit for cultivation. The mines undeveloped are supposed to be very valuable, but as yet remain mostly in a state of nature. We have held this Territory since 1846, twenty years, at a cost to the national Treasury of full $100,000,000, and I doubt if it will ever reimburse to the country a tithe of that sum. The entire population may be assumed at a hundred thousand, and the minimum force required there will not fall much short of two thousand five hundred men, which should be mostly of cavalry. Much of the very food consumed by men and horses has to be hauled over a thousand miles, at a cost of fifteen cents a pound, and the cost of every man will average $1,000 a year. General Carleton, who commands there, is thoroughly conversant with all its history and interests, and seems alive to his obligations to the General Government. With the consent of the War Department he has collected as prisoners of war the hostile Navajoes and Apaches to the number of 8,793 men, women, and children, on a reservation forty miles square, at the Bosque Redondo, (Fort Sumner;) and General Haines, my chief commissary, reports the cost of feeding them alone at from $60,000 to $70,000 a month. This is done on the supposition that it costs less to feed than fight them.

In this connection I send herewith a most full and complete report by General Carleton, of date October 17, 1866, called for by me during my recent tour. I invite your special attention to the papers indorsed by him, giving the abstract of the Indian scouts for the years 1863 and 1864; and I infer these fights have been much less frequent since he has collected the hostile Indians on the reserve. You will observe, also, that his calculation is that the Indians will soon be self-supporting. I hope so, for surely we cannot afford to feed them at the present rate without asking a special appropriation of Congress. I also here subjoin the most valuable and comprehensive report of General Pope on the same matters, of date August 13, 1866, and think that his views are entitled to very great weight and consideration. I think these Navajoes and Apaches, the Cheyennes and Arapahoes, with the Kiowas, could probably be got to reservations near the Cherokees and Choctaws; but between them and the Utes and the Sioux there is a traditional hereditary war that cannot be reconciled in one generation. They will not live together; and, indeed, while by feeding the Indians we may keep some quiet, others will be as hard to keep to their reservations as the wild buffaloes. After the next year's experience I hope to be able to advise some more specific measures than are embraced herein.

In the department of Arkansas General J. J. Reynolds has managed matters so quietly and so skillfully that we have not had a particle of trouble. In matters connected with the freed negroes he was admirably seconded by the commissioner, General Sprague, a most accomplished soldier and gentleman. I feel assured that General Ord, who has recently succeeded General Reynolds, will continue in that department to maintain absolute peace, and that plenty and prosperity will soon repay the labors of the industrious inhabitants. The Indians to the west of Arkansas are reported as more nearly approaching civilization than any Indians ever did on this continent. It is worthy an effort on our part to endeavor to spread their influence, and to attract to the same quarter all of the Plain Indians that can be induced to remove there, and by contact and example to learn to cultivate land and raise cattle and horses, by which many of the Choctaws and Chickasaws, Cherokees and Creeks have become quite wealthy and respectable.

Inasmuch as I am compelled to leave on distant duty, from which I may not return in time for the usual reports to Congress, I will call on the department commanders for subordinate reports, to be transmitted on receipt, and to be supplementary to this; and to them I must refer for more precise details of actual events during the past year.

I am, with great respect, your obedient servant,

W. T. SHERMAN,

Lieutenant General Commanding.

General JOHN A. RAWLINS, Chief of Staff to General Grant, Commanding Armies of the United States, Washington, D. C.

FORT UNION, NEW MEXICO, August 11, 1866.

DEAR GENERAL: I have just returned to this place from an inspection of this Territory, as far as I had the time to make it, and as far as I think it was necessary, and I shall leave here for Fort Leavenworth on the 15th instant. In order that you may understand fully the condition of affairs as it appears to me, and the measures I have adopted to obviate or at least prepare for anticipated troubles, I will begin with my departure from Denver.

As I wrote you from that place on the 2d of July, the condition and feeling of the Ute Indians are unsatisfactory, not to say alarming. In addition to other causes of trouble, the southern bands of these Indians are suffering for food; many of them, indeed, are in a starving condition. Venison has become very scarce, and in the several attempts they have made to supply their actual necessities by hunting buffalo on the plains, they have been beaten in fight by their hereditary enemies, the Comanches, Kiowas, Cheyennes, and Arapahoes, and driven back to the mountains. The Indian department has refused to supply them even with the scantiest food, and, as you know, it is neither the business of the military, nor, in fact, as matters stand, is it in their power to supply these deficiencies. In this state of things, the Utes are compelled either to starve to death or supply their pressing wants by depredating upon the herds and flocks of the nearest settlements. These depredations, although trifling in the quantity of stock taken, occasion, of course, great dissatisfaction and uneasiness among the settlers, and have led to various violent acts which will very soon culminate in open and extensive hostilities, unless something is done to remedy this deplorable condition of things.

The Indians are anxious to be at peace, as they have always been, but they must kill a few cattle and sheep now or then, or starve. For such acts I cannot consider them at war, nor authorize hostilities against them; neither can I prevent this small robbery they are committing, as I have no proper jurisdiction over treaty Indians at peace. I can neither pay the owners of stock thus appropriated, nor withhold compensation from the Indian annuities. The only measures I have the power to adopt consist in making such disposition of the force at my command as will cover as effectually as such a small force can the settlements most exposed to these Indians, and prevent the probability of anything like general hostilities, or a general devastation of the exposed Ute frontier.

If you will examine the maps, you will find south of the dividing ridge, between the Platte and the Arkansas, a number of considerable stream tributary to the latter river. Of these, the most important are the "Fontaine qui bouillir," the Upper Arkansas, the St. Charles, the Huerfano, and the Purgatory. Between Bent's old fort and the mountains the valleys of these streams are pretty thickly populated, for this region, and extensively cultivated. The northern extremity of these settlements is Colorado City, (a very small village,) at the head of the "Fontaine," and the most southern the little Mexican village of Trinidad, on the Purgatory, at the base of the Raton peak. The distance between these extreme points is about one hundred and thirty miles. In order to cover these settlements, as far as possible, with the small force disposable, I have ordered the establishment of a post of two cavalry companies and one infantry company on or near the Upper Huerfano, where it issues from the mountains. This post will be near to the several passes through which the Utes descend to the plains, and about midway between Colorado City and Trinidad. I think it will be sufficient to control the outlets from the mountains, and cover as far as it is practicable to do so this extensive range of unprotected settlements. In addition to this post, I shall instruct the commanding officer at Fort Lyon to patrol the valley of the Purgatory and Upper Arkansas, as high up as Pueblo, by a company of cavalry, at least once every month. These arrangements will probably prevent any extensive outbreak and general massacre, but are of course powerless to remedy the causes which are surely bringing about open hostilities with the Utes. I have extended the limits of the district of New Mexico to embrace that portion of Colorado south of Colorado City for convenience, and because the troops used on the Ute frontier come from this district, and are in more easy communication with Fort Union than with Laramie.

SENATE &amp; HO. OF REPS.

Report of the Secretary of War.

In like manner the settlements in southern Colorado, along the Rio Grande, west of the "Sange de Christo" mountains, (the San Luis valley,) and the settlements west of the Rio Grande between that river and the San Juan, are open to the depredations of the Utes, who have already done the same acts so loudly complained of east of the mountains.

Fort Garland, on the Rio Grande, at the head of the San Luis valley, is well placed to cover all the settlements along the Rio Grande toward the south. It is about eighty miles west of the new post to be established on the Upper Huerfano, and will contain a garrison of four companies. One hundred miles southeast of Garland, and near to or on the San Juan river, I have also directed a post to be established of four companies to protect the settlements in its rear and on the San Juan.

These three posts constitute a chain of posts along the southern and eastern frontier of the Ute country, and they will, I think, render a general Indian outbreak difficult.

Between the Utes in the north and the Apaches along the extreme southern frontier of New Mexico, there was but one tribe of Indians west of the Rio Grande, (the Navajoes.) These Indians, after an active campaign against them, were collected together by General Carleton and placed upon a reservation on the extreme eastern frontier of the Territory, where, controlled by the presence of a considerable military force, and subsisted by the Government, they are still held as prisoners of war.

Large fields have been opened, and the Indians are learning to work in them and at other occupations, so that it is hoped that in a year or two, if permitted to remain, they may be able to contribute largely to their own support. The retention of this reservation where it is, and under present conditions, I do not consider judicious even if it were practicable.

It is unnecessary to say that the past history of our relations with the Indians has made it clear that in the settlement of new Territories, the time must arrive when the Indians are so pressed upon by the whites at so many points, and under such circumstances, that the security neither of whites nor Indians is longer compatible with the wild life and wandering habits of the Indians. This unavoidable condition of things renders it necessary to restrict the Indian to certain limits, and to buy for the occupation of the white settlers the districts of country thus vacated by him. This necessity has given rise to the "reservation system," to which in the future, as in the past, all the Indians on the continent must be gradually subjected. The necessity and good policy of the reservation system are, I believe, generally, if not indeed unanimously admitted; but the location of these reservations and the conditions under which the Indians are to be placed upon them have given rise to differences of opinion which have greatly obstructed any satisfactory conclusion. In the earlier history of the country, the policy of locating these reservations in the country inhabited by the tribe of Indians concerned was adopted for the Indians of the northwestern States, including Ohio.

Without going into particulars of history too well known, it may be stated as the result of this policy of locating reservations, that after a long period of bloodshed and horror, during which the Indians were gradually driven from one reservation to another, the great tribes of Indians formerly occupying the region north of the Ohio and east of the Mississippi have been nearly exterminated, and the scattered and feeble remnants are now found distributed along the extreme western frontier of Kansas and Nebraska.

Of all the powerful and populous tribes which once inhabited the Northwest, but a few hundreds of hopeless and helpless stragglers remain. Of the history of the white settlers, the pioneers of emigration in the great States of the Northwest, it is unnecessary to speak. Such a record of nameless horrors, of gross inhumanity to whites and Indians, and of lavish and wasteful expenditure of public money, cannot at this day be read without astonishment and indignation. Such a process of extermination of both Indians and white men has never before been permitted to go on under the eyes of a Christian people, and it will long remain a reproach to this Government. Feeble, worn out, and dispirited as we find them to-day, these wretched remnants of the powerful tribes once famous in our history cannot yet be left in peace. Some of them have already been removed to the Indian country west of Arkansas, and the remainder will soon follow, and it is hoped that they may there be permitted to die in peace, and their names and tribe be forgotten. Very different was the history of the southern tribes and of the pioneers of Tennessee, Georgia, and other southern States. Warned, apparently, by the deplorable results of the policy pursued north of the Ohio river, the Government, in dealing with the southern tribes, so far modified the system of reservation as greatly to obviate most of the evil results which had marked its operation south of the Ohio.

An extensive district of country west of the Mississippi was selected as specially Indian territory, and the southern tribes—after some fruitless efforts to control them in their own country—were at once removed to it without undergoing the intermediate stages which had marked in blood the course of the northern tribes. Compare the condition of the two branches of the same race, now first brought together in this common territory. The southern tribes are still numerous and powerful, and, as far as Indians can be, they are prosperous and progressive.

It is needless to repeat what I have said of the condition of the wretched fragments of the great northern tribes. Contrast, too, the history of the white settlers of the States north and south of the Ohio. In these differences will be found the different results of a policy of Indian reservations located in a country claimed by the Indians, from which they must again and again be removed before the advance of white emigration, and a policy which at once separates the races and removes the Indian to a region selected for his sole occupation, and so remote from his original country that return is hopeless.

The foregoing remarks are simply introductory to a brief statement of the policy which I have so often urged upon the Government for the past three years, in letters to the Secretary of War, General Grant, and yourself.

As I have before said, the time inevitably comes in the history of the settlement of new Territories when it is necessary for the security of both whites and Indians that the Indians should be placed upon a reservation. That time has arrived in the case of several tribes of Indians within the limits of this department. It is understood to be the purpose of the Indian department to collect these tribes, and place them upon reservations in their own country. This process is merely a continuation of the policy which was pursued toward the Indians north of the Ohio, to which I have briefly referred, and must of necessity be attended with like results. It has been tried in Texas in quite recent times; it is being tried in New Mexico to-day under the most favorable conditions. In both cases it has worked precisely as our history might and should have taught us. Perhaps it will be well to detail briefly the course and results of this system.

An Indian tribe is collected together and placed upon a limited reservation in some part of the same territory; once there the Indian is partly subsisted by the Government, and partly subsists himself by hunting.

The Indian is thus left in his own country, every foot of which is familiar to him; he retains his arms and horses; he must of necessity be permitted to indulge to some extent in his wild life and wandering habits; he has nearly unrestricted access to the settlements upon which his depredations have been committed, and is nearly or quite free to maintain his intercourse with the wild tribes and to be subjected to all the influences of savage life. It is in human nature, too, that the Indian agent or the military commander placed in charge of a reservation of this kind should feel a pride in his administration, and in the good conduct of the Indians, and that he should be very unwilling to admit that depredations or outrages were committed by them. These reservations, therefore, soon become places of refuge for the Indian after he has murdered or robbed the white settlers. The advance of the white emigration presses more and more closely around the Indian reservations, and narrows the range of hunting-grounds of the Indian more and more, until each day makes it more difficult for him to supply himself with those articles of food which the Government does not give him. The herds and flocks of the settlers, and their property of every kind which the Indian covets, are daily brought more nearly within his reach, and temptingly displayed under his very eyes. The land upon which his reservation is located daily becomes more valuable by the growth of settlements around it, and is therefore daily more coveted by the whites, who, in the exposed settlements and loose state of society on the frontier, are prompt to redress any petty theft or wrong-doing by a bullet. The relentless hate occasioned by the remembrance of violence and outrage committed by these very Indians, makes it impossible for the whites to understand that "the Indian has any rights he is bound to respect." But one result can follow from such relations between whites and Indians: day by day the difficulties and broils increase; all crime committed in the whole country around is charged by the whites upon the Indians on these reservations, until, after outrages and murders on both sides, and great suffering both to whites and Indians, it is finally found absolutely necessary to remove the Indian to another reservation more remote, where, in time, the same causes produce the same results, until the Indian tribe is totally exterminated after something like the extermination of the early settlers. It would be difficult to devise a system which could work more wrong and inhumanity to both races. Our past history is conclusive on this subject. The necessity of placing Indians upon reservations as soon as their relations to white emigration endanger peace, is freely admitted. The question is, "Where shall such reservations be located, and under what conditions shall the Indians be placed upon them?" A correct answer to this question will go far to solve the Indian problem. There are several elements which enter into the solution of this question.

SENATE &amp; HO. OF REPS.

1. The Indian must be so placed that he can never again be brought into contact with white emigration, nor obstruct the settlement and development of the new Territories.

2. He ought to be placed where he can be subjected, under the most favorable conditions, to the influences of Christianity and civilization, and be taught to labor and to support himself.

3. As he must, for a time at least, be supported by the Government, he ought to be placed where provisions and other necessities of life are cheapest.

4. He should be placed where the smallest possible military force would be needed to control him until he had learned to control himself.

5. He ought to be placed where sympathy and kindness are felt for his race, instead of relentless hostility; where society is established, and the laws thoroughly executed; where the great preponderance of the white population around him, and his security under the law, as well as his immediate and certain punishment for wrong-doing, would deprive him of the power, and, in time, of the inclination to indulge his savage propensities; where all intercourse with the wild Indians, and all power to indulge his wandering habits, would be taken from him; where, in fact, he would be surrounded only with the best influences, and could at least be made a harmless member of the community, if he could not be made a good citizen and good Christian.

It is manifest that not one of these conditions could be secured under a system which should keep the Indian in remote districts of country, in front of the white emigration and in contact with the very advance of the white settlers on one side, and with the wild tribes of Indians on the other.

The plan which I propose differs from that which seems to have been determined on by the Indian department, in this, that I propose to remove the Indians of New Mexico, Colorado, &c., to the East, instead of the West; toward that portion of country where food and other necessities of life are cheapest, instead of where these things are most expensive; where the fewest troops, maintained at the least expense, would be needed; where the Indian could no longer be an obstacle to the settlement and development of the great mining regions, nor himself be subjected to that process of certain extermination which his obstruction to the advance of white emigration now renders inevitable, and where he could be placed under all the conditions most favorable to his welfare and security and to the safety of the frontier settlers.

To this plan it is objected that it is too grand in its proportions, and would be attended with too great expense ever to be executed. Let us examine this question.

It is needless to say that it is not proposed to accomplish all this in a year, or in ten, or even twenty years. There are, and will continue to be, wild tribes of Indians, whose existence in a wild state does not endanger the settlement of the country; with these tribes, for the present, it is not proposed to interfere. The tribes to whom it is proposed to apply this system of removal from time to time are precisely the tribes which the Indian department propose to begin to place upon reservations—those tribes which are now so closely in contact with the whites as to endanger both races.

It is also needless to say that the main difficulty consists in collecting these Indians together and putting them en route to a reservation. Up to this point the plan of the Indian department and that suggested by me are identical, as is also the expense; a comparison, therefore, only begins at this point. When once the Indians are collected and ready to move, is it more economical to establish them where food is most costly, and where every necessary of life is an expensive article of luxury? Where twice as many troops would be needed, maintained at four times the expense? Where the Indians would continue to depredate upon the people, and be subjected to the same process of extermination as before? Where they would obstruct the settlement of the country and jeopard the peace of the future? Is it really believed that the additional expense of transportation over a few hundred miles would not be many times overcome within a year or two by cheapness of food and decrease of military force? Is it really believed that a temporary arrangement, with all its evils, and, to say the least of it, partial security, can be better than a final and complete disposition of the Indians? Or is there some other reason for establishing and keeping up these unsatisfactory reservations at remote points and at enormous expense, not dictated by humanity, economy, or wisdom, and in opposition to the whole experience of the past?

I presume that I should not differ much, if at all, with the Indian department as to the time when the relations of an Indian tribe to the white emigrants rendered it necessary to place the Indians upon a reservation. I only propose, when that time arrives, we shall make a final and complete disposition of that tribe at least, and not resort to a temporary arrangement, which is attended with little but evil.

It may safely be left to such persons as the Government may select to determine the place where a reservation for any given tribe of Indians shall be established. Such places can be readily found along the Mississippi or Missouri. Only let the Government adopt some policy which secures an end to Indian troubles and massacres, however far in the future, and the details will readily be adjusted. Only let us have a final result, and not a temporary arrangement, which leaves the last state of the Indian and white man worse than the first.

In accordance with these views I consider it both wisdom and economy to remove the Navajo reservation to some point in the Indian Territory west of Arkansas. There is no doubt that the present disposition of these Indians is the best that could have been made at the time, and that their subjugation and establishment under the eye of a military force, where the Indian is taught to labor, and, as far as possible, is restricted to certain limits, reflect great credit upon the energy, good sense, and good management of General Carleton, who commands in this Territory; but, at the best, such an arrangement is temporary, and the time has now arrived (as indeed it existed as soon as these Indians were collected together) to remove them altogether beyond the limits of the Territory. General Carleton, at the time he established the Navajos at this reservation, had not the power to carry them further away from their original country. He removed them as far as possible—to the extreme eastern boundary of the military department he then commanded—and could do no more.

The difficulties and quarrels, and the dissatisfaction on both sides, occasioned by a location of Indian reservations in the country of the Indians, and which I have sketched in some detail heretofore, are in full blast in New Mexico concerning this Navajo reservation, and nothing is heard except complaints of robbery and murder by Navajos, which the Indians counterbalance by very similar charges against the Mexicans. The expense of feeding these Indians where they are is at least four times what it would be in the Indian Territory west of Arkansas, while twice as many troops are needed to guard them here as would be needed there.

In my judgment these Indians ought to be removed at the earliest moment. The cost of moving them would only be the expense of a train to haul the necessary subsistence for them to their place of destination—an expense which would be repaid many times to the Government by the decreased cost of feeding the Indians.

The various bands of Apache Indians, too, should be collected from time to time and removed to the same region.

The bands of Utes in Colorado and the northern part of New Mexico, as well as the Indians of the plains to the eastward, are in such relations with the whites that they too must be collected on reservations, or the communications between the mining regions and the agricultural districts along the Missouri which supply them with food will be strictly cut off, or so much interrupted as to occasion suffering, if not actual destitution. It is needless to say that there is no idea of doing all this at once. Time and patience are needed to complete these operations, but when once completed the matter is settled forever. Reservations for these Indians of Colorado can be readily secured along the Missouri river. Meantime we are obliged to take things as we find them, and to make such use of the military force as will obviate, as far as possible, the evil results of a system of Indian policy which to-day stands condemned by the whole history of the past. Indian wars, and massacres of both whites and Indians, must continue as long as the causes which occasion them remain in force, and as these causes of trouble are every day increasing with the increase of population, we must anticipate in the future an increase in the frequency and violence of Indian outbreaks.

I have established only one new post on the Apache frontier, and that is located near the head of the Mimbres river, about one hundred and fifty miles west of the Rio Grande. This post, with Fort Cummings at Cook Spring, Fort Selden on the Rio Grande, Fort Stanton on the Bonito river, between the Rio Grande and the Pecos, forms a line of posts covering the southern frontier of New Mexico from the Apache Indian.

Some of the posts hitherto established between the northern and southern line of posts I have kept up to protect the settlements against small raiding parties which might slip through the outer lines. Fort Union, Fort Bascom on the Canadian river, one hundred and fifty miles southeast of Union, cover the eastern frontier of New Mexico against the Comanches and other Indians of the plains, and will be garrisoned by six companies of cavalry, disposable for rapid movements on the plains to protect the routes to the Missouri river. With these dispositions of the troops assigned to New Mexico I think all the protection will be afforded which can be under the present system of Indian management.

The same force now engaged in affording this partial protection is entirely sufficient to effect the removal of the Indians from this Territory, as I have suggested, a removal alike demanded by humanity and common sense. A list of the posts, their exact location, and the garrison of each I will send to your office in St. Louis, as I presume you will not want it in your journey. I also send to your headquarters much detailed information concerning the supply of the posts in this Territory, and the unnecessary additional expense occasioned by the bad practice which has grown up during the war of making all contracts at a great distance from the country to be supplied, under the direction of officers totally unacquainted with the resources, people, manner of doing business, prices, or anything else in the districts in question, and utterly without experience or knowledge of service on the frontier. I will make a special report to you on the subject when you return, and meantime I beg that you will inquire into the workings of this system of concentrating the management of contracts and supplies at Washington or other places remote from the districts to be supplied, and of giving direct orders from the staff bureaus in Washington to subordinate officers concerning the details of service in this department, without regard to the orders on the same subject given by the department commander, and, indeed, without any notification to him. In your present journey you will have the opportunity to see how injuriously to the public interests and to proper discipline or performance of duty such a system works, and how impossible it is for the department commander to be responsible for the expenditures or in fact the administration in any respect of his department. This special report will be ready for you when you return, and can be corroborated by your own observations.

In conclusion, I submit a few general observations concerning Colorado and New Mexico, with which for the present I will end a letter already much longer than I intended to make it, or perhaps than was necessary.

Colorado and the routes east from the mining regions need more troops. There ought to be a post on the Middle Park, west of Central City, to cover the mining population from the Ute Indians. I should suppose that for the present one company of infantry and two of cavalry would be sufficient. It is also desirable to establish a post on the Smoky Hill route, between Pond Creek and Denver, near Beaver Station. I will endeavor to detach sufficient force for this purpose from Lyon and Pond Creek, although I fear there are not enough men at those posts for the purpose. I have ordered one company of the eighteenth United States infantry to take post near Denver for escort to trains and other purposes. The land for this force has been given by the citizens free of expense, and the necessary lumber for quarters can be furnished by the quartermaster at Denver from buildings now unoccupied and owned by the Government.

The necessity of keeping an office of the quartermaster and subsistence department at Denver, as suggested to you in my letter of July 2, you will see for yourself during your visit.

For the garrison of Fort Garland, by far the most important post on the Ute frontier, I have authorized the retention until their term of service expires of four companies of New Mexican volunteers, to be consolidated from other companies of the regiment under the command of Kit Carson, who is now the colonel, but who will be reduced to lieutenant colonel. I need not say that Carson is the best man in this country to control these Indians and to prevent war if it can be done. He is personally known to and liked by every Indian of the bands likely to make trouble, and the men he will retain are perfectly familiar with the Indians and the country. I think this battalion should be permanently retained for service on the Ute frontier. I shall consider the Government peculiarly fortunate if war with the Utes can be avoided under the provoking condition of things which I have referred to in the first part of this letter. The damage this tribe could do to the widely-scattered and exposed settlements in southern Colorado and New Mexico, on both sides of the mountains, is incalculable, and we have no sufficient force to prevent such depredations. Peace with these Indians is of all things desirable, and no man is so certain to insure it as Kit Carson.

I must again state to you that I do not consider the treaties lately made with the Sioux, Cheyennes, Arapahoes, Kiowas, and Comanches worth the paper they are written on, for reasons which I have given you so often that you must be sick of hearing them.

I have myself no doubt that hostilities will again break out on the Platte, the Smoky Hill, and the Arkansas rivers before the beginning of winter, and I have accordingly made all the arrangements possible with the small force at my command in this view; what can be done will certainly be done to protect the overland routes, but I fear without much success in case of a general outbreak. I will carefully instruct the posts along the Arkansas on my return, and will place them in the best possible condition for the active service into which they may any day be called.

Very respectfully, yours,

JOHN POPE, Major General.

Major General W. T. SHERMAN,

Report of Major General H. W. Halleck.

HEADQUARTERS

MILITARY DIVISION OF THE PACIFIC,
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA,
October 18, 1866.

GENERAL: In accordance with the instructions of General Grant, I send herewith the reports of Major Generals Steele and McDowell of the military operations in their respective departments during the past year.

It will be seen from the report of General Steele that the Indian hostilities have been mostly confined to that portion of Oregon and Idaho surrounding the valley of Malheur lake and on the upper waters of the Owyhee river, as designated on the map forwarded with my report of August. Most of the Indian depredations in northwestern California and northern Nevada have been committed by the same hostile tribes, namely, the Bannacks, Pi-Utes, and Snakes. The hostility of these Indians is no new thing; they have been at war with the whites, murdering and robbing whenever they could get an opportunity for the last twenty years. They have no fixed habitations, but are continually changing their location in various parts of that extensive country, most of which is mountainous and almost inaccessible for want of roads, and portions of it entirely barren. The traveled roads most molested are those from Star City, Nevada, and Susanville, California, to Ruby City, Idaho, and from the Dalles, Oregon, to Boise City, Idaho. General Steele has two companies of infantry and one of cavalry on the Cañon City road, and I hope to be able to send him two or three other companies of cavalry in the course of a week or two. On the mail route from Chico to Idaho there are four one-company posts, namely, Camp McKee, on Mud lake, Camp McGarry, at Summit lake, Camp C. F. Smith, and Camp Lyon. On the mail route from Star City to Idaho we have a post at the Three Forks of the Owyhee, one at Camp McDermitt, and a new one is now being established in Paradise Valley. Although these will serve to keep the Indians in check they cannot entirely prevent their depredations, for small parties occasionally conceal themselves on the roads, or visit isolated ranches for the purpose of murder and plunder. Hostilities will not entirely cease till these Indians are killed or captured. It will be seen from the reports that much has been done during the past year to break up these savages, and I think that still more will be accomplished during the coming winter.

In northwestern California the Indians have been generally quiet, and the posts at Camps Wright, Gaston, and Lincoln are kept up on account of the Indian reservations in the vicinity of each. Since my report of August 4 the post on Humboldt bay has been broken up. Camps Bidwell and Warner and Fort Klamath are in the hostile Indian country, and convenient for sending out scouting parties.

Camp Independence, on Owens river, in southeastern California, was a two-company post, but General McDowell has recently sent detachments from that place to form temporary camps in Nevada, near the White mountain range, to protect the mining settlements there. No serious difficulties have yet occurred in that part of the country.

In regard to military operations in the Territory of Arizona, the accompanying report of Major General McDowell is so full as to require but few remarks by me. I respectfully call your attention to what is said in regard to the want of company and regimental officers, and also to the remarks on the value of the native troops there. It is greatly to be regretted that they could not be retained in service. The experiment of cultivating a Government farm near Fort McDowell has been a complete success, and will serve to encourage agricultural settlements in that part of the country.

The Apache is a bitter enemy to all white settlers, having been at war with them for the last half century. There is no hope of peace in that country till he is destroyed or thoroughly conquered. His style of warfare is simply that of murder and robbery. As these Indians are scattered in small bands over an immense extent of country, very sparsely populated, and with few good roads, they must be hunted and exterminated. They will not fight except at a great advantage, and with the certainty of plunder. The murder and robbery of travelers and isolated settlements, and the stealing of herds, constitute their principal occupation, and furnish them with the means of their precarious subsistence.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. W. HALLECK,

Major General Commanding.

Brevet Major General E. D. TOWNSEND, Assistant Adjutant General, Washington, D. C.

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF CALIFORNIA,
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA,
October 18, 1866.

SIR: I have to report as follows in compliance with instructions from division headquarters of October 4, 1866:

DISTRICT OF HUMBOLDT.

This district comprises the northern coast counties of California. It is inaccessible to wagons, and is reached from the other settled portions of California either by trail over the mountains, or by sea.

During the rebellion, and prior to my coming out, an extensive Indian war broke out in this district, and a large force of volunteers—some of them raised especially for the service—were occupied in waging it. Last year a large body of Indian prisoners who had been made in the course of the hostilities, and had been kept on the sand-spit opposite Fort Humboldt, were sent to the "Round Valley reservation."

The volunteers were all mustered out, and their places supplied by the regular forces.

Everything is at this time, and has been for some time past, quiet in the district, and no immediate trouble is anticipated unless the whites should, as they have been too apt to do, provoke it. When the company of artillery now at Fort Humboldt leaves that station, and it becomes reduced to a mere depot, there will be but two posts maintained in the district—one of one company of the ninth infantry at Camp Lincoln, not far from Crescent City, near the "Smith River Indian reservation," and one of two companies of the ninth infantry at Fort Gaston, on the Trinity, and the "Hoopa Valley Indian reservation."

DISTRICT OF CALIFORNIA.

This district was broken up last March. It occupied that part of California north of Tejon Pass, and not included in the district of Humboldt. It was organized during the rebellion, and with reference to the disloyal inhabitants. On the return of peace the posts and stations were reduced as rapidly as possible, and there remain in it now, outside the small peace garrisons, in the permanent works in the harbor of San Francisco, but three posts: one of one company of the ninth infantry at the "Round Valley Indian reservation," Mendocino county; one of two companies, one of the ninth infantry, and one of the first cavalry, at Camp Bidwell, in Surprise valley, to protect the frontier settlements from the hostile Indians of northern Nevada and southern Oregon, and guard one of the routes from the Sacramento river, in California, to Idaho. This post also furnishes a small guard for the settlements near Fort Crook. The third post is at Camp Independence, Owens river valley, beyond the Sierra Nevada, and consists of a company of the ninth infantry, and one of the first cavalry.

During the first years of the war the Indians were very hostile in this section of the country, but were finally overpowered, and a large number of them were carried off to the "Tule River Farm Indian reservation," near Visalia. The Indians from Owens river valley were not contented at the reservation. The hot climate and low land being so different from their own, and the larger part of them having fled from it back to their old haunts, an attempt was made last year to again get them back, but without success; they fled to the mountains.

The establishment of Camp Independence has given protection to settlers established in the valley, and I do not doubt they will soon raise all the supplies required for the troops. It already supplies all the grain, hay, and beef.

I have given orders for establishing an outpost from Camp Independence, at or beyond Silver Peak, in Nevada, to protect the settlements in the southern part of that State.

The difficulty here, as it is everywhere else in this country, is with the whites more than the Indians. Could the former be placed under some restraint, and not suffered to shoot and maltreat the natives with utter impunity, we would have no trouble whatever. In the northern part of the valley the Indians work in the mines and on the farms, and they would do so in the southern portion, below the camp, but a few of the settlers who believe in shooting every Indian on sight prevent it, and force them to remain in the mountains, whence they from time to time come forth to steal that they may not starve.

There are tribes of Indians living to the east and southeast of Owens river that have as yet had but little to do with the whites, and it is mostly by these that the principal depredations have been committed. The force now at Camp Independence will be sufficient, it is believed, to protect all the settlements in that quarter.

The posts in the harbor of San Francisco have been reduced to small skeleton garrisons of the second artillery in the principal forts; one company at Fort Point, two companies at Alcatraz, and one company at Point San José, with the two battery companies of the regiment at the Presidio.

The stations at Monterey, Benicia barracks, Camps Union, near Sacramento, and Babbitt, near Visalia, Camp Reynolds, on Angel Island, and Fort Crook, (except a squad of men attached there from Camp Bidwell,) have all been abandoned.

There is, I think, no danger to any of the settlements in the late district of California; the only apprehensions are from the settlers in the vicinity of Fort Reading.

DISTRICT OF SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA.

This district was also discontinued last March. The post at San Diego has been broken up, and that at Drum barracks and Wilmington depot, on the execution of orders recently issued, will be reduced to a regimental quartermaster and a squad of fifteen men.

One company is all that now remains in this late district. This company is stationed in two detachments, one at Drum barracks, one at Camp Cady; existing orders will further subdivide it into three detachments, two as above, and a third at Rock Springs.

The detachments at Rock Springs and Camp Cady are for the purpose of protecting that part of the road from Los Angeles to Prescott, Arizona, which lies between the Cajon Pass and Fort Mojave. This is the only United States mail road from California to Arizona, and has been much infested by roving parties of Indians, who have given much uneasiness and inflicted considerable injury on the settlers and travelers.

The young officer stationed at Camp Cady attempted to chastise a party which passed near his station in open day, and was badly defeated, with several of his men killed and wounded. He has asked for a court of inquiry, which will be granted as soon as officers can be had from which to constitute it.

The establishment of a second station on the road, as above mentioned, will give it all the protection the present force will admit of.

The other parts of this section of the country are quiet.

DISTRICT OF NEVADA.

The volunteers were all relieved early from this district, and it now has two small posts of a company each at Churchill barracks and Camp Ruby, for the protection of that part of the great "overland mail route" from the Pacific to the Atlantic which lies within my department, and two stations for the protection of the roads to Idaho and southern Oregon, one of a company of cavalry at Camp McDermitt, for the road from Virginia City through Star City and Queen's river valley, and one at Camp McGarry, of a company of the ninth infantry, and one of the first cavalry for the protection of the Idaho mail road from Chico through Susanville, Pueblo, &c., to the Owyhee.

There have been within the last two years several Indian combats in the northern part of Nevada, in the vicinity of the routes which the posts of Camps McGarry and McDermitt are intended to protect, and many Indians have been killed and captured and driven away from the settlements. The orders from division headquarters are now being carried into effect for the establishment of a camp of a company of cavalry at Paradise Valley.

Though there were during the summer great complaints of want of protection near Paradise Valley, and of depredations committed there, there have been no serious disturbances to record, and it is believed the company now under orders will give all the additional force necessary in this part of Nevada.

Since the discontinuance of the district of California, the post of Camp Bidwell has been transferred to the district of Nevada, and, as the operations of the troops in Nevada have freed the central part of the State from hostile Indians, and driven the larger part to the north, the headquarters of the district have been changed from Churchill barracks to Camp McGarry, as a more central point with respect to future movements against those who continue to give us trouble.

DISTRICT OF ARIZONA.

The regular troops in this district consist of the first and third battalions of the fourteenth infantry, four companies of the first United States cavalry, and one company of the second United States artillery. Until very recently there were also several companies and fragments of companies of Arizona volunteers. The latter have been ordered to be mustered out on the expiration of their year's term of service, and most, if not all, have by this time been discharged. They were the most effective troops for the service in that country that we have had, and have done more than all the others together. In fact, it is not too much to say that they only within the last year have inflicted any considerable injury on the hostile Apaches. The regular troops, used to a different kind of warfare, unused to the kind of life necessary to obtain any results against the Indians in Arizona, seem to acquire very slowly the experience necessary to enable them to be effective for offensive operations.

For a more complete description of Arizona Territory, and account of the disposition of the Indian tribes, &c., than can be given in this paper, I beg to refer to my special report, dated March 23, 1866, made on my return from a tour of inspection throughout the district. Since the date of that report the post of San Diego has been abandoned, and the company stationed there transferred to Fort Yuma. This, with a company of the fourteenth infantry, now constitute the garrison of the latter place, which, together with the company at Fort Mojave, are expected to keep the peace along the line of the Colorado river, and furnish guards for the supplies and cattle that go therefrom into the interior.

There has been a good deal of uneasiness within the year at several points along the river, particularly at La Pas, the mouth of Bill Williams's fork, Hardyville, and El Dorado cañon, and it has been impossible to furnish the protection asked for, except to a limited extent. The hostility existing between the River Indians and certain bands of the Pi-Utes and Chemehuevis has caused alarm to the white inhabitants who have been, and are, friendly to the Mojaves. The killing of the head chief, Waba Yuma, of Hualapais, by some whites on the road from Hardyville and Prescott, has also unsettled the good relations heretofore existing with those Indians.

The hostilities on the road from Camp Cady to Fort Mojave with the Pi-Utes seem to have extended their effects to the Indians of that or kindred tribes further to the north, and there have been offensive movements against the important mining settlements at El Dorado cañon. This has given alarm to those engaged in the enterprise of opening a line of trade by way of the Colorado river to Utah, and they fear their boat with its supplies may be in danger. At their repeated and earnest request I have ordered a guard of ten men to be detached from Fort Mojave, to be stationed for sixty days in El Dorado cañon. This, I since learn, will take every man, not on special duty, away from the post, the others being absent, escorting cattle to Fort Whipple.

The Indians, who have heretofore been quiet on the road from La Pas to Prescott, and have confined themselves to limits prescribed by the military commander and Indian superintendent, were found in large numbers beyond their limits in Skull valley. It is claimed they were there with hostile intent, and that they attacked a private train under escort of some Arizona volunteers. The result was an engagement, in which a large number of Indians were killed and wounded; it remains to be seen whether enough to subdue the tribe, or only to reframe it.

The Arizona volunteers, heretofore stationed in Skull valley, having been mustered out of service, their place has been supplied by the company of the fourteenth infantry from Date Creek, and the stations at the latter place and at Wickenburg have been abandoned.

The post of Camp Lincoln, on the Upper Verde, has proved so favorable for operations against the Apaches that it will be maintained by a company of the fourteenth infantry, though the force, both in quality (for this kind of service) and quantity, will not replace the volunteers whose places they take.

The post at Fort Whipple, near Prescott, will be kept up for the present.

The post of Fort McDowell, on the Lower Verde, now occupied by three companies of the fourteenth infantry and one company of the first cavalry, has, together with the post of Camp Lincoln, inflicted so severe a chastisement in repeated combats with the Apaches that they have compelled them to beg for peace. This, heretofore, has been offered them on condition they would go to the place reserved for Indian prisoners at Fort Goodwin. But they represent that they are at enmity with the Fort Goodwin bands, and cannot live with them.

I am not sure they are sincere in their desire for peace; but as they may be, and as I have now lost the force most competent to further chastise them, I have given instructions to grant them peace on the terms proposed to them by the late excellent commander of Fort McDowell, which will provide for their coming in as prisoners, in the vicinity of that station, and there plant and keep the peace with the whites and their allies, the Gila Indians, the Pimas, and Maricopas.

The post of Fort Grant, (two companies of the fourteenth infantry,) at the mouth of the San Pedro, has been recently destroyed by the floods of the river, and the station has been removed to the site of old Fort Breckinridge. I hope soon to change it to the heart of the Apache country, where the climate may prove more healthy, and there is an abundance of wood and grass, as well as pure mountain water.

The post of Fort Goodwin, occupied by three companies of the fourteenth infantry, is the place I have assigned for such of the Apaches as have surrendered themselves, and claim to wish to live in peace with the whites. At times several hundred have been on the reservation, but the difficulty of at all times having supplies for them has made it necessary to relax the rule for their constant presence, that they might lay in a store of mescal, &c., for food. This may have been taken advantage of in some instances to escape and commit depredations on the settlements. I do not expect in one season to reform a people whose whole life has been one of plunder, but I have no doubt that a combined system of kindness, when they do well, and chastisement when they do ill, will have the same effect on Apaches as it has on other men, as well as animals.

Owing to sickness in the valley, the small post on the San Pedro, above Fort Grant, has been abandoned.

The camp on the Upper San Pedro, near Barbecoma, is still maintained as a protection for the settlements, as are also the stations at Fort Bowie and Tucson. The companies stationed at Fort Mason, (so called,) on the upper Santa Cruz, near Calabasas, have been temporarily removed (by the district commander, on account of sickness) to the vicinity of old Fort Buchanan, whether to any good purpose remains to be seen.

The cost of transportation is so great into Arizona that I have felt it good economy to do everything possible to raise, and stimulate others to raise, supplies in the country.

I am glad to say that the experiment of a Government farm on a large scale in the valley of the Verde, at Fort McDowell, has proved a success, and an abundant crop of corn and sorghum is about to be harvested, to be followed by a second crop of small grain.

Like results are expected from the farm ordered to be opened at Fort Goodwin, so I hope that next year will show a reduction in the cost of maintaining the troops, to be followed by reductions in every succeeding year, for there is an abundance of good arable land in the country to support a large population.

A great drawback to the service in the department is the lack of officers, both staff and regimental.

There should be at least four officers of the quartermaster's department in Arizona alone. There are but two there now, and they belong to the volunteer service and will undoubtedly soon be mustered out.

The lack of company officers is such that at times companies are without a commissioned officer. At one time a post of two companies in Arizona had only one officer, a subaltern, to command the post, the two companies, and do the duty of quartermaster and commissary.

Under authority given me from division headquarters to raise a hundred "Indian scouts," I have directed the district commander in Arizona to enlist seventy Pimos and Maricopas and twenty tame Apaches.

I send herewith reports of the combats with the Indians in the department since the beginning of last year, and a tabular statement of the changes in the stations of troops since July, 1865.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,
your obedient servant,

Brev. Lieut. Col. R. N. SCOTT, Ass't Adjutant General, Headquarters Military Division of the Pacific, San Francisco, California.

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE COLUMBIA,
FORT VANCOUVER, W. T., October, 1866.

COLONEL: Pursuant to instructions by telegram from the major general commanding the division, I have the honor to report the military operations in this department during the past year, so far as information can be obtained from the records at department headquarters. It is believed that officers have not, in all instances, forwarded reports of their scouts among the Indians. I assumed command of the department on the 24th of February, 1866. The command was composed of one battalion fourteenth United States infantry, seven hundred and ninety-three men, seven companies of volunteer infantry, five hundred and fifty-three men, and four companies of volunteer cavalry, three hundred and nineteen men, besides three companies of artillery, two occupying permanent works at the mouth of the Columbia river, and the other at San Juan Island. The inclosed list will show the strength of the command, and of that at each station. The troops stationed in the Indian country were divided up into small detachments, which were so far separated from each other that they were scarcely able to defend themselves against the attacks of hostile bands. When these detachments were divided up, and scouting parties sent out, there was more or less danger that the Indians would capture the camps before their return. In some instances scouting parties were attacked, had to fight their way back to camp, and very narrowly escaped with their lives. Some of the volunteers had been ordered to Fort Vancouver for muster-out, but owing to the snow and the state of the roads were unable to get in until after the weather became settled in the spring. I ordered the small camps to be broken up, and the detachments to be concentrated at the most important points as soon as the state of the roads would permit. It was necessary to abandon some stations on account of there being orders to muster out the volunteers, and there being no other troops to replace them. Camps Wright, Polk, Curry, Logan, Lander, Reed, Alvord, and Fort Lapwai were abandoned. The troops at Wright, Curry, and Logan were moved to Camp Watson, and part of those at Alvord to Camp C. F. Smith, on White Horse creek. Those at the other camps named were mustered out of service as soon as they reached their rendezvous. The volunteers at Camp Watson were afterward relieved by a company of the first United States cavalry. Those at Camp C. F. Smith and Camp Lyon were relieved by a company of the fourteenth infantry and one of the first United States cavalry, and all mustered out of service, except one company of the first Oregon cavalry, sixty men. There is also one company of the first Oregon infantry still in the service at Fort Klamath, Oregon.

Nothing is known at these headquarters of any operations in the field in this department during the past year previous to December, 1865. On the 25th of that month the Indians made a raid on Camp Alvord and ran off forty mules; Captain F. B. Sprague, first Oregon infantry, pursued them and recovered all the mules. The Indians killed one of his horses and wounded two others; one Indian was wounded. Captain Sprague states in his report that the Indians had driven off all the good horses in the raid of November 5. February 7, Captain L. L. Williams, first Oregon infantry, reports that he went out on a scout from Camp Wright, and had one man killed by Indians on the south side of Harney lake, February 4, 1866. On the 21st of February, Captain F. B. White, first Oregon cavalry, reports that on the 14th of that month he heard at Camp Lyon that the Indians had attacked Hall's ranch on Jordan creek; that he immediately sent Lieutenant Silas Pepon, first Oregon cavalry, in pursuit of them: Pepon found Hall badly wounded and the ranch nearly destroyed by fire. He followed the Indians, killed one, and recovered thirty-six head of cattle and horses; one man of the command was wounded. Brevet Major F. W. Perry, fourteenth infantry, reports that he left Camp Curry on the 13th of February with forty-four men and scouted south around Harney lake, and returned to camp on the 23d, having marched one hundred and fifty-two miles in eleven days without seeing any Indians. Captain J. H. Walker, fourteenth infantry, was ordered from Camp Lyon to scout the country between the Malheur and Owyhee rivers. On the 23d of February he encountered a party of Indians, killed eighteen and wounded two of them, captured nineteen horses, a few rifles, fifteen pounds of powder, twenty pounds of balls, and three hundred pounds of dried beef. He lost one man killed and one wounded. On the 24th of March Captain J. H. Walker started from Camp Lyon with twenty-nine men and scouted to the Owyhee river; crossed the river and scouted through to the Malheur river. He returned to camp on the 10th of April without having seen any Indians. On the 2d of March Major L. H. Marshall, fourteenth infantry, was sent from Fort Vancouver to take command of the district of Boise. He left Fort Boise, March 28, on a scout, went one hundred and ten miles, and returned on the 17th of April without having had an encounter with Indians. On the 30th of April Captain James Henton, with one company, second battalion, fourteenth infantry, arrived at Fort Vancouver from Cape Disappointment, Washington Territory, and on the 4th day of May proceeded to Fort Boise with his command. On the 16th of April Brevet Colonel J. B. Sinclair, fourteenth infantry, with a detachment of recruits of same regiment, left Vancouver, proceeded to Dalles, Oregon, and thence to Camp Curry. Assuming command of the garrison at Curry he abandoned the post and marched his command to Fort Boise, Idaho Territory. Colonel Sinclair scouted the country thoroughly between Camp Curry and Boise. On the 18th of April Brevet Lieutenant Colonel J. J. Coppinger, with one company of the second battalion fourteenth infantry, marched from the Dalles by Meachem's route to Fort Boise, scouting the country. Brevet Major F. W. Perry, fourteenth infantry, left Camp Curry, April 16, on a ten days' scout on the Cañon City road, with no result. On the 29th of April Captain P. Collins, fourteenth infantry, had scouted the country thoroughly between Camp Lyon and Snake river, without having seen any signs of Indians. From the 18th to the 29th he was scouting on Squaw creek. On the 18th of April Lieutenant Amundus C. Kistler, fourteenth infantry, was sent from Fort Steilacoom to Neenah bay with thirty men and two howitzers to quell Indian disturbances. On the 21st of April he reports that he had captured eighteen Indian prisoners and sent them to Fort Steilacoom, six of whom were charged with murder. He made the Indians surrender by throwing shells into the woods beyond them. On the 20th of April Captain F. B. Sprague, first Oregon infantry, was ordered to abandon Camp Alvord and proceed to Camp Lyon. On the 30th of April Captain P. Collins, fourteenth infantry, with twenty-five men, went on a scout to the Burnt river district; no result.

Major General Halleck ordered four companies of the first United States cavalry from California to this department April 4, 1866. Two companies, H and I, came to Fort Vancouver April 15, and were mounted there. H company was ordered to Camp Watson May 7, and I company May 30, 1866. May 21, Captain David Perry's company, first United States cavalry, came into southern Oregon by the Chico route, and Captain James C. Hunt's by the Humboldt route; the former took station at Camp C. F. Smith, and the latter at Camp Lyon, Idaho Territory. Captain P. Collins, fourteenth infantry, scouted on Malheur river from the 3d to the 23d of May: saw no Indians. On the 4th of May Captain F. B. White, first Oregon cavalry, went in pursuit of Indians committing depredations on Jordan and Reynolds's creeks. He recovered twenty head of stock taken from the citizens. On the 11th of May Major Marshall left Fort Boise with eighty-four men on a scout up the Owyhee river. On the 16th of May Captain L. L. Williams, first Oregon infantry volunteers, left Camp Curry and scouted over an unexplored region, but saw no Indians. On the 4th of June Major Marshall returned from his scout on the Owyhee; he found five hundred Indians at the Three Forks of the Owyhee strongly posted on the opposite side of the south fork, between the south fork and middle fork. The river was impassable. He moved down eight miles and crossed in a boat which he improvised. As his advance moved up the bluff they were fired upon by Indians concealed behind the rocks. He fought the Indians altogether four hours; killed seven and wounded twelve; lost one non-commissioned officer, killed. The Indians were so strongly posted that he could not advance upon them, and was obliged to recross the river. In this operation his boat was swamped; he lost a howitzer, (which was afterward recovered,) abandoned some provisions, and threw some boxes of musket ammunition into the river. Captain James Henton's company, B, second battalion fourteenth United States infantry, was sent from Fort Boise, June 16, to establish a camp in the Flint district to protect the citizens against Indians. Captain J. H. Walker's company, C, second battalion fourteenth infantry, left Fort Boise on the 21st of June for Camp C. F. Smith, to relieve the cavalry company which was ordered to the Owyhee country. Captain P. Collins's company, D, second battalion fourteenth infantry, was ordered the same day to proceed to Warner's lake and establish a camp there. On the 23d of June Brevet Colonel J. B. Sinclair, fourteenth infantry, with a detachment of cavalry and infantry, was ordered to destroy an Indian camp on Antelope creek. He did not catch the Indians. Soon after this the Indians corralled some citizens in the Owyhee mining district, and Brevet Lieutenant Colonel John J. Coppinger, fourteenth infantry, moved with his company, A, second battalion fourteenth infantry, from Fort Boise by forced marches to their assistance. Great consternation prevailed in Silver and Ruby Cities. The women and children were locked up in the crushing-mills. The Indians got wind of the troops and left before their arrival.

July 15, Brevet Colonel J. B. Sinclair, fourteenth infantry, left Fort Boise with his company for the purpose of establishing a camp at the mouth of the Bruneau river. On the 16th of July Brevet Lieutenant Colonel J. J. Coppinger, with his company, A, Captain James Henton, with his company, B, second battalion fourteenth infantry, and Captain David Perry's company, F, of the first United States cavalry, moved from the Flint district to the Three Forks of the Owyhee. On the same day Major Marshall left there with two companies of the first United States cavalry, and Captain F. B. White's company, B, first Oregon cavalry, for the Bruneau river. Major W. V. Rinehart, first Oregon infantry, went out from Fort Klamath in pursuit of hostile Indians, and returned on the 20th of July with eight of the Snakes as prisoners. Lieutenant R. F. Bernard, first United States cavalry, with thirty-four men, left Camp Watson, Oregon, on the 4th of July, in pursuit of Indians that had been committing depredations on the Cañon City road. On the 15th of July he detached Sergeant Thomas W. Connor, with eighteen men, to look for a party of Indians. The sergeant discovered them in camp on Rattlesnake creek, and immediately charged them, killing thirteen and wounding many more. He captured four horses and two mules. Corporal Lord was killed. On the next day

Lieutenant Bernard attacked this band again and dispersed them, capturing two women, two children, three horses, and a very large quantity of camp equipage; also, twenty head of beef cattle, which had just been killed and jerked. The Indians numbered about three hundred. Lieutenant Bernard returned to Camp Watson July 30, having marched six hundred and thirty miles without having lost a horse.

Major L. H. Marshall, fourteenth infantry, started from the mouth of the Bruneau with the three companies of cavalry, August 4, on a scout to Goose Creek mountains. Major Marshall has been in the field ever since, and has rendered no official report of his scout yet, but he informed me verbally that, while scouting on the south fork of the Owyhee, his command killed thirty-five Indians. He ascertained, through an old Indian who was captured, that the Reese River Indians brought ammunition and traded with the Snakes for the stolen stock. From Three Forks of the Owyhee Major Marshall crossed over the hills to Camp C. F. Smith. From there he went to Stein's mountains; was at Camp Warner on the 20th of September, and was going from there to Harney lake. On the 8th of August Brevet Lieutenant Colonel R. F. O'Beirne, fourteenth infantry, left Vancouver with his company, proceeded to Dalles, and was ordered to march by the Cañon City road to Boise, scouting the country along the route. Brevet Lieutenant Colonel E. M. Baker, first United States cavalry, left Camp Watson with thirty-four men, on the 22d of August, in pursuit of Indians that had run off a band of Government mules—number not reported. He found thirteen mules wounded with arrows, and saw where seventeen others had been killed. He captured one squaw and two children, and returned on the 4th of September. On the 3d of September Captain James Henton, fourteenth infantry, marched from Three Forks of the Owyhee to the Bruneau river, scouting the country along the route. On the 5th of September Captain James Henton's company, B, second battalion fourteenth infantry, was ordered from the mouth of the Bruneau to Warner's lake. September 6, Captain David Perry's company, F, first United States cavalry, was ordered to take forty days' rations and scout through the Malheur country to the Cañon City road. September 8, Brevet Lieutenant Colonel J. J. Coppinger, fourteenth infantry, was ordered to establish a winter camp fifteen miles east of the Three Forks of the Owyhee, and to build a blockhouse at the Three Forks. On the 10th of September Captain James C. Hunt, first United States cavalry, was ordered with his company to scout the country between Stein's mountain and Harney lake. On September 21, Brevet Major E. Myers, first United States cavalry, was ordered from Major Marshall's scouting party to report to the commanding officer at Camp Warner. September 23, Brevet Lieutenant Colonel R. F. O'Beirne, fourteenth infantry, was ordered from Fort Boise to scout the Burnt River district, where the Indians had been stealing stock lately.

It will be observed that in these changes of station the troops moved through country frequented by Indians. The company of infantry at Fort Steilacoom has been ordered to be relieved by a detachment of artillery from San Juan Island, and to proceed on Cañon City road.

During the time I have been in command of this department I have made four tours of inspection.

I left Vancouver May 9, 1866, accompanied by two members of my staff, and proceeded by the way of the Columbia and Cowlitz rivers, to Monticello, Washington Territory, and thence across the mountains to Olympia and Steilacoom. After inspecting Fort Steilacoom, proceeded to Port Townsend, Bellingham bay, and San Juan Island, examined the condition of these posts, and returned to Vancouver on the 19th of May, by the same route, having been absent eleven days, and traveled a distance of six hundred and sixty miles—one hundred and twenty miles on horseback.

On the 4th day of June, accompanied by my aid-de-camp, I proceeded by Columbia river to the Dalles, Oregon, and on the 5th, taking an escort of ten men, marched to Camp Watson, a distance of one hundred and twenty-five miles, reaching there June 10. On the 12th, taking Brevet Major Myers, with company I, first United States cavalry, as escort, I crossed the Blue mountains, and marched to Camp Curry, a distance of eighty-four miles, reaching there on the 16th. On the 18th we crossed the Malheur Lake valley to Silvies river. We were unable to cross the river at this point, and were compelled to follow its course through almost impassable cañons toward its source. On the 20th the river was bridged, and the command crossed. On the 23d we camped on the east side of Malheur Lake valley. During the night the Indians drove off fifty-two pack-mules belonging to the escort. The Indians were pursued, and all of the animals except three that had been killed were recovered. On the 25th we crossed the south fork of the Malheur, and struck the Owyhee river opposite Camp Lyon. On the 30th the river was impassable at that point, and we were compelled to move up to the Chico road, striking it July 1. We crossed the Owyhee the same day and proceeded to Camp Lyon, reaching there July 2. Distance from Camp Curry to Camp Lyon, three hundred and ten miles. Leaving Camp Lyon on the 3d, we arrived at Fort Boise, Idaho Territory, on the night of July 4, and found Major General Halleck and staff there.

The whole distance from the Dalles to the Snake river, a distance of six hundred and thirty-six miles, was made on horseback in twenty-seven days. We were frequently compelled, on account of the high waters, to head impassable cañons, and considerable time was lost in attempts to cross the rivers at different points.

On the 5th of July we left Fort Boise, and returned to Vancouver direct on the 11th. The whole time occupied by the trip was thirty-eight days. Total distance traveled, one thousand two hundred and forty-nine miles.

The route is shown on map No. 1, being marked thus: — — — —. On the 12th of July I accompanied Major General Halleck to Fort Stevens, and the country on Puget sound. The object of the trip was the examination of points for permanent fortifications. I returned to Vancouver on the 22d of July.

On the 13th of August, accompanied by my aid-de-camp, I left Vancouver and proceeded, by way of Columbia river and Wallula, to Fort Boise, reaching there August 23, 1866. I left Fort Boise August 27, 1866, crossed Snake river 28th, moved up the river to mouth of Bruneau, and examined the country in the vicinity. Left Bruneau August 30, crossed an unknown country, struck Sinker creek, and followed it up to the mining districts of Idaho. Passed through Silver and Ruby Cities September 2. Reached Three Forks of the Owyhee September 4, and took an escort of twenty men, under Brevet Major David Perry, first United States cavalry. Followed Major Marshall's trail to Camp C. F. Smith, reaching there September 6. Left there September 8, reached Camp Lyon September 10, and Fort Boise September 12. Left Fort Boise September 13, returned to Vancouver by the same route, arriving September 19. The whole distance traveled was one thousand four hundred and sixteen miles. Time occupied, thirty-eight days. The route of this trip is shown on map No. 1, being marked thus: — — — —.

SENATE &amp; HO. OF REPS.

First Lieutenant and Brevet Lieutenant Colonel A. O. Vincent, arrived at Fort Vancouver (where it is now stationed) from department of California.

Since my return, on September 19, Captain J. H. Walker, fourteenth infantry, commanding at Camp C. F. Smith, Oregon, informs me that on September 12, he, with fourteen men of his command, made a scout to the headwaters of Trent creek; they discovered and broke up a camp, destroying large supplies of berries, seeds, provisions, &c. The Indians, twenty-five or thirty in number, became informed of their movements and escaped, leaving their fires still burning. The captain desisted from following them as night was coming on and he was a long distance from any aid or assistance. Fifty mounted men (infantry) are now out on a scout from Fort Klamath, Oregon, after a band of hostile Indians. Some Indian scouts have been employed at Camp Watson, and in the district of Boisé. Lieutenant William Borrowe, second artillery, detailed on recruiting service, has been ordered to the Warm Springs and Umatilla reservations, to enroll the complement of the one hundred scouts apportioned to this department. Recruiting for the eighth regiment of cavalry is progressing very slowly in this department. Recruits will probably be made more rapidly as winter approaches. I think the recruiting service here has been injured by the action of the Legislature of Oregon to raise volunteers for service in that State. I was consulted by Governor Woods in relation to calling out the volunteers. I expressed my disapproval of such proceeding without the sanction of the War Department, and gave it as my opinion that the General Government would not defray the expenses of volunteers called out without proper authority. The exigencies of the case do not seem to demand such action on the part of the State authorities. The class of men who would enlist prefer entering the volunteer service, and they will not enlist in the regular service so long as there is a prospect of volunteers being called into service. As soon as the organizations now in this department are filled up, and those which are expected arrive, it is believed that there will be troops enough to bring the hostile Indians to terms in a reasonable length of time. It is intended to continue operations against these Indians during the winter, and for that purpose winter camps have been established in their haunts. The troops in pursuing the Indians have, perhaps, driven them into the settlements sometimes, but this cannot be avoided. The inclosed list and map will show the locations of the different stations, and the number of troops at each, according to the present arrangement. As soon as the reports from the different scouting parties that have been out for some time are received, the result will be reported.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,
your obedient servant,

F. STEELE,

Report of Major General George G. Meade.

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE EAST,
PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA,
October 12, 1866.

GENERAL: I have the honor to submit for the information of the general commanding in chief the following succinct report of military operations in my command during the present year:

At the commencement of the year my command was the military division of the Atlantic, composed of the department of the East, the Middle department, and the departments of Virginia, North Carolina, and South Carolina.

The only movements of any consequence were those made on the northern frontier with a view to enforce the neutrality laws. Early in April a dispatch was received from the honorable Secretary of War, transmitting one from the collector at Eastport, Maine, reporting the concentration at that place of large numbers of strangers, believed to belong to the Fenian organization, and assembled with a view to organizing an expedition against the Province of New Brunswick. At this time there was only one company of artillery at Eastport. I immediately ordered three additional companies from the nearest posts, and repaired myself to Eastport. On my arrival I found the collector, under the instructions of the Treasury Department, had seized a vessel loaded with arms and ammunition.

Being satisfied of the illegal character of the expedition, I confirmed the seizure of the arms, placed them in charge of the commanding officer at Eastport, and gave notice publicly that no violation of the neutrality laws would be permitted. These measures had the effect of causing the expedition to be abandoned, and the men composing it to return to their homes.

The arms seized were offered to the individual claiming them on condition of his giving security that they would not be employed in any illegal enterprise. This offer has not as yet been accepted, and the arms are still under military custody at Eastport. On the dispersion of the expedition the troops ordered to Eastport were returned to their former stations.

During the month of May several reports were received indicating the deposits of arms and collections of men at various points on the frontier of New York and Vermont. These reports, as received, were transmitted to Major General Hooker, commanding department of the East, with instructions to investigate them, to seize all the arms and munitions of war, where there was evidence of their being destined for illegal use, and to take all necessary measures to preserve the neutrality as far as the means within his control admitted.

On the 1st of June, while at West Point, I received official information of the crossing at Buffalo, New York, of an armed body of Fenians: at the same time information was received of the concentration of large forces in the vicinity of Ogdensburg, New York, and St. Albans, Vermont. I at once directed Major General Hooker to send all the available force in his department to the frontier, and proceeded myself to Buffalo. On my arrival at Buffalo, on the 3d instant, I found that the armed men who had crossed were captured by the United States steamer Michigan on their attempting to return the night previous, and being satisfied the movement at Buffalo was a feint, I left that place on the evening of the 3d, and reached Ogdensburg the next day, the 4th of June.

On my arrival at Ogdensburg I learned of the concentration of large forces at Malone, New York, and at St. Albans, Vermont. Finding the small force at my command inadequate to prevent a crossing, I directed my subordinate commanders to station their commands to the rear, on the main lines of travel, and issued the most stringent orders for the seizure of all arms and munitions of war, and directed the stopping and turning back of all suspected parties. These duties were successfully executed, large quantities of arms and munitions being seized at various points. No opposition was offered, except in one instance, when an armed party of Fenians seized, at Watertown, New York, a locomotive, and proceeded to Cape Vincent, and there recaptured two car loads of arms which had been sent there for security after seizure by the deputy marshal at Watertown. On learning these facts, I dispatched Major J. Stewart, commanding three companies of artillery, in a special train to intercept the Fenians on their return; but the latter, learning of Major Stewart's movement, abandoned the train with the arms, and escaped by scattering over the adjacent country.

On the necessary authority being received from the War Department, and the appearance of the President's proclamation on the 6th of June, I ordered the arrest of the principal leaders at St. Albans and Malone, and issued a proclamation commanding the dispersion of the assemblages at these places, and offering transportation to their homes to such of the men as would abandon the expedition. These measures had the effect to suppress the expedition, no effort being made to cross except that of a small inefficiently armed body under a General Spear, who crossed the boundary line near Franklin, Vermont, and remained for a day on the other side in the vicinity of the line, recrossing on the advance of the British troops. The expedition being abandoned, the men returned to their homes, mostly furnished transportation by the Government. This was deemed the most expedient course, for though the conduct of the men composing the expedition had, up to the time of its abandonment, been most exemplary, it was feared so large a body, estimated as high as ten thousand, if left on the frontier without means of return, would become riotous and disorderly, requiring, to preserve the peace, the calling out the militia, which I was anxious to avoid on the ground of economy, as well as other reasons. After the men composing the expedition had all been sent home, the troops were returned to their former station. Brevet Major General Barry, who had been specially assigned to duty by the General commanding-in-chief, was, by orders from these headquarters, left in general charge of the troops remaining on the northern frontier. The report of General Barry, commanding at Buffalo, as well as that of Major Gibson, third artillery, commanding at St. Albans, are herewith appended.

On the 6th of August General Orders No. 59, Adjutant General's Office, Washington, District of Columbia, abolished the military division of the Atlantic, and I was assigned to the command of the department of the East. Since the date of that order there has not been any movement of troops. The troops, consisting of the first and third regiments of artillery, and six companies of the fourth infantry, are stationed from Erie, Pennsylvania, to Plattsburg, New York, on the northern frontier, and from Eastport, Maine, to Fort Delaware, Delaware, on the Atlantic coast.

A recent personal inspection of the department showed the troops to be in commendable order and condition. The distribution of regiments into one and two-company posts is not, however, conducive to efficiency and discipline; and it is to be hoped the recent increase of the Army authorized by law will permit of the concentration at least of regiments, so necessary to preserve the esprit and proper military tone of both officers and men.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

GEORGE G. MEADE,

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE GULF,
NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA,
November 14, 1866.

GENERAL: I have the honor to transmit herewith the report called for by the General-in-Chief, in his letter to me of October 4, 1866.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

P. H. SHERIDAN,

Major General United States Army.

Brevet Major General J. A. Rawlins,

Chief of Staff, Washington, D. C.

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE GULF,
NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA,
November 14, 1866.

GENERAL: In compliance with letter of instructions, dated October 4, 1866, I have the honor to make the following report of operations within the limits of my command since May 29, 1865:

On the 17th of May, 1865, I was relieved from command of the Middle military division, and assigned to the command of all the territory west of the Mississippi and south of the Arkansas rivers, with directions to report to Lieutenant General Grant for instructions.

This territory embraced at that time within its limits the only organized rebel army left in the confederacy, which was under the command of the rebel General E. Kirby Smith, with headquarters at Shreveport, or vicinity, in the State of Louisiana.

My instructions from the Lieutenant General were to operate against this command, to break it up or destroy it. For this purpose I was authorized to draw from Major General J. J. Reynolds, commanding department of Arkansas, twelve thousand men, and from Major General E. R. S. Canby, commanding the military division of West Mississippi, twenty-five thousand men, together with the Fourth and Twenty-Fifth Army corps, and a column of from eight to nine thousand cavalry, to be collected from Louisiana, West Tennessee, Mississippi, and Alabama. The aggregate strength of this force was about eighty thousand men.

On the 29th of May I assumed control of this new command, designating it the "military division of the Southwest," with headquarters at New Orleans, Louisiana, and at about the same time received intelligence of the surrender of E. Kirby Smith, through commissioners sent from him to Major General Canby. This surrender was made, but bore upon its face double-dealing on the part of the rebel commander or his agents, as the Texas troops had declined to surrender, and had disbanded to their homes, destroying magazines and carrying with them arms and ammunition from the different arsenals. General Smith proceeded to Galveston, and from thence escaped to Mexico, in violation of the agreement he had bound himself to observe. This conduct on his part may have arisen from the fact that it could not be concealed that his real object in offering to surrender was to get security for the Arkansas, Louisiana, and Missouri troops to return to their homes, knowing full well that the Texas troops did not intend to surrender, and that most of them had already gone to their homes; that while they were destroying their arsenals and carrying home with them their arms, it was their constant boast that they were not conquered, and that they would renew the fight at some future day.

Previous to the surrender and in anticipation of the successful escape of Jefferson Davis, and his probable arrival in the trans-Mississippi department, it had been contemplated to organize a column of fifteen thousand confederates at Marshall, Texas, for the invasion of Mexico. This scheme failed, perhaps from the capture of Mr. Davis. But while the main scheme of sending the fifteen thousand men to Mexico failed, numerous bands, squads, and parties, numbering, perhaps, three or four thousand men, crossed the Rio Grande into Mexico.

In view of this and the troubles of our sister republic, and taking into consideration the fact that all our military projects during the war against Texas had been failures, and that on this account the Union people there had come to look upon the Government as weak, it was determined to throw a large force into that State and along the Rio Grande border. The accomplishment of this purpose was accompanied with great labor from various causes, but it was successfully achieved.

Among the first difficulties were the inadequacy of the depot at this place for the requirements of the service to be accomplished; the absence of all mercantile marine, and the worthless character of most of the transportation held by the quartermaster's department here for the purpose of crossing the Gulf or entering the ports of Texas; the destruction of all the wharves at the ports in Texas, with the exception of Galveston, by the confederates, and the long line of communications to the points occupied in the interior, over which supplies had to be sent; and last, but not least, the great reluctance of the troops, officers and men, to continue for a longer period in the service, they claiming that they had fulfilled their contract with the Government, and that it was but just they should be mustered out.

The movement of the Thirteenth corps had been ordered before I reached New Orleans. One division of it, under Major General F. J. Herron, proceeded to occupy the line of the Red river in Louisiana, and Marshall and Jefferson, in northeastern Texas. One division, under Major General F. Steele, was under orders for the Rio Grande line. The third division, under Major General J. A. Mower, was ordered to Galveston, from thence to occupy the line of railroad from Galveston to Brenham, while Major General Gordon Granger, who was in command of the corps, was assigned to general command in Texas.

While these movements of the Thirteenth corps were in progress, I was rapidly collecting at Alexandria, Louisiana, a column of cavalry about four thousand five hundred strong, to be commanded by Major General G. A. Custer, and another column at Shreveport, Louisiana, about five thousand strong, to be commanded by Major General Wesley Merritt. These cavalry columns were collected from different points in the States before mentioned, and were transferred up Red river by steamboats under great difficulties from the low stage of the water, were organized into divisions, equipped, supplied, and prepared to march for their respective points of destination; Merritt's division to march via Marshall to San Antonio, and Custer's division via Hempstead to Austin, Texas, the columns marching nearly parallel to each other and something like a hundred miles apart.

These columns took with them a small pontoon train to cross streams on the line of march, and for the additional object of being able to cross the Rio Grande, should the Government elect to send troops in that direction.

While the movements of the Thirteenth corps and cavalry were going on, the Twenty-Fifth corps was embarked at City Point, Virginia, for the coast of Texas, to occupy the points of Indianola, Corpus Christi, Brazos Santiago, and the line of the Rio Grande—most of the corps, however, being sent to the Rio Grande line. Great trouble was experienced in the landing of the troops of this corps in consequence of the bad harbors in Texas, the great draught of the vessels employed as transports, and the absence of suitable lighters to convey the troops across the bars.

While the foregoing operations were in progress, the Fourth Army corps, numbering about ten thousand men, with all its field transportation, arrived in New Orleans, having been ordered to report to me for service in Texas, and was transported as rapidly as possible to Indianola, from thence to Victoria, and ordered to occupy the line from that point to San Antonio.

The troops on the line from Galveston to Austin were supplied with comparative ease, as the bar at Galveston offered no very difficult obstacles. The wharves, although in bad condition, still sufficed; the railroad from Hempstead to Brenham was in condition to transfer our necessary supplies, and from Brenham to Austin there was a passable wagon road.

The landing of the troops at Indianola was difficult on account of the dangerous bar, which had to be lightered over from the transports, and in consequence of the destruction of the wharves the lightering had to be, in most cases, to the shore in small boats. Then when the troops were landed, there was no water for a distance of eighteen miles, and they had to be hurried over this distance as soon as landed, and from thence to Victoria, where timber and water could be obtained in abundance. Victoria is distant from Indianola about thirty-five or forty miles. After these difficulties had been overcome it was found that the country between Indianola and Victoria was not passable for wagons in the winter, and the railroad from Lavaca to Victoria had to be repaired at much labor and some expense, else the troops would have had to come back to their supplies at Lavaca and Indianola, where there was no water. I therefore ordered the railroad repaired, and after it was in running order sold it to the company, covering the cost of repairs. The wharf at Indianola had also to be built entire, and when completed sold, to cover the expenses incurred.

But on account of these obstacles, and especially the difficulty of crossing the outer bar, which is about twenty miles from the landing, some of the transports had to return to New Orleans or the mouth of the Mississippi river for water for the troops and coal for the transports.

At Brazos Santiago the wharf had been destroyed, and many of the same difficulties occurred here, and some of the transports had also to return to New Orleans and the mouth of the Mississippi river for supplies of coal and water. The troops on this line were extended up the Rio Grande as far as Laredo, and on this line much the largest number of troops were placed. A wharf had to be built at Brazos, and at first the troops up the Rio Grande were supplied by small steamers which we had sent to that river; but the difficulties of entrance at the mouth of the Rio Grande made this line of supply very dangerous and precarious for the supply of the troops, as sometimes a transport could not cross the bar at the mouth of the river for nine or ten days. I therefore ordered the building of a railroad from Brazos to White Rancho, on the Rio Grande river, a distance of eleven miles, and this gave security to the supply of the troops. This railroad was afterward sold at about forty thousand dollars over the actual expense of construction. All these difficulties in the movement of troops were overcome, and in a short period of time.

The effect of this large movement of troops on the destiny of imperialism in Mexico has not been fully appreciated by our people. It is, however, well known that while we were struggling for republican existence against organized rebellion, and when nearly all the heads of the Governments of Europe (except Russia) wished, and did believe, that republicanism was not a success, the Emperor of the French undertook the bold expedition to subvert the republic of Mexico. There was no territorial question to be settled, and history will not excuse the attempted annihilation of a nation on the plea of non-payment of a million or two of debts due. There was no good excuse for this attempted violation of rights, and the history of imperialism in Mexico is only the history of the buccaneer Morgan on a more extended scale, who at one time captured and held Panama, on the Isthmus, until he could hold it no longer. So that when this movement of our troops to Texas and the Rio Grande took place we found the line of that river and all northern Mexico in the hands of imperialism; a Government which collected no taxes, had no system of government, and supported its partisans, soldiers and civilians, by levying contributions on the poor inhabitants; but the appearance of our troops and the knowledge that friends were on the border went like electricity to the homes and hearts of the Mexican people. The rebels who had escaped from our country received no sympathy, and in less than a year this hardy people, without money, without arms and munitions of war, and without supplies, have recaptured Matamoras, Camargo, Presidio de Rio

Report of the Secretary of War.

SENATE &amp; HO. OF REPS.

Grande, Lampissas, Monterey, Saltillo, Monclova, Durango, Chihuahua, and in fact hold nearly all of the country, putting the invaders on the defensive and confining them to the valley of Mexico, with a fair prospect of their speedy extermination.

I have felt much interest in this event, because I have always believed that the occupation of Mexico was a part of the rebellion; and believing that the contest in our own country was for the vindication of republicanism, I did not think that vindication would be complete until Maximilian was compelled to leave.

The course taken by nearly every newspaper in the lately rebellious States was sympathy for Maximilian, and the sentiment of a large portion of the population was likewise; and so determined was this on the part of thousands of adventurers that the Cordova emigration scheme was gotten up, and had, I think, for its object the formation of a Maximilian-American party composed of confederates entertaining antipathy toward our Government. Many of these, having no means, would have drifted into the army of Maximilian. I had to take strong grounds against this emigration, and finally broke it up by refusing to permit emigrants to embark from the sea-ports within the limits of my command.

The effect of the presence of our troops in Texas and on the Rio Grande, as alluded to heretofore, on the destiny of imperialism was great. It had not a friend among the officers or men from the highest to the lowest grade, and the effect was depressing in the extreme—so much so that I am inclined to believe that had a demand been made for the withdrawal of the Imperial troops, on the ground that the invasion of Mexico was a part of the rebellion, it would have been granted, and the miseries of that country for the last year avoided.

While the Imperial troops held the line of the Rio Grande, the strictest neutrality was preserved. Since they were driven away the same honorable neutrality has been preserved toward the Liberal Government.

The number of troops sent to Texas was about fifty-two thousand. Shortly after they had arrived, and become somewhat settled, orders came for the muster-out of about forty-seven thousand of this force, and the muster-out was carried on gradually, and in accordance with our ability to bring them back, so that the movement may be considered as equal to a continuous movement of over ninety thousand men over the most difficult line of operations which we have in the country. I make these remarks, because I was under the impression at one time that the Quartermaster General did not fully understand the magnitude of the movement, or the natural obstacles in the way of its accomplishment, and we had to struggle for six months without funds, on the plea that the Brazos railroad was constructed without authority, and the public service made to suffer a punishment by this denial of funds. I believe the Quartermaster General was influenced in this act by the representations of incompetent inspectors sent out to make reports.

The condition of civil affairs in Texas was anomalous, singular, and unsatisfactory. I found the provisional governor, backed by a small portion of the population, had for his standard of loyalty "abhorrence for the rebellion and glory in its defeat;" while his successor, as actual Governor, had for his standard of loyalty "pride in rebellion—that it was a righteous but lost cause, being overpowered by the Federal forces." Both of these representatives of the civil law, entertaining opposite standards for the loyalty of their subjects, I was required to support, and did it to the best of my ability; but it has been embarrassing in the extreme. Governor Hamilton, the provisional governor, was clamorous for more troops, and in several communications to me asserted that the civil law could not be carried out; that freedmen would be killed and Union men driven from the State without military support, which I gave whenever it was possible. Governor Throckmorton, the present Governor, wants all the troops moved from the settled portions of the State, asserting that the civil law was all right; that justice would be done to freedmen, Union men, and our soldiers in the courts. But justice is not done. To give you an instance of this, two soldiers were shot at Brenham, Texas, about two months ago; they were unarmed, and offered no provocation. The grand jury could find no bill against their would-be assassins, but found a bill against Brevet Major Smith, seventeenth infantry, for burglary, because he broke into the house of some citizen in his attempt to arrest these men.

My own opinion is that the trial of a white man for the murder of a freedman in Texas would be a farce, and in making this statement I make it because truth compels me, and for no other reason.

During the last six months Indian depredations have taken place on the remote frontier. Their extent is not defined as yet, but they are not very alarming, and I think that the Governor has to some extent been influenced by exaggerated reports, gotten up, in some instances, by frontier people to get a market for their produce, and in other instances by Army contractors to make money.

I have ordered two regiments of cavalry to the frontier and placed a regiment of infantry at Austin, to be moved if necessary.

It is strange that over a white man killed by Indians on an extensive frontier the greatest excitement will take place, but over the killing of many freedmen in the settlements nothing is done. I cannot help but see this, and I cannot help but tell it to my superiors, no matter how unpleasant it may be to the authorities of Texas.

I will establish the frontier posts in Texas in the early spring. It was not done heretofore on account of having no available regular troops, and to have attempted it with volunteer troops, desirous of returning to their homes, would have involved an expense which I did not like to put upon the Government.

In Louisiana there was about as much, if not more, anomaly in civil affairs than in Texas.

Our depot was in New Orleans, which, from its geographical position, became the main depot of the Gulf States, and in fact the whole Southwest. This place had necessarily been the headquarters of superior commanders, and as many of them appeared to have more ability in civil than in military affairs, they left the results of that ability to be settled by myself and the subordinate officers of my command—questions and claims, semi-military and semi-civil, of every possible phase, and so numerous and complicated that, after a fair examination, I think it will require one officer and ten clerks for over twelve months to brief and systematize what is yet left.

The settlement of such of those claims as have already come up has been a dead weight upon the legitimate military duties of my command. Then there was the accumulation, at this place, of material of war of every possible character, from ocean steamships down to pick-axes and spades, the disposition of which gave great labor; but by keeping steadily to work, and by the good judgment of subordinate commanders and staff officers of the different bureaus, this depot is now reduced to the present wants of the service.

At the time of my arrival at New Orleans, as before alluded to, the civil affairs were much mixed up. Governor J. Madison Wells was legitimately holding the position of Governor; but a new election was to occur in the summer or fall, and although from the antecedents of the Governor, who supported the Federal authority, I had reason to expect good judgment, still, either on account of the approaching election—in which he was a candidate for reelection—or because he thought it best, he was filling a number of vacancies in offices throughout the State by returned confederates. I did not know this, as it was none of my business, until I learned it by the constant appeals made to me by men who were turned out to give place to new-comers whom they did not think deserving, and I only speak of it now because it led afterward to bitterness and shedding of blood, in which the military were to some extent involved.

The Governor was reelected and the Legislature met; but it was found that the Governor had one will, and the Legislature had another. Each hated the other, and trouble was sure to come. Not only was the Legislature in antagonism with the Governor, but all, or nearly all, the subordinate civil authorities of the State were against him. Many of these he had himself appointed, if they still held over after the election. Then the Governor commenced making appeals to the military authorities to support him, and when it was proper and legitimate to serve the ends of justice, such support was given; but when it was to satisfy partisan or political purposes it was refused, and the military assumed the position that politics was outside of the profession, and that it could not be called on, legitimately, to serve the interests of either side. This bitter political feeling finally culminated in the massacre of the 30th of July, 1866. I have thought that had I been in the city this slaughter might have been avoided; but I did not expect it to occur, and I was led to this belief by a conversation which I had about the 1st of June last with Judge Durell, who was the president of the Louisiana convention of 1864, and who told me that he would decline to call it together. He asked if it could have military support. I said it could not; that I would not allow the military to be used for party purposes; but that if the parties in the State came into collision, it would be my duty to maintain the peace of the country, as I had believed for some time past that the safety of life and property did not rest with the civil authorities when there was any great disturbing cause.

In Florida there were no political issues involving the military authorities, although much annoyance occasionally came from arrests of officers and soldiers for acts alleged to have been committed during the rebellion. The people of Florida appeared to realize the fact that it would not make much difference to them what party was in power, and that their best interest was to take off their coats and go to work to repair the disaster of the rebellion.

On the 27th of June, 1866, the temporary military division of the Southwest was abolished by the creation of the military division of the Gulf, which included the departments of Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi, and Florida. These departments were respectively commanded by Majors General Wright, Canby, Slocum, and Foster.

On October 7, 1866, the department of Mississippi was transferred to the military division of the Tennessee.

On May 22, 1866, Major General Canby, having been ordered to Washington, was succeeded by Brevet Major General A. Baird in the command of the department of Louisiana.

HEADQUARTERS DISTRICT OF MISSISSIPPI,
 VICKSBURG, MISSISSIPPI,
 October 29, 1866.

GENERAL: In compliance with instructions from headquarters department of the Tennessee, dated October 21, instant, I have the honor to submit the following report of the operations, since I have been in command, in the late department of Mississippi, and in the present district of Mississippi, and of the condition of affairs generally in my command:

MILITARY HISTORY.

Pursuant to orders of his Excellency the President, I assumed command of the department of Mississippi on the 14th of November, ultimo.

Previously I had been on duty for two months in the department of Arkansas.

On assuming command I found the department divided into three districts, denominated, respectively, the northern district, the southern district, and the western district. Brevet Major General M. F. Force, with headquarters at Jackson, was in command of the northern district; Brevet Major General J. W. Davidson, with headquarters at Natchez, was in command of the southern district. After relieving Major General P. J. Osterhaus, who had been my predecessor in the command of the department, I assigned him to the command of the western district, with headquarters at Vicksburg.

I found on duty in the department the following troops:

The twenty-sixth Indiana veteran volunteers; the fifth and sixth regiments colored artillery, (heavy,) acting as infantry; the forty-ninth, fiftieth, and fifty-second, fifty-third, fifty-eighth, sixty-fourth, sixty-sixth, seventieth, and one hundred and eighth regiments of colored infantry, and batteries C and D, second United States colored artillery, (light.)

The thirty-third Illinois veteran volunteers was in the department, but under orders to be mustered out, and the thirteenth Indiana cavalry had been mustered out, but the whole of the regiment had not left the department. The thirty-third Illinois and the remnant of the thirteenth Indiana were sent to their respective State rendezvous with as much dispatch as possible.

At the date of my assumption of the command the troops in the department occupied the following posts: Vicksburg, Jackson, Grenada, Okolona, Columbus, Meridian, Yazoo City, Natchez, Brookhaven, Winchester, and Magnolia.

The diffusion of troops at many posts under inexperienced and negligent commanders, more especially if the posts occupied are surrounded by a considerable population of citizens, is one of the greatest enemies to efficiency and discipline. Looseness of discipline leads to many and useless conflicts with citizens, and many complaints from the latter of outrages and lawlessness on the part of the troops are the necessary consequence.

The commanding general of the military division of the Tennessee reached this place the day after I had arrived and assumed the command.

After a full consultation with the commanding general (and in pursuance of his directions to concentrate the troops at the smallest number of posts compatible with the efficient performance of the duties devolved upon them, so soon as I had acquainted myself with the condition of affairs in the department) I submitted a recommendation to him to reduce the number of posts to six, which he approved. The posts suggested were Vicksburg, Natchez, Jackson, Meridian, Columbus, and Grenada. These points are centrally situated with reference both to the territory and population of the State, on highways of communication either by river or railway, whence troops could be rapidly dispatched to any point at which their presence might be required. The concentration was promptly made so soon as the approval of the commanding general to the proposed arrangement had been received.

By the reduction in the number of posts the cost of supplying the troops was diminished, and the discipline, efficiency, and instruction largely promoted. To bring the troops to the highest possible state of efficiency, to enforce rigid discipline, and to prevent outrages on and unnecessary conflicts with citizens, I published orders requiring the troops to remain in their camps or cantonments when not absent therefrom on duty, and tactical instruction to be given to them twice a day, of not less than one hour at each lesson, on five days of the week. The remaining two days, Saturday and Sunday, were devoted to police and relaxation. The observance of the Sabbath was specially commended in orders. The healthful effect of these measures soon demonstrated itself in an improvement in the discipline and instruction of the troops, and in the reduction of the number of complaints by citizens of outrages by soldiers. To still further guard against the latter evil, I published an order directing that whenever it might be necessary for the military authority to intervene for the enforcement of justice or the preservation of law and order among the citizens, the commanding officer on whom the duty might devolve should give written instructions to the officer detailed to command the troops designated for any such special service, explaining fully the work to be performed, and how far military force should be used therefor; that the officer charged with the duty should make a full written report, on the completion of the work assigned him, of his operations to his immediate commander, and that a copy of the instructions and report should be transmitted through the intermediate commanders to department headquarters, for the information of the department commanders.

Shortly after my arrival in the department I found that a fruitful source of corruption among the officers and of complaint from citizens was the improper and illegal dabbling of officers in the collection and disposition of cotton alleged to have belonged to the so-called confederate States.

To correct this evil I published an order defining the relations of officers of the military service to the cotton question, and their duties therein. I explained that the duty of collecting and forwarding any cotton that had belonged to the late rebel authorities, or of any other cotton the title of which, from any cause, had become vested in the United States, had been by an act of the supreme Legislature, confined to the Treasury Department and its duly appointed agents; and that the duty of the military officials was simply, on the requisition of a duly accredited agent of the Treasury, to aid in collecting and guarding the cotton claimed as the property of the paramount Government as the conqueror of rebels.

This order removed from the region of military action a potential temptation to malfeasance by officers; and in a comparatively brief period no further complaints were heard of the improper interference of military officials in the collection, movement, and disposition of cotton.

The effect of the several important orders and movements above described was to bring the troops in the department well in hand, and the department itself, generally, under thorough control.

Conformably to an order from the War Department the two companies of light artillery, colored, were mustered out of service on the 26th of December, 1865, and, shortly after, the twenty-sixth Indiana was mustered out.

In the month of January, 1866, the commanding general of the military division asked my opinion as to whether the number of troops in the department could be reduced, consistent with a due regard to the enforcement of the laws, the preservation of order, and the protection of life and property.

I replied, recommending the muster-out of the colored regiments, and suggested that the forty-ninth, fiftieth, fifty-third, sixty-fourth, sixty-sixth, seventieth, and one hundred and eighth be selected for that purpose. Authority was immediately received to muster out the regiments designated; but before they could be collected at the points at which the muster-out was to take place an order was received from the War Department suspending the order for muster-out, and directing that they be retained in the service to work on the levees of the Mississippi. Under this arrangement the regiments remained in service until some time in the month of February, but were never called for by the officer in charge of the work of repairing the levees. The order for muster-out was renewed near the close of February; the work was immediately commenced, and terminated about the middle of March.

On the 15th of January, Major General P. J. Osterhaus and Brevet Major Generals J. W. Davidson and M. F. Force were mustered out of the volunteer service.

Near the close of January the second battalion of the fifteenth regular infantry arrived at this place, and reported for duty in the department. It was added to the garrison of this post.

On the 1st of February I published an order abolishing the district organization, directing the post commanders to report direct to the department commander, and ordering the records of the districts to be forwarded to these headquarters. This arrangement was at once effected, and was found to work better than through the intermediate machinery of the district organization.

In the month of April an order was received directing the muster-out of the remaining colored regiments in the department. The work was immediately commenced, and by the 20th of May all the colored troops in the department had been mustered out.

This left me for duty but one small battalion of regular infantry. One company was sent to Meridian, one to Jackson, and one to Natchez, to replace the colored troops at those posts; the remaining five companies were retained at this post as a central force immediately under the control of the department commander, to be used wherever and whenever there might be a necessity therefor.

After the removal of all the public property from Meridian, the company was withdrawn from that place to Jackson, and the company at the latter sent to Grenada. The number of lawless men in the vicinity of Grenada rendered necessary the presence of a small military force there to protect the citizens from outrage. I desired also to have a company there for the purpose of trying to arrest the assassin of Lieutenant J. B. Blanding, Veteran Reserve corps, who had been foully murdered while on duty in the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands at Grenada.

To aid in the effort to arrest the murderer of Lieutenant Blanding I applied to General Stoneman, then in command of the department of Tennessee, for a company of cavalry temporarily.

The company was sent from Memphis to Grenada, and though the greatest energy was displayed by both the cavalry and infantry companies, their exertions were unavailing. And notwithstanding all the efforts I have made, not alone through the military force, but through detectives, and with the hearty co-operation of the Governor of the State, it has been impossible to arrest the murderer. Who he is very well known, but it is not known whether he is skulking in the trackless swamps of this State or has fled to some other. The facility with which information could be communicated to him by his confederates in crime has so far rendered abortive all the efforts for his arrest. It is yet trusted that in time the author of so atrocious a deed will receive the punishment due to his crimes.

In the month of August ultimo the department of Mississippi was abolished, and the same geographical limits erected into a command, styled the district of Mississippi. The troops in the district are now posted as follows: five companies at Vicksburg, one company at Natchez, one company at Jackson, and one company at Grenada.

The greatest possible economy has been practiced in supplying and sheltering the troops. The old quarters built by the soldiers during the war have been availed for sheltering the troops, a small amount of material only having been purchased for the necessary repairs.

Since the 2d of April last a small ground-rent has been paid for the ground necessarily occupied in Vicksburg for military purposes, but no similar disbursement is made at any other place in the State. The number of buildings necessarily used as offices in this place has been reduced to the lowest possible limit consistent with the efficient transaction of the public business, and the rent paid therefor is very moderate.

In the month of April the fortifications at Vicksburg and Natchez were, in pursuance of orders from the General commanding the Army, dismantled, and their armaments shipped to Baton Rouge arsenal.

The duties of the troops since I have been in command in this State have been chiefly conservative. As the rigid administration of equal and impartial justice to all classes of citizens through the civil tribunals must in the end be the safeguard of the rights of person and property in every country not permanently under the control of martial law, I advised all classes of the community to resort to the civil courts for a redress of their grievances and to obtain their rights.

Nevertheless, all the civil functionaries of the State, whether executive or judicial, were informed, respectfully but firmly, that the State laws making discrimination between citizens on account of race or color, or that were in opposition to the laws of the United States, could not be enforced; and that all prosecutions or suits growing out of events connected with the late war were strictly prohibited. And I am happy to record that this policy has been successful. The higher executive and judicial officers of the State have, as a rule, in their actions at least, admitted the justness and propriety of this decision. As a consequence no serious conflict has occurred between the civil and military authorities. Most of the cases of suits or prosecutions prohibited by military orders or the laws of the United States, and of cases arising under the laws of the State making discriminations on account of race or color, have been adjusted either by equitable decisions in the State courts, or by transfer, under the act of Congress approved May 11, 1866, to the courts of the United States. And I think it is not going too far to say that substantial justice is now administered throughout the State by the local judicial tribunals to all classes of persons, irrespective of race or color or antecedent political opinions. It is unfortunately too true that many outrages and crimes have been committed by the vicious and criminal on the weak, and that these crimes have in many cases gone unpunished. But when it is remembered what a terrible social, political, and military convulsion the nation passed through in the war of the rebellion; when it is borne in mind that a vast population of slaves was suddenly emancipated by the violence of war, and that the late slaves now occupy as freed people the very same soil, in the closest juxtaposition to the formerly dominant class, on which the two races lived in the relation of master and slave, it should not perhaps be matter of surprise that so many outrages and crimes occur and go unpunished, but rather matter of marvel that so few occur.

Great social and political changes are not made in a day. Time, the potential Lethe of deep-rooted, long-standing prejudices, and diffused education, the mighty elevator of the human race, must accomplish the great reforms necessary to the permanent prosperity of the white and colored inhabitants of the southern States.

In December last, his Excellency the Governor of the State applied to me to consent to a general disarming of the negroes through the militia, in conformity with the State statute prohibiting that class of persons from bearing arms without a special license to do so. The reason assigned for the proposition to disarm the negroes was the apprehension of a negro insurrection. Believing there was no foundation in fact for the apprehension of an emeute of the negroes, and entertaining the sincere conviction that the State law prohibiting them from bearing arms was unjust and unconstitutional, I declined to give my assent to the proposed measure. I informed the Governor, however, that I would submit his request, through the proper official channels, to his Excellency the President, for his orders in the premises. The President's decision sustained the position I had taken. His orders were communicated to the Governor of the State; and the latter, at my request, issued an order to the militia of the State not to attempt to enforce the State statute prohibiting the negroes from bearing arms.

In this connection I will record that the Governor of the State has, throughout the whole of my administration of military authority in this State, heartily cooperated with me in all my efforts for the complete restoration of law, order, and prosperity among the people, and for the enforcement of strict and impartial justice to all classes.

THE FREED PEOPLE.

When I assumed command in this State I found the labor question, the most important element of prosperity in an agricultural country, entirely unsettled. The freed people, the former laborers, and the only reliance for the immediate supply of the great desideratum, labor, were restless, unquiet, and indisposed to make arrangements for continuous labor; and the white population, especially that portion desirous of engaging in cultivating the soil, depressed, despondent, and hopeless of securing sufficient labor to whiten the alluvial fields of the Mississippi valley once more with the great staple, cotton.

After taking sufficient time to inform myself of the position of affairs and to survey the whole field, I suggested to Brevet Brigadier General Samuel Thomas, the then assistant commissioner of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands for this State, to issue a circular address to the freed people, advising, not requiring, them to enter into contracts to labor for the ensuing year.

This suggestion, according with General Thomas's convictions of the necessities of the situation, was conformed to, and on the 31st of December last the proposed address was issued and widely circulated. The freed people were advised to this course, not because of the existence of a State statute requiring them to make contracts to labor for a year without they had a license to do job-work, under the penalty of being treated as vagrants without such contract or license, (for it was announced that the enforcement of this statute would not be allowed,) but because by entering into the contracts they would secure employment, a support, and homes for a year. Moreover, by entering into written contracts, made in duplicate and duly authenticated before a civil magistrate, the freed people would have in their possession the evidence for the enforcement of their rights and just claims in the local courts against delinquent employers. It was believed this means of securing justice to the freed people would be particularly efficacious in the rural districts, remote, by reason of geographical distance and diffusion, from the sphere of the immediate surveillance of the military officials. Still further, the freed people, under the information and influence of designing and incendiary persons, had been drugged into the belief that the paramount Government would, on the approaching Christmas or New Year's day, divide among them the lands and other property of the country. It was hence necessary to impress them with the sublime truths that freedom is not licentiousness; that it does not mean the right to do nothing and be supported by charity, whether national or individual; and that it is the duty of every human creature, possessed of the capacity, to work for his or her own support.

The beneficial effect of the address was soon apparent. Complaints from persons wishing to employ negroes to labor for the year, that they would not enter into labor contracts, were soon heard no more.

And I will here express my deliberate judgment that the contract system is the best, both for the employer and the employed. This conviction is derived from the close observation and minute experience of the operations since I have been in command in this State. It is true I have received some complaints from employers that their hired freed people have not worked well; on the other hand, I have received complaints from the freed people that they were defrauded of their wages; but the opinion is hazarded that these complaints, whether coming from employers or employed, constitute exceptional cases, and that the grand bulk of employers and employed have, to the profit of both parties and the advantage of the whole country, honestly and faithfully acknowledged the sacredness of the obligations of their contracts, and fairly carried out the stipulations of the same. It is therefore suggested that the negroes be advised to continue the contract system till they are able to purchase or lease land.

In the latter part of April General Samuel Thomas was relieved from duty as the assistant commissioner of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands in this State, and I was ordered to perform the duties of that office. The opinion is ventured that the consolidation of the duties of the military commander and the assistant commissioner in the hands of the same person for one State or geographical military command is a wise arrangement, and will be found to be promotive of the public interest.

Several of the statute laws of this State in reference to the negroes are very objectionable. I will specially designate a few that seem to be most open to objection.

The statute makes the negro a competent witness in all cases in which one or both of the parties litigant are negroes; it therefore fully protects the rights of the negroes. But if both the parties litigant in any case are white persons, the negro is not a competent witness. Since the negro is a competent witness, either for the prosecution or defense, in cases in which a white person is either plaintiff or defendant and the other party a negro, no reason can be perceived why the colored person should not be a competent witness when both parties are white persons. It is true this statute does not injure the rights of person or property of the negroes, but it does work great injury and inconvenience to the white inhabitants. As the law now stands, the negro can use the testimony of the members of the colored race, as also the evidence of white people, in all cases in which his rights are in litigation; but in matters of litigation between two white persons neither of the parties can use negro testimony, though it may be the only evidence available in the case. A white person can use the testimony of the negro only in case a negro is a party to the suit.

SENATE &amp; HO. OF REPS.

Report of the Secretary of War.

The statute prohibiting the colored people from bearing arms, without a special license, is unjust, oppressive, and unconstitutional. One of the courts of the State has decided the law to be unconstitutional, while another has maintained its constitutionality.

The law prohibiting the negroes from purchasing or leasing real estate except in corporate towns or cities is impolitic and unconstitutional. The effect of it is to drive the negroes in large numbers, into the towns, where they suffer from idleness, vice, and disease; whereas if they were allowed to acquire homes in the country they would become useful, contented, and happy laborers. The constitution of this State, as amended in 1865, invests the negro with the right to acquire and hold property without any qualification or limitation as to the kind or character of the property. It is hence impossible to perceive what authority the Legislature of the State possesses to limit this constitutional boon. Moreover, this statute conflicts directly with the undoubted constitutional right of every citizen, whether white or black, to alienate every species of property he owns, whether real or personal, in any way, or to any other person, without distinction of color, that may be agreeable to the interest or disposition of the proprietor.

The statute requiring all negroes to make a contract on or before the 10th day of January of each year, or to obtain a license to do job-work, is unjust, oppressive, and unconstitutional.

The Constitution of the United States, as well as the constitution of this State, prohibits forever slavery or involuntary servitude.

If the negroes are required by a statutory enactment to obtain a license to do job-work, make a contract to labor for the year, or be exposed to arrest, fine, and imprisonment, it would seem the constitutional gift is not much more than a name.

It is trusted that subsequent legislation will remove these objectionable acts from the statute-book, or that they will become obsolete.

A slow but gradual amelioration of feeling and abatement of prejudice toward the negroes are observable among the white population of the State.

THE CROPS.

The soil products in this State for the current year are almost a total failure. The spring, even to the commencement of the summer, was wet, cold, and unpropitious. The summer was excessively dry and fiercely hot. The excessive heat withered, hopelessly, the corn crop, and injured the cotton. The worm, the most fatal of all the enemies of the cotton plant, made its appearance in the latter part of the summer and early autumn, and mercilessly ravaged the cotton fields.

The most reliable information in my possession goes to show that the corn grown in the State will not feed the people until the 1st day of January, and that the cotton made will not repay the cost of production. The people have no breadstuff to support them until another crop can be made, nor the money to buy it with. But bread they must have. Whence is it to come? Abundance has crowned the agricultural labor of the great Northwest during the present year. Thence, it would seem, the supply must be drawn, either by private charity or Government bounty, or both, to relieve the coming want of this people.

NATIONAL CEMETERIES.

Negotiations have been concluded for the site of a national cemetery near Vicksburg, and the preliminary steps have been taken to secure a site for a similar purpose near Natchez. Already the work of removing the bodies of the soldiers who fell in the defense of the country to the former site has been commenced, and will be pushed as rapidly as the means at disposal will permit; but the small sum allowed for the removal of the bodies and for the preparation of the cemetery makes the work necessarily slow.

It is respectfully suggested that, as many of the graves of the soldiers who were buried near the margin of the Mississippi river are being obliterated and destroyed by the fluvial changes, abundant means should be at once allowed for the work of preparing the cemeteries and removing the bodies to their final resting-place.

The State, and especially this city, was visited by a severe epidemic of cholera in August and September.

I have briefly sketched the leading events of my administration of this command, and attempted to present a faithful picture of its general condition.

The stated reports of my staff officers to the chiefs of staff bureaus at military division and department headquarters, hitherto regularly made, have furnished information of the minute administration of affairs.

I have the honor to be, General, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

THOMAS J. WOOD,

HEADQUARTERS

MILITARY DISTRICT OF KENTUCKY,
LOUISVILLE, KENTUCKY, 1866.

SIR: In compliance with instructions from headquarters department of the Tennessee, I have the honor to transmit the following report of the operations of the military forces under my command in this State since assuming command of the department of Kentucky, April 24, 1866, in obedience to Special Orders of the War Department No. 172, dated April 16, 1866:

The military force in the department on the date of my assuming command consisted of eight companies of the second United States infantry, the twelfth United States colored heavy artillery, and the one hundred and nineteenth United States colored infantry; the two latter regiments under orders for muster out of service. The disbandment of these regiments was accomplished by the 1st of May, leaving but eight companies of the second United States infantry within the limits of the State subject to my command. These troops were stationed as follows: one company at Camp Nelson—a few days afterward, on the breaking up of this post, it was ordered to Lexington, where it has remained since two companies at Jeffersonville, Indiana, guarding public property and buildings at that place; the remaining five companies in the city of Louisville, performing guard duty at the different headquarters, guarding public buildings and property.

About the middle of July a detachment of recruits sufficient to reorganize the two companies necessary to fill up the regiment to ten companies were received, and the companies reorganized at this place.

About the middle of June the department of Kentucky was abolished, and the State of Kentucky reduced to a district command. The necessary reduction of my staff, clerks, orderlies, &c., was promptly made; a proportionate reduction of quarters was also immediately made. In obedience to orders from the War Department, dated in the early part of June, I assumed the additional duties of assistant commissioner of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, relieving Brevet

Brigadier General John Ely, Veteran Reserve corps, who had for some months past been in charge of the bureau of affairs in this State.

Since the union of the bureau duties with the military under the district commanders, the management and operations of both are so nearly connected that I have thought it best, in order to give the commanding general a more comprehensive report of the affairs, to append to this in full my report of the operations of the bureau recently made and forwarded to the Commissioner at Washington; it is attached and respectfully submitted.

During the succeeding few months a more tranquil state of affairs existed in Kentucky than the State had probably enjoyed for some years past, but as the political contest progressed considerable bitterness of feelings sprang up between the contending parties. The election, however, generally passed off quietly. The party known as the rebel sympathizers carried the State in August last by a large majority, electing men, in most cases, to office whose sympathies were known to have been in favor of the rebellion throughout the war, and in many instances returned rebel soldiers were elected.

Bands of "guerrillas" and "negro regulators" soon increased in numbers and audacity, and many lawless acts have been perpetrated by them upon the defenseless and unoffending citizens, both white and black. The increase of robbery and lawlessness, and the ineffectual measures taken by the civil authorities to suppress these bands, rendered it my duty to offer to the citizens more protection from the military than I had before found necessary.

In Gallatin and surrounding counties these bands became so formidable and bold in committing their robberies that I was compelled to send, about the 1st September last, a company of troops to Warsaw, also Bowling Green and Paducah, for the protection of the people. These troops still occupy their camps at these places, and judging from the present state of affairs it will be necessary to continue their presence there.

From these posts small detachments of men are sent out as necessity requires to protect the agents of the bureau, and make arrests of desperadoes. I have allowed no arrests of citizens to be made except where it was manifest that the civil authorities failed or refused to take action, and then only on affidavits previously taken showing conclusively the identity and guilt of the parties. All parties arrested up to this date except five have been turned over to the civil courts for trial after a few days' imprisonment; these five prisoners have been in confinement only a few days, are now awaiting the demand of the United States marshal to be so turned over. These parties have generally been turned over to the United States district court of this State, the only court in the State within my knowledge that will admit the testimony of colored witnesses against accused white parties. For further particulars on this subject I would respectfully refer to the accompanying report of the bureau affairs. [See General Howard's report.]

The general health of the troops has been good; the discipline and efficiency all that could be expected or desired under the circumstances.

The most important post within the district is the city of Louisville; this has been well and efficiently commanded by Brevet Brigadier General Sidney Burbank.

My staff has been so much changed by muster out of service and other causes that it is difficult to give a detailed account of the duties performed by them.

It affords me pleasure to report that these duties have been well and promptly performed.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JEFF. C. DAVIS.

Report of the Secretary of War.

SENATE &amp; HO. OF REPS.

*Report of Major General D. E. Sickles.*HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE SOUTH,
CHARLESTON, S. C., October 30, 1866.

I have the honor to report the operations and general condition of affairs in this department during the present year, in compliance with the order of the General-in-Chief.

The troops in the department of South Carolina, on the 1st of January, 1866, comprised three hundred and fifty-two officers and seven thousand and fifty-six enlisted men. By the muster out of volunteer organizations this force was reduced on the 1st of June last, when the department of South Carolina was discontinued, to two hundred officers and two thousand nine hundred and seventy-three enlisted men.

I assumed command of the department of the Carolinas, including the States of North and South Carolina, June 2, 1866, in compliance with General Order No. 32, War Department, dated May 19, 1866. The troops in the department of the Carolinas comprised one hundred and sixty-nine officers and three thousand two hundred and seventy-seven enlisted men. On the 17th day of August, 1866, I assumed command of the department of the South, embracing the same territory and troops included in the department of the Carolinas. The one hundred and twenty-eighth United States colored troops was mustered out October 10, 1866. The troops now comprise the sixth and eighth regiments of United States infantry; companies A, H, I, and L, fifth United States cavalry; light company E, third regiment United States artillery, and thirty-seventh regiment United States colored troops. Total number of commissioned officers, one hundred and thirty-five; enlisted men, two thousand six hundred and twelve.

The sixth United States infantry and four companies of the eighth, with companies H and L, fifth United States cavalry, and three companies thirty-seventh United States colored troops, garrison twelve posts in South Carolina; and six companies of the eighth United States infantry, companies A and I, fifth United States cavalry, light company E, third United States artillery, companies A, B, D, F, G, I, and K, thirty-seventh regiment United States colored troops, garrison the several posts in North Carolina.

Depots for recruits for the fortieth United States infantry have been established at Smiths-ville, North Carolina, and Charleston, South Carolina. Enlistments are going on satisfactorily.

Pursuant to General Order No. 32, War Department, Adjutant General's Office, 1866, the States of North and South Carolina, respectively, constitute military commands, Brevet Major General J. C. Robinson, United States Army, commanding in North Carolina, and Brevet Major General R. K. Scott commanding in South Carolina, each performing the duties of assistant commissioner of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, &c., within his command.

The discipline and efficiency of the troops is generally fair, most of the enlisted men of the regular force being recruits. Desertions have been quite numerous for several months, but are now less frequent. (Report of Major James P. Roy, sixth United States infantry, acting assistant inspector general, Appendix 1.)

The troops are well equipped and clothed, and comfortably quartered. But few complaints have been reported of the issues made by the quartermaster's and subsistence departments, and these have been promptly corrected. (Reports of the chief quartermaster, Brevet Major General R. O. Tyler, and of the chief commissary of subsistence, Brevet Brigadier General W. W. Burns, Appendix 2 and 3.)

The health of the troops has been excellent; the sick in hospital averaging only four per cent. of the mean strength of the command, and the ratio of deaths per thousand men being only 3.68. No case of yellow fever or cholera has occurred, nor have these epidemics appeared in the department; a remarkable result, attributable mainly, in my judgment, to the effective quarantine maintained, in compliance with General Order No. 15, headquarters armies of the United States. (See report of medical director, Appendix 4.)

Large reductions have been made in the expenditures of the quartermaster's department. The estimates reported for January, 1866, were $238,794 17, and for August, 1866, $54,076 06.

In January, 1866, in the department of South Carolina, eleven steamers, five tugs, and one sailing vessel were more or less employed. On September 1 the water transportation had been reduced to one steamer and three sailing vessels; two of the sailing vessels were chartered for quarantine purposes, and have been since discharged.

The depots at Hilton Head, belonging to the quartermaster, subsistence, and medical departments, have been broken up, and the civilian employes, more than a thousand in number, discharged. Orders recently received for the disposition of the large accumulation of ordnance and ordnance stores at that post are being executed with diligence by the ordnance officer and chief quartermaster.

The depots at Raleigh and Columbia have likewise been discontinued. Charleston and Newbern are now the only sources of supply.

The cemeterial operations, necessarily suspended during the warm season, will be resumed next month, and prosecuted with energy to completion during the winter, so that all the offices of honorable interment, as contemplated by the Government, will have been rendered to those of our heroic dead who fell during the war in North and South Carolina.

For more particular information as to these and other operations of the quartermaster's department I respectfully refer to the report of Brevet Major General Tyler, inclosed herewith, to whose zeal and ability I am much indebted.

The issues of rations to refugees and freedmen subsequent to January 1, 1866, were gradually diminished under the operation of orders from department headquarters forbidding issues to persons able to earn a living. The demand for labor during the year has been sufficient to employ every one willing to work. Agents of the Freedmen's Bureau, in some localities, issued rations improvidently. Over issues made by those agents I have no direct control.

In compliance with the recent instructions of the Secretary of War, Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, Washington, August 22, 1866, all issues to freedmen and refugees ceased on the 1st of October, except to the sick in hospitals and orphans in asylums heretofore established. For the ten days ending October 10, two thousand and thirty-four rations were issued to those two classes in North Carolina, and in South Carolina one thousand and ninety rations. The Legislature of South Carolina, during its recent extraordinary session, made a liberal appropriation for the supply of corn to the destitute.

The most satisfactory progress seems to have been made during the past year in all that concerns the welfare of these States. A year ago civil authority did not exist. The duties of the Executive were in the hands of provisional functionaries appointed by the President. These have been replaced by Governors elected by the people. The courts were all closed, and the administration of justice depended altogether on military tribunals. Now, the courts are all open, and the jurisdiction of military tribunals, except on the sea islands, is confined to persons in the military service, in cases arising under the Articles of War. The administration of municipalities, towns, and counties devolved upon military officers. The police of Charleston, Columbia, Raleigh, and Wilmington was exclusively military. The taxes imposed, the streets that were lighted, the licenses granted, and all the regulations of commerce and trade were subject to military authority. Now, the local magistrates and officials chosen by the people, or appointed according to law, are discharging their ordinary duties. The police is almost exclusively municipal. All taxes, assessments, and charges of every kind are levied by civil authorities, and all the restrictions upon commerce, trade, and intercourse, other than those imposed by the laws, have ceased.

In the condition of the colored population the same gratifying progress has been observed. The act of emancipation has been ratified constitutionally by the spontaneous assent of these States. The Legislature of South Carolina has recognized the civil rights of freedmen as defined by the civil rights bill. In North and South Carolina the courts are open to freedmen for the protection of person and property. In South Carolina they are competent to testify in all cases, without disqualification on account of color, interest, or relation to the subject-matter. Their dwellings, schools, churches, and societies are generally unmolested and secure. They are free to cultivate the soil for themselves, or to engage in any lawful calling, or to hire for wages, as they may choose. And it is only just to declare, as the result of my observation, that the conduct of the colored population has deserved all praise, and justifies the belief that as freemen they will become reliable, worthy, and useful citizens. Conspicuous among the better tendencies of the race is their respect for religion. Devoted to their churches and preachers, they habitually attend divine service and engage with singular earnestness in all religious observances. The belief is almost universal among the freed people that their deliverance from servitude was the act of God.

The situation at the commencement of the agricultural year, which begins in the South about the 1st of January, was full of difficulties. Many of the planters had not obtained possession of their lands. Those who were in possession had little or no money. Plantation buildings, fences, implements of husbandry, and stock could only be partially restored. The negroes generally had been led to hope that the Government would give them the lands and premises where they had been domiciled as slaves: hence they were unwilling to make engagements to work for others. With the restoration of civil authority, they apprehended injustice and oppression at the hands of their former masters. They were anxious to acquire lands for themselves. They desired especially to live somewhere under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Federal authority. Thousands found their way to the sea islands and the abandoned coast plantations, under the impression that General Sherman's field order gave these lands altogether and exclusively to the freed people. They were not disposed to work for the owners to whom lands had been restored, for they had been encouraged to believe that they could rightfully stay and cultivate the abandoned lands of which they had taken possession.

In South Carolina the legislation of 1865 failed to quiet the uneasiness and distrust of the freed people as to the security of their civil rights. The discussions in Congress and in the public journals, and the language of many public agents, kept alive the hope of receiving grants of lands from the Government.

All these circumstances contributed to make the colored people restless, migratory, and indolent, producing general discontent and frequent collisions between the two races. Grave disorders becoming more and more frequent, I published a comprehensive order defining the principal relations between the whites and the freed people, and establishing regulations concerning the occupation of lands, labor, pauperism, vagrancy, disorderly conduct, and crimes.

(General Order No. 1, January 1, 1866, department of South Carolina. Appendix 5.) These regulations at least furnished positive and uniform rules for the government of all concerned, and contributed to establish order where all had been uncertainty and confusion.

The results were immediate and salutary. The planters evinced a disposition to employ as many hands as their means allowed. The freedmen generally went to work. Their desire to wander from place to place and to crowd together in towns and cities diminished. The facilities for traveling which had been improvidently furnished by the agents of the Freedmen's Bureau, were curtailed by orders to the quartermaster's department to confine transportation strictly to the provisions of General Order 138, War Department, Adjutant General's Office, 1865. The misgivings of many planters as to the disposition of free negroes to work for wages gradually gave way. It soon became evident that with proper energy, capital, patience, and tact on the part of the landholders, if they failed to make good crops, the failure would neither result from the lack of available hands nor from the omission of the military authorities to exert a proper influence upon the laboring population. (General Order No. 75, department of South Carolina, Appendix 6.)

And now, at the close of the year, I do not hesitate to affirm that where the season has been favorable, wages liberal, facilities for culture ample, the superintendence diligent and judicious, and the laborers well treated, the average production has been equal to ordinary years before emancipation. "Whenever the planters wish the thing to succeed, it is successful." This remark, quoted from the report of the Marquis of Sligo, colonial Governor of Jamaica in 1835, is as truly applicable to these States as it could have been to the British West Indies after emancipation.

On the 1st of January last the control of civil affairs in the city of Charleston was turned over to the mayor and municipal authorities, with certain temporary reservations; these related mainly to the trial and punishment of negroes and the prohibition of the quasi military organization and equipment of the police as it existed before emancipation.

Desiring to relieve the people from all unnecessary restraints incident to martial law, I directed, on the 4th of March last, that the administration of civil affairs in all the parishes and towns be remitted to the civil authorities, when duly appointed and qualified according to law, and prohibiting thereafter any military tax, assessment, or charge of any kind, except fines and penalties imposed by provost courts or military commissions for offenses whereof the party had been duly convicted. Civil officers have been required in all cases to obey the proclamation of the President, the laws of Congress, and all orders relating to the government of this department emanating from competent authority. No disqualification for office has been imposed except the refusal or neglect to take and subscribe the amnesty oath last prescribed, unless the party belonged to one of the classes excepted from amnesty, and in such cases full pardon from the President is required. Provost courts have been necessarily continued in operation, with jurisdiction in cases concerning persons of color, until such persons became legally competent to sue and testify in the State courts, with the same rights and remedies accorded to other persons. (General Order No. 7, department of South Carolina, March 4, 1866. Appendix 7.)

Contemporaneously with these measures, the muster-out of the volunteer force, and the general improvement in the condition of affairs rendered it expedient and practicable to discontinue the military district and sub-district organization, and to establish posts embracing, territorially, several counties. These have been garrisoned by one or two companies, from which mounted detachments and patrols could be furnished when required, post commanders reporting directly to department headquarters. This organization was continued until the assignment of Generals Robinson and Scott to the military commands of North and South Carolina. I desired also that the post commanders should be ex officio agents of the Freedmen's Bureau, reporting in that capacity to the assistant commissioner; and so far as this suggestion has been adopted, the gain to the public service and to the interests of all concerned has been manifest. In my judgment all the legitimate duties of the Freedmen's Bureau can be more efficiently and promptly performed by post commanders, who will have not only the necessary authority, but also the means and facilities at their disposal to enforce their orders. The administrative and economical advantages are obvious enough.

The superior courts, the local magistracy, and the town and municipal authorities have generally shown a proper disposition to do justice between man and man and to afford protection to all good citizens. Unfortunately, however, there are exceptions to be made to this statement. In some parts of Barnwell, Edgefield, Newberry, Chester, Laurens, and Richland districts, (counties,) in South Carolina, a freedman has little security for life, limb, or property, apart from the presence and protection of a garrison of United States troops. There are other districts in the western part of South Carolina where the same insecurity exists. The truth is, that in certain localities of these States, personal encounters, assaults, and difficulties between citizens, often resulting in serious wounds and death, have for years occurred without the serious notice or action of the civil authorities; and in those neighborhoods where it has heretofore seemed to the population officious to arrest and punish citizens for assault upon each other, they can hardly be expected to yield with any grace to arrests for assaults and outrages upon negroes. It is precisely in these localities that the most impatience is displayed at the presence of a garrison, because people who have long violated civil law with impunity dislike martial law or any other law that is enforced.

In consequence of the vigilance of the garrisons and the punishment which has followed the perpetration of outrages upon refugees and freedmen, when the guilty parties became known to the military authorities, these crimes are now generally committed by bands of outlaws and marauders, composed of the most reckless and abandoned characters, organized mainly for plunder and pillage. There is reason to believe that organizations of these banditti, more or less numerous, and connected with each other, exist in the localities I have mentioned, and have their accomplices with corresponding organizations in the border counties of Georgia, Tennessee, and North Carolina. They defy the civil authorities; they overawe the well-disposed population. They often elude the garrisons, because it is impossible to obtain from the people in the neighborhood of their depredations or of their resorts any reliable information about them. Even the colored people generally prefer to evade inquiries, rather than expose themselves to certain vengeance as the penalty of disclosures that would cause the arrest and punishment of one or more of these confederated bands. His Excellency the Governor of South Carolina, who has endeavored, by means of rewards privately offered, to effect the arrest of some of these offenders, has succeeded in capturing one or two of them, and they are now in the hands of the civil authorities, awaiting trial.

In July last a party of guerrillas, disguised as blacks, rode into the county town of Newberry, dismounted, tied their horses, and proceeded to the house of one Amos Wesley, a colored barber, who resided near the courthouse; they killed him in the presence of his wife and family, mounted their horses, and rode off. No arrests were made at the time, and the ringleaders are still at large, although several of them are known to the civil authorities. Wesley had wronged no one, and seems to have been an inoffensive person, although, perhaps, somewhat indiscreet in speech. He had, however, been warned to leave Newberry, and it appears he intended to move somewhere as soon as he could find a suitable place for his calling. The officer sent to investigate the affair arrested two persons as accomplices in the crime, but the evidence was not deemed sufficient to justify their detention. (Report of Major Everton, aid-de-camp, Appendix 8.) All the papers in the case have been furnished to his Excellency the Governor of South Carolina, in compliance with his request, for his information and action.

Two or three weeks ago a party of men, similarly disguised as blacks, went to the residence of Mr. Biglow, a teacher of a school for colored children in the town of Aiken, in Barnwell district; displaying weapons and threatening his life, they compelled him to leave the place, never to return, under pain of death. Mr. Biglow was requested to return by the post commander, and was assured of protection, but declined to do so, fearing he could not, without more hazard than he was willing to incur, resume his avocation in Aiken. This place has long been a favorite summer resort for invalids and for people of wealth and refinement in the South. It is the headquarters of a military post, garrisoned by company H, fifth United States cavalry. Brevet Major Walker, United States Army, the post commander, has exerted himself with zeal and diligence to obtain sufficient testimony to justify the arrest of the perpetrators of this outrage, and although, as he reports to me, they are well known to the neighborhood and suspected by himself, it has been as yet impossible to obtain reliable testimony on the subject. The civil authorities have taken no action the case, so far as I am informed. (See report of Brevet Brigadier General B. P. Runckle, agent of Freedmen's Bureau, and report of Brevet Major L. Walker, United States Army, commanding post, Appendix 9.)

It sometimes happens, indeed, that arrests are made of the worst class of offenders, and occasionally they are tried and punished. Instances of much gravity are too frequent, however, of the most reprehensible neglect to arrest and prosecute notorious malefactors and outlaws. Inquests in case of homicide, especially if the victim be a negro, seldom result in a verdict which points out the guilty. When arrests are made by military authority and the parties turned over to the civil tribunals, the accused are generally admitted to easy bail. The sittings of the superior courts only occur twice a year, so that justice is slow at best. It became necessary, therefore, to authorize commanding officers to treat these outlaws as guerrillas, and punish them summarily. On the 12th of October the commanding officer of the post of Chester, in compliance with General Order No. 15, current series, department of the South, turned over the jail to the sheriff, and also the custody of the prisoners, several of whom had been confined on charges of the most serious character. The sheriff was admonished by Brevet Major Carter, United States Army, commanding, of the desperate character of some of the inmates, and of the necessity for vigilance, but, on the second night after the sheriff had taken possession, all the prisoners escaped. It being apparent that no reliance could be placed on the sheriff, I have communicated the occurrence to his Excellency the Governor of South Carolina, and directed the post commander to resume possession of the jail, capture the escaped prisoners if possible, and hold them in military confinement until the proper judicial tribunal shall be ready to try them.

39TH CONG....2D SESS.

Report of the Secretary of War.

SENATE &amp; H. OF REPS.

The orders of the General-in-Chief, General Order 44, headquarters of the Army, Adjutant General's Office, July 6, 1866, directing the arrest of offenders and their detention in military custody, in cases where the civil authorities fail, neglect, or are unable to arrest and bring offenders to trial, have been strictly and vigilantly enforced. These orders have had the effect of stimulating the action of the civil authorities, especially in certain localities notorious for the insecurity of person and property.

Since the organization of the courts of the United States in North and South Carolina, respectively, all cases of admiralty jurisdiction, and all other proceedings, civil or criminal, of which those courts have cognizance, have been remitted to them. No complaint or suggestion has reached me from any quarter of any failure of justice in those tribunals. North Carolina having, in all trials, civil or criminal, except the crime of rape when charged against a negro, extended the laws of the Commonwealth impartially to all persons, without distinction on account of color or race, jurisdiction of all cases, whether civil or criminal, with the exception just now mentioned, has been remitted to the ordinary civil tribunals of the State. The distinguished officer commanding in North Carolina reports that he finds, "in most parts of the State, a willingness on the part of civil officers to aid the military commanders in bringing criminals of all colors to justice, and generally giving all classes their just rights." General Robinson, however, remarks that "petitions from loyal men throughout the State, setting forth grievances and stating they are being prosecuted for acts done in their military capacity and while protecting loyal persons," have been received by him; and he reports that, "in all cases clearly ascertained, the executive officers of judicial circuits have been notified to discontinue such prosecutions."

Approving of the action of the district commander, I have directed in such cases, in compliance with General Order No. 3, War Department, Adjutant General's Office, January 12, 1866, that all parties within the provisions of that order be protected from any penalties or damages that may have been or may be adjudged against them in the courts of North Carolina.

In South Carolina I directed, in June last, that all white civilians in military custody charged with felonies or misdemeanors be turned over to the civil magistrates and tribunals of the State for trial, according to the nature and character of the offense charged, and of the jurisdiction of the court having legal cognizance thereof. Serious doubts having been entertained whether in prosecutions of white persons for offenses against freedmen the latter would be deemed competent witnesses in the State courts, I requested his Excellency the Governor to submit the question to the chief justice of the court of appeals, who replied, the Governor concurring, that the courts of general sessions always had cognizance of offenses committed by white persons against the person or property of freed persons of color; and that under the provisions of the law of 1865, persons of color became competent to testify before grand juries, magistrates, and courts, in criminal cases, touching the person or property of persons of color. The laws of South Carolina had not, then, placed the freed people upon an equal footing in the courts as parties; and, therefore, cases in which they were concerned remained, temporarily, within the exclusive jurisdiction of military tribunals. (Special Order No. 19, department of Carolinas, Columbia, June 26, 1866, Appendix, 10; also letter of instructions to Brevet Major General R. K. Scott, commanding in South Carolina, dated Charleston, August 31, 1866, Appendix 11.)

of South Carolina convened the Legislature in extraordinary session, when laws were passed substantially recognizing the civil rights of the freed people as those rights are defined in the civil rights bill passed by Congress. This concession gave all people of color the same remedies for wrongs and the same protection enjoyed by the most favored citizen. Their competency to sue and to testify in all cases, to make contracts, and to hold, convey, or bequeath property, whether real or personal, has been expressly recognized in South Carolina. (Correspondence between his Excellency the Governor of South Carolina and the major general commanding, Appendix 12; also copy act Legislature of South Carolina, Appendix 13.)

These laws having been officially communicated to me, I have directed that all cases, civil or criminal, in which the parties are civilians, be turned over to the State tribunals, that the jails and prisons be restored to the sheriffs, and that military provost courts be discontinued, except on the sea islands, where provisional tribunals cannot for the present be superseded, inasmuch as civil authority has not yet been organized and established. A large portion of the territory of these islands remains under the control of the Bureau of Abandoned Lands, Freedmen, &c., and of the United States tax commissioners, pursuant to the legislation of Congress at the last session. (General Order No. 15, Headquarters department of the South, October 15, 1866, Appendix 14.)

The courts throughout the department have been interdicted from entertaining prosecutions or suits against persons for acts done by competent military authority; or against any one who adhered to the Union during the rebellion for acts done in opposition to rebel forces and agents; or for the possession and use of abandoned lands or other property held by authority of the President or any civil or military department of the Government.

In remitting to civil authority the comprehensive jurisdiction for some time exercised under martial law, the occasion was deemed a proper one to enjoin upon the freed people their duty to yield unhesitating obedience to the civil laws and magistracy, and also to commend to the authorities and inhabitants in general the considerate, forbearing, and patient execution of the laws in all matters concerning the numerous population so recently vested with civil rights and the obligations of citizens. Considerations affecting public tranquillity and order suggested the expediency of prohibiting whipping as a punishment for men and women, and likewise the sale of persons convicted of vagrancy and other offenses for periods of involuntary service. (Correspondence between his Excellency the Governor of South Carolina and the major general commanding, Appendix 15.)

Under the operation of the legislation and the general orders to which allusion has just been made, the superior courts have held their autumnal term. The adherents to the cause of the Union, the partisans of the rebellion, northern men domiciled here since the war, the slaveholders of former times, and the freedmen of this epoch, have all found themselves within the cognizance of the courts. White men have been convicted of crimes upon negro testimony; negroes, tried upon charges preferred by white persons, have been acquitted upon negro testimony. In one instance the acquittal turned upon the evidence of the accused, a freedman, in his own behalf, the testimony of accused persons, when offered by themselves, having been made competent by recent legislation in South Carolina.

It would be premature, as yet, to assume that the new order of things in these States is no longer an experiment. Nevertheless, among the numerous matters of complaint disposed of during the year, the cases are exceptional and inconsiderable in number that seem to furnish just occasion for censorious comment or criticism upon the manner in which the civil authorities, and especially the superior tribunals, have fulfilled their novel relations to the freedmen as citizens.

It has been already intimated that justice is administered by the superior courts in these States with a conscientious respect for law and a degree of independence of popular sentiment not generally found among the inferior magistrates or ministerial officers. The magistrates are often dilatory in issuing warrants for the apprehension of offenders, if public opinion incline toward the accused. Nor are the sheriffs and constables likely in such cases to be diligent in making arrests. Inquests by coroners, when freedmen have been killed, have seldom pointed to the guilty party. In an instance reported by the post commander at Hilton Head, that occurred in Beaufort district, the perpetrators of the homicide were on the coroner's jury and joined in the verdict that the victims came to their death by means to the jury unknown. Such also was the verdict in Wesley's case, at Newberry, although the murderers were recognized on the spot and were well known to the neighborhood.

These irregularities do not occur where persons of consideration are sufficiently interested in the proceedings to insist upon the proper action. The Governors, unfortunately, have no control over any of these officers. They are amenable for official misconduct, it is true, to indictment and trial by a court; but in the absence of executive control it may be assumed that for practical purposes there is no responsibility. District and post commanders are instructed to report the refusal or neglect of any magistrate, court, or officer to perform any official act required by law, whereby due and rightful protection to person and property shall have been denied.

In conclusion, the following general observations are suggested by a review of the operations and the condition of affairs during the year in this department:

The military occupation of the territory by detachments garrisoning posts embracing one or more counties has restored order, afforded security for person and property, and encouraged the resumption of agricultural, industrial, and commercial employments. For the necessary garrisons and the detachments required to make the post organization efficient throughout the department, three battalions of infantry and three squadrons of cavalry, with four companies of artillery for the forts and permanent works, will be sufficient.

Notwithstanding the gravity of some exceptional occurrences incident to the close of a long war, tranquillity and order have been restored under martial law, contemporaneously with successive concessions of jurisdiction to civil authority, and the gradual reduction of the Army to a peace establishment.

In certain localities disturbed by bands of outlaws, many of them fugitives from justice in these and other States and paroled rebel soldiers, who continue to commit the worst crimes and disturb the peace of neighborhoods, the exercise of the power of arrest and punishment under martial law is the only reliable security for life and property. The civil authorities fail to suppress these organizations and punish the outrages committed. Magistrates, constables, jurors, and witnesses, residing far from a garrison, are intimidated by threats of retaliation from enforcing the ordinary legal remedies against these bandits and guerrillas.

The material prosperity of these States, injured almost irreparably by the war, seems likely to be restored through emancipation. Although some time must elapse before their productions will be equal in quantity to the product before the war, the increased value of the staples raised will soon make up the equivalent. Capital, enterprise, and population are coming from the North. With these will be provided increased facilities for culture, manufactures, and trade. Remarkable success has rewarded many diligent and judicious planters, who have paid liberal wages in cash and treated their laborers kindly. Evidence accumulates to prove the general disposition of the negroes to work voluntarily and faithfully for wages, or for themselves as tenants and as small proprietors. Education, the enjoyment of their earnings, the security of family ties, the possession of civil rights, and the practice of divine worship are exerting their salutary influence upon the conduct, intelligence, and thrift of the freed people. The two races, alienated by war and suddenly separated by emancipation, are becoming gradually reconciled.

There are good reasons for the belief that the fortunate exemption of this department from the riots and turbulent collisions which have occurred elsewhere is attributable in the main to the prohibition of all armed organizations, whether of police, patrols, "regulators," or militia. The organization of an efficient police and constabulary in the several towns and counties has been uniformly encouraged, and the troops have always supported the civil authority in the execution of the laws and in the preservation of order whenever the employment of armed forces has been necessary and proper. The lawful enrollment of the militia has not been prevented; but while the United States forces occupy the territory no occasion is likely to arise for the services of any other armed force. To illustrate the inconvenience that would be incident to the operations of outside military organizations not under my command, I invite attention to the following extract from the militia law of South Carolina, passed December 22, 1865, and which does not differ essentially, I understand, from the legislation of adjacent States:

"Sec. 123. That every commissioned officer in the militia shall have power, when occasion shall require, to assemble, arm, and raise any number of men belonging to their respective corps; and, if need be, to give notice and call to their aid the officers and men of any adjacent corps to disperse, suppress, kill, and destroy, take or subdue any pirate, sea-rover, or other enemy, who shall in a hostile manner hurt, or attempt to hurt, any of the inhabitants of this State, or their persons or possessions, or any company of freedmen or others who shall be lurking in any suspected place where they may do mischief."

The employment of any armed force in the manner authorized by this statute would be sure to provoke serious collisions between the two races, and more especially until the distrust and alienation out of which such enactments have their origin shall have yielded to the better sentiments of coöperation and concord. (Copy report to Adjutant General of the Army, 29th September, 1866, Appendix 16.)

The armed bands called "regulators" have no formal sanction from any authority, and are only countenanced by ill-disposed persons. These bands have committed repeated acts of hostility against the United States forces, and many depredations and outrages upon the persons and property of peaceable citizens. The instructions and orders given in such cases have been to capture and punish such offenders summarily as guerrillas, pursuant to General Order No. 90, War Department, May 11, 1865.

In certain counties, such as Newberry, Edgefield, and Laurens, so much countenance was given to outrages upon refugees and freed people, directly and indirectly, by the indifference of the civil authorities, and by the population, who made themselves more or less accomplices in the crimes, that other and more comprehensive measures became necessary. I invited some well-disposed citizens of consideration and influence to proceed to those localities, and endeavor to arouse the people to a proper sense of their responsibility for these disorders. Brevet Colonel Alexander Moore, aid-de-camp, with an escort of cavalry, proceeded, by my order, to the localities where the offenses had been committed, and arrested a number of the parties, some of them prominent citizens, who had harbored and given aid and comfort to the worst offenders.

These remedies not proving to be effectual, I caused it to be made known to the inhabitants of Edgefield, Newberry, and Laurens that measures had been initiated to remove the persecuted refugees and freed people inhabiting these counties to places of refuge and security, and to subsist them until they could provide for themselves; and that unless all just occasion for complaint against the population of those counties ceased forthwith, these measures would be taken at the expense of the communities responsible for grievances that seemed to defy all other modes of redress. Instructions of this purport having been sent to Brevet Major General Ames, commanding the western district, and the tenor of them having been communicated to his Excellency the Governor, the improved condition of affairs subsequently observed in these counties made it practicable to postpone the execution of these measures indefinitely. (Copy instructions to Brevet Major General Ames; copy communication to his Excellency the Governor of South Carolina; copy reports of Captain Coan, aid-de-camp, and of Colonel Deveraux, assistant commissioner of Bureau Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, and other documents; Appendix 17.)

It has likewise been found necessary to prohibit associations or assemblages composed of persons who served in the rebel armies, and having for their object the perpetuation of any military or other organization engaged in the rebellion. This prohibition has not been enforced against any society which has, in good faith, confined its action to the charitable relief of disabled and indigent survivors, and the ordinary observances for the burial of the dead. (General Orders No. 7, department of the South, Appendix 18.)

Recently a meeting of one of these associations was made the occasion for an address delivered by General Wade Hampton, in which he is reported to have commented upon the Government and the armies of the United States, and especially upon the operations of Generals Sherman and Sheridan, in a manner well calculated to incite discontent and hostility against the authorities of the United States. I have directed an inquiry into the matter, in order that the association of rebel soldiers may be suppressed, and General Hampton admonished to observe the terms of his parole, if, upon investigation, it shall appear to have been disregarded in this instance.

I desire to express my hearty appreciation of the efficient aid I have received from the distinguished officers commanding in North and South Carolina, and from the post commanders, in the discharge of the novel and difficult duties incident to the exercise of military authority during the gradual transition from martial to civil law. The officers of my staff, in their several departments, have evinced the most praiseworthy zeal and diligence.

Very respectfully,

NAVY DEPARTMENT, December 3, 1866.

SIR: I have the honor to present the annual report of the condition and operations of this Department and of the Navy during the year. The reduction of the naval force at home and the establishment and reinforcement of the squadrons abroad, with the repairing and placing in efficient condition the vessels and machinery which had become worn and defective by long and constant hard usage, have continued to be objects of paramount importance in the administration of naval affairs since my last annual report.

When the war terminated, which had developed the energies and the resources of the country, and so stimulated the activity and inventive powers of our countrymen as to have given extraordinary efficiency to the Navy, this Department became relieved of some of the labor and much of the responsibility which for four years had commanded its unremitting attention. But to reduce the immense armament which the exigencies of the period and the power of the Government had called into existence, to discontinue the blockading squadrons, to dispose of the large number of captured and purchased vessels which had been used for war purposes, to discharge and retire the volunteers from service, to suspend the work which had been commenced for increasing the Navy, to contract within proper limits our naval force, which, during the war, had assumed a magnitude that gave us foremost rank among naval Powers, while yet placing our Navy upon a substantial but economical peace establishment, involved no inconsiderable amount of labor and responsibility, as well as of judgment and discrimination.

While these reductions from the war standard have continued to occupy the attention and the efforts of this Department during the year, it has also been vigilant to organize and reestablish efficient squadrons abroad, and, for the protection of American interests and the assertion of American rights, to have one or more of our vessels visit every important point where our commerce has penetrated.

Not until after the fall of Fort Fisher did the Department spare any labor or effort to strengthen and increase our naval power; but down to that period it was pressing forward with the same energy and determination in the construction of additional vessels and machinery, and in procuring additional ordnance supplies and munitions, as during any period of the war.

The possession of the Mississippi river and its tributaries had justified the diminution of the naval force which was made on our internal waters at an earlier period, although an efficient and well-organized squadron continued to patrol those rivers until the rebellion was wholly suppressed.

At the close of the war the Government had at its command an immense navy, composed partly of vessels built for fighting purposes, and partly of vessels which had been captured, or were purchased from the commercial marine and armed for the service.

Contracts for new vessels which had been commenced, and for engines which are in the course of construction, must necessarily go forward to completion; but as far as has been practicable, all such work in the navy-yards and elsewhere is suspended. At the earliest moment consistent with the public interest, most of the captured and purchased vessels were sold, and returned to the merchant service, from which they had been originally procured. They thus, after having been used to suppress the rebellion, are contributing in a measure toward reestablishing commercial and social relations among the States which had been arrayed in conflict. Some naval-built steamers, hastily constructed for war purposes, which there was no object in further retaining, have also, from time to time, as opportunity presented, been put in the market and sold to advantage. In this manner, and by these means, our large Navy has been reduced and brought within the limits of a proper peace establishment.

Report of the Secretary of the Navy.

The naval stations which were established at various points on the southern coast, to promote the efficiency of the blockade, have been discontinued, and the supplies which were on hand when the blockade was raised and the squadrons were withdrawn, have been sold or transferred elsewhere, as the public interest required. The reduction of these stations has been effected as economically and with as little waste as was possible.

Prudence required that a naval force should continue for a period to line our coast, in order to prevent any renewal of hostilities, or any further infraction of the laws. Happily no contingency has arisen calling for naval interposition, and it is a subject of congratulation that since the surrender of the armies and the termination of the blockade, tranquillity has pervaded the States which were in rebellion. The people lately in insurrection have peacefully submitted to the result of the war, accepted its legal consequences, acquiesced in the decision against secession, and acknowledged their allegiance to the Constitution and Government of the Union. Some discontent has been exhibited in consequence of the attempts to impose upon this portion of our countrymen, since their submission, terms which are regarded as in the nature of ex post facto laws, and to enforce on the States, as a condition precedent to their resumption of their rights under the Constitution, the adoption of an amendment to that instrument in the preparation and presentment of which they had no voice or representation, and which, if incorporated into the organic law, is conceded as changing in essential respects the character of the Government. That they and others should object to and oppose such a measure is not surprising. So far as they are concerned it conflicts with the acknowledged truth that Government derives its just powers from the consent of the governed, and it conflicts equally with the method prescribed by the Constitution for the initiation and submission to the States of all amendments to the fundamental law. Yet never, perhaps, in the annals of the world have the inhabitants of such an extent of country, previously accustomed to self-government, so soon and so generally submitted to the results brought upon them by defeat.

Intemperate language has been uttered by violent and inconsiderate partisans, but peaceable acquiescence has generally prevailed for the last eighteen months through the South. A domestic disturbance of a local character, having its origin in a controversy concerning the State government, broke into a lamentable riot at New Orleans, which was speedily suppressed without assistance from the naval vessels which were in front of the city, and ready to render aid if required. There was not then, nor has there been in any quarter, resistance to the Federal authority; nor have there been any of the anticipated outbreaks such as in other countries have followed the disbanding of great armies, and which it was apprehended might require not only military but naval force to overcome. The rebellion being suppressed and the cause or pretext which led to it extinguished, there has been no obstacle to the reestablishment of the Union and the restoration of fraternal relations, save the passions and resentments incident to a civil war. Gradually our home squadrons have been diminished and finally wholly withdrawn, excepting a force which has been and is maintained in the Gulf with reference as much to foreign as domestic affairs.

GENERAL EXHIBIT OF THE NAVY.

The total number of vessels in the Navy at this time is two hundred and seventy-eight, armed with two thousand three hundred and fifty-one guns. Of these, there are in commission and on active duty one hundred and fifteen vessels, carrying one thousand and twenty-nine guns. The following general exhibit gives in detail a statement of the character and condition of the naval force:

	Number.	Guns.
Vessels in squadron service.....	69	694
Vessels on special service.....	9	83
Vessels on service at home stations, including receiving ships, Naval Academy, navy-yard duty, &c.....	37	252
Total number of vessels in commission..	115	1,029
Iron-clad vessels laid up.....	54	147
Iron-clad vessels not completed.....	7	40
Steam vessels not completed.....	19	386
Sailing vessels not completed (old line-of-battle ships).....	2	-
Wooden vessels laid up, repairing, fitting for sea, and for sale.....	81	749
Total number of vessels and guns..	278	2,351

The total number of seamen in the naval and coast survey service is about 13,600 men.

THE SQUADRONS.

In the spring of 1865 measures were taken, while reducing our naval force and disbanding our blockading fleets, to reestablish our foreign squadrons, which had been recalled in the spring of 1861. For four years our commercial interests had necessarily been left almost without other protection than such as could be rendered by a few isolated cruisers, which represented us at remote points. But the display of the flag of the Union in foreign ports and on distant seas, even at long intervals, by a roving man-of-war, was an admonition of the naval power of the Republic, which, though employed for the time in aiding to suppress domestic difficulties, it was well understood would be prompt and efficient in vindicating the rights and interests of our countrymen.

Before the close of the year in which the rebellion was suppressed, our foreign squadrons were reestablished, and the admirals in command on their respective stations. These squadrons have been from time to time augmented, and, with a degree of activity and energy never before exhibited, have, by one or more of their vessels, during the year visited nearly every principal port of the world. The views of the Department enjoining activity, and the exhibition of the flag of our Navy wherever our commerce penetrated, have been faithfully observed, and the reappearance of our men-of-war has been welcomed, not only by our countrymen, but by the people of every nation which they have visited.

EUROPEAN SQUADRON.

The restrictions imposed upon American armed ships during the rebellion, by the great maritime Powers of southern Europe, virtually excluded our naval vessels from the ports of those countries. When Rear Admiral Goldsborough received his orders, these restrictions had not been removed, and, avoiding for the time the ports and countries from which our men-of-war had been excluded, he established his headquarters at Lisbon.

This squadron, which is still commanded by Rear Admiral Goldsborough, is composed of the following vessels:

Colorado, flag-ship.....	48 guns.
Ticonderoga.....	11 "
Augusta.....	10 "
Swatara.....	10 "
Shamrock.....	10 "
Canandaigua.....	9 "
Frolic.....	5 "
Miantonomoh.....	4 "
Ino.....	3 "

The limits of this squadron embrace the Mediterranean, the western coast of Europe, and Africa as far south as St. Paul de Loando. Great activity has been exhibited by most of the vessels, some of which have visited the principal ports of the Baltic and the Mediterranean, as well as those on the Atlantic. Except when important public interests or some unavoidable circumstance has rendered their presence in port indispensable, the ships have been almost constantly cruising. In pursuance of the system of active operations adopted by the Department when reestablishing the foreign squadrons, lengthy anchorages and cruising collectively have been avoided.

These naval representatives of our country were warmly welcomed by the different nationalities, and more extended commercial and friendly intercourse was invited. The appearance of our naval vessels gave confidence wherever they went, and encouragement to the immense emigration which, like an irresistible current, flows with increasing volume westward, especially from northern Europe.

On the decks of one or more of the vessels of this squadron the sovereigns, or some representative of the reigning families, and the people, of most of the maritime Powers of Europe have, during the year, received and interchanged courtesies with our officers. All expressed their gratification with the reappearance of our flag in their waters, and extended their congratulations on the return of peace and the restoration of the Union.

When the usual tranquillity of any of those countries has been disturbed by wars and revolutions, the appearance of our flag has imparted security to our citizens there located. In the early part of the year the disturbed condition of Spain, and during the summer the war between Austria and Prussia and Italy, excited lively interest. An ample force during those periods was maintained on the Spanish coast, and the German ports were visited. When agitations and revolutions ceased in one quarter, and peace was restored in the other, the active movements of the squadron were resumed.

The Ticonderoga passed the Dardanelles and went up to the capital of Turkey on the 7th of September. The anchoring of a man-of-war of her dimensions in the Bosphorus, before the palace of the Sultan, had not been permitted to the naval vessels of any other Power since the treaty of 1856. The officers were received by the Sultan and people in the most cordial manner, and the vessel was visited by the grand vizier, his minister of foreign affairs, and others of his cabinet, and by the members of the diplomatic corps at Constantinople. On her arrival at Tripoli on the 18th of October she was received with marked courtesy by his Highness Prince Pasha and the officials in the place. Our consul there reports that the visit had a most happy effect, none of our men-of-war having visited the place for several years.

The shores of Greece, the Syrian coast, the Barbary States, and the settlements on the northwest coast of Africa accessible to our ships-of-war, have received due attention, and friendly relations have been cultivated in all those quarters.

The large emigration to our shores from Germany and northern Europe rendered it important that special attention should be directed to that quarter. Early in the spring the Department had made preparations to send out the turret iron-clad Miantonomoh, accompanied by the steamer Augusta, to join the European squadron. Before these vessels were ready to sail, Congress passed the resolution approved May 16, 1866, greeting the Emperor, and congratulating the people of Russia on the escape of his Imperial Majesty from assassination. A request that the President should forward a copy of this resolution to the Emperor, followed by the authorized appointment of an additional Assistant Secretary of the Navy for six months, led to the designation of Assistant Secretary G. V. Fox to bear to his Imperial Majesty the resolution of Congress. He was authorized to take passage in the Miantonomoh, which vessel, with her companion the Augusta, was directed, before reporting to Rear Admiral Goldsborough, to proceed to Cronstadt to carry out the purpose of Congress. In compliance with these orders those vessels have visited the Baltic, and have also entered the principal ports from Cronstadt to Lisbon, including the capitals of Sweden and Denmark.

The reception of this force wherever it has appeared, and especially in Russia, where all classes were impressed with the friendly sympathy evinced by our Government toward the Emperor and people, was of a most flattering character. The Assistant Secretary and the officers of the Navy were welcomed with festivities and extraordinary courtesy and attention for a succession of days, not only at St. Petersburg, but at Moscow, and throughout the empire, and warm friendship was everywhere manifested for our country and people.

Great courtesy has been shown the squadron in the ports of those countries from which our men-of-war had for several years been excluded, and every facility has been extended at their dock-yards and elsewhere for the accommodation and repairs of any of our vessels.

Contagious disease has prevailed at many places, which our vessels could not visit unless required to do so by absolute necessity.

In order that the activity and service of this and all our squadrons may be known and appreciated, an enumeration of the ports which they have respectively visited is given.

During the year the flag of the Navy has been shown at Queenstown, Kingston, Belfast, Liverpool, Swansea, Falmouth, Portsmouth, Southampton, Plymouth, Sheerness, Spithead, Chatham, and other points in Great Britain; Marseilles, Toulon, Brest, Cherbourg, L'Orient, Rochefort, Lormont near Bordeaux, and Villa Franca, in France; Barcelona, Malaga, Carthage, Corunna, Valencia, Gibraltar, Terragona, Cadiz, Ferrol, Port Mahon, Vigo, and other ports in Spain; Lisbon and Oporto, in Portugal; Messina, Palermo, and Syracuse, in Sicily; Naples, Spezia, Leghorn, and Civita Vecchia, in Italy; Milo, Athens, and Piræus, in Greece; Constantinople, and the islands of Candia and Cyprus, in the Turkish dominions; Syria, Beyrout, Trieste, Venice, Alexandria, Tripoli, Tunis, Algiers, Tangiers, Antwerp, Kiel, Hamburg, Flushing, Nieuwe-Diep, Sierra Leone, Monrovia, the Cape de Verd Islands, the Canaries, the Azores, Porto Praya, St. Iago, the ports on the Elbe and Weser, in Germany, and many others of lesser note.

ASIATIC SQUADRON.

The Asiatic squadron embraces the eastern coast of Africa and Asia, and the islands which stud the seas and ocean eastward of the Cape of Good Hope. The squadron is commanded by Rear Admiral H. H. Bell, who reached Batavia, within the limits of his command, on the 28th of December, 1865. The vessels of the squadron are—

Hartford, flag-ship.....	23 guns.
Wachusett.....	10 "
Monocacy.....	10 "
Ashuelot.....	10 "
Shenandoah.....	9 "
Wyoming.....	7 "
Supply.....	6 "
Relief.....	3 "

All the open ports of China, including some which no American man-of-war had ever entered, have been visited by the vessels of this squadron. Rear Admiral Bell in April proceeded to Canton, where he had a friendly reception and an agreeable interview with the governor general of the Quantung provinces. The disposition manifested toward our country and countrymen was of a gratifying character. Unlike the great maritime nations of Europe, the Chinese Government and people gave no encouragement or recognition to the rebels in their war upon the Union.

American residents in that far distant quarter of the globe have not been interfered with in their legal pursuits, or molested by the natives, save in a single instance. The exception was that of the United States consul at New Chwang, who was assaulted by a party of dissolute characters. The Wachusett was dispatched in June to that port for the purpose of securing the arrest and punishment of the parties who were engaged in the outrage. By the considerate yet determined course of Commander Townsend the trial of eight of them was secured, and conviction followed. The ninth, and chief instigator, whom the authorities seemed powerless to arrest, was seized by Commander Townsend and delivered over for trial.

While waiting the decision of the courts in the case of these outlaws, Commander Townsend, at the request of the Chinese customs authorities, availed himself of the occasion to survey the bar at the mouth of the Lian river. The channel was ascertained and buoyed for the benefit of the commerce of the world.

The increase or renewal of piracy in the Chinese waters has rendered the institution of decisive and vigorous measures for its arrest a necessity. Rear Admiral Bell has been fully authorized to act in concert with the naval commanders of other nations on that station in the suppression of piratical depredations.

The small number of our vessels in those waters—as compared with the English and French fleets—as well as the size of our ships, has not admitted of enlarged and complete arrangements for pursuing the lawless depredators, who seek shelter among the shoaled and most intricate waters. A class of smaller vessels will soon reinforce this squadron. In the mean time, Rear Admiral Bell is giving his earnest efforts to this great object, and the force under his command is under orders to pursue with vigor and destroy all piratical vessels, and deliver the captured freebooters to the authorities at the nearest consular ports.

During the summer, Rear Admiral Bell has visited the several open ports of Japan in his flag-ship, the Hartford, taking with him one or more of the other vessels of his squadron. He passed through the Straits of Simonosaki and the inland sea, where no American man-of-war had been since 1863. There were apprehensions that he might meet with some opposition in that quarter in consequence of the rebellious attitude of the Prince of Nagote toward the Government of the Tycoon and the existence of war between them. He met with none, however, and the passage was made quietly, without holding communication with the citizens of the disaffected province, in accordance with his determination announced to the governor of Nagasaki before departing from that port. This pass is an important one to the commerce of the United States, and the passage of our vessels through it, during a season of hostility, indicates that there is a disposition on the part of the people of Japan to reciprocate the kind feelings which we entertain toward them and to respect our flag.

The manifestations of the Japanese toward Americans have been more friendly than to any other nation. While Europeans were excluded from intercourse with them, they entered into treaties with the United States and opened their ports to our trade. It is important in every point of view that these amicable relations should be cultivated and sustained, and that there should be no aggressive act on our part to interrupt or disturb them. In the not distant future it will be of importance to this country to secure the commerce of Japan, and we should not permit ourselves to become complicated in the controversies of other Powers with this peculiar people. Such is the policy of this Department.

The Shenandoah on her way to the Asiatic coast visited many points, after leaving the Cape of Good Hope, unfrequented by vessels of the United States Navy. The intercourse between the officers and the authorities in all instances was mutually pleasant. While at Tamatav, in the island of Madagascar, Captain Goldsborough, in company with the United States consul and a large number of officers of the Shenandoah, made an official visit to the governor of the province, by whom, surrounded by his councilors, he was received in the council chamber. The governor expressed his gratification and pleasure in seeing an American vessel-of-war for the first time in a port of Madagascar, and offered any assistance in his power which the vessel might require. The treatment received from the natives was most kind and hospitable.

Proceeding up the Arabian sea, the Shenandoah anchored in the cove of Muscat on the 15th of September last, where she remained until the 18th. Immediately on the arrival of the vessel an officer came on board with the compliments of the Iman, to extend welcome to the port, to offer the facilities of the place, and to express the desire of his Highness to exchange the customary courtesies. A salute of twenty-one guns was fired by the Shenandoah, and promptly returned. The commanding officer and others of the vessel called on the Iman, who, surrounded by the governor of the province, the councilors of state, and several military officers, received them in a dignified manner. The Iman was particular in his inquiries as to the health of the President and the people of the United States, with whom he hoped to be always on terms of peace. There are no American residents at this place, but our commerce, which we desire to encourage and extend to every sea, was not absent from this distant quarter, there being two vessels at the time belonging to our countrymen waiting cargoes in the cove of Muscat.

In May last the headquarters of the squadron were removed from Macao and reestablished at Hong Kong, which is considered the most convenient and best adapted locality for that purpose.

The following ports, among others, have been visited by the vessels of Rear Admiral Bell's command: Macao, Swatow, Amoy, Foo-chow, Ningpo, Shanghai, Whampoa, Canton, New Chwang, Chee-Foo, Tang-Chow, and Taskee, in China; the ports of Japan; Manila, in the Philippine Islands; Ambong, in Borneo; and Batavia. On her way out, the Shenandoah touched at Fayal, Funchal, Santa Cruz, Porto Grande, Porto Praya, Simons-town, Mauritius, Tamatav, in Madagascar; Mahé, one of the Seychelles group; Muscat, in Arabia; Bombay, Ceylon, Calcutta, Penang, and Singapore.

NORTH ATLANTIC SQUADRON.

During the greater part of the year the service required of the Navy on the North Atlantic coast and in the West Indies has been divided between three squadrons, but on the 1st of November last the Atlantic coast and West India squadrons were consolidated, and thereafter designated the North Atlantic squadron, the combined forces being commanded by Rear Admiral Palmer. The vessels are as follows:

Rhode Island, flag-ship.....	12 guns.
Osceola.....	10 "
Saco.....	10 "
Mackinaw.....	10 "
Winooski.....	10 "
Agawan.....	10 "
Lenapee.....	10 "
Chicopee.....	9 "
Monongahela.....	9 "
De Soto.....	9 "
Bienville.....	9 "
Yantic.....	8 "
Conemaugh.....	8 "
Florida.....	6 "
Daffodil.....	1 "

Until the union of the West India and Atlantic coast squadrons, the former was under the command of Rear Admiral Palmer, and the latter under Commodore Joseph Lanman. The vessels of these squadrons, besides guarding the coast, have visited the following points outside the United States: Havana, St. Iago de Cuba, Matanzas, Bahia Honda Caye, Cardenas, and the principal cays and islands on the north side of Cuba; the Anguilla group, the Cayman islands, Bermuda, St. Thomas, Port au Prince, and Cape Haytien, in Hayti; St. Domingo city; St. John's, and Mayaguez, in Porto Rico; Kingston and Port Royal, in Jamaica; Santa Cruz, St. Christopher, Nevis, Antigua, and St. Bartholomew's, of the Leeward Islands; Barbadoes, Trinidad, Martinique, Tobago, St. Lucia, and St. Vincent, of the Windward Islands; Demarara, in British Guiana; La Guayra and Porto Cabelle, in Venezuela; Curaçoa, and the island of Nevaza. Some of these points have seldom or never before been visited by an American man-of-war. There has always been a vessel at Aspinwall, prepared to give assistance and protection to the immense numbers of our countrymen, and the vast wealth crossing the Isthmus. A portion of the squadron has been on the northeastern coast, and visited Halifax, St. John's, Pictou, the Magdalen group, Prince Edward's Island, and other points.

Revolutionary movements and civil disturbances in Hayti and St. Domingo, which threatened to place in jeopardy the lives and property of American residents, or made them apprehensive of danger, have called for visitations of our naval vessels and the exhibition of the flag at frequent intervals in those quarters. There has, however, been no occasion for interference, for the rights of our countrymen have been respected.

Rear Admiral Palmer, in April last, was ordered from the West Indies with a portion of his command to the northern limits of his station, in consequence of apprehensions then prevalent in regard to the condition and treatment of our fishermen on the eastern coast. But the liberal and conciliatory policy of the English Government dissipated all apprehended difficulties, and the questions were early in such train of adjustment that no necessity arose requiring the presence of a naval force on the fishing banks; other threatening questions were also quietly disposed of. During the summer, Admiral Palmer visited Halifax in the steamer Rhode Island, and the Winooski in June and July made a cruise among the fishing fleets in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. Our citizens engaged in the fisheries were found pursuing their avocation quietly, and good feeling between them and their neighbors prevailed. The intercourse between the officers of our service and the authorities at the British ports visited was most friendly, and the former were the recipients of gratifying attentions.

The vessels on the West India station were instructed to exercise vigilance in detecting slavers and preventing the slave trade, provided any lingering remains of that nefarious traffic still existed. But no captures have been made, and it is to be hoped this infamous trade is extinguished.

SOUTH ATLANTIC SQUADRON.

The South Atlantic squadron, which embraces the southeastern coast of South America, and the west coast of Africa from the Cape of Good Hope to St. Paul de Loando, is commanded, as at the date of the last annual report, by Rear Admiral Godon. The vessels are the—

Brooklyn, flag-ship.....	21 guns.
Juniata.....	15 "
Shamokin.....	10 "
Kansas.....	9 "
Nipsic.....	8 "
Shawmut.....	6 "
Onward.....	3 "

The vessels of this squadron have, during the year, visited Rio de Janeiro, Bahia, St. Catherine's, Ceará, Maranhão, Pernambuco, and Santos, in Brazil; Buenos Ayres and Rosario, in the Argentine Republic; Montevideo, Colonia, and Pasandre, two hundred miles up the Uruguay river, in Uruguay; Concepcion, in Paraguay; St. Paul de Loando, Benguela, Little and Great Fish bays, and other points on the coast of Africa, the Falkland Islands, and St. Helena.

The duties of this command have been faithfully and promptly performed, without any extraordinary incident to record. The reestablishment of the squadron in that quarter has been productive of friendly and beneficial intercourse between the officers and seamen of our service and those of other Powers in whose waters our vessels have appeared. Rio de Janeiro has been selected as the headquarters of the squadron, and at St. Paul de Loando, which is now embraced within its limits, a joint depot of stores and supplies for the South Atlantic and European squadrons has been established. It is believed that so far as the former squadron, particularly, is concerned, the arrangement will be productive of economy, and that advantage is to flow from embracing a portion of the southwest coast of Africa and the east coast of South America in one squadron. The saving of fuel—one of the most costly articles on our foreign stations—is a subject worthy of the closest attention, and is one of the objects which the Department had in view in fixing the present limits of the squadrons. A vessel taking its departure from some point on the southeast coast of South America can run before the wind, over to the African coast, follow that coast under steam to the depot at St. Paul, and then take the trade winds back to the coast of Brazil.

The Juniata arrived at Rio on the 16th of September, having made a successful cruise to the southwest coast of Africa. The information obtained by her goes far to confirm the impressions that the maintenance of a permanent squadron on the African coast will no longer be required. But one slaver had been fitted out on the southern coast of Africa within the past year, and she had been captured on the coast of Cuba with her cargo. It was the opinion of prominent officials at Loando, including the French admiral on that station, that the slave trade had expired, and that this blot on civilization had become at last a matter of history.

In assigning to the European and South Atlantic squadrons the duties heretofore performed by what was known and maintained as the African squadron, that distinct organization has been dispensed with, and the service is more economically performed.

The prevailing war between the allied Powers of Brazil, Uruguay, and the Argentine Republic and Paraguay has rendered it advisable to keep one or more vessels in the vicinity of the La Plata. The flag-ship has been most of the time in that locality, and American citizens and interests have received due care and attention, aid and encouragement being always near at hand and ready to be extended on their behalf.

In April last Rear Admiral Godon ascended the Uruguay river as far as Pasandre, some two hundred miles above Montevideo.

NORTH PACIFIC SQUADRON.

The extensive limits of the Pacific squadron, and the important and rapidly-increasing American interests on the western coast of this continent, which require to be protected, rendered a division of the naval force advisable. By this division the North Pacific squadron was made to embrace the coast of North America and the Sandwich Islands, and was placed under the command of Rear Admiral Thatcher. This officer hoisted his flag at San Francisco on the 6th day of August, 1866. The following vessels have been allotted to this squadron:

Vanderbilt, flag-ship.....	15 guns.
Pensacola.....	21 "
Saranac, (temporarily).....	13 "
Suwanee.....	12 "
Mohongo.....	10 "
Jamestown.....	22 "
Lackawanna.....	9 "
Mohican.....	8 "
Resaca.....	8 "
Saginaw.....	4 "

The Pensacola, Mohican, and Resaca have not yet reached their destinations, and the Saginaw, under authority of an act of Congress, is aiding the Western Union Telegraph Company in laying a telegraphic cable on the northwestern coast.

The vessels of the squadron have visited the Sandwich Islands, the ports of Central America, Puget Sound, and Acapulco, Guaymas, Mazatlan, San Blas, and La Paz, in Mexico. At all times one or more vessels have been at San Francisco, and also at Panama, ready for any emergency, and there has been almost constantly a vessel at or in the vicinity of Acapulco, the most important point to our interests on the west coast of Mexico.

In the latter part of September a conveyance to Honolulu in the Vanderbilt was tendered to and accepted by Queen Emma, and the vessel sailed from San Francisco on the 13th of October on that service.

A more thorough exploration of the Pacific ocean, with a view of correcting the charts and thereby lessening the dangers to navigators, is important, and our cruising vessels are expected to render themselves useful in ocean surveying service. Under the special direction of the Bureau of Navigation, which is intrusted with the details of such work, much valuable nautical information may be obtained by competent and efficient officers, who, with the means furnished to each vessel, will be able to correct some existing errors and establish with approximate correctness the geographical position and actual extent of many of the dangers which are now imperfectly stated. The cruising vessels of this squadron, when not on special service, instead of avoiding these reported but doubtful and ill-defined dangers, will make it their duty to ascertain, by actual observation and search, the exact facts in regard to them, and report full particulars to the Department.

SOUTH PACIFIC SQUADRON.

The South Pacific squadron extends from Panama to Cape Horn, and includes within its limits Australia. This squadron is under command of Rear Admiral Pearson, who, until the division of the squadron, had charge of the entire force in the Pacific ocean. He is to be relieved by Rear Admiral Dahlgren, who sailed from New York on the 1st instant. The vessels composing the squadron are the following:

Powhatan, flag-ship.....	22 guns.
Tuscarora.....	10 "
Wateree.....	10 "
Nyack.....	8 "
Dacotah.....	7 "
Farallones.....	6 "
Fredonia.....	4 "

The Lancaster, recently attached to this squadron, is on her return to the United States. The following points have been visited during the year: Valparaiso, Callao, and the commercial ports between those points; the Chincha Islands, Payta, Guayaquil, Panama, and the Straits of Magellan.

Events transpiring on the coast of Peru and Chili have rendered the presence of the greater part of the Pacific squadron necessary in that vicinity. In the absence of Rear Admiral Pearson on a cruise to the Sandwich Islands, war was declared and entered into between these Powers and Spain. Information of this fact was dispatched to Rear Admiral Pearson, with orders to proceed without loss of time to Peru and Chili. These did not reach him until his return to San Francisco. With as little delay as possible he proceeded to execute the orders he received, but before he arrived at Valparaiso the Spanish fleet had bombarded the city, inflicting great damage.

In anticipation of active hostilities between Spain and the southern republics, whereby American interests, and especially the shipping interest at the Chincha Islands, might be put in jeopardy, the Department had taken, the preceding autumn, measures for reinforcing our squadron in the Pacific by sending thither a special force, consisting of the turreted iron-clad Monadnock and the steamers Vanderbilt, Tuscarora, and Powhatan, under the command of Commodore John Rodgers. This officer reached Valparaiso previous to the bombardment of that city, and apprehending the views of the Department, remained on that station for the protection of our countrymen until the arrival of Rear Admiral Pearson. The appearance of so distinguished a commander, with a formidable squadron, on the eve of so important an occasion, and in the absence of Rear Admiral Pearson, was opportune and fortunate.

The course pursued by Commodore Rodgers in protecting American interests, and in observing and preserving neutrality in the harbor, met with approval. Whatever may have been his opinions or feelings as regards the course which the Spanish admiral thought proper to pursue, he was not required to interpose his force against or for either party. As the armed representative of this Government, which was on friendly terms with each of the belligerents, it became his duty, even while endeavoring to mitigate the harsh severities of war, to maintain a strict neutrality. His friendly offices in the cause of humanity were manifested so long as they could be effective; but the officers of other neutral Powers having declined to unite in any decided steps to protect the city, no alternative remained for him to pursue, consistently with the position of this Government toward the parties, than that which he adopted.

After the bombardment of Valparaiso, which took place on the 31st of March, the Spanish fleet retired from before the city and proceeded to Callao. Rear Admiral Pearson, who reached Valparaiso on the 17th of April, also proceeded to Callao, and was present during the attack on the defenses of that port on the 2d day of May. No occasion was presented for him to depart from the neutral position which had been taken, and which has been strictly observed throughout the contest, toward these belligerents.

GULF SQUADRON.

Affairs of public policy required that an organized squadron should be continued in the Gulf of Mexico. Commodore John A. Winslow was selected for that command, and entered upon his duties on the 7th day of May, 1866. The vessels of this squadron consist of—

Estrella, flag-ship.....	3 guns.

The vessels have patrolled the Gulf of Mexico, and repeatedly visited all the ports on our coast from Key West to the Rio Grande; also, Havana, Matanzas, and Cardenas, on the north side of Cuba, and the waters of the Rio Grande and Tampico, in Mexico.

On repeated occasions during the year one or more vessels of this squadron have been sent to Tampico. Apprehensions were at times entertained by American residents in that city as to their entire security and safety. The reports of the commanding officers to whom this service was assigned indicate that neither American citizens nor American interests have suffered violence from either of the contending parties.

During the spring and summer, reports were circulated of the intentions of lawless parties to seize colored persons on the southern coasts of the Gulf States and carry them into slavery, the neighboring island of Cuba being their alleged destination. Such contemplated violations of our laws and the rights of humanity were sufficient of themselves to arouse the vigilance of the Gulf and coast squadrons, each of which had its attention called to the subject, and was at all times vigilant to detect such schemes, if they existed, and to intercept those who should venture to engage in them. Judicious inquiry and anxious watching have failed to bring to light any attempt to carry on this detestable traffic. Precaution was taken, by dispatching a vessel for the especial purpose, to warn our consular representatives at the neighboring ports of Cuba of suspected movements of the kind referred to, and from an expression of opinion obtained from those officers and others after diligent inquiry, it is difficult to believe that, even if an expedition of that character were successful in departing from our shores, it would be permitted to land or be received into Cuba.

SPECIAL SERVICE.

Besides the vessels attached to the several squadrons, a number are on special service. The Sabine, the apprentice-ship of the Navy; the Massachusetts, Memphis, and Newbern, which are used in conveying supplies, mails, and officers and seamen to and from the squadrons on the coast; the Purveyor, which has recently returned from St. Paul de Loando, where she landed a cargo of stores for the European and South Atlantic squadrons; the Don and Ascutney, used for towing and other service between the yards and stations; the Sacramento, on a special cruise and under special instructions to the coast of China and Japan, touching at various localities in the route for the purpose of her mission; and the Michigan, employed on the lakes.

The Sabine has her headquarters at New London, with her field for cruising extending from the coast of Maine to the Capes of the Delaware.

The Michigan, as soon as the ice permitted the resumption of navigation, early in May, was about proceeding on a cruise through the lakes, when disturbances on the frontier assumed such proportions as to require the coöperation of that vessel with the military and civil authorities to preserve in good faith the neutrality laws. The Michigan was engaged in this duty from early in May until June, delaying her annual cruise to the upper lakes. When the armed force which invaded Canada was defeated, the fugitives, driven from their positions by the force directed against them, were, about seven hundred of them, captured in their retreat by the Michigan on the 3d of June, in Niagara river, off Lower Black Rock. They were retained and provisioned on board the Michigan until the 5th, when they were turned over to the civil authorities. On the 16th of June Captain Bryson was notified by the military commander of the district that the coöperation of the Michigan was no longer required at that point, the difficulties on that portion of the frontier having terminated. Shortly afterward the Michigan made a circuit of the upper lakes, visiting Cleveland, Detroit, Mackinaw, Green Bay, Milwaukee, Racine, Grand Haven, and returning to Erie and Buffalo.

The steam frigate Susquehanna, Commodore James Alden, is on special service, having been ordered to convey our minister to the Mexican republic and Lieutenant General Sherman to Vera Cruz, or such point as might be required.

MONADNOCK AND MIANTONOMOH.

The turreted or monitor class of vessels was never designed by the Department for cruising purposes, but for harbor defense and operations upon our coast. In the object for which they were intended these vessels are as formidable and efficient as was anticipated, and will furnish security to any port, and be able to disperse or destroy any blockading fleet which may appear in our waters. The peculiar formation of our coast is in itself a protection against the heavy and formidable iron-clads of immense tonnage and deep draught which European constructors have devised, because, except at a few points, it will be difficult for them to approach within cannon-shot of our shores, and there is but a single port which they can enter from the Capes of the Chesapeake to the Rio Grande. But, while in the estimation of our best naval officers our monitor class of vessels are more than a match for the monstrous and expensive iron-clad structures of Europe, they are of such draught that they can enter all of our principal harbors, and are therefore peculiarly adapted to our coast defense.

The impression sought to be created that these vessels could not venture outside the harbors where they were constructed, or at all events that they could not proceed on a distant voyage, has been dispelled by the cruise of the Monadnock, which, after navigating the Atlantic and Pacific, reached San Francisco in safety. The Miantonomoh, another monitor of the same type as the Monadnock, crossed the Atlantic, passed up the Baltic to Cronstadt, and has visited many of the principal ports of Europe. These vessels have, in these two voyages, disposed in a great degree of the misrepresentations and prejudices which had been created, and proved the ability of the turreted vessels to perform long voyages, when required.

Great credit is due to Commodore John Rodgers, and the officers and crew who were charged with the labor, responsibility, and risk of vindicating the navigating power and capability of these American naval vessels. To Lieutenant Commander Francis M. Bunce, who volunteered to navigate the Monadnock to San Francisco, and performed that duty, which many deemed hazardous, and not a few denounced as an impossibility, honor and praise and promotion are due for persevering and successful daring. Service such as his cannot otherwise than be appreciated and rewarded by the country.

Rear Admiral Goldsborough, in a dispatch dated the 7th of November, 1866, says: "The pilot who went from Cherbourg to Brest with the vessels, a man of large experience, told me that he never in his life saw a vessel behave better than the Miantonomoh, and for his part, as far as safety was concerned, he would be willing to go around the world in her. Vice Admiral Popoff, of the Russian navy, who took passage in the Miantonomoh from Hamburg to Cherbourg, also told me that he was particularly struck with her good sea qualities in the midst of a heavy blow and sea encountered just after leaving the Elbe, and that if he was in my place he would prefer being on board of her to the Colorado. Indeed he spoke in the highest terms with regard to her merits on the occasion."

Reports of the performance of the Monadnock and the Miantonomoh are appended to this report.

QUARANTINE VESSELS.

A joint resolution of Congress, approved March 24, 1866, authorized the Secretary of the Navy to place gratuitously at the disposal of the commissioners of quarantine, or the proper authorities of any ports of the United States, to be used by them for quarantine purposes, such vessels or hulks belonging to the United States as were not required for other uses by the national Government; under this authority the sloop-of-war Saratoga and Portsmouth were placed at the disposal of the commissioners of health at New York for service at quarantine—the first named on the 20th day of April, and the other on the 18th day of May. They were returned to the navy-yard in the latter part of September, the commissioners reporting that they were no longer required.

THE NAVY-YARDS.

During the past year the operations of the several navy-yards have, with a view to economy, been reduced to the lowest limit consistent with the public interests. On several vessels work has been altogether suspended, and on others only so much has been done as was necessary to enable the contractors for the steam machinery to place portions of their engines in the hulls. Six vessels of the class intended for high speed have been launched, and also three others in which the steam power has been somewhat reduced in order to increase the armament. Steam machinery for twelve vessels of the classes here referred to is in an advanced condition, and the Department is under contracts, made during the war, to provide the vessels in which these engines are to be placed. It has, however, been considered advantageous under the circumstance, there being no pressing necessity for this class of vessels since hostilities have ceased, to make temporary arrangements for storing the machinery and postpone the construction of the hulls.

SENATE &amp; HO. OF REPS.

We have in our navy-yards too few ship-houses. As a matter of economy, ships should be built under cover. Protection from the weather not only facilitates the work during construction, but if retained for any period on the stocks, adds greatly to the durability of the ship after completion.

Fourteen ships are now in the course of construction at the several yards, of which nine are in ship-houses, and five are exposed to the weather. Over these last temporary covers are being erected.

These vessels, and others hastily built during the war, are constructed to a great extent of unseasoned timber, and for that reason it is best that they should remain on the stocks a longer period than would be otherwise required. The vessels which are in the course of construction can be launched whenever it may be necessary to make room for others, for which the steam machinery is being manufactured. Four of the vessels which are now on the stocks are iron clads, larger and much more formidable than the Miantonomoh and those of her class. The steam machinery and turrets for these vessels are prepared and ready for erection whenever it may be considered advisable to launch them.

In addition to the steamers which are being constructed, or are afloat, it has been deemed expedient to have a class of smaller vessels which in many cases can serve the purpose of the Government with greater economy than the larger vessels, particularly in time of peace.

The want of a sufficient number of building-shops, ship-houses and dry-docks has been a serious embarrassment and cause of delay throughout the whole of the war. There should be an increase of all these, for the efficiency of the Navy depends in a great degree on having an adequate number of each.

There are in the single navy-yard of Portsmouth, England, eleven dry-docks; more than three times the number that we have at all our yards, for there is only a single permanent dry-dock at any one yard, and but three in all of them. With these limited means, and under these disadvantages, the Department has been compelled to struggle to maintain an efficient navy in a period of great and exacting trial. Had we a war with a maritime Power, where naval combats would be frequent, and cruising active, the necessity for more docks and larger yards would be great.

The supplies of timber at the different yards have been exhausted during the rebellion, and it will be true economy to provide an abundance, so that in future emergencies the difficulties and embarrassments recently experienced may be avoided. Our former policy, many years since, was to make an annual increase of ship-timber, and other countries have wisely furnished themselves with this material. Commodore Steedman, in a recent communication from Carthage, in Spain, writes: "It is an interesting fact that there is still a stock of Florida timber in this yard which came from Florida while it was yet a colony of Spain."

In the construction of ships-of-war iron may ultimately, to a great extent, supersede wood; but such are the resources of timber in this country that wooden vessels will, for some time to come, constitute a large portion of our Navy.

For the construction of iron and armored vessels, it can only be repeated that, although our country has the material in great abundance, and possesses many advantages in that regard, we are almost wholly unprepared. In future maritime wars the contests between the great naval Powers for supremacy on the ocean will be determined chiefly by iron-clad or armored ships. Our turreted vessels or monitors will be powerful and effective for harbor and coast defense, but in conflict with any European Power our countrymen will hardly be content with merely defensive warfare.

Armored vessels for ocean cruising must necessarily be of large size, which cannot, with the requisite strength, be secured in wooden structures. If attempted the immense masses of timber must rapidly decay, and the cost resulting from deterioration will be such as no economical and prudent nation will consent to sustain. Ships for cruising and offensive operations must be such as can use sails, for no vessel can long keep the sea under steam alone. Such vessels as are here suggested should be built at a Government establishment, for though private enterprise can do much in aid of the Navy, the peculiarities of iron vessels for naval purposes are such that private parties cannot undertake the work unless at prices which will cover all the outlay for the establishment, as well as the vessels, for there can be no other customer than the Government for such work.

In this view of the subject it is plainly the interest of Government to erect its own shops and machinery, and to possess its own establishment for the construction of its iron and armored naval vessels. Several years of preparation will be required to provide the necessary appliances for such an establishment, and a special and convenient location, with ample area, should be promptly selected. In each of the navy-yards a dry-dock is indispensable, and for a steam navy there should be suitable shops and accommodations for the repair of vessels.

The navy-yards at Norfolk and Pensacola, which were almost totally destroyed during the war, require large expenditures to place them in a condition to be efficient. They have been occupied as naval stations since the Government recovered possession, and some repairs have been made at each; but the dilapidated walls and remnants of the former establishments remain in a condition which renders them scarcely fit for occupancy or use. This is more particularly the case at Pensacola, where only a few outbuildings and stables escaped destruction. These are now converted into temporary quarters for the officers on duty at that station. From the limited appropriations which have been made some progress has been effected toward restoration at Norfolk. The destruction at this yard was not so thorough and complete as at Pensacola.

The yard at Norfolk is, in a national point of view, one of the most important, as well as one of the best located, in the United States. It is the only southern yard on the Atlantic coast, is accessible in all seasons, has one of the best harbors in the country, and is, in every respect, favorably situated, with many natural advantages for a naval establishment. There is at this yard a permanent dry-dock which, under all the disadvantages that have existed, has been of immense service to the Government in the repair and refitment of vessels, without the delay and additional expense that would have been incurred in sending them further north. Since the termination of the war, most of the machinery which belonged there has been recovered, and portions of it put in operation. But in order that this yard may be placed in proper working condition, at all compared with its former state of efficiency, and adequate to the future wants of the service, much yet remains to be done.

The yards at Norfolk and at Pensacola are as essential to the Navy and the country as either of the yards at the North, and in the event of a foreign war we could better dispense with one of the yards north of the Chesapeake than with either of these. Our possession of them during the late conflict, even in their dilapidated condition, was of great value to the Union cause. After their recovery the vessels composing the several blockading squadrons were not detached and sent North for ordinary repairs, with loss of service, during their absence, of vessels and crews, but were retained on their stations. The repairs thus effected were made without many of the required facilities, but notwithstanding great disadvantages considerable saving ensued to the Government, and the blockade thereby was made more efficient.

The suppression of the rebellion and the reestablishment of that peace and unity which constitute us one country and one people make it a duty to restore these national establishments to their former efficient condition. In so far as there was reason during the rebellion for refusing to do this because insurrection prevailed in the region where the yards are situated, that reason no longer exists. True, the expenditures will be made in States which were in rebellion, but the rebellion has passed away, the States are parts of the Union, and the establishments which are to be renovated are national in their character and of general interest to all. Upon the Pensacola yard, even in its present ruinous state, we must depend for repairs and supplies for any squadron we may employ to guard the ocean outlet of the great central valley of the Union, and of our whole coast bordering on the Gulf. To neglect to put that yard in proper condition would be to neglect Iowa, Illinois, and the States North, as well as Louisiana and Mississippi.

In the event of a foreign war with the great maritime Powers, our country would labor under serious disadvantages were we without a navy-yard or naval station in the Gulf. A naval force of steamers—and all fighting vessels must hereafter be steamers—could not be maintained in the Gulf without frequent repairs and supplies. With no navy-yard in the Gulf, the disabled vessels would necessarily be withdrawn from their station and compelled to proceed to a northern yard for refitment. Beside the perils incident to a voyage under these circumstances, with an enemy on the coast, the services of the officers and crews, as well as of the vessel itself, would be lost during the time she might be absent in going to and returning from a northern yard. The rebels and the waste of war have devastated the Norfolk and Pensacola yards, but the best interest of the service, and the obligations of the Government, are not less imperative now, when peace and union are restored, to place them in proper condition. It is to be hoped, therefore, that liberal appropriations will be made for that purpose.

NAVAL DEPOT FOR IRON CLADS.

In consequence of the failure of the Senate to act on the bill which passed the House of Representatives for the acceptance of League Island for naval purposes, the Government remains without a depot or station for our iron and armored naval vessels. Most of them have been permitted to remain in the back channel at League Island, where they were placed after the close of the war, as the best and most available location for their security and preservation. It is desirable that the bill for the acceptance of League Island, which has been unfortunately delayed in its passage through the Senate, should receive the early action of that body, that the necessary appropriation may be made for deepening the channel, preparing suitable docks, and making other necessary arrangements, at an early period, for the proper care and protection of the large number of costly vessels which are there in a precarious condition, and from which they are liable at any time to be warned away by the proprietors of the adjacent shores. The vessels lying in the back channel are there on sufferance. Being of iron, it is essential that they should be laid up in fresh water, and in consequence of the omission of Congress to provide any suitable place, the Department selected this location as by far the most eligible in the country for that purpose. They are there, however, under many disadvantages, for no preparations or improvements for them have been made, nor is the Department authorized to make any, for the safe-keeping, protection, and preservation of vessels which have cost the Government several millions. Deterioration and permanent injury must be the consequence of this delay, and, notwithstanding every precaution has been taken, it is but reasonable to expect that they have already been damaged to some extent from their exposed condition.

ENLARGEMENT OF NAVY-YARDS.

The purchase of Seavey's Island, adjacent to the navy-yard at Kittery, authorized by the act of April 17, 1866, has been consummated, and that island now constitutes a part of the Kittery navy-yard. This acquisition enlarges the heretofore restricted limits at that station, and will obviate some of the difficulties which have been experienced in consequence of insufficient room for the shops, sheds, and storehouses which are wanted to store materials. The annual loss at this and other yards by the deterioration of materials unavoidably exposed to the weather or stored, with much inconvenience, in temporary sheds, has been very great. The want of sites for the erection of additional storehouses and sheds has led to propositions for adding one additional story to the present buildings.

Operations at most of the yards have been much embarrassed for want of room, but at no one has there been so much difficulty and inconvenience from this cause as at Philadelphia. Until the introduction of steam the Philadelphia yard was of secondary importance, on account of its interior location, which rendered ingress and egress to vessels propelled exclusively by sails difficult and dilatory. But the revolution wrought by steam; the manufacture of iron vessels, and engines, and armature; the advantage of an interior location which was formerly an objection; the facility with which iron and coal can be obtained on the Delaware, and the necessity that our iron and armored vessels should be laid up in fresh water, will make the Navy establishment on the Delaware river important beyond any in the country. It is impossible, however, to carry on the operations which are essential at this central point within the limits of the present yard, which has scarcely one sixth of the area of any other, almost all being too restricted. Nor can the present yard, which is within the thickly populated part of the city of Philadelphia, be enlarged except at a cost which precludes the idea of its accomplishment. Another location must be obtained. Ten times the water front, and twenty times the area of the present Philadelphia yard are wanted for the naval establishment on the Delaware. There is no doubt that the present yard will be abandoned, and the sooner another location is secured, with ample room for the necessary works, to which the present establishment can be transferred, the better will it be for the service and the country. Should the Senate confirm the law which was passed by the House at the last session, accepting League Island for naval purposes, ample ground and water front will be obtained.

HARBOR DEFENSE.

The changes which have taken place within a few years, both in the character of vessels and guns, have raised questions as to the most effective means and the best use of those means for sea-coast defense. The value of iron-clad vessels, of channel obstructions, and of torpedoes, as means of defense, are, respectively, matters for consideration. A communication was addressed by this Department to the Secretary of War, in February last, suggesting the organization of a joint Army and Navy board for the consideration of these questions, and the adoption of some general principles concerning them.

The extent to which each or all of the means suggested could be advantageously used, the best form of iron-clad vessels, the character of the obstructions and of torpedoes, to what Department the preparation of these defensive means properly appertained, and which should control their use, are points which it is important to have defined and settled.

The Secretary of War concurred in the importance of organizing such a board, and assigned experienced officers to serve upon it in conjunction with naval officers detailed by this Department. This board, consisting of Rear Admirals Charles H. Davis and John A. Dahlgren, and Commodore James Alden, of the Navy, and Brevet Major General J. G. Barnard, Brevet Brigadier General Z. B. Tower, and Brevet Brigadier General B. S. Alexander, of the Army, assembled at Washington on the 1st of March, and continued in session until the 17th of July, and had these matters before them.

In the discussion of the three leading subjects which have been indicated, it was an object with the board to arrive at and report upon some definite plan of proceeding by which our harbors could, on a sudden alarm or emergency, be put at once in a complete state of defense against an enemy's fleet.

In their preliminary report the board advocated the importance of having always on hand a number of iron-clad vessels at each of our great commercial cities, and within the waters of our exterior bays; but without further information both as to the offensive and defensive properties of our forts, and also of our iron clads, it was unable to specify the requisite number, or to define precisely the part they should perform in the defense of our harbors, especially as that would depend upon the degree of success which might be attained in a well-devised system of channel obstructions.

On the subject of channel obstructions, a plan submitted by one of their number was favorably received by the board, who recommended that it should be tested experimentally; but such a test would have involved a large expenditure of money, for which there was no adequate appropriation. The board also recommended some general experiments to be made under their direction for ascertaining and settling certain general principles concerning the effect of torpedoes. After a very full examination the members became convinced that they could arrive at no definite conclusions on the points submitted without preliminary experiment; and satisfied that they could not add materially to what they had already reported, the board was dissolved by order of the Department.

The subject is, however, of great importance, and should receive thorough consideration.

PROMOTIONS.

In conformity with the provisions of the act of the 25th of July last, "to define the number and regulate the appointment of officers in the Navy, and for other purposes," selections were made for promotion and advancement in the brief period which remained after the passage of the act, and before the close of the last session of Congress. This labor was much facilitated by consultations which had previously taken place with most of the officers of the highest rank in the service who were on the active list, and under whom nearly every officer had served during the war. But the requirement, "that the increase in the grades authorized by this act shall be made by selection from the grade next below, of officers who have rendered the most efficient and faithful service during the recent war, and who possess the highest professional qualifications and attainments," could scarcely be expected, under any circumstances, to be carried into effect without causing some disappointment. By the act of January 24, 1865, an advance, "not exceeding thirty numbers, in rank for having exhibited eminent and conspicuous conduct in battle, or extraordinary heroism," was authorized. In the selections for promotion the tests prescribed by Congress controlled when the qualifications in other respects were unexceptionable. Many officers afloat had no battle-record; others possessing high qualifications, but occupied in other duties, had unfortunately been in no position to render actual fighting service during the recent war. Some few have necessarily been superseded by their more fortunate juniors, whose record being in all respects meritorious, they were selected for promotion under one or both of the tests which Congress adopted.

But for the war no such law would have been enacted, and the great object of the law was the recognition of war services. Governments very justly recognize and reward courage and success. The acts of 1865 and 1866 gave preference for promotion or advancement to those meritorious officers who had distinguished themselves by their heroic qualities and achievements over those who were not endowed with those qualities, or who had been so unfortunate as to have no battle-record.

Where all had done so well, it was a delicate and embarrassing duty to discriminate and select for promotion. No body of men ever acquitted themselves with more honor than the gallant officers of the Navy during the late war, and it is a gratification to know that, while some have received higher honors than others, yet every one on the active list who faithfully discharged his duty, has, by the liberal provisions of the Government, been advanced, and, if not promoted, occupies a higher number in his grade by the operation and administration of the law.

By the provisions of the third section of the law, a board of naval officers, consisting of Commodore S. P. Lee, Captain Foxhall A. Parker, and Commander John Lee Davis, was convened at Hartford, on the 5th of September, for the purpose of examining such officers as have served in the volunteer naval service for a period of not less than two years, with instructions, after examining the claims of all candidates, to select and report from the most meritorious in character, ability, professional competency, and honorable service the number authorized to be appointed and transferred to the regular Navy under the act. This board was subsequently enlarged by the addition of Captain Daniel Ammen and Commanders Walter W. Queen and K. Randolph Breeze. Owing to the large number of candidates who desire to avail themselves of the privilege of the act, as well as to the thoroughness of the examination, and also to the fact that all who claim the right must be examined before the authorized selections can be made, there will be necessary and unavoidable delay on the part of the board in making their report.

NAVAL ACADEMY.

The Naval Academy is reestablished at Annapolis, with some enlargement of the grounds and some important improvements. No measures were adopted by Congress for establishing the institution elsewhere on the Chesapeake, where there might be greater seclusion, with more ample area for those connected with the Academy. The appropriations for additions and improvements of the present site, with the acquisition of more ground, will obviate some of the objections which were taken against that location. The authorities of Maryland have manifested a warm interest in the Academy, and afforded facilities for enlarging the premises, which were, and still are, too limited. They have also, by suitable legislation and by municipal regulations, to guard and protect the midshipmen from improper influences, done acceptable service in another respect.

On resuming possession of the academic grounds and buildings, expensive repairs became necessary in order to place them in proper condition for the School. During the war the houses and buildings had been used for Army and hospital purposes, and the grounds had been broken and impaired by wagon roads while in the occupation of the military forces. Considerable labor and expenditure was necessary in renovating and restoring the buildings and grounds for use. This has been accomplished under the immediate direction of the Superintendent. The buildings and grounds are now in good order, and the institution is in all respects in as prosperous and satisfactory a condition as could be expected in so brief a period.

39TH CONG....2D SESS.

Report of the Secretary of the Navy.

SENATE &amp; HO. OF REPS.

A transfer of the executive mansion and grounds belonging to the State of Maryland, authorized by the government of that State, and for which an appropriation was made by Congress at its last session, has been completed, and the land is now inclosed within the academic grounds, to which it was adjacent, and, when graded, will make a handsome addition to the site already owned by the Government. An appropriation will be necessary, however, to defray the expense of grading and filling in the water front, for which the proper estimate has been made.

An appropriation of $25,000 was made at the last session of Congress for the purchase of certain other contiguous property which it was deemed advisable to secure, but the owners hold it at such exorbitant rates that the negotiations for it have been discontinued.

A more extensive range for those connected with the Academy than the present area furnishes is much wanted, and was one of the principal reasons for suggesting a change of location of the institution in my last annual communication.

Attention is invited to the recommendation of the Superintendent for additional accommodations for the officers and assistant professors, there being suitable locations upon the ground for the proposed buildings.

The machine-shop erected for the benefit and improvement of the pupils is completed, and the machinery, with a propeller engine adapted to the purpose of instruction, has been properly prepared.

The midshipmen have the present year entered upon a full theoretical and practical course of studies in regard to the application of steam power, so that hereafter the graduating class will be enabled, with very little practice afloat, to manage any engine in the Navy, and will thus have attained in their academic course the requisite elementary knowledge of this indispensable part of the profession of the future naval officer.

Three cadet engineers have been received into the Academy under the provisions of the act of July 4, 1864, which requires that the applicant shall, besides satisfactory evidence of mechanical skill and proficiency, have been employed at least two years in the actual fabrication of steam machinery. The stringent requirements of this act may need modification, in order to make it practically useful, for it is a severe exaction that youths under the age of eighteen who make application to be received as cadet engineers shall have had two years' previous practical experience in such employment. Under the provisions of this act, a class of only three who had prepared themselves for the purpose was formed, and as the necessary teachers and accompaniments for so small a class might be employed to advantage in improving a larger number, several young men who had been trained at some of the best scientific schools, and received the appointment of acting third assistant engineers in the Navy, have been added to the class for instruction in the higher qualifications of their profession.

The great loss, delay, and embarrassments experienced during the war in consequence of the ignorance, inefficiency, and incompetency of many of the engineers, admonish the Government of the necessity of educating and training men of ability to this highly responsible profession. Our naval officers must themselves hereafter be familiar with steam enginery as well as with seamanship, in order to be masters of their profession. Unless this is the case they cannot be masters of their ship, but will be dependent on the engineer who controls its motive power, and whose negligence or incompetency may destroy its efficiency.

The cadet engineers, making, as they will, steam and steam machinery a specialty, must attain proficiency, and from their acquirements and mechanical skill will become a highly scientific and useful class, indispensable to the service, and more useful, perhaps, in the design and construction of engines than in duty afloat.

Great credit is due to the energetic and judicious efforts of the Superintendent, who has given to the Academy the benefit of his acquirements and experience, and who in his well-directed labors has had the earnest coöperation of those associated with him in educating the future officers of the Navy. Under such management, fostered and sustained by the Government, the institution takes high rank and will be of incalculable service to the country.

Some valuable suggestions are made in the very able report of the Board of Visitors, as well as in that of the Superintendent, both of which are appended and commended to the consideration of Congress and all who feel an interest in the success of the Navy.

NAVAL APPRENTICES.

The revival of the system of naval apprentices, authorized by the act approved March 2, 1837, promises encouraging results. Having been imperfectly understood and not judiciously carried into effect at its origin, nearly thirty years ago, and compelled to encounter not only indifference and prejudice, but opposition, the execution of the law had been neglected and fallen into disuse.

Time and experience will still be needed to perfect the system, which has many difficulties to overcome, for it is yet in its infancy; but when fairly established and its merits fully developed, important benefits may be anticipated from it, not only to the naval but the merchant service. A class of educated and trained seamen will go forth yearly from the school-ships to give character and efficiency to American commerce as well as to the American Navy. Under judicious and skillful management the school-ships will be nurseries for the naval and merchant service, from which, when the system is in full operation, there will graduate a superior class of well-instructed and thoroughly-disciplined seamen, who in a few years will elevate and thoroughly revolutionize the maritime force of the country.

If the Government would enlist the best class of boys as apprentices, it must, as has been heretofore suggested, make the service attractive; and to do this most effectually, the recommendation is renewed that a portion of those most proficient and most deserving shall receive appointments to the Naval Academy. To carry this recommendation into effect, the plan proposed in my last report, that of conferring one half of the yearly appointments upon the naval apprentices who shall pass the best examination, instead of appointing the whole from congressional selection, is most available.

SEAMEN.

On former occasions and in various ways the attention of Congress has been invited to the condition of our seamen. Some measures should be taken to ameliorate and improve their condition and to increase their numbers, for neglect on the part of the Government, inattention to their merits and their wants, and more remunerative employment and greater consideration in other pursuits, are having their effect in retarding the increase of this useful and deserving class. Without representation or political influence, identified with no party, though always true to their flag, the sailors have received little attention from our legislators. This is, perhaps, in part owing to the fact that no one Department of the Government is clothed with special authority in regard to them. At an early day after the adoption of the Constitution, general duties respecting seamen were distributed among several Departments of the Government. The Treasury Department is intrusted with the navigation interest, and nominally with the care and protection of our sea-faring men. The State Department, through our consuls abroad, is charged with the duty of providing for destitute American seamen in foreign ports. The Navy Department, which procures its naval recruits mainly from the merchant marine, has the care of enlisted seamen.

No one Department is specially charged with the duty of attending to a class which, more than any other, needs the friendly and protecting care of the Government. Their interest and welfare are, consequently, almost wholly neglected, and from their roving life, liable to imposition when ashore, they become the victims of sharpers, who soon rob them of the wages they have earned while afloat.

Elsewhere in this report mention has been made of the importance of school-ships at the principal sea-ports, where boys may be received, educated, and trained for naval seamanship, and where their youthful ambition may be stimulated with the hope that by their own exertions, and by propriety of conduct, they may enter the Academy and become officers of the Navy. This commencement will do much to elevate the character of the American sailor. While some of the apprenticed boys would doubtless enter and obtain honorable position in the merchant marine, most of them would, with proper encouragement, continue through life in the public service, or until age had incapacitated them for duty. A small pension after not less than twenty years' service for such as preferred it to support in the asylum already provided, would attach them to the Government with which they would feel themselves identified. In his roving and unsettled life the sailor seldom accumulates property, and a pension of half his monthly wages to comfort declining age would be but just after he has given his best years to his country.

Movements have been recently made in behalf of their seamen by some of the maritime countries, which have become aware of the necessity of taking measures to retain the requisite complement of seamen for naval and commercial purposes.

In our own country our best naval officers and intelligent merchants are interesting themselves in this subject, and Congress and the Government cannot remain indifferent to it without putting in jeopardy our commercial and naval supremacy. But in order that the whole subject may be duly considered, and the best measures adopted for wise and intelligent legislation, there should be connected with the Navy Department a properly organized bureau, which should have in charge the whole subject relating to seamen, not only the men-of-war-men, but the shipped seamen of the merchant service. Such a bureau, with an intelligent and practical seaman of either the naval or merchant marine at its head, one who understands the existing evils, comprehends the necessity of thorough and radical action, appreciates the growing wants of the country, and has the energy, industry, and zeal necessary for the work, could mature a system which would constitute the basis of future legislative action and be of benefit to both the seamen and the country.

The division of this and other incidents of the naval and commercial marine of the country among the different Departments tends to confusion, augmented expense, and inefficiency. It is a departure from the uniform practice and organization of other maritime Governments, all of which, so far as known, place in the charge of their marine department all that belongs to their navigating interests. The adoption of such a plan here would secure that unity of action and purpose which is indispensable to the best and wisest administration. The duties of the Light-House Board, the great and important operations of the Coast Survey, and the revenue-cutter service, which bring the naval power of the country to the aid of its financial and revenue system, are all legitimate branches of the administration of the Navy Department. Ocean transportation for military purposes should be a naval duty, and the same may be said of the cooperation of our consuls in the protection of our seamen abroad, and providing for the return to our shores of those who are wrecked and found destitute. All these matters can be best regulated and most easily attended to by being placed under the supervision of officers familiar with all the exigencies and operations of the naval service, and who in the performance of their duties will act under the direct control of the Department to which they belong.

OUTFIT FOR SEAMEN.

Complaint is made that at present prices, and with an inflated and fluctuating currency, the seamen find it difficult to procure their outfit on the wages they receive. It is a question whether the seamen, who, when on service, are confined to no particular locality, but are constantly changing from port to port, and from one country to another, ought not always to be paid in coin. It is important to them beyond any other class that they should receive their wages in money of true standard value, which they can use abroad as well as at home, and that they should not be paid in a fluctuating paper currency.

It has been suggested that were an outfit of clothing to a specified amount, in the nature of a bounty, furnished each recruit on his enlistment, it would remedy to a considerable extent the difficulties which are experienced. There are many reasons in favor of this proposition. In the naval service of most countries, and in the Army of our own, the enlisted man receives his clothing in addition to his wages. If compelled, as he is at present, to furnish an outfit for himself, by an advance of wages, the sailor commences his service in debt, becomes dissatisfied, and not unfrequently deserts. It is therefore recommended that clothing to a specific amount be furnished by the Government to each sailor on his enlistment.

TIMBER LANDS.

Many years since the Government adopted the policy of reserving from sale certain timber lands for "the sole purpose of supplying timber for the Navy of the United States." The lands thus reserved were placed under the control of this Department, and are scattered through the States of Florida, Georgia, Mississippi, and Louisiana. Agents were appointed, with salaries ranging from five hundred to two thousand dollars per annum, with allowances for boat hire, horses, wagons, and other alleged expenses, to protect these lands from depredation. These agencies were continued, at considerable annual cost to the Government, until the beginning of the rebellion, when they were discontinued, and they have not been revived since the insurrection was suppressed.

Measures for the preservation of live oak were commenced as early as 1817, and it was represented at that time that many of the trees had obtained their full growth. Yet it is not known that any timber has ever been procured from these lands for the Government, but, so far as ascertained, every stick of live oak which has been used by the Navy has been purchased, and there is little doubt that much of it was cut and taken from the timber reservations which had for years been protected by Government agents, at great annual expense to the Government.

Since the restoration of peace, ineffectual search has been made for the maps and papers relating to these lands, but they have not yet been found. Whether they have been misplaced or were abstracted by those who had access to and charge of them, but who fled South at the commencement of the rebellion, cannot be stated. Some difficulty may be experienced in ascertaining the quantity and precise locality of these reservations, but from what has taken place, it is evident that the policy of timber reservations with salaried agents to protect them is a costly failure, and should be abandoned. The Government has experienced no inconvenience in procuring ship-timber from private parties, nor is it apprehended that any embarrassment will occur from that source in the immediate future. Under these circumstances it is a question whether the Government should not, through the Land Office, resume possession of these reserved lands, and put them in market to be sold for general purposes.

NAVAL PENSION FUND.

At the date of the last annual report the naval pension fund amounted to $9,000,000. There has been added during the year the sum of $2,750,000, making the aggregate at the present time $11,750,000.

By law one half of the net proceeds of all prizes, when the captured vessel is of inferior force, is decreed to the United States, and it is enacted that all money thus accruing to the United States from sale of prizes shall be and remain forever "a fund for the payment of pensions to the officers, seamen, and marines who may be entitled to receive the same, and if the said fund shall be insufficient for the purpose, the public faith is pledged to make up the deficiency; but if it should be more than sufficient the surplus shall be applied to the making of further provision for the comfort of disabled officers, seamen, and marines."

The efficient and active vigilance of the Navy in capturing prizes, and the promptness with which their adjudication has been enforced, has placed in the Treasury a fund the income of which is more than sufficient to pay the pensions at present rates. Further legislation is therefore required in order that "the surplus shall be applied to the making of further provision for the comfort of disabled officers, seamen, and marines."

The subject is submitted for consideration that the necessary provision may be made to carry into effect the pledged faith of the Government.

PENSIONS.

On the 1st of November last, the Navy pension-roll was as follows:

1,057 invalids, with annual pensions amounting to.....	$73,637 05
1,208 widows and orphans, annually receiving.....	192,102 00
2,255 persons receiving a total annual amount of.....	$270,739 05

This amount will be somewhat increased by virtue of the provisions of the acts of June 6 and July 25, 1866.

COMPENSATION OF CLERKS.

The compensation to the clerical force of the Department is small for the service rendered, and insufficient for the support, in a manner becoming their position, of the clerks and their families. All persons who have fixed incomes are injuriously affected by our expanded currency. With the ruling high prices for rents and the necessities of life, the struggle of such as have low salaries and dependent families is extremely severe. A fair compensation on the part of the Government to those who faithfully serve it is undoubtedly the best policy.

An extra allowance, if made to the employés of any Department, should be extended in like manner to the clerks in the other Departments, who are as faithful and as meritorious, and subject to the same expenses as those who have received the special benefaction of Congress. The discrimination which is made is not only invidious, but in its effect most discouraging upon those who, while laboring with equal fidelity and assiduity in similar positions, are denied corresponding remuneration. No money of the Government is more judiciously expended than that which is paid to the capable and faithful clerical force in the Departments; and that of the Navy Department I earnestly commend to the special consideration of Congress.

EXPENSES AND ESTIMATES.

The available resources of the Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866, were, $142,291,919 40
Expenditures..... 43,324,536 42

Leaving a balance at the commencement of the present fiscal year of.... 98,967,392 98
The appropriations for the current year amount to..... 18,976,667 50

Making the total available resources for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867..... $117,944,060 48

As several of the bureaus will have unexpended appropriations, which will be ample for some time to come, they have made no estimates for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868.

The following amounts are asked for:

Pay of officers and men of the Navy.....	$10,826,280 00
Pay for labor and superintendence in navy-yards.....	7,976,192 00
Bounties to discharged seamen.....	500,000 00
Navigation, Naval Academy, Observatory, &c.....	612,230 15
Magazines, &c.....	80,000 00
Surgeons' necessities and hospitals.....	386,513 00
Contingent expenses.....	1,592,000 00
Support of Marine corps.....	1,595,212 01
Total.....	$23,568,433 16

The large unexpended balance in the Treasury at the close of the last fiscal year is embraced in appropriations under more than one hundred different heads. Many of these are continuous, have been made for years, their expenditure will be protracted through years to come, and, though assisting to make up a large balance, cannot be dispensed with. There are large amounts, however, under the heads of "construction," "steam engineering," "ordnance," "provisions and clothing," and "fuel," which can with propriety revert to the Treasury. No appropriations under these heads were made for the current year, and for the ensuing year none are asked. In the course of time the appropriations would be exhausted, but it is not believed to be in accordance with sound public policy in time of peace to continue such large amounts at the disposal of the Department.

Liberal appropriations for the naval service were made during the existence of the war, but the funds of the Department were always carefully and economically expended. This fact is attested by the numerous claims of contractors for relief now before Congress; and the result is, that the Department is able to complete all the vessels and engines contracted for before the close of the war, and designate appropriations to the amount of about fifty million dollars that can be relinquished to the Treasury, or may be otherwise disposed of by Congress.

It has heretofore been deemed essential to correct administration that there should be annual estimates for proposed expenditures, and specific appropriations therefor after examination by Congress, and this Department has no desire to evade this annual scrutiny.

THE BUREAUS.

The reports of the several chiefs of bureaus and of the colonel commandant of the Marine corps are appended, and are referred to for full information of the operation of their several departments. A brief abstract only can here be given.

The chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks gives in detail a statement of the repairs and improvements at the navy-yards, the present condition of the work, and his views of future wants. The expenditures for permanent improvements were necessarily small during the last four years, and now that the war is closed, it is thought to be sound policy to supply many of the wants and correct the defects which a state of war has developed. The Portsmouth yard has been extended by the purchase of Seavey's Island, and arrangements have been made, subject only to a grant of jurisdiction by the New York Legislature, for extending the Brooklyn yard by incorporating into it property known as the Ruggles estate. The means for executing work at the Philadelphia yard are very limited, and, in consequence of the want of shops and machinery, large quantities of work have been done in private establishments which could have been performed more economically and perfectly in the navy-yard had the facilities existed. It is also recommended that the Washington yard be extended by the purchase of additional property. Fourteen beneficiaries have been admitted to the Naval Asylum during the year, nine have died, and one has been sent to the Insane Asylum. Total number on the rolls, including officers and attendants, one hundred and seventy-two; expenses, $62,282 58.

The Bureau of Navigation has under its immediate supervision the Naval Academy, Naval Observatory, Hydrographic Office, Nautical Almanac, and the school for naval apprentices, and a survey of operations in each of these departments is given in the report of the chief of the bureau. The subject of the local deviation of compasses, arising from the use of large quantities of iron in the construction of vessels-of-war, is occupying the attention of the bureau, and the results of some important observations will soon be made public. To collect data for this purpose, an officer was especially sent to San Francisco in the iron-clad Monadnock. A hydrographic office has been established in this city, under authority of an act of Congress passed at its last session. It will be the central depot from which charts, sailing directions, and nautical books in general will issue. The new buildings for the Naval Academy authorized by Congress will soon be commenced; other improvements have been completed. The Superintendent of the Naval Observatory reports that there has been added to the instruments of that institution a great transit circle, which restores the Observatory to the rank of a first-class institution, and will largely extend its sphere of usefulness. The result thus far of the naval apprentice system has not, in the opinion of the chief of the bureau, disappointed the expectations of its most sanguine advocates.

The chief of the Bureau of Ordnance reports the sale, during the past year, of unserviceable cannon and surplus powder to the amount of $387,364. Other ordnance material which the close of the war has left on hand, and is not needed for the present or prospective wants of the squadrons, will be disposed of. He states that the most satisfactory results have been attained with guns cast either solid or hollow, and nothing has transpired abroad, in the efforts to produce a steel or steel and wrought-iron gun better than ours, to induce a fear that cast-iron ordnance will be surpassed in any essential of endurance, either as smooth-bore or rifles. In gun-carriages a decided improvement has been made in the substitution of iron for the cumbersome wood ones so long in use, and a carriage has recently been designed upon which a fifteen-inch gun can be safely handled in any weather in which an action may be fought at sea.

The chief of the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting reports that seven hundred and thirty-one tons of hemp, of a value of $296,489, have been used at the Government ropewalk at Charlestown. A board has been organized to examine and test the comparative strength of wire and hemp rope, with a view to its more general introduction into the Navy should the report be favorable. It is believed that by the use of wire instead of hemp rope, a vessel of the Wabash class will be relieved of over four tons' weight aloft, and that there will be a large saving in the original cost, as well as increased durability in the rigging of a vessel. The coal contracts for the current year are for forty thousand tons delivered at Philadelphia, at $5 61 per ton, and twelve thousand tons delivered at New York, at $7 28 per ton. But little coal has been sent abroad during the year. Especial attention is invited to the suggestions relative to the enlistment of seamen, both for the naval and merchant service.

The report of the chief of the Bureau of Construction and Repair is chiefly occupied with the prospective wants of his department. To place the Government dock-yards in such a condition as the experience of the past few years has shown to be necessary for efficient service will require the erection of a number of new buildings. The views of the chief of the bureau are detailed with some minuteness, and should command attention. During the war it became necessary to build many vessels of unseasoned timber, but such vessels are of short durability, and true economy will be consulted by laying in for future use a large supply, particularly of oak and yellow pine timber. Special appropriations for a few years for this purpose are recommended. During the year the force in the navy-yards has been principally engaged in placing in efficient condition the vessels which had been almost constantly employed during the war, and but little progress has been made upon the hulls of the new vessels.

The chief of the Bureau of Steam Engineering reports that no new work has been undertaken during the year in his department. All the new work under construction was commenced before the close of the war, and a number of engines are now completed, for which the vessels have not been commenced. This will be taken off the contractors' hands and stored. The machinery for the Idaho and Algonquin, designed by E. N. Dickerson, has proved a failure in each case, and been rejected. As the Navy is almost wholly a steam Navy, it is suggested that increased facilities be afforded for the construction and repair of steam machinery in our navy-yards, and to this end estimates, amounting to about one million and a half of dollars, are submitted. The chief of the bureau suggests that in view of the importance of the Engineer corps, the rank and pay of engineer officers should be increased; also, that the age qualification for cadet engineers be extended to twenty-one years.

The chief of the Bureau of Provisions and Clothing calls attention to the very great evils of the present system of supplying a sailor with his outfit. The market rate for the various articles he is compelled to purchase is now so high that when a sailor has received his advance in money, and drawn his clothing and small stores, he finds a debt of about a hundred dollars standing against him, which he cannot expect to work out, after leaving a half-pay allotment for his family, in less than a year. The chief of the bureau recommends the erection of an additional storehouse, at a cost of $150,000, upon the new purchase at Brooklyn, known as the "Ruggles property."

The chief of the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery calls attention to the necessity for increased hospital accommodations at the Naval Academy, Annapolis, and suggests that a sufficient sum be appropriated to purchase a proper site, and to erect a hospital commensurate with the necessities of the institution. He represents the hospital now in use as wholly insufficient for the present number connected with the Academy. He also urges an appropriation of $150,000 additional to the amount already appropriated to build a hospital at Mare Island, to answer the growing necessities of that distant station. He represents that the building in which the naval laboratory is carried on is small, and so inconvenient as to seriously embarrass its operations; that the machinery, apparatus, manufacturing department, store-rooms, packing and dispensing rooms, are all crowded in one small building. He submits an estimate of $80,000 for additional laboratory accommodations. Interesting tables connected with the casualties of the Navy during the rebellion, and showing its sanitary condition, are given. The number of persons wounded during this period was 4,030, of which 3,266 were from gunpowder, 456 were scalded in battle, and 308 drowned in battle. The casualties incident to service in the Navy, not connected with battle, during the same time, were 2,070. The aggregate number of deaths in the Navy from casualties of all kinds during the rebellion was 2,272, as follows: from gunshot fractures, 495; from gunshot flesh wounds, 1,309; from incidental casualties, 373; died in rebel prison-pens, 95.

The colonel commandant of the Marine corps reports that at his annual inspection he found good order and discipline sufficiently marked to reflect credit upon both officers and men. One half of the strength of the corps is attached to vessels upon foreign service; the remainder is employed in guarding the navy-yards and naval magazines, and being instructed in the duties of soldiers. No difficulty is experienced in getting a sufficient number of recruits, and of a better class than formerly. The commandant of the corps recommends that new barracks be erected in Washington to displace those at present occupied, which were erected in 1805, and besides being dilapidated and not adapted to the health and comfort of the men, are considered wholly inadequate for the wants of the service. It is also recommended that steps be taken towards securing a convenient site for marine barracks at Norfolk, where there are no suitable accommodations for the marines. Attention is called to the fact that, although the corps is a military organization numbering some thirty-six hundred men, its commandant holds but the commission of a colonel. Strong interest is felt that the grade of brigadier general should be conferred upon the highest officer in a corps whose numbers and service would seem to justify it, particularly at a time when so many Army officers are honored with that position.

CONCLUSION.

I have, in this report, presented to you, and stated for the information of Congress, the present condition of our naval force at home, where its preparation for efficiency is still proceeding, though on a properly reduced scale, and its arrangements and operations abroad, where, following in the track of our expanding commerce, it keeps faithful watch over our national interests and honor. I have added to this description such suggestions as I deemed most worthy of favorable consideration, looking, with a due observance of economy, to further improvement of its organization. The calm which succeeds the great tempest through which our country has passed gives me the gratifying opportunity, while stating the movements of our naval force in distant seas, to suspend for this year the five times resumed narrative of its mighty growth and ever-memorable achievements. Yet in closing this report, I again exhort the Government and the country to realize promptly and practically that the maintenance of our Navy in an amplitude of power adequate to any emergency is intimately blended with our hopes of lasting peace, with the augmentation of our vast commercial enterprise and prosperity, and, above all, with that grand and imposing naval renown which has come in our age to be manifestly the surest and the cheapest defense of a great nation.

GIDEON WELLES,
Secretary of the Navy.

To the PRESIDENT.

SENATE &amp; Ho. OF REPS.

Report of the Secretary of the Interior.

39TH CONG....2D SESS.

Report of the Secretary of the Interior.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
WASHINGTON, D. C., November 19, 1866.

SIR: I have the honor to submit the following exhibit of the operations of this Department, and of the various and diversified interests connected with the branches of the public service committed to its supervision.

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866, public lands were disposed of as follows:

Acres sold for cash.....	388,294.15
" entered under the homestead acts.....	1,892,516.86
" located with military warrants.....	403,180.00
" approved to States as swamp.....	1,199,658.27
" approved to States for railroads.....	94,596.99
" located with agricultural college scrip.....	651,066.60

During the same period 6,423,984.18 acres were offered for sale. The cash receipts from sales and other sources were $824,645 08. The number of homestead entries exceeded that of the preceding year by more than sixty per cent.

There are sixty-one land districts and ten surveying departments. During the past year surveying operations have been prosecuted with energy in Minnesota, Dakota, Kansas, Nebraska, Colorado, California, Oregon, Nevada, and Washington, but have been deferred, on account of Indian hostilities, in New Mexico and Arizona. The anomalous condition of affairs in Utah has prevented any surveys there since the year 1857. At that date 2,500,000 acres had been surveyed. In order that they may be disposed of, it is recommended that a land district be created in that Territory.

The entire amount of the public domain is 1,465,468,800 acres, of which 474,160,551 acres have been surveyed.

The attention of Congress is again respectfully invited to the expediency of making early provision for the adjustment of claims to land situate in New Mexico and Arizona, arising under the laws of Spain or Mexico. The act of July 22, 1854, directs the surveyor general to ascertain the nature and extent of such claims under the laws, usages, and customs of Spain or Mexico, and to make a full report on all such as originated before the cession of the territory to the United States by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. Congress reserved the right to confirm, by its action, bona fide grants, and to give full effect to the stipulations of that treaty. Until such action, the lands covered by those claims are reserved from sale or other disposal by the Government. The act does not apply to that valuable region of country acquired by the treaty concluded at Mexico, December 30, 1853. Good faith and sound policy require the separation from the public domain of private property held by an incipient and unperfected right, or by a complete title, under a grant of the Government which preceded us in the exercise of jurisdiction and sovereignty over the soil. The confirmation of a private claim secures to the party a valid title. The location of his land, when ascertained by authentic surveys and noted upon our records, identifies the property of the United States, and facilitates the disposal of it. The authority of the surveyor general should extend to the lands ceded by the later treaty; and by a special tribunal created for the purpose, or through the action of the courts, all grants of this character could be definitely and finally disposed of.

The boundary between New Mexico and Colorado, as well as that between California and Nevada, should be permanently established, and the limits between Florida and Georgia finally adjusted.

It has been the cherished policy of the Government to assure upon the most liberal conditions to the actual settler a title to his home and improvements. His preference right of purchase is not confined to lands which were surveyed at the time of his settlement; nor is he required to pay for them, or for those surveyed but unoffered, until the day designated by the President's proclamation for the public sale. Differences of opinion exist as to the applicability to particular localities of some of the acts of Congress prescribing the period within which the declaratory statement for unsurveyed lands must be filed. No distinction ought to be made in regard to the time allowed for the payment for unoffered lands and those which have been offered. I concur in opinion with the Commissioner of the General Land Office as to the changes that might be advantageously made in existing preemption laws. They also should be greatly simplified and rendered more uniform in their operation. In this way controversies such as have been occasioned by incongruous and conflicting provisions will be avoided, and the benefits of this wise and just policy effectually secured.

The right of the preëmtor attaches from the date of his actual personal settlement; that of the homestead settler from the date of his entry at the local land office. The latter is confined to surveyed lands. In either case the title may be consummated by a full compliance with the terms and conditions imposed by the law under which it was initiated. A party who has settled, with a view to preëption, upon a particular tract, and thus excluded all others from acquiring a right thereto, should not be permitted to abandon his original claim and enter the land under the homestead law. Such a privilege would, in many instances, inevitably lead to great abuse. The modes prescribed for acquiring title to land by these enactments essentially differ; and if the claimant under a preëption law fails to perform the condition which it enjoins, he should incur the consequences of such failure.

Authority should be given to the head of the Department to close up the local office, and transfer its archives, where the lands in a State are nearly all disposed of. The powers vested in the local officers might be conferred upon the Commissioner of the General Land Office, to enable him to give title on the sale of the remaining tracts.

A few tracts have been entered in California at the minimum price of twenty dollars per acre, under the supplemental act of March 3, 1865, for the disposal of coal lands. The propriety of reducing this minimum, where the coal is of inferior quality, and cannot be obtained without difficulty, is submitted for consideration. The area of the coal lands of the United States is estimated at two hundred thousand square miles.

Land offices have been reopened in Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Arkansas. By the act approved June 21, 1866, public lands in these States are reserved exclusively for homestead entries; and for the period of two years from the date of its passage only eighty acres can be entered by one person. The opinion of the Attorney General that patents for land sold under the revenue laws must issue from the General Land Office will govern the action of the Department.

The law forbids any incumbent in the General Land Office to purchase public lands. I suggest the propriety of extending it so as to include every officer in any way connected with the administration of the laws relating to them.

The grant to Iowa for the improvement of the Des Moines river has been fully satisfied. It embraced 833,079.90 acres.

There still remain unsold seventy-seven lots, situated within the Fort Howard reserve, in Wisconsin. They will be disposed of in accordance with the act of July 4, 1866.

Up to June 30, 1866, 43,204,774 acres of swamp lands had been patented to the several States, and the aggregate indemnity to them on account of such lands sold or otherwise disposed of by the United States was, in cash, $597,201 37, and, in other lands, 478,036.93 acres. It is recommended that the time for making selections of such lands be limited to two years after the official plat is received at the local office, and that the purpose of Congress in relation to this subject be explicitly declared.

Instructions have been issued to the surveyor general and the local officers in California to give full and summary effect to the provisions of the act of July 23, 1866, "to quiet land titles in California."

The registers and receivers act as agents of Government to prevent trespassers on the public lands from removing timber therefrom. By imposing fines, and compelling the offenders to enter the tracts trespassed on, the Government has been, to a considerable extent, protected in its rights. A bona fide settler is allowed to appropriate the timber on his claim only so far as may be necessary for indispensable uses. The Commissioner presents the importance of promoting by legal enactments the planting and growth of trees on the public domain, and he suggests the mode by which that object may be accomplished.

Under the donation laws, patents for 1,282,423.93 acres of land in Oregon have been issued. Additional legislation is recommended to enforce the survey of donation claims on which settlement was made prior to the public surveys.

Two hundred Indian patents were issued during the last fiscal year, for 298,256 acres of land.

Attention has been repeatedly invited by this Department to the immense value of the deposits of precious metals within our territorial limits. The mineral lands on the Pacific slope belong to the Government, but it has not provided for the disposal of them, or for the development of the treasure which they contain. In the absence of legislation by Congress, and with its tacit consent, these mines have been worked by individuals, vast expenditures made, and a species of possessory right acquired which has been recognized by State laws, and maintained and vindicated by State tribunals. The act of February 27, 1865, declares that no action in the courts of the United States for the recovery of any mining title, or for damages thereto, shall be affected by the fact that the paramount title to the land on which such mines are is in the United States, and the Supreme Court has held that mining interests, apart from the fee-simple rights in the soil by patent, existed before that act, with the implied sanction of the Federal Government. The exploration and working of these mines have largely contributed to the national wealth, and our legislation should, I submit, be controlled to some extent by existing rights and interests, which are the legitimate results of our policy of inaction. The wisdom of Congress can devise measures which, by placing this vast interest under the control of positive law, will render it tributary in a greater degree to the public prosperity.

Copious details are furnished and many topics connected with the public lands ably discussed in the interesting and elaborate report of the Commissioner.

By reason of the increased rates of pension, more than $23,000,000 will be required for this branch of the service during the next fiscal year.

Samuel Downing, of Edinburg, Saratoga county, New York, is the only surviving soldier of the Revolution. His name was inadvertently omitted in the last annual report of the Pension Bureau to this Department.

The names of 931 widows of revolutionary soldiers appear on the pension-rolls at the close of the last fiscal year.

prior to that of 1861 do not exceed 3,000. The widows and minor children who receive a pension by reason of the services and death of those who served in such wars number 1,227.

During the last fiscal year 22,645 original applications for invalid pensions were granted, at an aggregate annual rate of $1,756,812 20. The number of such pensions that were increased was 1,263, at an annual amount of increase of $43,946 25. The total amount awarded to Army invalids during the year appears to be $1,800,764 45.

During the same period 27,076 original applications of widows and dependent relatives of officers and soldiers of the Army were allowed, at an aggregate rate of $2,743,711 17 per annum. The increased allowance to such persons was $299 10; so that the sum required to meet pension claims of this description allowed during the past year is $2,744,010 27.

The whole number of new Army pensioners of all classes added to the rolls during the year ending June 30, 1866, was, accordingly, 49,721, and requiring for their payment $4,500,523 37 per annum. The number dropped from the rolls during the same period, on account of death or other causes, was 9,342, whose annual allowance amounted to $880,173 62.

On the 30th of June last there were on the pension-rolls 54,620 invalids, whose yearly rate of pensions was $4,128,718 50; and 69,889 widows and dependent relatives, at a yearly rate of $7,284,404 11—making a total of 124,509 Army pensioners, at an annual aggregate of $11,413,122 26.

Including payments to pension agents, the amount paid during the year to revolutionary pensioners was $252,204 88; to Army invalid pensioners, $3,815,805 04; and to widows and dependent relatives, (not revolutionary,) $9,109,436 70—giving the total sum of $13,177,446 12.

During the year 238 original applications for Navy invalid pensions were allowed, at an aggregate amount of $18,902 50 per annum. Twenty-five such pensions heretofore allowed were increased at an aggregate annual rate of $917. Two hundred and eighteen original applications of widows and dependent relatives of officers and seamen were allowed, at an aggregate of $32,976 per annum. The total number of Navy invalid pensioners on the rolls at the close of the fiscal year was 1,032, at an aggregate annual rate of $72,610 05. The number of widows and dependent relatives was 1,181, at an aggregate annual rate of $189,742—making the whole number of naval pensioners, of all classes, 2,213, requiring for their annual payment $261,852 05.

The total number of pensioners of all classes, Army and Navy, on the rolls June 30, 1866, was 126,722, and the amount paid pensioners, including expenses of disbursements during the last fiscal year, was $13,459,996 43. This amount includes $99,237 15 paid to 1,043 pensioners residing in the States whose inhabitants were lately in rebellion.

From the date of the executive proclamation declaring the inhabitants of any State to be in a state of insurrection against the United States, the names of all pensioners residing in such State were stricken from the rolls. Inter-course with them was, by the laws of war, the legislation of Congress, and the President's proclamation in pursuance thereof, suspended so long as such condition of hostility continued, but the right of such pensioners as remained loyal to the United States was saved by the act of February 4, 1862. Their names, on making the required proof of continued loyalty, are accordingly restored to the rolls. Mr. Attorney General Speed, whose opinion on the subject was taken by my predecessor, held that the restored pensioner was entitled to the arrears of the pension which had accrued since the last payment to him prior to the rebellion, and the practice of the Government has been in conformity to that opinion.

The Navy pension fund, accruing from the condemnation and the sale of prizes, and invested in bonds of the United States, amounts to $11,750,000. The interest of this investment is more than double the amount necessary to pay the Navy pensions. There is also an uninvested surplus of $205,738 35.

During the past year 406 bounty-land warrants were issued for 63,866 acres of land.

The Commissioner of Pensions represents that a considerable number of additional clerks is indispensable to the prompt and efficient transaction of the business of his office. The bill to reorganize the clerical force of this Department, recommended by my predecessor, and passed by the Senate at the last session, would have afforded a partial remedy; but the changes made in the pension laws subsequent to its introduction render its provisions inadequate to the present and increasing wants of the service. The cases during the last year exceeded by twenty-five per cent. those disposed of during that which preceded it. The labor of the office during the current year has increased in a much greater ratio, and is nearly if not quite twofold greater than has ever devolved upon it for the same length of time since its organization. Notwithstanding this imperative necessity for a well-organized force, several years have elapsed since any permanent addition to it was made. The authority to employ temporary clerks of the first class has been given, but it secures only the services of mere copyists. The business of the bureau must fall in arrear when insufficient means are furnished for transacting it. No delay, other than that which is unavoidable, should be suffered to occur in awarding the pensions provided by the country for those who have such strong claims upon its justice and gratitude. The case is respectfully presented to Congress, who can alone furnish the remedy, and whose early favorable action is specially and earnestly invoked.

The voluminous report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs exhibits in detail the condition of this difficult and important branch of the public service. The numerous treaties recently negotiated with various Indian tribes have greatly augmented the labors of the department, and the constant pressure of emigration into the Indian Territory produces conflicts of interest which require judicious management to adjust and control. The Commissioner sets forth the terms and stipulations of those treaties. The Indian tribes of the Southwest have resumed their former friendly relations with the Government, and it is hoped that they will succeed in fully adjusting the differences which have heretofore existed among them in consequence of the different attitudes they were induced to assume toward the United States during the rebellion.

There are before the Senate some important treaties with the Indian tribes in Utah, Kansas, and Dakota, to which the attention of that body is respectfully invited. Several treaties recently negotiated with Indian tribes in the Northwest will be submitted to you at an early day, to be laid before the Senate for its consideration and action. It is believed that, should they be ratified and faithfully executed, peaceful relations will be established with powerful tribes, occupying a vast extent of country, who have recently been in hostility to the Government.

The Commissioner suggests the necessity of further negotiations with some of the Indians in Kansas with a view to their removal from that State, and also with the Indian tribes in Idaho, New Mexico, and Dakota, for their removal to and settlement upon reservations to be set apart for their exclusive occupancy and use. These suggestions will receive the early and careful consideration of the department. Collisions and hostility have been of less frequent occurrence between the whites and the Indians during the past year than has been generally believed. Occasionally depredations have been committed, and raids made upon emigrants and settlers, but these are believed to have been greatly exaggerated, either by the fears of the inexperienced and timid or the cupidity and selfishness of interested and designing speculators. Peace appears to have been the rule, and hostilities the exception, between the Mississippi river and the Rocky mountains.

It has been the settled policy of the Government to establish the various tribes upon suitable reservations and there protect and subside them until they can be taught to cultivate the soil and sustain themselves. It is no doubt the best if not the only policy that can be pursued to preserve them from extinction.

Numerous recommendations looking to the amelioration of the condition of these wards of the Government are contained in the Commissioner's report, and will no doubt receive the attention of Congress.

During the year ending September 30, 1866, there were 14,039 applications for patents. Eight thousand seven hundred and sixteen patents (including reissues and assigns) were issued; 1,415 applications were allowed, but patents have not issued thereon by reason of the non-payment of the final fees; 2,579 caveats were filed, and 55 extensions of patents were granted.

During the same period the receipts were $460,416 80, and the expenditures $343,697 73, leaving a balance of $116,719 07, which added to $111,578 19, the balance on hand September 30, 1865, makes the amount now in the Treasury to the credit of the patent fund $278,297 76.

The last annual report of this Department alluded to the law regulating appeals in cases arising in the Patent Office. I am unable to perceive any stronger reason for granting an appeal to one of the justices of the supreme court of this District from the decision of the Commissioner of Patents, than from that of the Commissioner of Pensions disallowing a pension claim, or from that of the Commissioner of the General Land Office on a contested right of preemption. The decision of the judge does not have any more conclusive effect than the ruling of the executive officer. If adverse to the applicant, a patent does not issue. But if in his favor, even in interference cases, it is not a final determination of the questions in controversy. Congress has declared that it shall not preclude the right to contest the patent in any court in which its validity may come in question. If sued by the holder of an elder patent who was a party to the whole proceedings, the successful applicant cannot set up the decision awarding him a patent as a defense to the action. Such a decision is not, in its essential characteristics, a judicial act, and cannot be assimilated to the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, which may be pleaded as an estoppel where the identical question is directly involved between the same parties in a subsequent suit. The duty incident to this special trust should not be imposed upon the judge, and there is a manifest impropriety in giving him a supervisory control over the action of an executive bureau. The judicial and executive departments of the Government are distinct and independent, and the officers of each should be confined to their appropriate sphere of action.

The applicant for a patent, before he can prosecute an appeal to the judge, must pay into the office the sum of twenty-five dollars for his use. The fee required on each successive appeal from the primary examiner to the examiners in chief, and from the latter to the head of the bureau, constitutes a part of the patent fund, and is not paid to those officers. They receive a fixed compensation, without regard to the cases submitted to them. The amount of the judge's emoluments for this special service depends upon the number of appeals to him, and that may be increased or diminished by the character of his decisions. He is thus placed in a position which no judicial officer should be compelled to occupy.

The act of March 3, 1849, establishing this Department, directed "the Secretary of the Interior to exercise and perform all the acts of supervision and appeal in regard to the office of Commissioner of Patents theretofore exercised by the Secretary of State." Subsequent legislation has not changed the connection then created. The Commissioner being thus subordinate to and under the control of this Department, should, as is now required of the other officers who sustain the same relation to it, submit to the Secretary a detailed report of the condition and operations of his bureau. The act of 1837, directing him to report to Congress, was passed when the Patent Office was under the supervision of the Secretary of State, who makes no annual report to the President of the United States for transmission to that body. The reason for the present exceptional regulation no longer exists, and I recommend that Congress order the Commissioner to make his annual report to the Secretary of the Interior.

On the 6th instant the Union Pacific railroad was completed to a point twenty-three miles west of the hundredth meridian of longitude, being two hundred and seventy miles distant from Omaha. The want of a railroad connection from Omaha eastward has retarded the transportation of the iron and equipments of the road and compelled the company to rely upon shipments by the Missouri river, at such times as the state of the navigation permitted. The difficulty will be removed by the construction of the railway from Clinton to Council Bluffs, which, it is believed, will be completed next spring.

The company have constructed all their depot buildings at Omaha. The arrangement and extent of their grounds and permanent fixtures are on a scale adapted to our vast and increasing traffic between the western and eastern shores of the continent. The road has been built of such excellent materials, and in so substantial a manner, as to elicit repeated expressions of commendation from the Government directors and commissioners. There can be no better evidence of the fidelity with which the company have met the requirements of Congress than the fact that the commissioners have in no instance refused to accept any portion of the road presented to them for examination.

The company have not filed a map showing the permanent location of the road beyond a point three hundred miles west of Omaha. Surveying parties have been actively engaged in ascertaining the most direct and practicable route, taking Julesburg, on the South Platte, at the mouth of Lodge Pole creek, about three hundred and seventy-five miles west of Omaha, as a starting point, and have furnished a statement of the comparative distances, quantities, and gradients of three lines—one via Cache la Poudre and Antelope pass, one via Camp Walbach and Crow creek, and the other via Lodge Pole creek, Camp Walbach, and Cheyenne pass. It is expected that the definite location of this part of the road will not be long deferred.

The company report that in April, 1865, their engineer commenced an extended reconnaissance of the country east of Great Salt Lake, with a view to find a practicable route over the Wasatch mountains to Green river via Spanish Fork and the Uinta. After ascending the Spanish Fork to its head-waters, he explored the whole district of country lying between the hundred and tenth and hundred and eleventh meridians of longitude, and between the parallels of forty degrees and forty degrees and thirty minutes of latitude. The result of these examinations satisfied him that such a route could not be found.

The survey of the line by the way of the valley of the Sweetwater, the South pass of the Rocky mountains, and the valley of Black's Fork of Green river was then commenced. It established the important fact that the summits of all the passes, of which surveys had been made in the great ranges of those mountains, have very nearly the same altitude above tide-water. Further examinations were made by the company's engineer in that region, the details of which have not been furnished to the Department.

One of the most important of this company's surveys extends from Great Salt Lake west to the Humboldt valley, between the hundred and fifteenth and the hundred and sixteenth meridian of longitude, traversing the Great American desert. Although incomplete, it has resulted in the discovery of a line, with grades not exceeding sixty feet per mile, from Great Salt Lake City to the valley of the Humboldt, across the Humboldt range of mountains, a distance of two hundred and eight miles. For about one hundred and fifty miles across the desert no fresh water was found by the engineer. He is satisfied, however, from his examinations, that it can be obtained in the passes over Cedar mountain, on the eastern side of the desert, and the first range west of the desert, leaving only sixty miles without fresh water. The soil is admirably adapted to a fine hard road-bed. The results of the survey are satisfactory to the company, and show that the difficulties to be overcome are much less formidable than were anticipated.

The company report that the amount actually expended on the road in money is $9,690,082 01. Of this amount $3,113,221 25 have been derived from the sale $3,280,000 of Government bonds, $3,901,857 01 from loans, and $2,508,725 from stock subscriptions. This amount does not embrace the indebtedness to the contractors for the first two hundred and forty-six miles of road, extending from Omaha to the one hundredth meridian. Their contract expired by the completion of this part of the line, and when the whole indebtedness of the company is adjusted the entire expenditure, including a million of stock which the contractors agreed to take, will not fall short of $12,500,000. The amount of the company's loan is $3,668,213 95. To meet this debt it has $5,480,000 of its first mortgage bonds unsold, and $560,000 of Government securities.

The amount of bonds actually executed is $3,560,000. The company is entitled to issue the following amounts: first, for two hundred and forty miles of road accepted by the Government, $3,840,000; second, for one hundred miles in advance, $1,600,000, making a total of $5,440,000.

None of these bonds have been offered for sale. They are made, by the act of Congress, a lien prior to that of the Government, and it was deemed advisable to wait, before negotiating them, until the work had made such progress as to give to the public the assurance that its successful completion was no longer a matter of doubt. They have, therefore, been used to a limited amount as a basis for temporary loans.

The rolling stock on the road consists of twenty-one locomotives, one hundred and fifty-six flat, forty-six box, thirty-five hand, and five passenger cars.

The Union Pacific Railway Company, eastern division, have constructed their road to Fort Riley, one hundred and thirty-five miles west of the Missouri river, of which one hundred and thirty have been accepted by the Government, thus giving a continuous line of railroad and telegraph four hundred and eighty miles west of St. Louis.

They have also constructed a branch road, thirty miles in length, from Lawrence to Leavenworth, which affords them another line of communication to the Missouri river.

The company report that the present equipment of the road is as follows: nine locomotives, ten first-class passenger, three baggage and express, one hundred and one box, ninety-four flat, and twenty-seven hand cars. They have also purchased eight locomotives, five passenger, fifty flat, twenty stock, and four hand cars, have supplied the road with the requisite stations, depots, and water-tanks, and commenced the construction of machine-shops and round-houses at Wyandotte and Lawrence. Iron, weighing fifty-six pounds to the linear yard, and sufficient to construct one hundred and sixty additional miles of road, with sidings, has been purchased and will be delivered monthly until next April. Contracts have been made to complete the road two hundred and fifty miles beyond Fort Riley by the 31st day of December, 1867.

The traffic of the road is already considerable, and gives promise of great increase in the future. The gross receipts of one hundred and five miles of main line and thirty miles of branch road, for the month of September, were $42,000.

The commissioners, under date of November 28, report that they have examined, and they recommend the acceptance of, an additional section of the road of the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California, making a distance of seventy-four miles from Sacramento. The company report, under date of the 18th ultimo, that they have constructed an additional section of twenty miles, reaching at the terminus an elevation of about sixty-one hundred feet above tide-water at Sacramento. A force of ten thousand men is now engaged in grading the next two sections; the ties are redwood, equal to cedar in durability, and number about twenty-five hundred to the mile; and the culverts are constructed of granite or other hard stone, except in the valley, where hard-burnt brick is substituted, as stone could not be procured. The bridges are made of the best quality of red fir. The drainage is ample, and the road well ballasted with gravel and broken rock. The grades are necessarily high. The maximum authorized by law has been reached for a distance of three and one half miles. There is no difficulty in operating these portions of the road. The passenger trains make twenty-five and the freight trains twelve miles per hour.

There are on the road, or in transitu, thirty locomotives and six hundred and seventy-one cars. The company have in Sacramento the machinery for a large machine and repair shop, including a powerful horizontal engine for furnishing the driving power. The shop is in process of erection, and the company expect soon to be able to build locomotives and cars equal to those furnished in the eastern States. The tunnels have been constructed sufficiently wide to accommodate double tracks. A full force is at present employed in constructing a tunnel sixteen hundred feet in length at the summit of the Sierra Nevada, and one of nine hundred feet in length seven miles east of that point.

Examinations and surveys indicate the valley of the Humboldt as the most advantageous route through the State of Nevada.

The company expect to reach, during next year, the Big Bend of the Truckee river, to which point the road has been permanently located, a distance of one hundred and ninety-five miles from Sacramento. They allege that their expenditure exceeds $12,000,000, and they entertain no doubt that the road will be completed to Salt Lake City during the year 1870.

The Atchison and Pike's Peak Railroad Company have completed forty miles of their road west from Atchison. The company report that they have on hand six locomotives, two passenger, one baggage and express, fourteen box, and thirty-two flat cars, three tanks, and two turn-tables, &c., with a machine shop and a blacksmith shop complete, the former being built of stone masonry and covered with an iron roof, and they are now engaged in the erection of a round-house. The road is generally built in a very substantial manner; nearly all the bridges and culverts are of the best quality of solid masonry. The longer span bridges are of the Howe truss pattern. The road-bed for the next thirty miles is nearly ready for the superstructure. The ties, iron, chairs, and spikes for the same, are on hand or in transitu. The company report an expenditure, in the construction and equipment of the road, of $2,307,650. They confidently expect that sixty miles of road will be completed by the 1st of January next.

The Western Pacific Railroad Company filed, on the 13th of last July, their acceptance of the provisions and conditions of the resolution of Congress extending the time for the construction of the first section of twenty miles of their road, approved May 21, 1866. On the 2d instant this Department received the report of the Government commissioners, showing the completion and equipment of that section. It extends from San José, in the direction of Sacramento, to a point in Alameda county, a distance of twenty miles.

The report of the president of the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company, under date of the 16th instant, sets forth that renewed surveys by their engineers, during the past season, justify and confirm the opinion that the most direct and practicable route from Sioux City to a point which they have selected upon the Union Pacific railroad from Omaha is on the east side of the Missouri river, to a crossing near De Soto, thence via Fish creek to the Platte valley, and thence to the point of connection with the latter road at Fremont, forty-six and one half miles west from Omaha. It is also stated that the grading of the northern sixty-eight miles has been placed under contract, and a force already engaged on the work. The company has arranged to construct about six miles of road, which will connect its line very advantageously with the Cedar Rapids railroad, at a point where it is expected that the latter road will reach the Missouri river valley in a few days.

There is nothing on file in the Department to show that the company authorized to construct the Atlantic and Pacific railroad by the act of Congress approved July 27, 1866, have accepted the provisions of the act.

The work on the wagon road from Niobrara to Virginia City has been continued, though with serious annoyance from hostile Indians. The route has been shortened nearly one hundred miles.

Operations on portions of the projected road from Sioux City to the mouth of the Big Cheyenne river have been prosecuted with great activity and success. That part between the initial point and Yankton, with the exception of the bridges, is finished and in perfect order. The bridge over the Big Sioux river is being built. If the construction of it does not absorb the appropriation now on hand, the remainder will be applied to the completion of the bridges over the Vermillion river and the James. Apprehended Indian difficulties have prevented the extension of the road from the mouth of the Big Cheyenne.

The superintendent of the road from Virginia City, Montana, to Lewiston, reports that a considerable force is employed. The funds at his command will not, in his opinion, more than suffice to locate and clear out a trail ten or twelve feet wide from Lewiston to the valley of the Bitter Root. From thence roads are already open to Virginia City. He prefers the route by the Loo-Loo Fork, though it, in common with the others, is subject to obstruction from snow during one half of the year.

The northern and western porticos of the north wing of the Capitol are completed, and the columns of the southern portico are soon to be set. It is believed that the ensuing year will witness the completion of all the porticos. Efforts have been made, which it is hoped will prove successful, to improve the imperfect and objectionable ventilation of the Senate Chamber and Hall of the House of Representatives. In order to obtain a supply of air that shall at the same time be pure and in the summer cool, it is proposed to construct from each Hall an underground duct, opening in the center of a fountain in the eastern grounds. The jets and overflow would at once assist in cooling the air and serve to relieve it of all mechanical impurities.

The pipes to the Government spring now supply the Capitol with abundance of pure water.

The balance on hand of the appropriation for the Capitol extension, October 31, 1866, was $80,410 83. The architect estimates that $250,000 will be required to continue the work during the next fiscal year.

The apparatus for lighting, by means of galvanic electricity, the one thousand and eighty-three gas-burners of the dome, has proved a complete success. They can now be lighted in a few minutes. An interesting paper on this subject has been prepared, at the request of the Commissioner of Public Buildings, by three electricians of reputation, and is annexed to his annual report. The sum of $48,481 79 was expended on the dome during the year ending October 31, 1866, at which date there was on hand a balance of $1,539 59. An appropriation of $15,000 will be required to complete this work. The belt between the second and third cornices of the rotunda should be ornamented by a series of national pictures, or in some other appropriate manner; and designs for the purpose will be invited from eminent artists, if Congress confer the requisite authority.

The extension of the Library is nearly completed. The work has been done in the most substantial and elegant style, and the rooms are now an appropriate setting for the rich literary treasures within them. It is proposed to heat them with steam from the boilers in the basement, by means of Gould's apparatus. The Commissioner of Public Buildings urges, on sanitary grounds, the necessity of warming the passages of the center building, and of improving the manner of heating and ventilating the Supreme Court rooms. The expenditures on the Library extension from October 31, 1865, were $137,926 61, leaving a balance of $31,129 50.

The architect repeats the recommendation made in his preceding report in favor of the extension of the central portico, in conformity with the plan proposed by his predecessor, Thomas U. Walter, Esq. Should this recommendation be sanctioned by Congress, it would be advisable to commence the work at an early day, while operations on the other portions of the edifice are in progress, and before the eastern grounds are improved. In view of the anticipated early completion of the Capitol, should the central portico not be extended, it is recommended that Congress authorize inclosing the public grounds north and south of the building, and squares numbered six hundred and eighty-seven and six hundred and eighty-eight, should the bill which passed the Senate at the last session providing for the purchase of them become a law, and improving the Capitol grounds in a style befitting the magnificent edifice which crowns their summit.

About three fourths of the material necessary to complete the northern portico of this Department is on the ground, and it is expected that the work will be completed next season. An appropriation of $25,000 for this object will be required.

The appropriations for repairing and furnishing the Executive Mansion have been expended in a judicious and satisfactory manner, and the grounds between it and the Treasury Department have been improved and embellished.

The expenditure of the small appropriation for Pennsylvania avenue has scarcely improved its general aspect. The propriety of providing the means for paving it in the most durable manner is worthy of favorable consideration.

The appropriation of $10,000 for the repair of Long bridge has been expended, but the sum was wholly inadequate for the purpose. It is estimated that $20,000 more will be required to put it in proper order. A like sum is needed to properly repair the bridge at Little Falls, known as the Chain bridge. The navy-yard bridge is in good condition, and the new draw in it will be soon completed. The improvement of Franklin square has commenced, and in time grass, shrubbery, trees, and walks will render it an ornament to the part of the city in which it is situated. Appropriations will be necessary for the improvement of Lincoln square, the completing of the culvert through the Botanic Garden, and the construction of an iron fence around it. The opening, grading, and paving of certain streets and avenues mentioned in the Commissioner's report and leading to the Capitol, while eminently desirable on many accounts, will be wholly beyond the power of the corporation of the city. The propriety of undertaking these improvements on the part of the national Government is submitted for consideration.

By the act of May 5, 1864, the Commissioner of Public Buildings is directed to pay to the proper authorities a just proportion of the expense of improving avenues, streets, and alleys passing through or by property belonging to the United States. A large amount is due from the Government for such improvements. The means to meet it should be at once provided. The Commissioner recommends a further appropriation of $100,000, to enable him to meet similar liabilities in future.

The number of patients which Congress, at its last session, ordered to be constantly kept at Providence Hospital at the expense of the United States was fifty per cent. greater than that of the preceding year, while the sum appropriated for their maintenance remains the same.

The relations of the General Government to this District, and the duties resulting therefrom, have been fully and elaborately discussed in the recent annual reports of this Department. I cordially commend to favorable consideration the carefully considered views there advanced.

Congress made provision at its last session for the completion of the cut-stone dam from the Maryland shore to Conn Island, and for other portions of the Washington aqueduct. The work on the dam was resumed in August last, and has been vigorously prosecuted. The foundation masonry will be completed at an early day. The temporary dam at that point was washed away by the spring freshet. It has been rebuilt and will probably require no further expenditure. The connecting conduit is rapidly approaching completion. The work on the gate-house at Great Falls has been unavoidably deferred. The appropriation was made at so late a period of the session that it could not be advantageously used during the present season. An urgent necessity exists for deepening the distributing reservoir, and protecting, by a rubble wall, its interior or water slopes. I respectfully recommend that an appropriation be made for this and such other additions to the work as will permanently, and to the greatest available extent, secure to the national capital all the benefits which the liberality of Congress proposed to confer by this improvement.

The following statement shows the sums advanced to United States marshals during the year ending June 30, 1866, for defraying expenses of the United States courts, including fees of marshals, jurors, and witnesses, main-

The amount paid for miscellaneous expenses and for rent of buildings for the use of the courts is $143,344 22.

The foregoing does not embrace the salaries of the judges or other officers of the courts; they are paid out of a special appropriation which is not under the control of this Department.

I cannot too strongly urge upon Congress the necessity which exists for the erection of suitable buildings for the Federal courts. The Department is now compelled, in many instances, to lease property which is ill adapted to the purpose, and where adequate security is not provided for the records and files. Few houses belonging to private parties have been constructed with reference to judicial uses. An exorbitant rent is often demanded, and the Government, in more than one instance, has been constrained to submit to unreasonable exactions. Every consideration of economy and propriety requires that the United States should be the proprietor of the buildings where its courts are holden, and that the most ample accommodations should be furnished the judges and officers for the performance of their highly responsible duties.

The report of the warden shows that on the 1st of November there were confined in the District jail one hundred and thirty prisoners, of whom forty-nine were white and eighty-one were colored. The average number during the year was one hundred and fifty; six entered the Insane Asylum, and three died. Eight white boys were sentenced by the courts of the District to the Baltimore House of Refuge. It was impracticable to make such an arrangement for the detention of young colored convicts. They have been, therefore, dismissed by order of the court, after a short incarceration. The officers are a warden and nine guards; and although the building is not in all respects secure, no prisoner has escaped during the past fourteen months. There prevailed last spring in the prison a mild form of typhus fever, which the attending physician ascribes to local causes, since removed. Efforts have been made to promote habits of industry among the inmates, and to impart to them the benefits of religious instruction. During the year ending November 1 there were two thousand and sixty-five commitments for various offenses. The total expense of the jail, including the cost of transportation of convicts sentenced to the penitentiary at Albany, was $32,626 97.

Pursuant to the authority conferred by an act of Congress, approved July 27, 1866, my predecessor designated a site for a new jail in the District. I have selected a plan and employed a competent architect to prepare a design and descriptive plans of the building, with complete specifications of the work required and the materials to be used. Notice of a public letting of the contract for the erection of the building will be given in the manner prescribed by Congress.

The board of trustees appointed and commissioned conformably to the recent act to establish in this District a House of Correction for boys have been duly organized; but the limited means at their disposal, and circumstances beyond their control, have rendered it impracticable to prepare the requisite permanent buildings for the reception of inmates. Boys under the age of sixteen convicted of crime punishable by imprisonment may be sentenced by the courts of this District to the institution. The directors suggest that its benefits should not be confined to one sex, and that children of confirmed vicious habits, who are beyond domestic control, although not convicted of crime, should, on the application and at the expense of their parents or guardians, be received and subjected to a kindly but rigid discipline. The act directs that the convict shall be confined during the "term of his sentence," and thus prohibits the directors from detaining him after, or discharging him before, the expiration of the specific period fixed by the court. They should, like the officers of similar institutions organized under State authority, be authorized to exercise a discretionary power in this respect, and to bind the discharged convict by indentures of apprenticeship. Their report is submitted, and I trust that their views and suggestions will receive the most favorable consideration.

Adequate measures have not been adopted in regard to juvenile offenders against the laws of the United States, convicted by the Federal courts in the several judicial districts. Difficulties have arisen in executing the act of March 3, 1865, and in many parts of the country it remains a dead letter. I respectfully refer to that portion of the last annual report of this Department which relates to the subject, and express my entire concurrence in the views there presented.

The board of police report that the District is divided into eight precincts. The levy court of the county of Washington have declined to provide station-houses within their jurisdiction. They allege a want of authority, and I recommend such legislation as will place them on the same footing in this respect as the corporations of Washington and Georgetown.

The total number of arrests by the police force during the past year was 24,542, of whom 19,757 were males, and 4,785 were females; 15,817 were charged with offenses against the person, and 8,725 against property. One third arrested are colored; 9,158 were married, and 15,334 were unmarried; 14,530 could read and write, 10,012 could not; 1,702 were committed to jail, 614 gave bail for their appearance at court, 207 were turned over to the military, 7,731 were dismissed, 2,038 were sent to the workhouse, 644 gave bond to keep the peace.

In 10,791 cases fines were imposed, amounting in the aggregate to $50,355 06. Of sick, disabled, or destitute persons, 3,846 were furnished with temporary lodgings; 118 were assisted or taken to the hospital. One hundred and thirty-six lost children were restored to their parents.

The sanitary company of the police have essentially contributed to the preservation of the health of the city. By their agency, many nuisances have been abated and increased cleanliness of the streets and avenues enforced; but the available means for the accomplishment of objects of such vital importance are lamentably deficient. I cordially unite with the board in recommending that a more rigid and comprehensive code of sanitary laws be enacted for this District.

The detective force have made six hundred and ten arrests during the past year, recovered stolen or lost property to the amount of $38,662 45, and performed a large amount of other labor of which no record can be made.

The board represent that the system for the trial of minor offenses is open to flagrant abuses, and recommend a reorganization of the petty courts in the District. They are of opinion that a properly organized police court could promptly and efficiently dispose of all criminal cases of an inferior grade. It is believed that the establishment of such a court will promote economy, tend to the suppression of crime, and secure to the accused a speedier trial than is now obtained.

Eleven thousand seven hundred and forty-nine messages were dispatched during the year over the fire-alarm and police telegraph.

The sixth section of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes," approved July 28, 1866, increased the pay of the Metropolitan force thirty dollars per month. It was claimed that the commissioners, secretary, clerks, police magistrates, detectives, police surgeons, and others, were entitled to the benefits of the act. My predecessor was of opinion that the term "Metropolitan force," which occurs in that section, must be construed to embrace such persons only as were declared to constitute it by the act of August 6, 1861. The right of the other claimants to the increased compensation was therefore not recognized. I concur in this interpretation, but if it does not, in the opinion of Congress, give full effect to their intentions, a declaratory act will remove the difficulty. Congress, at the last session, authorized the appointment of one captain, twenty sergeants, and fifty patrolmen, but made no provision for their compensation. The entire force, including officers and detectives, consists of two hundred and thirty-eight men. Although active and vigilant, it is not sufficient to meet the exigencies of the service. I respectfully invite the attention of Congress to this subject. The salaries of all persons connected with the office of police commissioners, or subject in any way to their order or control, should be fixed by act of Congress.

The eleventh annual report of the Board of Visitors of the Government Hospital for the Insane shows that, during the year ending June 30, 1866, there were admitted, from the Army, 136 patients; from the Navy, 9; from civil life, 70; from the quartermaster's department, 3; from the Soldiers' Home, 1; rebel prisoners, 3; total, 222, of whom 30 were colored. The whole number under treatment during the same period was 483, of whom 362 were males; 265 were from the Army and Navy. During the same period 112 were discharged as recovered, 26 as improved, and 10 as unimproved; 54 died; leaving under treatment, at the close of the fiscal year, 281, of whom 185 were males. Valuable tables accompany the report, showing the physical and mental condition of those who died, and of those who were received into the institution during the year; the time of life at which each of the 2,209 patients treated since the opening of the institution became insane; their nativity; the form of disease under which they labored when admitted; the number who paid the expenses of their maintenance and treatment, and the number entitled to gratuitous admission. A singular and interesting fact is established. The instances of the recovery of patients who have been received from the Army or Navy are by three hundred per cent. more numerous than in the cases of persons who have been admitted from the avocations of civil life. This very marked difference in results is attributed to the fact that the former are sent to the hospital immediately on the appearance of symptoms of insanity, and their treatment is not interrupted or thwarted by injudicious friends. The importance of these two conditions—early entrance and uninterrupted treatment—is fully and ably discussed in the report.

During the year the receipts were $111,180 84, and the expenditures $107,079 10, leaving a balance in the hands of the superintendent of $4,081 74. Estimates are submitted for the next fiscal year by the Board of Visitors and the superintendent of construction.

My predecessors have alluded in terms of commendation to the management of this institution under the auspices of the eminent professional gentleman who is at its head. It continues with signal success to subserve the great objects for which it was created. It is a noble charity, founded and owned by the Government, and worthy in all respects of its fostering care.

There have been on the rolls of the Columbia Institution for the instruction of the Deaf and Dumb, since July 1, 1865, one hundred and six pupils, of whom seventy-three were males, and thirty-three were females. Ninety-six are now in attendance, of whom twenty are from the District of Columbia, and two are children of persons in the military service of the United States.

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866, the receipts for the support of the institution were $26,835 44, and the disbursements, $26,988 58, leaving a balance due to the president of $153 14.

For the erection of buildings the receipts from appropriations and a small balance on hand were $39,490 53, and the disbursements were $37,056 68, leaving a balance on hand July 1, 1866, of $2,433 85.

For the improvement of the grounds there was at the same date an unexpended balance of $2,222 46 remaining from the appropriation of $3,500 made for this purpose at the last session of Congress.

The report of the Board of Directors contains an interesting and instructive comparison of the instruction of semi-mutes which prevails in this country with that adopted in Germany. It is proposed to confer upon the pupils the advantages and benefits of each method.

The institution embraces a primary school and the collegiate department. In the former, instruction is confined to the elementary branches. In the latter, there is a class for such pupils as evince a desire and an adequate capacity for a more extended and liberal education. On completing the preparatory studies there pursued, and passing a satisfactory examination, they may enter the college proper, where the course comprises the ancient languages, French, German, mathematics, history, metaphysics, the natural sciences, and the science of government. Such large educational facilities, especially in the more advanced studies, are not afforded in any of the twenty-two excellent asylums for the deaf and dumb now in active operation in the United States. The collegiate and academic departments have been efficiently and successfully conducted by the accomplished president and professors of the institution. It is gratifying to record that many of their pupils manifest an ardent love of knowledge and a high capacity for acquiring it.

This is not a Government institution. The United States have no control over it, nor are they vested with the title to the property purchased with their munificent benefactions. It had its origin in the generous purpose of public-spirited individuals to secure a home and the means of intellectual and moral training for the indigent children of this District who were blind, or deaf and dumb. At the time this movement was inaugurated, neither Congress nor the local authorities had made special provision for this afflicted class, although asylums had been opened in many of the States for their own citizens, whose infirmities and necessitous circumstances gave a just claim upon public bounty. An association was formed, and, by the act of February 16, 1857, was created a body politic and corporate under the name of the "Columbia Institution for the Instruction of the Deaf, Dumb, and Blind." The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to procure admission to the institution for all of this class of teachable age and indigent circumstances who belong to this District, or are the children of persons in our military or naval service, and to pay $150 per annum for the maintenance and tuition of each pupil admitted by his order.

Congress, by an act approved May 20, 1858, allowed for five years to the institution, $3,000 per annum for salaries and incidental expenses. At the expiration of this period $4,000 was allowed for this purpose, and successive annual appropriations were made, respectively, of $4,400, $7,500, and $12,500.

In the mean time the institution desired to be relieved of the care of the blind. The requisite amendment to the charter was obtained. The Government beneficiaries of this class are now educated at an institution in an adjoining State.

The directors, in their annual report for 1865, proposed, in lieu of the annual allowance for each Government pupil, an appropriation in gross for the support of the institution. Their estimate was $20,700, which sum was allowed by Congress for the current year.

Congress has appropriated $136,065 87 for the purchase of grounds, the erection of buildings, and other improvements. Deducting from the existing appropriation the sum of $3,300, to which the institution would have had undoubted claim on account of the twenty-two Government pupils, and it appears that Congress, in addition to the payment of the stipulated per capita charges, has advanced to this institution the sum of $196,865 87.

The directors submit the following estimate for the next year: $25,000 for the support of the institution, and $62,175 for buildings and improvements, making an aggregate of $87,175, being $15,235 in excess of the last appropriations for the same objects.

The expediency of granting so large a sum is submitted for consideration. If it is the intention of Congress to pay the salaries of the officers and teachers, and to provide merely for those who are entitled under existing laws to the privileges of the institution at the charge of the Government, the sum of $25,000 is fully adequate to the purpose. But it has been suggested that the advanced department should be maintained on such a footing that the deaf mutes of the several States, on completing their preliminary studies, may enjoy, free of charge, the privileges of a course of instruction equal to that pursued in the best American colleges. Such persons, if in indigent circumstances, have been heretofore maintained and educated at the State establishments at the expense of the States to which they belong. The directors conceive that an institution which offers advantages "which cannot be afforded in the local institutions should be as free to the citizens of the States as to those of the Federal District and to children of the Army and Navy."

There is, in my judgment, an obvious distinction between the exercise by Congress of its conceded power to legislate for the local wants of this District and for the Army and Navy, and its assumption of a power which has wisely and to the fullest extent been conferred upon the States. No necessity whatever exists for the erection of additional buildings to meet present wants. But should Congress provide for the gratuitous collegiate instruction of the deaf mutes of the United States, I concur with the directors in the opinion that accommodations for a hundred students in the college will probably not be "in excess of the demand that will be likely to arise within a few years."

The whole subject is respectfully presented for consideration, in connection with the estimates furnished by the board. In my opinion no further sums should be advanced until the charter of the institution be so modified as to secure to the Government an efficient control in its management, and a proper accountability in the application and disbursement of the funds appropriated.

I desire to bear testimony to the energetic and faithful manner in which the officers of this Department have, since my connection with it, discharged their duties; and I cannot suffer this opportunity to pass without asserting their just claims to more ample compensation.

The chiefs of bureaus are charged with weighty responsibilities, and required to determine difficult and complicated questions. I am unable to perceive any difference in the relative importance and value of their respective services. Their pay was formerly the same. No one familiar with the subject will pretend that the duties of the Commissioner of Patents are the most difficult and exacting; and yet, by a singular inadvertence, his salary was alone increased. It is now fifty per cent. more than that of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, or the Commissioner of Pensions, and even exceeds that of the Assistant Secretary, who, in the absence of the Secretary, is exclusively charged with the entire supervision of the Department. I am not of opinion that it is too large. Indeed it is less than that of many bureau officers at the seat of Government. But I respectfully submit that no such discrimination should be made between officers of the same grade in this Department, and that the Assistant Secretary, in view of his official position and arduous duties, should receive a salary less only than that of the head of the Department.

The clerks are not adequately paid. Many of them are charged with duties bringing into constant requisition acquirements which are the fruit of long experience and special study. The present salaries were fixed many years ago, and since then the cost of subsistence has increased one hundred per cent. The remuneration of the laborer, the mechanic, and the professional man has, in the intervening time, increased in a corresponding ratio, while that of these valuable public servants remains the same. Those of ripest experience and greatest merit frequently resign, as stronger inducements are offered to them in other pursuits than in the service of the Government. The applicants for clerkships are numerous enough, but do not possess the needed capacity for the higher branches of duty. No one, with the most limited experience in an Executive Department, can, I believe, avoid the conclusion that its efficiency would be largely promoted by a radical change in the organization of its clerical force, and that the increased outlay necessary to secure the services of experienced and skillful clerks would prove in the end to be true economy.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

O. H. BROWNING,

Secretary of the Interior.

THE PRESIDENT.

39TH CONG....2D SESS.

Report of the Postmaster General.

SENATE &amp; HO. OF REPS.

Report of the Postmaster General.POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
November 26, 1866.

SIR: The revenues of this Department for the year ending June 30, 1866, were $14,386,986 21, and the expenditures $15,352,079 30, showing an excess of the latter of $965,093 09. Anticipating this deficiency, a special appropriation was made by act of Congress approved July 28, 1866.

The decrease of revenue compared with the previous year was one and one fifth per cent., and the increase of expenditures twelve per cent. Including the standing appropriation for free mail matter, $700,000, as a legitimate portion of the revenues yet remaining unexpended, the actual deficiency for the past year is only $265,093 09; within $51,141 of amount estimated in the annual report of 1864.

That portion of the revenues accumulated in depository and draft offices, under the supervision of the "finance office" of this Department, was $6,751,655 39; collected by the Auditor, $2,641,074 38; and retained by postmasters for salaries and office expenses, $4,994,256 44.

The estimated expenditures for the year ending June 30, 1866, are.....	$17,583,000
The revenues, estimated at 5 per cent. over last year.....	$15,106,335
Appropriation for free matter, .....	700,000
	15,806,335

Excess of expenditures.....	$1,776,665
-----------------------------	--------------------

For this deficiency no special appropriation will be required. The standing appropriations for free matter, unexpended for several years, are deemed sufficient. The following amounts will, however, be required from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated:

For overland mail transportation between Atchison and Folsom, and for marine mail transportation between New York and California.....	$900,000
For steamship service between San Francisco, Japan, and China, for one year from July 1, 1867.....	500,000
For steamship service between the United States and Brazil, for the same period....	150,000
	$1,550,000

For detailed information as to the finances of the Department reference is made to the full and satisfactory report of the Auditor, hereto appended.

The number of postage stamps issued during the year was 347,734,325, representing $10,816,661; stamped envelopes 30,386,200, representing $921,500 50; stamped envelopes bearing printed cards and requests 7,683,525, representing $230,006 75; stamped wrappers 1,025,000, representing $20,500; making in all $11,988,668 25; a decrease of $858,769 25, as compared with the previous year.

The aggregate of stamped envelopes and stamped wrappers issued during the year ended June 30, 1866, was 39,094,725, representing $1,172,007 25; an increase of 12,888,550, representing $424,557 25, or nearly fifty per cent.; being largely in excess of issues during any previous year since the introduction of stamped envelopes.

The sale of stamps, envelopes, &c., during the past year amounted to $12,204,729 54, or $216,061 29 more than the issues; showing the absorption to that extent of the stock remaining unsold in the hands of postmasters, which amounted on the 1st of July, 1865, to $447,710.

The issues of postage stamps and stamped envelopes during the current fiscal year, from 1st of July to 1st of November, are $360,765 in excess of the issues for the corresponding period of last year, being at the rate of more than $1,000,000 per annum.

The increased demand since 1st July for envelopes with printed cards and requests for returning direct to the sender, if not promptly delivered to the address, is very notable, being about sixty-six and two thirds per cent. The general use of such envelopes will tend largely to reduce the number of dead letters.

During the year sixty-six cases of claims, on account of robberies by armed forces, involving an amount of $4,226 06, have been acted upon. Fifty-seven of these claims, amounting to $3,852 04, have been allowed under the provisions of the acts approved April 29, 1864, and March 3, 1865, and nine, amounting to $374 02, have been rejected as not coming within the provisions of the law.

CONTRACTS.

There were in the service of the Department on the 30th of June, 1866, 6,069 contractors for the transportation of the mails.

Of mail routes in operation there were 6,930; aggregate length, 180,921 miles; aggregate annual transportation, 71,837,914 miles; aggregate annual cost, $7,630,474; including the compensation of route agents, local agents, mail messengers, postal railway clerks, and baggage masters in charge of mails, namely, $779,710, the aggregate annual cost was $8,410,184. This service was divided as follows:

Railroad routes: length, 32,092 miles; annual transportation, 30,609,467 miles; annual cost, $3,391,592; about eleven cents per mile.

Steamboat routes: length, 14,346 miles; annual transportation, 3,411,962 miles; annual cost, $440,844; about thirteen cents per mile.

Celerity, &c.: routes' length, 134,483 miles; annual transportation, 37,816,485 miles; annual cost, $3,798,038; about ten cents per mile.

The length of routes was increased over the preceding year 38,581 miles; the annual transportation, 13,724,420 miles; and the cost, $1,393,590, the increase arising principally from the restoration of service in the southern States.

A table herewith annexed shows the rate of pay per annum for mail transportation in operation in late insurgent States on the 30th June, 1866, $1,170,529, compared with the amount due for service actually rendered in those States in the year ending with that date, $769,218; the difference, $40,311, resulting from the fact that much of the service was in operation only part of the year. The net postal receipts from those States for the same period being $693,835, the liabilities (without including the compensation of route agents, local agents, and mail messengers) exceed the receipts by $75,383.

A table is annexed showing the mail service in operation in these States September 30, 1866, compared with the condition of the service in the same States, November 1, 1865, the date to which the statements on this subject were made up in the last annual report. From this table it will be seen that there are in operation in the States enumerated ninety railroad routes, with an aggregate length of 8,170½ miles, at a cost of $587,581 per annum; twenty-six steamboat routes, with an aggregate length of 5,557 miles, at a cost of $195,665 per annum; and 1,137 "star service" routes, (celerity, &c.,) with an aggregate length of 46,442½ miles, at a cost of $1,062,477 54 per annum; making the whole service now in operation in these States, of all grades, 1,253 routes, with an aggregate length of 60,170½ miles, at a cost of $1,845,623 54 per annum. Compared with the service in operation on the 1st November, 1865, namely, seventy-one railroad routes, with an aggregate length of 6,242½ miles, at a cost of $437,257 per annum; twelve steamboat routes, with an aggregate length of 3,869½ miles, at a cost of $93,260 per annum; and one hundred and fifty-four "star service" routes, with an aggregate length of 8,186½ miles, at a cost of $177,743 per annum, there appears an increase of nineteen routes, 1,928½ miles, and $150,324 annual cost of railroad service; fourteen routes, 2,971½ miles, and $102,305 annual cost of steamboat service; and nine hundred and eighty-three routes, 38,250½ miles, and $884,734 54 annual cost of "star service;" making a total increase of 1,016 routes, 41,872½ miles, and $1,137,363 54 annual cost.

Another table is annexed showing the number, termini, and length of southern railroad routes not in operation September 30, 1866; the number being only fourteen, and the aggregate length 696½ miles. Comparing this with ninety routes in operation, having an aggregate length of 8,170½ miles, shows a remarkable progress in the resuscitation of the railroad system of the South. There being two thousand two hundred and fifty routes in all the States enumerated, these statements show more than half the whole number to be in operation, comprising nearly nine tenths of the railroad routes. All the routes in these States were duly advertised to be let to contract; a part from 1st January, 1866, and the residue from 1st July, 1866; but on a large number of them no proposals were received under the advertisement, and on many others the bids were extravagantly high. In the latter case, offers of the highest admissible rates were submitted by the Department to the lowest bidders, and in some instances negotiations were opened through special agents, postmasters, and leading citizens. By all these means combined the amount of service here stated has been obtained.

The existing contracts in all the States named, except Tennessee, will expire on the 30th June, 1867. New advertisements, inviting proposals for four years' service from 1st July, 1867, are now being issued, under which it is hoped all routes of real utility in the whole section will be let.

By a recent order of the Department, the overland mail route to California, of which Atchison, Kansas, had been the initial point, has been changed so as to have two points of departure—one from Junction City, Kansas, on the Union Pacific railroad route, (eastern division,) running from Wyandotte, Kansas; and the other from Fort Kearney, Nebraska, on the Union Pacific railroad route, running from Omaha City, Nebraska. The lines from these two points meet at Denver City, in Colorado Territory.

The Junction City road connects at Wyandotte with the Pacific railway from St. Louis, Missouri, making a continuous railway connection with the eastern cities. By this route the stage travel is diminished one hundred and sixty-eight miles, and the time occupied in the transit should be proportionately reduced. The mails to and from California, which before were sent via Chicago and St. Joseph, were consequently ordered, on the 15th of August last, to be sent via St. Louis, Wyandotte, and Junction City. The reports so far received of the actual running of the mails since the change took effect do not show the average diminution of time in the performance of the through trip which the Department was led to expect, though the capacity of the route for superior expedition is proved by the fact, that in one or two instances the mails have been received at New York in nineteen days from San Francisco, a day less than the shortest time ever made previous to the change. Subsequently, however, the extension of the Chicago and Northwestern railway to Omaha City, which is necessary to form a continuous line by rail to Fort Kearney, has become so nearly completed, that on the 13th of November instant, orders were issued to forward via Chicago, Omaha City, and Fort Kearney, all mails destined for the overland route from the distributing offices at Portland, Boston, Hartford, Albany, New York, Philadelphia, Pittsburg, Buffalo, Cleveland, and Detroit—the expectation being that mails from that portion of the country represented by these distributing offices will find their quickest transit by the northern route.

The preparation of post-route maps for publication has been continued by the topographer, and is well advanced. Two sheets, exhibiting the post offices and mail service of the New England States, are in the hands of the engraver, and will be ready for distribution and sale early this winter.

The amount of fines imposed and deductions made from the pay of contractors for failures and other delinquencies during the year was $62,956 48, and the amount remitted for the same period was $6,654 39, leaving the net amount of fines and deductions $56,302 09.

A table is annexed showing the number, description, and cost of mail bags, locks, and keys purchased during the year; the amount expended for mail bags of all kinds being $63,627 50. This, compared with the expenditure of the preceding year, ($91,715 86,) shows a curtailment of $38,088 36.

FOREIGN MAIL SERVICE.

The aggregate amount of postage, sea, inland, and foreign, upon the correspondence exchanged with foreign countries, was $2,289,219 30, being an increase of $469,290 70, as compared with the previous year. Of this amount $1,840,800 92 accrued upon the mails exchanged with Great Britain, France, Prussia, Bremen, Hamburg, and Belgium; $328,341 33 on mails exchanged with the British North American Provinces, and $120,077 75 on the correspondence transmitted to and from the West Indies, Mexico, Central and South America.

The transatlantic mail steamship lines employed in the service of foreign Governments conveyed mails, the postages on which amounted to $975,109 23; and those employed in the service of this Department conveyed mails, the postages on which amounted to $865,691 69.

The United States portion of the postages upon the correspondence exchanged with Great Britain and the continent of Europe amounted to $775,647 59; with the British North American Provinces, $188,888 53; with the West Indies, Mexico, Central and South America, $120,077 05.

The number of letters exchanged in the mails with foreign countries was 9,480,546; of which 4,886,916 were sent from and 4,543,630 received in the United States. Of this number 8,564,847 were exchanged with European countries, an increase of 1,851,330 over the number exchanged in 1865.

The number of newspapers sent to foreign countries was 2,804,442, and the number received from foreign countries 1,381,724, making a total of 4,186,166. Of this number 3,828,135 were exchanged with Europe, being an increase of 29,157 on the number in 1865.

The increased correspondence with foreign countries, particularly with the continent of Europe, during the year, is unprecedented, amounting to more than twenty-five per cent. as compared with the previous year.

The cost of transatlantic mail service performed by steamships employed by this Department, under the provisions of the existing law, which allows the sea and inland postage to American and the sea postage only to foreign steamers, was $525,307 46.

The cost of ocean transportation of mails to and from the West Indies, by steamers receiving different rates of compensation within the limit of the postages, was $57,871 69, being $20,742 32 less than the amount of United States postages upon the mails conveyed.

The amount paid for sea and isthmus transportation of the mails exchanged with Central and South America, via Panama, was $17,377 45.

The excess of postage collected in the United States upon the correspondence exchanged with Great Britain and the continent of Europe was $500,627 76; causing balances against the United States on settlement of the international postage accounts, amounting in the aggregate to $278,714 19.

A liberal postal convention has been concluded with the kingdom of Italy, which adopts the leading reforms in international postal intercourse recommended by the postal conference held at Paris in May, 1863. It was negotiated and signed at Turin on the 8th of July, 1863, and the ratifications thereof were formally exchanged at Florence on the 14th of June, 1866. This convention, a copy of which is annexed, will be carried into execution as soon as notice is received from the Post Department of Italy of the route or routes of transit by which the exchange of correspondence in closed bags can be effected.

Notice was given by the British Government, under date of July 25, 1866, of its purpose to terminate the existing postal convention between this country and the United Kingdom on the 1st of January, 1868, simultaneously with the expiration of the mail-subsidy contract with the Cunard line; accompanied with an assurance of the desire of that Government to conclude a new convention on a more liberal basis, reducing the present rates of international postage and granting enlarged mail facilities. The necessary steps were at once taken to accomplish that object, and I have the satisfaction of announcing that a preliminary basis for a new postal convention has been agreed upon by the two Post Departments, reducing the international charge on a single letter from twenty-four to twelve cents; admitting into the mails printed matter of every kind, and patterns of merchandise, at such rates as the dispatching country shall establish; and granting to each country, reciprocally, the right to transmit correspondence in closed bags, or in the ordinary mails, through the other, at the same rates of charge paid by the inhabitants of the country through which the correspondence is forwarded.

The principal advantages of the new arrangement may be briefly stated as follows:

1. A reduction of the international letter postage to one half of the existing charge.
2. The removal of all restrictions upon the exchange of printed matter in the mails at reduced postage charges.
3. The compulsory prepayment of postage upon letters and other mail matter, avoiding entirely the keeping of complicated postage accounts upon international correspondence.
4. A reduction of postage with all other countries to and from which correspondence is transmitted in the British mail, or in closed bags through the United Kingdom.
5. The establishment of uniform and reasonable charges for the sea and territorial transit of correspondence in closed mails; and granting to each Post Department the right to make use of all mail communications established under the authority of the other, for the dispatch of correspondence, either in open or closed mails, on the same terms as those applicable to the inhabitants of the country providing the means of transmission.
6. The postage of all international letters to belong wholly to the dispatching country, and no charge whatever to be made by the receiving country on delivery.
7. Each Post Department to make its own arrangements for the dispatch of mails to the other, by well-appointed ships, sailing on stated days, and to pay the owners of such ships for the conveyance of the mails which it dispatches.

No time has yet been agreed upon for carrying the new convention into operation, but it is confidently expected that the British Office will consent to name as early a date as practicable, that the public may receive, without unnecessary delay, the benefit of the reduced rates of postage, as well as of more frequent means of mail communication between the two countries.

The postal convention with Venezuela referred to in the last report was executed on the part of Venezuela on the 26th of June, and went into operation on the 1st of October last.

Negotiations have been commenced with the Post Department of Brazil, for a postal convention to regulate the exchange of correspondence with that empire, by means of the direct line of subsidized mail packets plying between New York and Rio de Janeiro, via St. Thomas, Para, Pernambuco, and Bahia. The draft of articles submitted by this Department as the basis of the convention proposes the establishment of low rates of postage both upon letters and printed matter, the avoidance as far as practicable of postage accounts between the respective Post Departments, and adopts the leading improvements recommended by the Paris international postal conference. A copy of the contract for the mail service to Brazil, which was executed by the United States and Brazil Mail Steamship Company on the 29th of August, 1865, is annexed hereto.

The Pacific Mail Steamship Company, of New York, to which was awarded the contract for the China mail service, authorized by the act of February 17, 1865, has executed a contract for that service, a copy of which is annexed. The high reputation of this company, their experience and undoubted resources, and the zeal and energy which they have manifested in making preparations for the service, afford a guarantee of the success of this great national enterprise to extend and develop American commerce, by obtaining control of the vast and constantly increasing trade of Japan, which the advantages of our geographical position should enable us to possess.

The contract is for monthly trips between San Francisco and Hong Kong, touching at the ports of Honolulu in the Sandwich Islands, and Yokohama (Kanagawa) in Japan, both on the outward and inward passages, by a line of first-class American sea-going side-wheel steamships of not less than three thousand five hundred tons burden, Government measurement, and of sufficient number, not less than four, to perform the stipulated service.

The Great Republic, the first of the new steamships building specially for this service, was launched at New York on the 8th of November instant, is now receiving her machinery, and is expected to be ready for sea about the 1st of May, 1867. She will register over 4,100 tons, Government measurement, or 1,100 tons more than the minimum tonnage named in the law; her extreme length is 380 feet, extreme breadth 50 feet, depth of hold 50 feet, and her draught when ordinarily loaded will be 21 feet. The second steamship, of similar size and proportions, is to be launched early in December of this year, and will be prepared for service about the 1st of July, 1867; and the machinery for two others of like dimensions is in course of construction. An inspection of the hulls and machinery of these ships, as well as a general knowledge of the preparations making by the contractors, has satisfied me that every possible exertion is being used to fulfill the requirements of the law and contract.

The company have tendered their first-class steamship Colorado to take the mails from San Francisco on the 1st of January, 1867, the day named in the law. This ship, which has been withdrawn from the Panama and San Francisco line to prepare her for service on the China route, is of the required tonnage, and will, it is believed, fully comply in other respects with the terms of the law and contract, although the report of her inspection by a naval constructor, under instructions lately given by the Secretary of the Navy, has not yet been received.

In the building of steamships for this line the contractors encountered a practical difficulty, arising out of two conflicting conditions; first, the necessity of constructing ships that could make the long voyage of 7,087 miles between San Francisco and Hong Kong, by the route named in the law, with safety and success, as regards the main object for which Congress authorized the establishment of the line; and secondly, the practicability of securing that object without making the ships so large as to preclude, by their heavy draught, the possibility of entering the harbor of Honolulu, which has a depth of water, under favorable circumstances, of barely twenty-one feet. These two conditions, they allege, were found to be inconsistent, and they therefore assumed the responsibility of so constructing the ships as to attain the more important objects of the subsidy, while necessarily placing a practical difficulty in the way of the accomplishment of the lesser, believing this to be the only course open to them without disregarding the main ends of their contract, as well as the wisest for the public interests to be promoted by the establishment of the line. They are, consequently, building ships of much greater cost, by reason of increased size, and proportionally more expensive to keep in service, than was necessary to meet the minimum requirements of the law.

Although the law, and the contract executed in pursuance thereof, name Honolulu as an intermediate port, the fact appears to be well established by reliable official information, that the laws which govern the navigation of the Pacific ocean render it unwise, if not incompatible with the complete success of the enterprise, to require the steamships to touch at the Sandwich Islands on their passage between San Francisco, Japan, and China. This is conclusively shown by the report of my predecessor to the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, dated June 11, 1866, in which are embodied explanations furnished by Rear Admiral Charles H. Davis, Superintendent of the United States Naval Observatory, respecting the proper routes to be pursued by steam vessels navigating the Pacific ocean between San Francisco, Kanagawa, and Hong Kong. Admiral Davis, referring to the advantages of the great circle or direct route between China and San Francisco, so clearly defined by natural laws, uses the following explicit language: "It is impossible, in establishing a route between two continents for the improvement of intercourse and trade, to overlook or neglect such advantages as these. It is hardly too much to say that it would amount to an absurdity to select the models of our ships with special reference to speed; and to propel them through the water with engines of enormous power, and then to premit those aids and advantages which nature offers to us as her own means of coöperation. At any rate, if we are prepared to do so, we must also be prepared to leave this field of enterprise at no distant day to those who will obey the laws governing the navigation of the great seas. These considerations with regard to the eastern voyage appear to dispose of the whole question. They show that touching at the Sandwich Islands on the return from China would prolong the voyage so many days unnecessarily; that an additional line of steamers must soon be established, provided the intercourse between China and America is to acquire that importance which is confidently expected."

A careful consideration of the subject has satisfied me of the correctness of the views expressed by my predecessor in that report. That the steamships of the main line between San Francisco, Japan, and China should not be required to touch at the Sandwich Islands does not, in my judgment, admit of reasonable doubt; but the conditions upon which such release should be granted is a question exclusively for the determination of Congress. A wise and liberal policy toward a national enterprise of this magnitude would seem to justify the release without imposing onerous conditions, in consideration of the increased expenses incurred in building ships for the service of great size and augmented speed, as well as of the important public interests involved in the success of the line.

Number of postal route clerks	83	96,200
Number of route agents	531	405,482
Number of local mail agents	58	38,919
Number of baggage-masters	30	1,800

Total.....738 $636,266

The free delivery system is in operation in forty-six of the principal cities. The number of carriers employed was 863, at an aggregate compensation of $589,236 41.

This mode of delivery has steadily grown in favor with the public, and in several of the large cities, where its progress has been most marked, the local postage shows a gratifying increase. Experience has shown its superiority over the old system of box delivery, and the results of the last two years commend it to Congress as a permanent branch of the postal service. Its effects in saving time to the public; in insuring the correct delivery by inducing the habit of directing letters to street and number; in reducing the great number of advertised and dead letters; in facilitating correspondence, especially local; in obviating the necessity of the many fruitless calls at the post office, are relied on to prove its advantages over the old system of office delivery.

DEAD LETTERS.

The whole number of dead letters received, examined, and disposed of during the year was about four and a half millions, upward of forty per cent. of which were from forty-seven of the larger post offices. About six hundred thousand other letters were received, being unavailable for want of prepayment of postage, or on account of misdirection or illegible address.

During the year there were registered and remailed to the respective owners, as inclosing money in sums of one dollar and upward, 32,814 letters, containing an aggregate of $244,589 99, of which number 27,948, containing $221,066 19, were delivered, being ninety per cent. The number of letters inclosing sums of money less than one dollar, remailed to the respective owners, was 13,834, containing an aggregate amount of $3,652 55. Of these, 11,175, containing $3,001 23, were delivered.

The number of letters containing papers of value other than money, as deeds, bills of exchange, drafts, checks, &c., received, registered, and returned for delivery to the owners, was 26,610, and the nominal value of the inclosures therein was $7,826,881 68. The number of these letters delivered was 24,053, being eighty-five per cent.

The number of letters and packages containing photographs, daguerreotypes, and articles of jewelry, was 67,016, of which 53,572 were sent out, (containing, for the most part, photographs and daguerreotypes,) and 42,745, or eighty per cent., delivered.

A large number of packages containing miscellaneous articles, for which no owners could be found, were sold at public auction, the proceeds amounting to $3,543 14.

The number of letters returned, unopened, to foreign countries during the year was 193,754, the amount of unpaid postage on which was $9,879 40. The number received from foreign countries in the same condition during the same period was 72,440, and the amount of unpaid postage thereon $2,039 26.

The number of congressional and official papers returned to the proper Departments was 17,806.

The number of letters inclosing soldiers' discharges and other military papers sent to the Adjutant General's Office, &c., was 8,918.

The number of ordinary letters remailed to the writers was 1,746,156, being an increase of 583,472 over the number of the same character returned the year previous. Of these 1,275,845 were delivered.

The whole number of letters of all descriptions sent out during the year was 2,093,444, of which 1,602,224 were delivered, being seventy-seven per cent.

Of the number of ordinary letters sent out for delivery since the 1st July last, from which time, in accordance with the law, they have been returned free, eighty-three per cent. were delivered, being an increase of seventeen per cent. over the percentage delivered during the same period of the year previous.

About 2,500,000 dead letters have been destroyed during the year. Of these upward of sixty per cent. were ordinary business circulars, advertisements of lottery and gift enterprises, notices of corporate societies, and tradesmen's bills; the remainder being composed of letters not signed, or so written as to be unintelligible.

An investigation into the cause of the non-delivery of letters confirms the statement made in the last report, that three fourths of the whole number fail to reach the parties addressed through faults of the writers, and it has been ascertained that the proportion of letters fully addressed returned from offices where the free delivery is established is less than three per cent. From some of these offices returns have been received, in which not a single letter so addressed appears without a satisfactory reason for the non-delivery. From forty to fifty per cent. of dead letters are returned from these offices, and it thus appears that a more careful attention to the details of address on the part of writers, together with a more extensive use of request envelopes, would materially promote the certainty of delivery and greatly diminish the number of dead letters.

POSTAL MONEY-ORDER SYSTEM.

The number of money-order offices now in operation is 766, being 347 more than at the date of the last annual report, and measures have recently been taken to establish 67 additional offices in the Pacific States and Territories.

The number of orders issued during the year was 243,609, of the value of.....$3,977,259 28
The number paid was 233,124, of the value of.....$3,851,839 49
To which is to be added amount of orders repaid to purchasers.....52,050 73

Excess of issues over payments.....$73,369 06

From the establishment of the system on November 1, 1864, to July 1, 1865, a period of eight months, the orders issued amounted to $1,360,122 52, and the orders paid and repaid to $1,313,577 08. On comparing these amounts with the corresponding transactions of the last fiscal year, it appears that the business has been almost trebled.

The average amount of each order issued during the year was $16 32.

The whole number of duplicates was 1,432,

SENATE &amp; HO. OF REPS.

Report of the Postmaster General.

of which 1,124 were issued to replace originals lost in the mails or otherwise, 296 were in lieu of orders invalidated by age, and 12 to replace orders illegally indorsed.

The sum of $2,710,685 53, being surplus funds accruing at the smaller offices from the transaction of the money-order business, was transmitted to first-class offices used as depositories, either by national bank drafts or in registered packages by mail. The receipts and expenditures for the last fiscal year, as adjusted and reported by the Auditor, were as follows, namely:

Receipts:
Fees on orders issued.....	$35,799 98
Premium received on exchange.....	3 08
	35,803 06
Expenditures:
Commissions to postmasters.....	$11,432 49
Clerk hire.....	14,910 50
Books and stationery.....	1,224 59
Premium paid on draft.....	25
Miscellaneous, including furniture and fixtures.....	563 44
Remittances lost in the mail.....	533 00
	28,664 27
Excess of receipts over expenditures.....	7,133 79
This sum represents the gross amount of revenue derived from the transaction of the money-order business for the past year, and if we deduct therefrom the amount of the deficiency in the receipts as compared with the expenditures during the period of eight months ending July 1, 1865, as stated in the last annual report, namely.....
There remains the sum of.....	$90 82
as the proceeds of the system from its commencement up to the close of the last fiscal year.

The cost of blanks for postmasters, which are furnished by the department of public printing, is not included in the foregoing statement of expenditures.

The present charge or fee established by law for an order of twenty dollars or less is ten cents, and for an order exceeding twenty dollars, twenty-five cents. These rates are defective in this respect, that an applicant who desires to remit any sum under forty dollars could do it more cheaply by two orders than by one, inasmuch as two orders for twenty dollars each would cost him but twenty cents, while for a single order of forty dollars he would have to pay twenty-five cents. The manifest tendency of this state of things is to augment unnecessarily the number of orders issued, involving a waste of time and of clerical labor at both the issuing and paying offices, as well as increasing the liability to error. The adoption of an additional rate of fifteen cents for all orders of more than ten, but not exceeding thirty dollars, without any change of the present fee for orders of ten dollars or less, or for orders exceeding thirty dollars, would remedy the defect in question, and promote expedition and accuracy in the transaction of the business.

At some post offices, particularly those located at centers of trade and commerce, the number of orders paid very greatly exceeds the number issued, so that the payment of orders constitutes the chief business of these offices, and as the postmaster's compensation for paying orders, being one eighth of one per cent. on the amount thereof, is much less than for issuing them, for which he receives one third of the fees, it is recommended that the commission for paying orders be increased from one eighth to one fourth of one per cent., so as to afford postmasters at such offices a compensation proportionate to their services.

In case of the loss of a money order, the owner, in order to obtain a duplicate thereof, is required "to furnish a statement under oath or affirmation," setting forth the loss or destruction of the original, together with a certificate from the postmaster by whom it was payable that it has not been and will not be paid. A certificate must also be obtained from the issuing postmaster, that the order in question had not been and will not be repaid to the purchaser. In the majority of cases the applicant's information with regard to the loss of the original order is limited to the fact that it was mailed at a certain office, but failed, from causes unknown to him to reach the person addressed. He is obliged, however, to furnish a statement to that effect, under oath, (which is to be administered by the postmaster without charge,) and to defray the cost of a five-cent revenue stamp affixed to such statement. This additional expense is burdensome to the owner, who is rarely to be blamed for the loss of the original order, for which the regular fee had already been paid to the Department, and the latter having undertaken, in consideration of that fee, to transfer through the mails the sum of money represented by the order, should perform that duty without exacting any further compensation. Experience, moreover, shows that the certificates of both postmasters afford complete security against the erroneous issue of a duplicate in lieu of an order that had once been paid. It would seem, therefore, that the legal requirement from the applicant of a sworn statement as to the loss or destruction of the original is entirely unnecessary, as well as onerous, and should be abolished. For similar reasons no charge whatever should be made for the issue of a duplicate order to replace an original that has become invalid because not presented within one year after its date, or because improperly indorsed. In such cases the invalidation of the order is in itself a penalty for any negligence of the holder, who, on application, should receive payment of his money by means of a duplicate without a second fee.

During the last fiscal year five cases have occurred of the payment of orders to persons who had forged the signatures of the payees. These persons had previously, through lack of precaution or injudicious confidence of the remitter or payee, been put in possession of all the information required to obtain payment of the order. To forge or counterfeit a money order is made a penal offense by the act of May 17, 1864, but there is no provision of law to punish the forgery of the payee's signature, and as the latter crime is liable to be often repeated, especially at the large offices, there is a necessity for additional legislation to provide an adequate punishment for it, as well as for any attempt to obtain payment of a money order by fraudulent means.

A remittance of surplus money-order funds, amounting to $617, sent in a registered package from Natchez, Mississippi, to St. Louis, Missouri, was lost by the destruction of the mail steamer City of Memphis, on the 31st of May, but in consequence of delay in obtaining satisfactory evidence that this sum had been duly counted, registered, and mailed, and had subsequently been totally destroyed, the claim of the postmaster at Natchez to be credited therewith was not allowed by this Department and transmitted to the Auditor in time to be inserted in his report.

MISCELLANEOUS.

In addition to the details of this report, I submit a few suggestions: the condition of all branches of this Department is most encouraging. The general plan proposed by my predecessor for reestablishing postal service in the late insurgent States has been, to a large extent, carried out; and efficient service, with economical expenditures, has resulted. Just as rapidly as the condition of the country and the necessities of the people will warrant, new post offices will be opened and mail service increased.

The surplus of revenues over expenditures for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1865, was not anticipated for the year ending June 30, 1866. The expense incident to reestablishing mail service in the southern States, where such service had been interrupted by the rebellion, it was known would increase largely the general outlays of the Department beyond what had been required during either of the preceding four years.

There is no better evidence of national prosperity than the constant increase, from year to year, of revenues derived from domestic and foreign postages. There is no better evidence of the increasing general intelligence of the American people than that furnished by the loaded mails.

The change in modes of conveyance from carrier pigeons and special messengers, and post riders with billets and small packages and a few letters, to railroads and steamboats, carrying every day hundreds of tons of letters and newspapers and books, all through the length and breadth of the land, is an extraordinary commentary upon the increasing wealth and prosperity of the nation, and the energy and intelligence of the people. The few thousand pounds of postal revenue in Franklin's time for a single year, give place now to $15,000,000 annually, a sum greater than the annual revenues of the Federal Government during the administration of John Quincy Adams.

This service, under the liberal patronage of the Government, has done more to aid in developing the resources of the country than anything else except the cultivation of the soil. It has done more to aid in enlightening and Christianizing the people than anything else except the spelling-book and Bible. The post office and mail route travel with civilization, and mark its progress as distinctly as the school-house and meeting-house.

It has always been an erroneous theory in the history of the postal service of the United States that it was established or sustained on the principle of wholly defraying its own expenses out of its own revenues; or, in other words, on the principle that it should be self-supporting. It is a great public necessity, to accommodate private citizens, and it will not do to say that no mail route shall be opened, or post office established, until the business on the proposed route or of the proposed office shall pay all expenses.

Large sums of money are paid every year to contractors for carrying mails beyond our frontier, across the central wilderness, to the Pacific States; and other large sums are paid for services on lines tributary to the main lines, to accommodate as yet sparse settlements. From these, comparatively small returns come back in the shape of postal revenues. Yet these very agencies invite settlement and encourage enterprise in material development, so that there come back to the people in real wealth almost as many millions of dollars as the Government expends thousands in this particular branch of service.

Congress has wisely appropriated $500,000 per year to pay for carrying mails from San Francisco to China. There is an excuse, in sending mails, for paying this money to a private company in aid of a great commercial enterprise. This money, so expended, will come back from the China seas in goods and wares and merchandise to our own markets, or, in seeking European markets, in transportation paid across the continent.

Whether the people pay in postage stamps for transmission of letters through the mails, or whether they pay by appropriation of public money, the ends sought and the ends attained are the same. While a lavish expenditure of public money is to be avoided, there ought to be a liberal expenditure for extending mail facilities by land and by sea.

In another respect I recommend more liberality. The clerks and employes of the Post Office Department have not been well paid for the services they have performed. The salaries of clerks in the Post Office Department during the four years of war were not increased, while all the expenses of living were more than doubled. The salaries were fixed in times of peace and low prices. They were not raised when war raised prices. Clerks were compelled to run in debt, and, in many cases, their families suffered from want. They worked faithfully and skillfully and honestly in discharging important duties for the Government. I submit that they ought to have some reasonable allowance for the past and an increase of salary in the future.

Clerks in post offices, letter-carriers, and route agents are not paid what they ought to be paid. Honest, industrious men are required for all these duties, and they ought to be paid a fair and living compensation for their labor. Their employment is uninterrupted, except by sickness. The letter-carriers claim peculiar consideration. They travel every day from early in the morning until late at night, in heat and cold and rain and snow, all through the cities, distributing letters and papers without compensation enough to pay house rent. I feel that the Government ought to pay all these employés better, because they earn more, and because the Government can afford to pay more. I plead the cause of all these employés because it is just to them that I should, and I earnestly ask permission and means to pay them better.

The foreign postal service has grown to such magnitude that increased care and responsibility fall upon those having the direct charge of it; and I respectfully ask that authority be given to appoint a superintendent of foreign mails, and an additional clerk for that branch of the service.

I also recommend that authority be given to appoint a superintendent of the opening and distribution of dead letters.

The law regulating the franking privilege ought, in my opinion, to be amended. I do not think the privilege should be abolished. I think it is a necessity for the different Departments, as well as for Congress. But great abuses have grown up under it. To avoid frauds and a misuse of the privilege, I recommend such a change in the law as to require the written signature of the person exercising the privilege upon the matter franked; and to relieve the heads of Departments and bureaus of great labor, that a franking clerk be authorized by law for each Department of the Government, with the right to frank all matter pertaining to the Department for which he is appointed.

Respectfully submitted.

ALEXANDER W. RANDALL,
Postmaster General.

The PRESIDENT.

Admission of Nebraska.

REMARKS OF HON. J. A. J. CRESWELL, OF MARYLAND,
IN THE UNITED STATES SENATE,
January 8, 1867,

On the bill (S. No. 456) for the admission of the State of Nebraska into the Union.

Mr. CRESWELL said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I expect to vote for the admission of Nebraska whether the pending amendment be adopted or not. I expect further to vote for the pending amendment, although I am satisfied that it will effect nothing. I am of opinion that the Congress of the United States has no authority to impose a condition in this manner upon the people of a State about to be admitted into the Union. I believe, however, that Congress has a constitutional right to interpose by conditions to be submitted for acceptance to the people of a Territory or inchoate State, wherever Congress may consider that those conditions are necessary to secure to the people of such Territory or State a republican form of government. I believe that the first clause of the fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution is a controlling one, and that the United States is bound by the highest obligation to guaranty, under all circumstances, to every State in this Union a republican form of government; and further, that the powers reserved to the States and the people thereof must yield to the paramount operations of this guarantee.

Admitting, therefore, that the right is reserved to the people of the States to regulate the matter of suffrage, I think it equally clear that the people of the State have no right so to regulate the suffrage as to exclude absolutely and perpetually from the governing power of the State any portion of its citizens by reason of their race or color, or by any other arbitrary and unequal rule of exclusion.

But as to the pending amendment, let us put the case in this way: suppose this act shall pass with the amendment offered by my honorable friend from Vermont, and notwithstanding its passage, and the admission of the Senators and Representatives from the State of Nebraska, the people of Nebraska in their Legislature, should refuse to recognize the principle, and should insist that their constitution stands as they sent it to Congress, and that none but white persons can vote under its provisions, I apprehend that when the constitution should come into the courts, the question being raised by a person of African descent whose vote had been refused, the courts would decide that the amendment of the Senator from Vermont did not control the language of the State constitution inasmuch as the people of the State had never in any manner accepted that amendment or acquiesced therein. The argument, brief, though pointed, of the honorable Senator from Maine, is conclusive to my mind on that subject. Nevertheless, the amendment is valuable as a declaration of principle; and I confidently expect and believe that the people of Nebraska will voluntarily amend their constitution so as to conform to it.

But, sir, there are other considerations in connection with the position of this State in its application for admission that I desire to present to the Senate. I am anxious to see the whole of the western territory filled up with States. I have none of that feeling of jealousy toward the West which the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Howe] said yesterday exists among eastern men. On the contrary, my heartfelt sympathy is with the adventurous people of that section. I believe that the active element of this nation is working there in the cause of civilization. The brave men of the West who spend their strength and their blood in subduing the wilderness and fighting the savage are the true champions of progress; and so far from feeling jealous of them I bid them God speed. If my friend from Wisconsin will but look over the record that I have made in the Thirty-Eighth and Thirty-Ninth Congress, he will not, I feel assured, charge me with any desire to impede the triumphant march of the pioneer. On the contrary, no measures that I have sustained have given me more pleasure, either at the time or upon subsequent reflection, than those to encourage the formation and to recognize the existence of the new States of the great West; and I care not how soon that section may so far increase in population and strength as to be able to outnumber with her representatives all the States upon the Atlantic. I would appeal to them for justice to Maryland with the same confidence that I now appeal to the Senators from the East, and I am sure that I should not appeal in vain.

But the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts says that we cannot without stultifying ourselves vote for the admission of Nebraska. He asserts that all men of whatever color are entitled to the exercise of the right of suffrage under the operation of equal laws. Well, sir, though I may be charged, perhaps, with being a somewhat recent convert to that doctrine, I accept it in its length and its breadth. I am willing to pledge myself to vote for the measure now pending, to apply that principle to all the remaining Territories, and to require that all of them shall make it a cardinal provision in their fundamental law before being admitted as States of the Union.

But, sir, I believe that it would not be wise to compel the people of Nebraska, at this late day, to hold new elections, to call new conventions, and to form a new constitution before admitting her into the Union. She has already complied, in the terms of her constitution, with every stipulation of our enabling act, as she interpreted it. The Senator from Massachusetts has said that in the enabling act Congress declared that Nebraska should conform to the principles of the Declaration of Independence. I admit it; but I ask him in all candor whether at the time those words were inserted in the enabling act he contended, or even intimated, that they imposed as a condition precedent to the admission of the State that black men should be allowed to vote. Did the Senator give any such intimation?

Mr. SUMNER. There was no discussion.

Mr. CRESWELL. There was no discussion; and it is therefore fair to presume that those words were used in no unusual sense. But a new state of affairs has arisen. My distinguished colleague the other day said that we ought to return to the doctrine of the fathers. I am willing to return to that fountain of true wisdom; and now that we have got rid of slavery, the bane and curse of this land for so many years, I am eager to turn again to the records left us by the revolutionary sages, and to conform my practice to those great principles of liberty and universal justice which they asserted and maintained.

Sir, for a vote that I gave in this body yesterday I have been censured in certain quarters. I have been charged with violating the accepted faith and traditions of Maryland. I deny it. I challenge any man in Maryland or out of Maryland to show from Maryland authorities the impropriety of my vote. Maryland was one of the old thirteen, and her first bill of rights and constitution were made in the very heat and fervor of the Revolution, ay, upon the very heel of the Declaration of Independence. The men who heard that glorious instrument read at the old State House in Philadelphia posted home to assemble their State convention, and to organize their State government. Influenced by the same feelings and purposes that prompted them to venture all in the effort to assert their liberties, they proclaimed to the world what they believed to be the genuine principles of republican government. The convention met on the 14th of August, 1776; many of the best men in the State were there: Dent, Mackall, Bowie, Hammond, Worthington, Ridgeley, Stevenson, Archer, Tilghman, Chase, Paca, and Charles Carroll, of Carrollton, held seats in that body. This convention, so constituted and animated, organized a State government upon the most enlarged views. What said they in regard to the right of suffrage? The bill of rights, adopted November 3, 1776, declared in its fifth section—

"That the right in the people to participate in the Legislature is the best security of liberty and the foundation of all free government. For this purpose elections ought to be free and frequent, and every man having property in a common interest with and an attachment to the community ought to have a right of suffrage."

Mark you, "every man;" not white men only, but "every man;" and that God made men of diverse colors they well knew, because at that time the African had been held in bondage in Maryland for more than a century.

Men still live who have heard their fathers say that they have seen, under that provision of the Bill of Rights, enforced by a subsequent provision in the body of the Constitution, white men vote side by side with negro men without a question being asked or a doubt expressed.

The same convention, in the body of the constitution adopted on the 8th November, 1776, inserted the provision following:

"All freemen above twenty-one years of age, having a freehold of fifty acres of land in the county in which they offer to vote and residing therein, and all freemen having property in this State above the value of thirty pounds current money, and having resided in the county in which they offer to vote one whole year next preceding the election, shall have a right of suffrage in the election of delegates for such county."

That continued to be the law of Maryland down to the year 1810, when the constitution was amended so as to confine the suffrage to white men. At the same time the Legislature saw proper to manumit the white race from the property qualifications that at that time oppressed them. It was enacted that from and after the year 1810 no man should be excluded from the right to vote or should be prevented from holding any office by reason of the want of any property qualification, thus declaring forever in favor of manhood suffrage.

Now, sir, why was that? That was a departure from the fathers in one respect toward freedom, but in the other toward slavery. They enfranchised the white man; they riveted more tightly the shackles of the black man. It was done because meanwhile cotton, as they believed, had become king. It was done because the inventions of Whitney and others had enabled the cotton-growers to manipulate their product so successfully as to make it with slave labor the most profitable staple of the continent, and slave, ay, negro culture, thenceforth became as much a business as cotton culture; and even Maryland and Virginia, from their former condition of active hostility to slavery, as evinced by the sentiments of their representatives in the Convention which formed the Constitution of the United States in 1787, became from that day forth the active propagandists of slavery.

From this new stand-point it may have been necessary, if slavery rather than freedom was to be preserved, to exclude the black man, whether free or slave, from the ballot-box, and they did so. Avarice is insatiable, and those who profited by slavery, not satisfied with their present gains, began to throw around it the protection of the State laws. In 1836 they provided by an amendment of the Constitution—

"That the relation of master and slave in this State shall not be abolished unless a bill so to abolish the same shall be passed by a unanimous vote of the members of each branch of the General Assembly, and shall be published at least three months before a new election of delegates, and shall be confirmed by a unanimous vote of the members of each branch of the General Assembly at the next regular constitutional session after such new election, nor then without full compensation to the master for the property of which he shall thereby be deprived."

This was a declaration to the people of Maryland: slavery shall be continuous, perpetual; it shall be the absorbing interest within the limits of the State; and no matter what may be the convictions of the people in regard to it, or what may be the manifest interest of the majority, you shall not abolish it without a unanimous vote of both Houses of two consecutive Legislatures—an absolute impossibility as men are constituted. Thus justice, blind and robbed of her scales, was forced to wield her sword in the interest of her enemies.

But that is not all. In the constitution of 1851, article three, section forty-three, they imposed an absolute prohibition upon all legislative action for the abolition of slavery, in these words:

"The Legislature shall not pass any law abolishing the relation of master or slave, as it now exists in this State."

Finally, they went so far as to say that no slaveholder, no matter what might be his views of duty or propriety, should be allowed to manumit his slaves; and after having built up all these legal fortifications around their pet interest they actually aided to organize rebellion and civil war against this great Government, in order that they might witness the apotheosis of their grand idea and construct upon the ruins of free institutions a Government with its foundation based upon the corner-stone of slavery. After that came the deluge; and the men who fought to obliterate all sentiments of liberty from the human heart were themselves swept out of place, and many of them for their impious rashness paid the penalty with their lives. I believe, sir, the hand of God was guiding the whole movement.

Once admitted that slavery and property qualifications are forever abolished, and there can be no reason assigned why "every man having a common interest with and an attachment to the community" ought not to be remitted, according to the Bill of Rights of 1776, to the right of suffrage.

The time has come when every man, declared to be a citizen of the United States, of proper age and having the qualifications applicable to other citizens, must, if we intend to stand upon a republican form of government, be allowed to express his political sentiments through the ballot-box.

Now, sir, I come to the question propounded by the other Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOOLITTLE.] He made the point upon my friend from Vermont that the people of a State might restrict the exercise of the right of suffrage. I admit it; but I assert that it must be by all the people; and now, that slavery is abolished, black citizens are a part of the people; and if there is a State within this Union with a constitution adopted by a majority of only a part of its people, I contend it is not republican in form. The white citizens of a State have no right thus to exclude the black citizens of a State from the exercise of political power any more than the black citizens have to exclude the white; and when a State is in that position, it is the duty of Congress, as much as anything can be its duty, to see that that State has a republican form of government. Not only does this duty apply to States which are under the ban of rebellion, but to all States. The Constitution says that "the United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government;" and hence, if by the force of events, or by any combination of circumstances, any State is in this Union without having given at some time of its history, either in the formation and adoption of its constitution or subsequently, to every citizen having the common qualifications, a right to speak with regard to its form of government, I pronounce it to be anti-republican.

I do not mean to say that every woman or every child or every criminal or traitor must vote. There must be certain obvious rules governing this matter. If the right of suffrage is committed generally to the males, then confine it to the males. If it be desirable to exclude children or criminals or traitors, let them be excluded as incompetent or dangerous characters to the State. But I do say that no principle ever embodied in the organic law by the founders of our Government can be cited to justify the Congress of the United States in allowing any State to retain a form of government which disfranchises all of a class of citizens by reason of race or color; and when gentlemen in Maryland talk about making a new constitution I contend that they must submit it to every citizen having these common qualifications; and if they deny that, I shall be one of Maryland's sons to come to the Congress of the United States and ask that that constitution shall not be recognized.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CRESWELL. Certainly.

Mr. SAULSBURY. When the Constitution of the United States was adopted were negroes allowed to vote in the State of Maryland?

Mr. CRESWELL. They were.

Mr. SAULSBURY. When did they cease to be allowed that privilege?

Mr. CRESWELL. In 1810.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Was the government of Maryland republican in form after that?

Mr. CRESWELL. It was so held. But if the gentleman had listened to my argument he would have heard that I contend that where slavery is recognized and protected by the Constitution of the United States and by the States, it is one thing to exclude slaves and chattels from all participation in the Government, but a very different thing, when slavery has been universally abolished, to disfranchise freemen and citizens. That is my position. The law is changed, and events have remodeled the whole question.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Allow me to ask the honorable Senator another question. If the laws of Maryland now exclude the negro population from voting, does my honorable friend say that on that account the government of Maryland is not republican in form within the sense of the Constitution of the United States, and therefore requires the interposition of Congress to make it republican?

Mr. CRESWELL. I have argued and now maintain, not that a State may not limit the exercise of the right of suffrage, but that the limitation must be by a majority of all the people, and that a part of the people, one fifth, two fifths, three fifths, four fifths, have no right to exclude any other part, however small, by reason of race or color, from the formation of the organic fundamental law in and by which that limitation is prescribed.

Now, sir, a word to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts. This is the great battle upon which we are entering. We shall contend for the right of every man in this country to protect himself by his ballot. It is a battle for mankind; it is a battle for all future time; and I am willing, under the circumstances, inasmuch as the Congress of the United States said to the people of Nebraska that they should be allowed to form their constitution upon a certain theory, to which at that time all acceded, I am willing, nay I am anxious, when we know from the character of that people and the representatives they have chosen that they will not only stand by us but that they will be in the very front rank in the approaching struggle to maintain the great doctrine that we have emblazoned upon our banners—to admit both those States into the Union at once. I appeal to the Senator from Massachusetts to accept their aid, and let us, having extended our lines upon the most advanced position, move onward in solid phalanx until the consummation of our great victory shall come. I respect the position he takes. I respect the view entertained by my friend from Vermont, and I am willing even to vote for his nugatory measure. I am willing to allow him that leek to feed upon if he be satisfied with it, and indeed it would be ungenerous in me not to do so, although at the same time I desire to state distinctly that I deny its legal efficiency.

I suppose, sir, that every inch of these States in which the black man has been denied and is still denied the right of suffrage will be fought over on this great question. I propose to take my position with that party that speaks for human rights. I propose even to go with that party which has the most enlarged views of human rights. And when public officers by their messages, whether Governors or Presidents, present to me the mean argument that the negroes hitherto held in slavery may in a very little while acquire all the power and consign us to an inferior station, I cast it to the dogs without an answer. If under the circumstances we are not able to maintain our position, 30,000,000 against 4,000,000—30,000,000 of born freemen against 4,000,000 of but lately ignorant and degraded slaves—then it is time for us to abandon all claim to the boasted ascendancy of the white race; and to quit that proud position that hitherto we have held as the first and the most aggressive in the cause of right of all nations on the face of the earth.

HO. OF REPS.

Tax on Distilled Spirits—Mr. McKee.

39TH CONG....2D SESS.

Such teachers acknowledge their insincerity when in the next breath they tell us that the negro is too ignorant to vote and can never be educated.

It is true he is ignorant. If this be his great sin, at least let his enemies cease to burn his school-houses and churches. Let him be allowed to take the money that he pays for white schools and appropriate it to the wants of his own children; let the magnanimous race, the race of property, the race of intellect, the race of power and station no longer rob the negro of the amount which he pays into the school fund, and appropriate it exclusively to themselves; but let them give him the benefit of all he pays, or else never more declaim about taxation without representation. Protect him in his right to worship God and his right to educate his children, and my word for it he will put to the blush many of our own race who have wasted better opportunities. Beside, the ballot itself is an educator. Let him enjoy its elevating tendency; and when another generation shall have succeeded to our places, intelligent men will wonder that we of this age could so long resist the teachings of patriotism and Christianity.

Tax on Distilled Spirits.

SPEECH OF HON. SAMUEL MCKEE,

OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 21, 1867.

Mr. McKEE. Mr. Speaker, it is my intention to make some remarks on a subject not at all exciting when discussed in the manner in which I propose; a subject of common interest to the whole country, to those who so lately fought against this country and those who fought in its defense. A subject, I repeat, not at all exciting, but the matter of which too often excites men of all classes, and in high and low places, improperly used, does much harm. I refer to the "whisky question," and my remarks shall pertain to the law regulating the manufacture of this article. The law framed at the last session and now in force is one which bears with great hardship and severity upon a very large portion of the people of the United States. The law was framed by those who had the subject in charge ostensibly to prevent fraud and secure the largest amount of revenue to the Government from the manufacture of this article, which is regarded as one of the non-essentials of the community, not necessarily entering into the articles of daily consumption for man. I know that there are very many who in practice at least refute this theory, yet I think the theory a sound one.

But in reality this law was framed for another purpose, and that purpose neither more nor less than putting the manufacture of spirits into the hands of a few men of capital, and thus enable them to monopolize the whole business and have the whole control in their own hands. If whisky is to be made at all, and I apprehend the country will not very soon come to the rule that it shall not, why not allow all men who desire to engage in this business a chance to do so with whatever means they have? Why make a distinction between this and other branches of manufacture? Why make a law that in its operations will compel a man to make a great deal of whisky to enable him to comply with the law, or not permit him to make any at all? Of course a man who owns a large distillery, from which he produces through his machinery twenty-five to one hundred barrels of poisonous, drugged liquor per day can easily afford to pay five dollars per day for an inspector to watch his machinery, and with this monopoly crushing out all the small makers of whisky and enabling them to send their villainous stuffs through all the land to supply the want of pure drinks, they can also afford to pay the inspector not to watch their movements.

Instead of being a law to prevent frauds on the revenue this is really a law to encourage fraud; a law which sends a Government spy into every man's establishment, who is responsible to nobody for his acts, is under no bond and under no penalties, whose only interest is to get the five dollars per day from the poor distiller for his work of two minutes, perhaps, or get ten to twenty times this amount from the rich one for not doing what the law requires he should do. True, he can be displaced if he proves not honest, but is there any reason to suppose that his successor will not be likewise? I know that details are dry; but as I am certain few men in this House understand where, to what extent, and in what manner whisky is made half so well as a very few know how to dispose of this article when in hand, I propose to show the practical workings of the system. I take my own district in Kentucky, simply because it offers a fair example, and the same rule that applies to this applies equally to all districts in which the population is sparse and the people poor where whisky is made. These poor people, it must be borne in mind, in all the mountain portion of our country bordering on the theater of the late war, and even in its sweep, were generally the people who remained true to the country. From a statement made to me by the late collector of my district, at my request, I present the following facts:

Up to the date when the present law went into effect—that is, from the 1st of May to the 1st of September, 1866—there had been made by distillers of the district application for license to the number of one hundred and nine. These distillers had applied under the belief that the license tax would be the same to them, as distillers under three hundred barrels, that it was in 1865, namely, twenty-five dollars. Not one of them had the means or facilities to make more than forty gallons of spirits per week. The general average was from fifteen to twenty-five gallons per week. This embraces only thirteen out of the sixteen counties in the district, leaving out three of the largest and most populous, from which latter the returns are not all in. This number is not the total number of small distillers in the district, for this reason: the great majority do not commence operations until the months of September, October, and November, consequently do not make application for license until they are ready to commence. The number of these others by whom application for license had not been made, for the reasons stated and because of finding out the onerous workings of the law in time to prevent being entrapped, is estimated from the reports of previous years to be one hundred and ninety-one, making the total number of small distillers in the district about three hundred. These men each about average making twenty gallons of pure whisky per week, aggregating four hundred and eighty gallons during the stilling season of six months, many not working more than two to three months. Total whisky produced in the district by the three hundred distillers one hundred and forty-four thousand gallons. Assuming that the average product is estimated too high by one half, which is perhaps true, these three hundred small distillers produced seventy-two thousand gallons, which brought an annual revenue to the Government of $144,000. The reason for stating that the product of four hundred and eighty gallons each is too high is, that these men frequently run no more than two or three months or dispose of their stills, and under the action of the old law could transfer their licenses, and the transfer in a few instances above had been counted as an issue of new license.

Out of these three hundred distillers who have heretofore pursued the business, as yet but two have prepared to run under the new law; the great majority of the others declaring their inability to comply with the new law, for the following reasons:

1. They are required to build bonded warehouses of their own, although general bonded houses are convenient, for the protection of Government, thus involving an expense to each of several hundred dollars in the erection of the building.

2. The necessity of employing an inspector at the rate of five dollars per day, and forbidding them to run without his presence. Entailing an expense in paying wages greatly disproportionate to the value of his services and the value of such like services of any kind according to the rates of labor-wages in this country.

3. The necessity of running their high wines or doublings immediately into the receiving cistern under the lock and seal of the inspector, by a series of tubing unapproachable to them, thus compelling them to purchase expensive scientific instruments for the purpose of testing the proof of their spirits and separating the high wines or doublings from the low wines or backings.

4. Being compelled to erect in a suitable room in the distillery, which is not to be entered by the proprietor, except in company with the inspector, as it is under his lock and seal, two or more receiving cisterns for the spirits, from which it is to be taken every third day and placed in proper packages in the bonded warehouse, thus further entailing unnecessary trouble, vexation, and expense.

To show the trouble and expense to which these small distillers are put, all of which is a part of the plan for crushing them out, I subjoin a circular from the revenue department:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
WASHINGTON, October 11, 1866.

Information has been received at this office that officers of internal revenue in various parts of the country are permitting distillers to continue under the new law the old practice of separating the low and high wines by allowing them to run into separate open tubs placed near the outlet of the still or worm. It is understood that the almost universal custom in grain distilleries has been to place near the outlet of the worm two open tubs, into one of which the high wines are conveyed, and into the other the low wines—the former connected by pipes with the high-wine cistern, and the latter with the still or doubler.

This arrangement is not consistent with the terms of the act of July 13, 1866. Section thirty-four (paragraph one hundred and twenty-five) of that act provides that all the spirits distilled during each day, of twenty-four hours, shall be conveyed on that day into one of the receiving cisterns prepared for that purpose, and that such cisterns shall be connected with the outlet of the still by suitable pipes or other apparatus, so constructed as always to be exposed to the view of the inspector.

This language clearly prohibits the use of open tubs for separating low and high wines. The outlet of the still or worm must be connected with the cistern by pipes or other apparatus exposed to the view of the inspector. Open tubs are not "pipes or other apparatus" contemplated by law. The intention of the law, as is well known, is to cut off the opportunities for the commission of fraud heretofore existing. To this end the design was to keep the spirits, as it were, under close guard continuously, from the worm to the bonded warehouse, by the use of a pipe connecting the worm with the cistern, by having the cistern in a safe room under the lock and seal of the inspector, and by having the spirits, under the immediate inspection of that officer, drawn off into casks or packages, which, after being duly gauged, proved, and marked, he is to see removed into the bonded warehouse, which, again, is under his lock and key.

Now, to permit the spirits to be run from the worm into open tubs, for the ostensible purpose of separating the low from the high wines, would be to frustrate the grand object of the law, and render all other safeguards provided by the law wholly nugatory.

Consequently distillers must in all cases be required to connect the still or worm with the receiving cistern by pipes or other apparatus, which must be so constructed as to convey the spirits directly to the cistern.

As it is necessary for the interest of the distiller to prevent the low wines from running into the high-wine cistern, and as the use of the open tubs for this purpose cannot be allowed, it becomes necessary to adopt some arrangement by which this can be done.

It is deemed entirely feasible to separate the low from the high wines by the use of a glass vessel which shall be connected with and made a part of the pipes or apparatus connecting the outlet of the still with the receiving cistern. The precise form of this apparatus for separating the low and high wines is not now prescribed, but distillers must be immediately notified that some such arrangement must be adopted and put in use by the 15th day of November next. Any distillery which, after that date, shall be found without such apparatus must be closed up and proceeded against according to law.

THOMAS HARLAND,
Acting Commissioner.

In order more fully to understand the objections to the law urged in this objection an explanation of the working of these small copper stills is needed.

The grain is first prepared by being ground up into meal or mash; this with a small amount of barley, wetted up, is allowed to ferment, when it is placed into the still and allowed to run through the windings of its worm, and finally into a small tub or half barrel at the mouth or the outlet of the worm. This tub is called the "singling tub," and the spirits run into it "singlings." This is only half-made spirits or whisky; its proof only being twenty or twenty-five per cent., (proof whisky is spirits which will show fifty per cent. of alcohol at sixty degrees temperature, Fahrenheit's thermometer.) The contents of the singling tub, after the spirits or, more properly, liquid has ceased to run, are poured back into the still. The singling tub is placed aside and the doubling tub put to the outlet of the worm; and when the spirits begin to run they are received into the doubling tub and the result is whisky. Doublings is only a technical distillers' phrase for whisky. In the language of the department, doublings are high wines and singlings low wines. Where the hardships of the new law falls particularly heavy is here. After the doublings have run until the experienced distiller judges from the quantity run that proof is about exhausted he takes out the bung of the doubling tub, inserts his proof vial, and judges that proof has ceased when a bead no longer forms. As soon as this period arrives, he removes his doubling tub, containing proof whisky, and places his singling tub at the mouth of the still again. What run now are called "backings." If he were to permit this to run into his doubling tub it would spoil his whisky completely, ruin the taste and reduce its proof until it would not be decent grog, (old drinkers, I believe, do not indulge in grog, but take whisky straight.) But these backings are too valuable to be lost, and are placed back into the still, run through again, and come out doublings or proof whisky. The use of the proof vial is never dispensed with, but is in constant use while the operation of doubling is being carried on, whether produced from singlings or backings. According to the new law as explained by a circular (special, No. 46) from the revenue office, this manner of having the spirits run into two movable tubs, or "open tubs," as it calls them, is strictly prohibited. The distiller is not allowed to have access to the spirits at all, but they must be run into sealed and locked cisterns and the proof determined by some scientific instrument, which would necessarily entail heavy expense, and the high wines (doublings) thus separated from the low wines, (singlings and backings.) These instruments, which will, of course, be new inventions, and like all new inventions, not perfect, may get out of order or may not be adapted to the small copper distilleries of the rural districts, and if so, on failure to perform their labor, the spirits would be ruined, entailing a heavy loss on the poor of the mountain parts of our land.

But I come back to this inspector, who has nothing at stake and everything to gain by defrauding the distiller in the reports of his spirits—not being under bond, while the distiller himself is under heavy penalties; heavy fines and penalties awaiting every slight infraction of the law, whether by negligence, ignorance, or intention, with a moiety to the informer—this inspector is nothing less or more than a spy paid by his victim, with great inducements in the shape of reward in moiety of fine for discovering dereliction on the part of the distiller; even if in some instances under the natural frailty of human nature he is compelled to add imagination to real violations of law to convict his unfortunate employer.

6. Under the law he is not only compelled to pay his inspector five dollars for his services, but in addition he is further compelled to pay him one mill per gallon for every gallon of spirits inspected, thus paying twice for the same services; or, in other words, he is by law compelled to pay for services for which he has already employed and paid the laborer. The amount is very small, but the principle is none the less worthy of attention.

The great majority of the distillers in the rural districts are honest and good men, and believe their business proper, whether so or not. Although the product of distillers of spirits proves a curse in the land, immensely overbalancing the good derived from whisky in any manner; yet the results are infinitely more appalling from the consumption of the products of the large distilleries than that of small ones. The spirits manufactured are perfectly free from foreign or deleterious substances, and if whisky and apple brandy are to be manufactured at all under the eye of Government officials it seems as if a peculiar protection should be thrown around those who manufacture pure spirits, which if not harmless, (and they are not necessarily so,) are at least less harmful than the drugged and poisonous production of the great steam distillery which pours its hundred barrels of noxious spirits out per day.

I know the large manufacturers are making strenuous efforts to have the tax increased. This is not necessary; and while it would enable the great establishments to still further grasp this whole business, enable them to commit still greater frauds—for I venture the assertion that in almost every large city an establishment can be found that has committed more fraud since this law went into effect than it would have been possible for all the small distilleries in any whole State in the Union to have committed in the same period of time—the decrease of tax, without removing this inspection, and relieving them from building their bonded warehouses, which are wholly useless and add unnecessary expense, when they are located for the storage of the article all over the country and by authority of the Government will not afford relief. The distillers through the country have become accustomed to paying the tax; it enables them simply to add this much to their price for the whisky. They cannot sell until this tax is paid, and they do not seek, after they once know the law, to evade it save in a very few instances. When the law first went into force they did not see how they could get on without selling their whisky first; but now they can understand this very well. It enables them to compel men to pay for whisky before it is consumed; to sell for cash and not on credit. But they cannot build these bonded houses and they cannot pay this inspector.

In cities there may be much illicit stilling in a small way, but the amount is greatly increased by this law. Relieve them of the burdens of inspection, &c., and they can and will pay the tax. If men are so dishonest in your large cities that you need to prevent all men from engaging in a business recognized as legitimate, except such as have immense capital—and I have yet to learn that large wealth of itself makes men honest—throw around your cities such guards as you choose; but let us place the poor honest countryman, who has not learned to deceive, in a position where he can live on what he has, be it ever so small, and follow his occupation, while this occupation is allowed at all, without being ground to death either by Government taxes, paid not to the Government, and from which the Government gets no reward, but into the pockets of greedy individuals, or by having his enterprise crushed entirely out by men who can command capital in abundance. I urge, as a matter of justice to the poor men of the land, a modification of this law. Let all those who make less than twenty barrels per annum be relieved from the provision requiring inspection and bonded warehouses. Let the law be to this class as it was before the act of the last session of 1866, since not only no harm can come of it, but great good. The revenue will be increased largely from this source. Frauds will diminish; and, as whisky will be drunk, men can get an article which is pure and fit for man to drink—that is, if any at all is fit.

For myself, if all men were like me little whisky would be required. Coffee-houses, saloons, and bars would close, not by law, but because no man went into or near them. Distilleries would also cease to make spirits to drink, because no man would drink their products. But all men are not so; and as they will drink whisky, let us not by oppressive laws so hamper its manufacture that only those who know, or have the means to enable them to learn, how by poisonous matter to so adulterate and increase its quantity from substances which do not enter into its legitimate make can produce this article. Put the law back as to these small distillers as it was in 1865 and you will get more money for taxes, be less annoyed by frauds, and save a vast amount of vexation not only to the revenue officer, but also to the manufacturers of pure liquors. I know very well that the revenue commissioners and some others have been waging a relentless war against small distillers. I remember the effort to put the tax up to $1,000, so that only men of great wealth could make whisky. But this or any other similar project is a war against the poor. As well say a man shall not make "wooden pails" unless he makes to the amount of $1,000 per month. Then again, I have heard this talk about the English system, where the Government itself makes or controls the manufacture of all the spirits or owns the distilleries.

Let us in this country have none of this English system, where the poor are ground to the very dust by the wealthy lords of the land; where men of capital have absolute control over all enterprise. Let us by wise and beneficent laws give the poor an equal chance with the rich to engage in whatever business the laws of the country allow to be carried on. The theory of our Government is that no class shall be privileged. Let us put it in practice. Let the tax on the product remain as it is; but let the law be so modified as to bear equally upon all. I trust that this House will see the propriety of this modification of doing justice to the poor, whom it is the duty of the Government to care for and protect.

One word further as to how this law affects the revenue. By this burdensome law now in existence the product of whisky in my own district alone is decreased from seventy-five thousand to one hundred and fifty thousand gallons per annum; and the loss to the revenue of the country is certainly $150,000, perhaps as much as $300,000; and my own is but little more than an average for my State. So that the decrease to the revenue alone from that State is not less than $1,350,000, and most likely to the extent of $2,500,000. Has the Government gained anything by crushing out these small distillers? Absolutely nothing. Other grain-growing and sparsely settled States, like my own, are affected in the same manner. The revenue commissioners are appalled at the apparent enormous decrease in the production of whisky. The decrease is only an apparent one, not real. So modify the law that the honest, poor man can engage in the manufacture, and let his reports be added to the reports of the honest man of wealth, and the increase of revenue will be as great from this source as has been the apparent decrease in the product of whisky. The revenue commissioners will not be appalled, except that frauds will be only one where now a hundred.

Reconstruction—Mr. Ward.

HO. OF REPS.

If by this law as now existing any less whisky would in the end be made, and any less drunk, I should not ask its modification. Less is made in certain localities; but this only gives the large manufacturer the chance himself to make the more, which he does, and sends it forth into all these rural districts, and by having the whole matter in his hands is enabled to cheapen whisky, because he can sell the more, and the consumption instead of being less is vastly more, and the effects of drinking this poison vastly more appalling. If this evil of making and drinking whisky—making is not an evil in itself but the drinking—is to be put an end to by law, let that law crush the great as well as the small maker.

Reconstruction.

SPEECH OF HON. A. H. WARD, OF KENTUCKY, IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, January 19, 1867.

The House having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 543) to provide for restoring to the States lately in insurrection their full political rights—

Mr. WARD, of Kentucky, said:

Mr. SPEAKER: A novice and almost a stranger upon this floor, I congratulate myself that I bear no scars inflicted by any member of this House, and no one can complain of any inflicted by me. I have heretofore engaged in no war of words, and do not therefore need the kind offices of the Reconstruction Committee.

It occurs to me that if the politicians of the country would teach and practice God's law of kindness instead of inculcating the doctrines of hate and vengeance between man and man and between section and section, you might discharge your joint Committee on Reconstruction; its occupation would be gone.

I find myself, Mr. Speaker, in a novel position in being called on to resist and condemn involuntary and compulsory secession. The people of the South in 1861, believing they had a right to secede from the Union, undertook to do so. This movement I opposed, because I then thought they were wrong. I did not think secession and rebellion could possibly remedy the evils complained of, but would be the fruitful source of incalculable and perhaps incurable mischiefs. The bill under consideration assumes that ten States, with a population of ten or twelve million white citizens, are out of the Union, foreign States, and their people aliens.

The distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] announces the startling fact that four years of war was prosecuted by the Government to turn ten States out of the Union and to make all of their white inhabitants slaves and aliens; not only so, but it is contended and asserted in the bill under consideration that these ten States have lost their State governments by the war.

Mr. Speaker, I have been taught to believe that the Constitution framed by our fathers invested Congress with the power to admit States into the Union, but gave that body no power to turn States out. The same great charter confers upon Congress power to pass uniform naturalization laws, but gives no power to destroy citizenship acquired under them. How, then, can Congress make aliens of native-born citizens? These southern States fought four long years to get out of the Union, and the contest was carried on by the Government of the United States to keep them in. This was what our bravest and best soldiers of the war fought for; they did not fight to turn these States out of the Union, nor to make aliens and slaves of the white people of the South. No one dared to announce such an infamous purpose as this. Gentlemen did not even dare at the commencement of the war to say that it was waged to free the negroes, who now boldly assume that it was waged to turn States out of the Union, to destroy their State constitutions, and to enslave their white population. I assume, Mr. Speaker, that the Constitution provides for the admission of States into the Union, and successful revolution can alone open the door for their exit.

It is true that the relations of these States to the General Government were suspended during the late unhappy war; but its successful termination at once restored the authority of the Constitution over all their territory and people. These ten States certainly were States before the war; if they are not States now, what are they? Certainly not Territories; no territorial governments have ever been or could be properly provided for them; and if their citizens are not citizens of the United States I would be obliged to the author of this bill if he will tell me of what country they are citizens?

In the exaction of all their duties to the General Government on the part of these ten States this Congress has repeatedly recognized them as such.

Mr. Speaker, the nation needs and must have repose; the war is over, but the whole surface of society is covered with frightful wounds, which must be healed. You cannot heal them by irritation nor by vindictive legislation. We must have peace, substantial, healthful peace; this can only be obtained by the speedy and complete restoration of all the white citizens of the late rebellious States to equal rights under the Constitution and laws. But gentlemen say that the people of these ten States cannot be safely trusted with a voice in the Government of the country, because they are disloyal. It seems to me a very important truth is overlooked in this line of argument. It is this: the people of the South did not make war upon our republican form of government nor seek to destroy it; they only sought to make two republics out of one. They are now and have been all the time as much attached to our system of free republican Government as those who abuse them for disloyalty.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that if gentlemen wanted to make these people hate our Government they could not devise a measure better calculated to accomplish that object than the one under consideration. It is natural for the citizen to love a good Government, which affords him perfect protection and perfect equality; but by what sort of reasoning do you expect him to love a Government which denies him every right of a freeman and degrades him by making him subservient to his former slave; and all this is accomplished by this bill in the most outrageous and odious manner. By its terms you declare all the white people of these ten States aliens, and at the same time, by the amendment of the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING,] you suspend the writ of habeas corpus in reference to these foreigners and proclaim martial law over all of these ten States.

Mr. Speaker, such a system of legislation as this must inevitably destroy the national credit and lead to national bankruptcy and ruin, and I fear its legitimate end will be frightful, bloody anarchy and final despotism. There is no rebellion now, no invasion threatened; the public safety is not endangered; then why suspend the writ of habeas corpus and proclaim martial law? Sir, we have had too much martial law already; in its practical operation it is military despotism.

Mr. Speaker, I honor the true soldier who perils his life in defense of constitutional liberty; but I would greatly prefer to meet him with the olive branch in his hand instead of the sword, dripping with the blood of his own countrymen. I want to see no more civil wars. I want to see my whole country united, prosperous, and happy.

Mr. Speaker, what is our condition at the end of this unhappy war? We have a debt of nearly three thousand million dollars hanging over the nation; and it will require the untrammeled brain and muscle of every man in America to pay it. What does the measure now before us propose? It not only proposes to make slaves of nearly one third of the white population of the United States, but it absolutely proposes an experiment which will cost this nation untold millions of treasure. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] or any other gentleman supposes that you can enslave ten or twelve million white people in the United States of America in this nineteenth century without the expenditure of a vast amount of blood and money, he is most egregiously mistaken.

Now, sir, what is the true policy of the Government in regard to these people? A nation cannot prosper unless its individual citizens are prosperous. When every individual is perfectly protected in his life, liberty, and property, he then invests his labor to advantage: he crowns his domestic board with plenty and accumulates a pile of surplus from which a rill of gold flows into the public Treasury.

Now, suppose you admit all these southern people to equal rights under the Constitution and laws; give them their representation here; do not thrust the hand of the Government into their pockets to take their money to sustain the Government and refuse them representation; let them come here and have an equal voice in making the laws under which they are to be taxed, and they will help you to pay the public debt.

I understand the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania to be opposed to closing the rebellion. He wants to put an appendix to it. He wants to continue it until he, with the aid of others, can make a "perfect Republic." Now, let us see how this is proposed to be done by the measure under consideration.

I will concede at the commencement of the argument upon this question that every man, not only in the United States, but every human being upon the face of God's earth, ought to be free, provided he is capable of governing himself; and I say, at the same time, that the man who governs himself is free, and that he who is governed by somebody else is a slave, be he white or black.

Now, I say, Mr. Speaker, that this proposition undertakes to regulate man's right of self-government in the following manner, as provided in sections four, five, and six of the bill under consideration. The fourth section provides—

That the persons who shall be entitled to vote at both of said elections shall be as follows: all male citizens above the age of twenty-one years who have resided six months in said State and ten days within the election district; and no person shall be deprived of the right to vote, or otherwise disfranchised, by reason of conviction and punishment for any crime other than for insurrection or treason or misprision of treason.

The sixth section disfranchises every man who renounced his allegiance to the United States and swore allegiance to the confederate government. But let us look at the proviso. It provides—

That on taking the following oath the party being otherwise qualified shall be allowed to vote and hold office:

I, A. B., do solemnly swear, on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, that on the 4th day of March, 1864, and at all times thereafter, I would willingly have complied with the requirements of the proclamation of the President of the United States, issued on the 8th day of December, 1863, had a safe opportunity of so doing been allowed me; that on the said 4th of March, 1864, and at all times thereafter, I was opposed to the continuance of the rebellion, and to the so-called confederate government, and voluntarily gave no aid or encouragement thereto, but earnestly desired the success of the Union and the suppression of all armed resistance to the Government of the United States; and that I will henceforth faithfully support the Constitution of the United States, and the Union of the States thereunder.

These are qualifications for suffrage embraced in that section. But there is another section on the same subject. The fifth section reads as follows:

And be it further enacted, That the word citizen, as used in this act, shall be construed to mean all persons born in the United States or duly naturalized. Any male citizen above the age of twenty-one years shall be competent to be elected to act as delegate to said convention.

The fourth section of the bill provides that no person shall be debarred from exercising the right of suffrage on account of having been convicted of any crime.

Now, what is the effect, I ask you, of these provisions? Why, sir, in the first place every man who ever committed manslaughter, rape, arson, or burglary, and was thus rendered infamous and disfranchised by a judgment of conviction, is to be a prominent and qualified voter in the reconstruction of these States. And not only that. There is the temptation held out in the proviso to the sixth section to every man in the confederate States to commit perjury. The man who went into the rebellion from interested motives, or a mere camp follower, may take this oath, while the man who fought honestly and manfully to carry out that idea will not take it, because he cannot do so truly; he will not perjure himself. You will catch all who will swear falsely, and you will lose all who have integrity enough to swear truthfully.

In addition to that, what do you get under the suffrage regulations of this bill? You get the votes of all the negroes, the votes of men who have learned the science of self-government in the school of slavery for nearly two hundred years. You get the convicts of the penitentiary, all of the jail-birds and unparadoned scoundrels who prey upon society, the men who would perjure themselves by swearing they were opposed to the cause for which they were fighting; and this is what the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania calls a perfect Republic. All of the people who have honesty enough to say what they are and what they have been, are disfranchised. And this is the perfection of a Republic in the estimation of the distinguished Pennsylvanian.

But how does the thing work if you look at it a little further? The constitution is to be made in this manner: Congress is to elect three commissioners who are to select judges of election; and I suppose they will select them without distinction of race or color—bound to do it. I suppose that they will be guilty of a violation of the sentiment which seems to prevail in this House if they make any distinction as to race or color in the judges. I suppose the judges must be loyal, and of course they will be of the colored race. Now, these gentlemen sit there as judges of the election with the Army of the United States at their back to keep the peace at the polls, as gentlemen say. Sir, we have had some of these peace-makers at the polls in Kentucky, and God forbid that we should ever see such peace-makers again. They were put at the polls for base and infamous partisan purposes; they were put there to disfranchise the free, qualified voters of my State.

Now, these negro judges will sit and hold this election, backed by the United States Army. That is rather an elevated position for the new-made freedman; the habeas corpus suspended, martial law proclaimed, the Army at the back of the negro conducting an election to reconstruct States. [Laughter.] I suppose the Freedmen's Bureau men will have something to do with it as it progresses. Now, look at it. Congress finding the negro incapable of self-government, passes an act creating the Freedmen's Bureau to govern him. Congress controls the Freedmen's Bureau, the Freedmen's Bureau governs the negro, and the negro, with the United States Army at his back, governs the white men, [laughter;] and this is what the gentleman is pleased to call a perfect Republic. [Laughter.]

Why, sir, I hope I may be pardoned for alluding to a caricature that I once saw. It was a picture of an old lady flourishing a broomstick over the head of her husband, with a negro in the background holding a dog by the neck, and flourishing an uplifted lash, with these words issuing from the mouth of the darkey: "Missus whips massa, massa licks me, and so you infernal dog I gib you dedebbil." [Great laughter.] Congress backs the Freedmen's Bureau, the bureau backs the darkey, and the negro gives the white man the devil, [renewed laughter;] and this is your perfect Republic!

But gentlemen undertake to say, when this constitution is thus formed and presented to Congress, Congress are to pass upon it, and say whether they will approve it or not, or whether they will make it over again. Do gentlemen assume that Congress has power to make a constitution for a State or Territory either? I deny it. There is not a vestige of authority for it anywhere. There is not a line in the Constitution, which is the great charter, that authorizes Congress to make a constitution for a State. The States have the right to make their own constitutions, to alter or amend the same as they please. Congress only has the power to guaranty to the States republican forms of government; and if you confer this power upon the negroes of the ten States it is very likely they will exercise it in their own way.

Now, the gentleman from Pennsylvania really contemplates that at some future day in the dim distance these people of the seceded States are to be restored. Suppose that Cuffy, when he comes to make a constitution, shall think better of his former master, and should happen not to hate him so bitterly as the author of this bill seems to do, and shall make a constitution declaring that all of the white men over twenty-one years of age shall vote without being naturalized, will you reject his constitution on that account? Why, sir, how long, I would like to know, do gentlemen propose to keep these people of the seceded States out? How long do you think it is necessary to keep them in a state of bondage before they will learn to love the authors of their oppression and graduate in loyalty and the science of self-government?

The rule adopted in regard to the negro is, that he is eminently qualified and has learned to be perfectly fitted for freedom by a probation of two hundred years in slavery. Do you propose to hold the white population of these ten States in a preparatory state for two hundred years? Or how much short of that will you stop? You intend finally to restore them; you think that having felt the chains of bondage around his neck and the manacles upon his wrist the white man there will have learned to love a Government which should owe its strength to the approbation and consent of those governed by it. You propose to teach him to love the Government by smiting him through that Government; you undertake to make him loyal by persecuting him. You undertake to punish a man who has been pardoned for all his political sins; and this is the perfection of a republic.

Now, I am glad the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] proposes at some time to restore these people. I am one of those who think that the longer a man is free the more capable he becomes of being free and exercising the rights of a freeman; and the longer you keep a man in bondage, the more likely he is to remain in bondage and the less capacity he is likely to acquire to throw off his bondage. When a man is free I am in favor of keeping him free. But these gentlemen here say that at some future time they intend to let these people come back.

There was a man who once came to my neighborhood and preached what he called the doctrine of restoration in reference to a better and higher world. He said that all sinners would finally be restored to the enjoyment of paradise, and be permitted to walk the streets of the New Jerusalem; but he said they would first have to go to the place of perdition, the pit that burns with fire and brimstone, and stay there until they had expiated all their sins. An old man who was present and heard him, one who was noted more for his straightforward and blunt language than for his piety, got up and said: "Why, brother, after I have been in that sulphur and fire burning long enough to have all my sins burned out of me, don't you think I would be a d—d pretty singe cat to go to heaven?" [Great laughter.] And that is what the gentleman is pleased to call a perfection of the Republic.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I would like to ask the gentleman if the preacher Nasby lives in his district? [Laughter.]

Mr. WARD, of Kentucky. I have always understood that he came from Indiana. [Roars of laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, the proposition under consideration not only proposes to dissolve the Union, but it proposes to dissolve it prospectively and indefinitely: it not only proposes to break up the Union now, but it proposes to lay the foundation for breaking it up indefinitely hereafter. It is assumed that the majority of Congress can do pretty nearly everything. I thought when I came here, having occasionally read the Constitution of my country, that the Constitution of the United States, like the fiat of the Great Creator of the universe, who, when He divided the sea from the land, said to the sea "Thus far shalt thou come, and no further"—I thought the Constitution of the United States absolutely restricted the power of legislation; yet some gentlemen here seem to think they can do almost everything. They assume that they can not only expel ten States from the Union at one blow, but also lay the foundation for their indefinite exclusion at the pleasure of the majority of any future Congress.

There is a provision in this very bill which says that if the right of suffrage and any other rights be in any manner restricted or denied by any of these States to the negro then that State shall be excluded from its representation upon the floor of Congress. Is it possible that such a precedent as that is to be established here? Suppose that the majority should be the other way, and not be, as it is now, in favor of New England and New England ideas. New England is now the largest slave-owner in the world, and under your tariff system all of the other States are her tributaries. These southern States are not considered republican in form because they once held slaves. And New England leads the van in this war upon the southern people. Yet New England to-day claims to own ten or twelve million white slaves; and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] says she obtained them by conquest. Now, is it possible that a free republic can fight to make ten or twelve million people slaves and still be a free Government? Can a republic make ten or twelve millions of its own citizens slaves by conquest? No, sir; to do that would be simply an act of suicide. Suppose, then, that there should be a majority here that would differ with the present majority in this House; and suppose they should undertake to say that New England, having at this particular juncture of affairs claimed to be the owner of ten or twelve million white people, and, therefore, her government was not republican in form, and therefore that a majority in Congress should say, "You must walk out!" that Congress would have as much right to turn her six States out as you have to say these ten southern States are out now.

I ask gentlemen to pause before they indulge in this kind of legislation. What are to be its effects upon the country? You undertake to hold these people in bondage, at an expense of one, two, or three hundred million dollars per annum. You establish a system of martial law. I believe the estimates of the Army and Navy reach about one hundred million dollars for the current year. If you carry out your system of martial law and suspension of the habeas corpus and your negro governments at the South, you will need at least $250,000,000 annually. I ask you whether the toiling millions of this nation are prepared to pay $250,000,000 per annum for the exceeding great luxury of holding our own countrymen in bondage, and this, too, while a national debt of about three thousand million dollars is hanging like a millstone round the nation's neck, and the people already overburdened with taxation to pay it? Can this scheme be carried out in the critical condition and peculiar character of the currency? What sort of a currency have you? About three hundred million dollars of the circulation of the national banks, based upon what? Simply upon the nation's promises to pay, the interest which the Government pays upon its bonds being the only metal that enters into the arrangement. Three hundred million dollars of circulation, and a few pitiful thousands upon which to sustain it! Why, sir, here you have a pyramid inverted, with an exceedingly narrow apex. What upholds it? Nothing but the atmosphere of popular confidence in the public credit. Carry out your revolutionary schemes; pursue your experiments with the liberties of the white people of this country, at the expense of two or three hundred million dollars per annum, and I ask you how the people can be expected to have confidence in your credit. Suppose this fabric topples over, what becomes of the Government securities? Your bonds become worthless; all the material interests of the country are damaged and almost destroyed. Yet gentlemen are asking us to pass this bill under the idea that it makes the Government a perfected Republic.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this whole system of legislation which has for its object retaliation and vengeance. The nation cannot afford to indulge in it. It is too expensive, not only in money, but it may cost the whole nation its safety. I implore gentlemen to abandon it. It is said by the distinguished gentleman who proposes this bill that, if we regard this measure as one of punishment, these people have deserved it. Gentlemen are all the time saying that treason must be made odious. They cling to the idea of punishment. It seems to me that war—a civil war like that through which we have passed—brings its own punishment. What more do you want than the punishment which the war has inflicted? The commerce of the southern people has been destroyed; their towns and cities have been burned; their fields desolated and stained with blood; wives have been widowed and children made orphans; and amid the desolation they are threatened with famine and crying for bread. Yet gentlemen say, "Revenge, crucify, punish—still punish."

"Alas, for the rarity
Of Christian charity
Under the sun!"

These children cry for bread, and you give them vengeance. You not only refuse to feed the body—you absolutely refuse to feed their minds. A few days ago there was passed in this House a resolution denying to the States lately engaged in the rebellion the scrip that was appropriated by Congress to educate the children. "God said, 'Let there be light!'" but this House says, by its vote, "Let darkness prevail!" You are in favor of darkness, because you shut out intellectual light. You propose to "make treason odious" by punishing the poor children and shutting the light of education from their minds. I ask gentlemen whether they expect to restore the Union by such legislation. Why, this is only one specimen of it. In my own State, and in the other border States, commissioners have been appointed by this Government to value the slaves that were enlisted in the Army of the United States. By a bill which has recently passed both Houses of Congress those commissioners are to be suspended in the exercise of their functions, the money is to be held, and the obligation, I suppose, finally repudiated. It seems to me repudiation—nothing but repudiation; although this House, in conjunction with the Senate, originally passed a law, before the negroes were enlisted, proposing to pay their former masters for them, they did it by solemn enactment, and afterward, at the last session I believe they reenacted the law and said it should be paid to the loyal owners. But now what have you done? When you want to uphold the nation's credit, when you want to restore the confidence of the public, you set the example of repudiation. A great nation cannot preserve its respectability among nations unless it pays all of its just debts. "Pay what thou owest" is the law of God and the law of the land. The nation ought to pay, and ought not to set the example of repudiation. I warn gentlemen on that subject. If you expect the people to be satisfied with the Government and uphold it, if you will make it strong and make peace permanent, you must not commence by repudiating what you owe the people of certain States and then turn round and tax them for what is due to you. You must pay all justly and fairly, or else repudiate all. The laws of the land must be executed fairly and justly; and I hope this House will reconsider that subject, and in some shape reassert its purpose to pay what it owes our people whose slaves enlisted in the Army.

Mr. Speaker, I have experienced some difficulty in making myself heard on account of severe cold and hoarseness; but I felt constrained by an imperative sense of duty to enter my solemn protest against the passage of this bill, believing as I do that if the provisions of this measure and others now pending in this Congress of a similar character be carried out the nation's credit must be destroyed, the Government securities rendered worthless, and the stability of the Government rendered so uncertain that capital will seek a safer place of investment, and I greatly fear that our free Republic, of which we have all felt so proud, will be converted into a military despotism at no distant day.

Mr. Speaker, I promised to give my friend from Ohio [Mr. LE BLOND] a few minutes of my time, which I now cheerfully yield to him.

SPEECH OF HON. L. S. TRIMBLE,

OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 21, 1867.

The House having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 543) to provide for restoring to the States lately in insurrection their full political rights—

Mr. TRIMBLE said:

Mr. SPEAKER: If I know the feelings of my own heart, I entertain a sincere and honest desire to see a thorough restoration of all the States to all their rights under the Constitution. I am in favor of peace, and wish to see every interest of the country prosper. I believe

"Peace hath her victories
No less renowned than war."

More glorious because they are bloodless, deriving their highest luster from the numbers saved instead of slain. Hence I am not in favor of the passage of the bill now under consideration or the substitute of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS;] for I believe under them we cannot have peace, that under them every right of the States and every right of the citizens of those States embraced by their provisions will be trampled under foot.

The bill declares, in the first place, that the ten States of the South are out of the Union, denies them representation upon this floor or a voice in their State governments, and proposes to establish in lieu of the governments now in those States governments to be set up and put in operation by Congress, through the agency of commissioners and military despots with no responsibility to the people, disfranchising a large portion of the people of that section. The most intelligent and best citizens are to be reduced to serfs. I ask where is the authority, where is the power, under the Constitution of the United States to so treat these people?

The people of the South attempted to get out of the Union by and through secession; did they succeed? Was secession triumphant, and did they, by the act of secession, dissolve the Union? If they did not, then will this Congress, and by this very act break up the Union and place the people of the South where they could not place themselves by secession or by revolution? The illegal and unconstitutional acts of the northern States, with the attempt on the part of the southern States to establish a government of their own, did not and cannot dissolve the Union. This unnecessary and cruel war cost this Government six thousand millions at least of treasure and an amount of blood unparalleled in the history of human warfare. But that did not take them out of the Union. But, sir, if this bill shall become a law, in my opinion it will bring upon the country another civil war with all its direful consequences; and I fear it may cost us as much blood and treasure as the late unfortunate struggle, ending in a total disruption of the Union and loss of the liberties of the people. I ask members to pause and reflect before passing this act. The step once taken it may never be in your power to recall it, and I appeal to you to stay your hands, do as you would have others do unto you, and give to these people the rights you claim for yourselves, to which they are equally entitled under the Constitution.

Now, sir, under what authority, under what clause in the Constitution, do you find any warrant for this bill? Not even under the constitutional amendment that is now pending and unaccepted as yet by the people—neither can it be, giving it the votes of all the northern States—can you find a shadow of authority or justice for the monstrous provisions contained in this bill. In the first place it puts upon trial ten States of this Union, arraigns them at the bar of Congress, adjudges them guilty of high crime, and denies them all rights, including those that are inalienable. They are not heard; they have no representation here; they have not the benefit of counsel, no one to plead their cause. By this act you dissolve their connection with the Government of the United States, blot them out of existence as freemen, and degrade them to the condition of negro Commonwealths.

The war did not destroy the States. It was carried on by the Government, as you solemnly declared, for the avowed purpose of maintaining the Union and preventing disunion, to preserve the national authority throughout the entire country, to enforce obedience on the part of the revolted States to the Constitution and the laws passed in pursuance thereof. It was so declared in the celebrated Crittenden resolution; it was so declared by Congress again and again; it was so declared by President Lincoln and Secretary Seward. It was expressly declared and reiterated by every speaker in the land who advocated the war that the sole purpose and object of the war was to maintain the Union, not to dissolve and break it up and by it to crucify the States and State constitutions. Without that declared purpose I do not believe the support that was given to it could have been wielded in the manner that it was.

Besides, Congress has recognized these States as States from the beginning of the struggle up to the present hour. The very bill that I have before me, and the substitute of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, characterizes them as States. Congress by the act of the 4th of March, 1862, so recognized them, and to-day this House recognizes that act, as follows:

"That from and after the 3d day of March, 1863, the number of members of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States shall be two hundred and forty-one, and the eight additional members shall be assigned one each to Connecticut, Ohio, Kentucky, Illinois, Iowa, Minnesota, Vermont, and Rhode Island, approved March 4, 1862."

Fixing two hundred and forty-one as the number of members of this House, only one hundred and ninety-one hold seats here. Thus admitting by the law, as it now stands, that South Carolina is entitled to four Representatives, North Carolina to seven, Virginia to eight, Mississippi to five, Alabama to seven, Arkansas to three, Louisiana to five, Florida to one, Georgia to seven, and Texas to three; but by your action overriding this law and the great constitutional right of representation. This act declares that the lower House of Congress shall consist of two hundred and forty-one members; we have upon this floor to-day less than that number by fifty. Besides this, you were fearful the President would not send this amendment to the southern States, and you passed a resolution instructing the President of the United States or your clerk to send to each of the States of this Union the proposed amendment to the Constitution for their approval. No one has ever yet declared here, so far as the action of the southern States is concerned, any objection to their ratifying amendments that suit the purposes and objects of the party in power.

If I recollect, during the last session of this Congress in the midst of a speech of some gentleman, (I believe the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who was arguing at that time these States were dead,) he was stopped while a telegram was read from the Governor of Alabama announcing the pleasing intelligence to the majority here that that State had passed the constitutional amendment and desired to be counted as the twenty-seventh State. That was received by members all over the House with plaudits and cheers, thus recognizing the right of the State of Alabama to pass upon this question. And the same doctrine was enunciated to the country upon the adoption of that amendment by the State of Alabama.

So all the time throughout the discussion and excitement upon this question, the southern States have been recognized as States. Why Louisiana, Tennessee, and other States had Representatives upon this floor long after the outbreak of the war; and the distinguished gentleman who now occupies the White House was a Senator from the State of Tennessee, and was nominated by the party in power as Vice President while the war was in progress. If those States are out now, Tennessee was certainly out then. You are committed, in my judgment, to the doctrine that these States have never been out of the Union. And I defy your power to put them out in the manner proposed.

I take it that if there is any constitutional authority or power anywhere to pass this bill, it is to be found in the Constitution itself, and not in the last amendment proposed that is now pending; because I suppose no one will claim or assert here that that amendment as it now stands has passed. It is defeated as it stands before the people of the United States to-day. To ratify it requires the vote of three fourths of the State Legislatures. It has been submitted to all the States. The existence of the southern States as members of this Union has been recognized by the Executive and by Congress, and cannot be denied successfully before the Supreme Court of the United States, or any other tribunal in the United States, in my opinion. It has not received the sanction of enough States to entitle it to become the organic law of the land. If it had, this bill would be in plain and direct violation of that amendment itself, because that amendment declares that "all persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the States wherein they reside," and that "no State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of any citizen of the United States," &c.

That is the amendment; but this bill proposes to disfranchise three fourths of all the white people of the South and degrade them to the position of slaves, denying them a voice in the affairs of their States or to be represented in the councils of the nation. I say that this bill is a plain violation of that amendment of the Constitution, because under this bill all persons are disfranchised who come within the provisions which I will now read. It is as follows:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That all persons who on the 4th day of March, 1861, were of full age who held office, either civil or military, under the government called the "confederate States of America," or who swore allegiance to said government, are hereby declared to have forfeited their citizenship and to have renounced allegiance to the United States, and shall not be entitled to exercise the elective franchise, or hold office, until five years after they shall have filed their intention or desire to be reinvested with the right of citizenship, and shall swear allegiance to the United States and renounce allegiance to all other Governments or pretended governments.

Who, I ask, can vote under this clause? Can any honest native of the South? The object and purpose of this last constitutional amendment was to prevent the disfranchisement of the black race or to endow them with the right of suffrage. But the object and purpose of this bill is to give the right of suffrage to the blacks and to disfranchise the whites.

Now, if that amendment to the Constitution is the law for the party in power, and it was the party cry upon which you went to the country at the last election, why, I ask, do you come here now and seek by the provisions of this bill to disfranchise three fourths or four fifths of the white population of the South? Is not that making a discrimination between races? But I suppose that that is all right if the discrimination is against white men, in the estimation of the majority here.

What else do we find? We find that this is a bill of attainder and an ex post facto law. By its provisions you try these people, condemn, and execute them in their absence. It not only destroys them as States, but it ruins them as individuals and deprives them of their rights as freemen. The constitutional amendment says:

"Nor shall any State deprive any person of life liberty, or property, without due process of law."

Now, if a State has not the power to do this, to deprive a citizen of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, where is there authority in the Federal Government to thus deprive the people of the South of the dearest right of freemen, the right of suffrage? Sir, you may take my land; you may take my slaves and everything else I possess; but all that dwindles into insignificance when compared with this monstrous outrage, depriving me of the inalienable right of the American citizen, the right of suffrage. In God's name leave me a freeman not a slave!

What does this bill do further? It fixes the conduct of elections in the hands of the military and of commissioners appointed by Congress. It overrides that provision of the Constitution of the United States which declares that—

"The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for the most numerous branch of the General Assembly."

The right of the people to manage their own affairs by means of State organizations is one of the rights which in my judgment never was surrendered to the Federal Government. And the only power possessed by Congress or by the executive department is the power expressly delegated by the Constitution itself. The Constitution says:

"All powers not delegated by the States to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people."

When did the States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, four of the original thirteen States, surrender, by constitutional amendment or otherwise, to the Federal Government the right to say who shall be entitled to the right of suffrage in those States? They never did surrender that right; and Congress has no such power under the Constitution of the United States. To do so will be usurpation and despotism.

Sir, is this the sort of government contemplated by the Constitution of the United States, which declares that it shall be the duty of the Federal Government to protect and defend the States in the exercise of a republican form of government? Is it republican to deprive these people of the right of suffrage, of any voice in their local affairs? I ask you further, if it is just and proper that the people of the South shall be disfranchised as it is proposed to do by the provisions of this bill, while the millions of recently emancipated slaves in that country should be endowed with the highest title of sovereignty? Is it fair and right to bestow this right upon them and deny it to the descendants of Lafayette and Kosciusko who may come to this country until they shall have been here five years? Is the freedman better qualified to manage the affairs of this country than the intelligent foreigner? If not, then why make the foreigner go through a schooling or training of five years before he is endowed with the right of suffrage, or why should that right be denied to the free-born white citizen of the United States?

I have ever believed that the perpetuity, the very existence of this Government depends upon the intelligence and patriotism of those upon which the duty falls of controlling its destiny through the ballot-box. If you would preserve the Government in all its purity and integrity, you should preserve the elective franchise, and place it in the hands of those competent to wield it to the honor and safety and dignity of the Government. Have we any evidence going to show that we should continue to prosper under the state of affairs proposed by this bill, with the ruling classes heretofore now made subservient to their former slaves, and the slaves placed in power over them? I tremble for my country when I contemplate the possibility of this proposition being carried into execution. As I already have said, I appeal to members here to pause before they commit this fatal mistake, before they make this stab at the very existence of our Government as ordained by our fathers. I desire to see it protected and perpetuated for all time in all its justice and purity.

What else do we find in this bill? We find that according to the provisions of this bill when this Union shall have been restored its continuance will depend upon the whim and caprice of any State. According to this bill should its provisions be violated by any State that State is to be sent back to the condition which it now occupies, the condition of being virtually out of the Union—taxed, but denied equality and representation. Now, is that constitutional, is that in accordance with the ideas of those great men who ushered into being this great and glorious Government of ours under the Constitution? Did they ever suppose that the right of any State in this Union, and especially of any of the States that made the Constitution itself, would ever thus be put in jeopardy? I do not believe it; no sane man or jurist ever did believe it heretofore.

Nor do I believe, Mr. Speaker, that if this bill ever becomes the law of the land it will be allowed to remain upon the statute-book for twelve months. Whenever reason shall have resumed its sway, the people who are now so anxious for the passage of this bill will see the workings of it, and will with their own hands obliterate it from the statute-book with the seal of their condemnation and that of every friend of law and of order.

What further do we find in this bill? An amendment was offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING,] and accepted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] That amendment is as follows:

And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act, and until the said States in rebellion shall be admitted to representation in Congress as aforesaid, the provisions of the writ of habeas corpus shall be suspended in Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Texas, Alabama, Louisiana, Mississippi, and Arkansas; and said districts of country are hereby placed under martial law for and during the whole term aforesaid.

Just think of it. This country is to be again placed under martial law, and that, too, at a time when there is profound peace, when the laws are being executed from one end of this country to the other, and as well executed in the southern States, I have no doubt, as in any other portion of the country. And that is to be done in plain violation of the Constitution of the United States, which each one of us upon this floor has sworn to support. You object to governments and officers elected while martial law prevailed in the South. The opposite side of the House are estopped from objections on that ground: after giving their countenance and aid to elections in my State, held by the military in 1863, electing members to Congress, without whose votes you could not have passed the first amendment, in open and known violation of the will of the legal voters of that State.

The Constitution declares that—

"The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it."

Why, sir, this very bill speaks of those States as "States lately in rebellion." No man asserts, because the facts will not warrant him in doing so, that those States are in rebellion to-day. Eighteen months or more have passed since the last armed confederate laid down his arms. Peace has prevailed from one end of this country to the other. Yet, in the face of this fact, we have this monstrous proposition—to declare martial law in ten States of this Union; and in making this declaration we, in my judgment, step upon the mangled ruins of the Constitution; for the Constitution plainly gives this power neither to the executive nor the legislative department of the Government. In this position I am sustained by the highest tribunal in this land. Let me read two short extracts from the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in the celebrated case of ex parte Milligan and others.

"No graver question was ever considered by this court, nor one which more nearly concerns the rights of the whole people; for it is the birthright of every American citizen, when charged with crime, to be tried and punished according to law. The power of punishment is alone through the means which the laws have provided for that purpose; and if they are ineffectual there is an immunity from punishment, no matter how great an offender the individual may be, or how much his crimes may have shocked the sense of justice of the country or deranged its safety. By the protection of the law human rights are secured; withdraw that protection, and they are at the mercy of wicked rulers or the clamor of an excited people."

Time has proved the discernment of our ancestors, for even these provisions, [referring to the provisions of the Constitution designed to protect the personal liberties of the people] expressed in such plain English words that it would seem the ingenuity of man could not evade them, are now, after the lapse of more than seventy years, sought to be avoided. Those great and good men foresaw that troublesome times would arise when rulers and people would become restive under restraint, and seek by sharp and decisive measures to accomplish ends deemed just and proper; and that the principles of constitutional liberty would be in peril unless established by irrevocable law. The history of the world had taught them that what was done in the past might be attempted in the future. The Constitution of the United States is a law for rulers and people equally in war and in peace, and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men at all times and under all circumstances. No doctrine involving more pernicious consequences was ever invented by the wit of man than that any of its provisions can be suspended during any of the great exigencies of Government. Such a doctrine leads directly to anarchy or despotism; but the theory of necessity on which it is based is false, for the Government within the Constitution has all the powers granted to it which are necessary to preserve its existence, as has been happily proved by the result of the great effort to throw off its just authority."

I am admonished why read from the Constitution or decisions of the highest tribunal in the land to a body whose voice can make and overthrow constitutions, executives, and the courts.

Under the Constitution the people of the South have the right, if they are accused of any crime against the Government of the United States, to be tried by a jury; for the Constitution declares that—

"The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury; and such trial shall be held in the State where the said crimes shall have been committed; but when not committed within any State the trial shall be at such place or places as the Congress may by law have directed."

With the same regard for the rights of the citizen when accused of crime, the Constitution provides that—

"No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia when in actual service, in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself; nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law."

These constitutional provisions are the shield behind which the humblest citizen of the South can stand, and, in my humble judgment, protect himself from the operation of the provisions of this bill. I believe that this protection will be given by the courts under the Constitution.

Much complaint has been made because the Legislatures of the southern States have not adopted the constitutional amendment submitted by Congress at the last session. I think myself that the southern States have already adopted one amendment too many. I trust that they will not adopt another. Why has any one the right to complain because those States refuse to adopt a proposed constitutional amendment? Why is an amendment submitted to those States unless it is expected that they shall exercise their free choice in regard to its ratification or rejection? If it is fore-ordained that a particular proposition for amendment shall become the law of the land, why go through the mockery of submitting to the people of the South a proposition upon which they are to exercise no freedom of choice? Why should not the southern States exercise the right to determine such questions in the manner which they deem to be demanded by their interests or self-respect? I would not ask Massachusetts to accept an amendment changing the organic law of the land unless that old Commonwealth believed that the adoption of that amendment would conduce to her interests and promote the welfare of the entire country. Nor would I ask the people of the South to accept an amendment which, in my judgment, barter away the rights and liberties of the best, the most intelligent portion of that entire country.

In my view there can be no doubt that this bill in its present shape comes within the definition of a bill of attainder and ex post facto law. It proposes to make criminal retrospectively acts which were not criminal at the time of their commission. It proposes to inflict punishment upon those whose guilt, whatever it may have been, has been wiped out by the pardoning power of the President of the United States. Three fourths or more of the people of the southern States have been, under the amnesty proclamation of the President of the United States, (about whose power in the premises there can be no question,) relieved from all the pains and penalties to which they were liable by reason of their participation in the late rebellion.

Attainder is the stain or corruption of blood which arises from being condemned for any crime. When and where, by what court and jury, were these people tried by law and found guilty? You have not tried Jefferson Davis nor convicted him, neither do I believe you can under the Constitution and laws.

They are free from that offense so far as the Constitution of the United States and the pardoning power can free them; and that frees them to all intents and purposes, in my judgment, as any man could be freed from any past offense. If that be so, I ask, then, if this bill is not a bill of attainder, and ex post facto?

And the only authority that exists, in my judgment, either in the national Government or in these States, to deprive any free-born white citizen of Texas or of South Carolina of any of the constitutional rights I have enumerated is by trial and conviction by a jury of that State for the commission of some offense the penalty for which has been fixed by law prior to its commission.

By the Constitution certain duties were imposed upon the several States, and the exercise of certain of their powers was restrained, which implied their continued existence as States. But to remove all doubt an amendment was added which declared that the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people. The reserved rights of the States are treated by this bill as nullities, not worth the paper on which they were written.

I have ever believed and sincerely believe to-day that the only way or hope to save this Union and preserve the life of the nation will be to preserve inviolate the Constitution. Tell me not that you can preserve my life after you have torn out my heart; it is as idle to talk of preserving this nation by overthrowing her Constitution. Under no circumstance conceivable by the human mind have I or would I ever consent to violate that Constitution for any purpose. I will cling to it as the last hope of freedom, as the bond of unity in the past, as the only practical bond of union in the future, the only land lifted above the waters to which the ark of the Union can be moored. From that ark alone will go out the dove, which shall return bringing the olive-branch of peace and the guarantee of constitutional liberty.

I am for peace, for the Constitution and laws passed in pursuance thereof. It may be a crime; if so I confess it. Already have our quarrels filled the country with mourning, with widows and with orphans that to-day appeal to Heaven for aid and sympathy. Why pursue these unfortunate differences? Let by-gones be by-gones; let us act for the living, with charity to all and malice to none, upon living issues, issues upon which we are to be saved or lost as a nation. I entreat you to pause in your career of madness and folly, of unequal and unconstitutional legislation. Repeal your Freedmen's Bureau bill, your civil rights bill, your test oath; grant a general amnesty; make good your Crittenden resolution; declare to the South and to the world that this is a republican Government in the true sense of that term, that we derive our just powers from the consent of the governed.

Mr. Speaker, by this act you blot out ten stars from that flag now waving over your chair. Desecrate not that flag, I entreat you, by mutilation or by tearing from its folds ten or one single star; let it continue to greet the breezes of heaven as the ensign of thirty-six coequal States united by a just Government, shedding its blessings upon all like the dews of heaven. Let there be one refuge secure from tyranny and oppression; let that glorious refuge be here in the United States of America.

The spirit now dominant in this House and rampant throughout the North not only mock at gray hairs and tramples on the lessons of experience, but regards with impatience and ill-disguised contempt every appeal in behalf of the rights of States or the guarantees of that Constitution you have all sworn to support. Stop! stop! says the extreme loyalist. We have had a terrible rebellion, we are fresh from the scenes of carnage and of war where our brothers have been slain. Can this be plead to extenuate or relieve you from your oath and duty to the Constitution of our fathers? No, never. Sir, the fierce bay of the bloodhound on the warm track of his prey devours the calm voice of reason and the soft pleadings of humanity. Who that realizes the moral accountability of nations can doubt that we have fallen upon evil days?

In this great crisis, oh! that some great and good voice that never counseled aught to dishonor or injure this Union would rise, as if from the grave, and expose the specious pretexts on which a further prosecution of this war is now being waged upon a brave and vanquished people.

Sir, they are our brothers. To what end do you further persecute them? Born a few miles south of us, from a common ancestry, with a common inheritance, who indeed formed the Union of these States.

I am frank to say I do not believe that the people who for four long years held at bay and often drove back nearly one million Federal troops can be reduced to subjection (by unconstitutional laws) and the negroes established as the dominant race. If so they have degenerated from their noble ancestors who drove back the British at King's mountain and upon the plains of New Orleans. Sir, if you do not intend to have a Union under the Constitution upon terms of equality you had better at once let the South go in peace, for no brave people ever did or ever will submit long to such taxes and laws as now proposed—virtually slaves without representation. Our forefathers fought for representation. They established the principle by the offering of their lives and their blood that representation and taxation should go together. Is that principle less dear to American freemen to-day? No, sir; it will continue to glow and burn until again enshrined in the hearts of every true American in this land, and woe to the man or party that stands in the way of this inalienable right.

From recent indications the last citadel of liberty, the Supreme Court, must bow to the behests of party. God forbid! Save us from such humiliation! Be it said to the honor of the courts in all ages of the world they were the last to forsake the rights of the citizen. In our own they have not been the instruments used to take the lives and liberties of innocent men and women. May that august tribunal continue with all its power and dignity under the Constitution as the shield and protector of the weak and the innocent through all time.

SPEECH OF HON. ELIJAH HISE, OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 21, 1867.

The House having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 543) to provide for restoring to the States lately in insurrection their full political rights—

Mr. HISE said:

Mr. SPEAKER: If I occupy any time to-night in the discussion of the subject now before the House it will be of course not to enlighten the members here nor to produce any conviction upon the minds of gentlemen united in this House in support of this and other measures to which I am opposed. My only object is to avail myself of this the only opportunity I shall have, I presume, to present some views I entertain on this subject, in order that the facts stated and the arguments urged may go to the country and go especially to my constituents for their information and instruction, if what I may say will furnish any. The reporters will please take down what I have to say as I have no written speech prepared. I am in the habit of relying upon the current of my own thoughts, the spontaneous flow of ideas in my mind, and on the inspiration of the moment for what I may say.

Mr. Speaker, I was asked, in the progress of my remarks on a former occasion, while speaking in the Committee of the Whole, by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] who is not now present, and for whose cultivated intellect I entertain a high respect—I was asked whether or not it was my opinion that the fact of the Republican, now commonly known as the Radical, party, had risen into power, whether their advent to power, their obtention of authority, both in the executive and legislative departments of the Government, was a sufficient cause for precipitating the country into a war by the southern States in their acts of secession and their subsequent attempts to establish and achieve their own independence? I instantly answered, in the hurry of the moment, that I thought not, and I would still give the same answer.

Although there had been causes engendering for a great number of years which occasioned strife and animosity between the States in which slavery did not exist and the States in which it did, and which were well calculated to drive the States asunder, although there had in the progress of time been many acts of usurpation of power not granted in the Constitution and many acts of the prostitution for unconstitutional ends of powers which were actually granted for the aggrandizement of one section at the expense of the other, nevertheless I never yet believed in the expediency of resorting to an attempted dissolution of the Union by separate or collective efforts for secession on the part of the southern States or either of them as a remedy or redress for all the oppression, for all the usurpation of ungranted powers and the prostitution of granted powers to their injury. I never believed secession a remedy either lawful or expedient; but if they had not hitherto, if preceding the acts of secession there had not existed any cause for so momentous a proceeding, one fraught with such disasters and calamities, yet they seem now, at all events, whatever may have been their purpose heretofore, or however unfounded may have been the pretext or the grounds upon which the southern States attempted to secede and establish separate governments for themselves, they have ample grounds here now why they should hereafter resist Federal power and Federal domination; that is, provided the atrocious acts of usurpation, injustice, and oppression committed and projected are attempted to be visited upon them.

I am, sir, for giving no cause for a severance of the Federal Union, or for resistance to the authority of the Federal Government; and I am for giving no substantial sufficient cause for revolution or secession. I was opposed to a severance of the Union, so much opposed to it that in fact I have always been in the hope and entertained the desire that the beneficent Government of the United States should be coextensive with the whole continent of North America. I have also further, however, entertained the opinion that unless this Government was administered and conducted within the limits presented in the Constitution, and in the exercise only of the powers granted therein, and to subserve only the ends intended thereby, always respecting the right of self-government and the reserved powers of the States, the Union never could be preserved; but by maintaining such respect for the rights of all sections and all the States of the Union, and by avoiding the usurpation of ungranted and even doubtful powers, the Union may be indefinitely extended and forever perpetuated. The very best mode, the most judicious course for strengthening the bands of union and perpetuating its existence forever would be to respect and carefully observe that wise and celebrated doctrine of President Jackson, to refrain from the usurpation or exercise of any ungranted or even doubtful powers.

These few preliminary remarks bring me directly to the expression of my opinion of the legal status and condition of things now. My opinion, as formerly expressed, has been and now is that there never has been a State yet out of the Union; that the authority exists only to admit States into the Union, and when admitted that all the States in the Union collectively, under the Constitution of the United States, compose a commonwealth of States; that they govern through that Constitution as States; that none but States can govern, and none but States can be governed by the United States. I say therefore that you can admit a State or any number of States into the Union. This power is plenary, full, and unlimited; but there is no power reserved to a State to withdraw, or granted to the United States to expel or eject a State from the Union.

I admit that Governments of every form, whether republics, monarchies, oligarchies, aristocracies, in former times have been overthrown, subverted, and destroyed. Such a thing may occur by one strong Power invading the dominion of a weaker Power and subduing its inhabitants. Such a thing may even occur in constitutional and representative Governments by surmounting to such extent the limitations of power and the lawful manner of its acquisition, and by obliterating in practice the conservative division of authority, so as by repeated acts of usurpation a republic may be converted into a despotism; but it can never legitimately be the case in the United States Government, a Government strictly constitutional, having no right to exist except under a constitutional charter, from which alone it derives all its powers (strictly defined and limited by special grants) to perform any governmental act.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HISE. I will with pleasure if it will not take much time.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Suppose the confederate States had succeeded—

Mr. HISE. It would then have been a successful revolution.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. The gentleman has not heard my question. Suppose they had succeeded in establishing their independence by force of arms, the Constitution of the United States being unchanged, no amendments having been agreed upon either by us or them, would they then be States in the Union while running their own governments and entitled to rights here under the Constitution? And if not under the Constitution how would they have got out of the Union?

Mr. HISE. It would have been a case of a successful attempt at revolution; they would have established their independence. If they had prosecuted that struggle until the North had ceased to resist or to wage war for their subjugation and had acquiesced in their independence, why then the States remaining would have been the United States north, and the other States would have been the States south under their own confederate government and constitution.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. If they had no power to secede, had we any power to acquiesce? What becomes of the constitutional provision regarding them as States after they have severed their connection with the Federal Government?

Mr. HISE. When I speak of secession I am speaking of the law as applicable to it, and not upon the subject of the successful application of force. The law of the case is that they cannot secede; there is no authority in the Constitution for their secession. The compact is between sovereignties, by which they bound themselves perpetually that the Constitution of the United States and the laws of the Federal Congress made in pursuance thereof shall be the supreme law of all the States of the Union, anything in the constitution and laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding. Every State, therefore, by its own ratification of that Constitution agreed with every other State to remain in perpetual unity under that compact, never supposing, much less providing for, such an event as secession or severance.

Therefore secession, attempted severance, was a revolutionary movement. It may have been rightful or wrongful; that is a subject which I do not desire to discuss; I desire to promote harmony and good feeling between my friends North and South.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. The gentleman does not meet my question exactly. I agree to his premises about the Constitution.

Mr. HISE. I think I understand my friend's position.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Well, but suppose these States had remained out fifty years, running their confederate government meanwhile; if I understand the gentleman from Kentucky, he claims that they would have been theoretically States in the Union under the Constitution and entitled to representation. But their secession and war were unconstitutional. Our consent to it, even if we had consented, was unconstitutional; and they were bound to us, and would be entitled all the time for these fifty years to have representation in our Government.

Mr. HISE. I would suppose that if the war had been conducted for five or six years, and then terminated by the consent of the two belligerents—

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Ah! that is not what I suggested.

Mr. HISE. In such case it would be like two game-cocks, that have fought and continued the fight until they find that neither can master the other. They then retire by degrees, getting a little further apart, and finally separate and each goes his own way. Why, sir, if that state of things were to continue for fifty years the doctrine of lapse of time would apply, and the southern States would have become an independent confederate Government; and the northern States would have retained their own independence and union under their existing Constitution; in other words, it would have been a successful revolution, resulting in a severance of the States by force and not by law. But such is not the case here.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Then I understand the gentleman to say that it is a question of time; if they only stay out four years then they are still States and entitled to representation; but if they stay out fifty years they are not entitled to representation.

Mr. HISE. If they stay out fifty years you have no right to govern them. All Governments, let me say to the gentleman, are instituted by the people for the purpose of promoting their own peace, welfare, and happiness. Government is but a machinery costly, expensive, and attendant with a variety of evils, among which is its tendency always to usurpation and corruption. Yet Governments have been found to be necessary evils by peoples where they have the doctrine of meum and tuum prevailing; for the conservation of rights of property and person. In such cases the people have found it to be necessary to create governments for their own protection, advantage, and happiness. That being the case, no Government can continue to prosecute a war for fifty years for its own aggrandizement, and to subjugate by military power a people attempting to establish their own independence, and reduce them to a state of absolute political and individual slavery.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HISE. No, sir, I will not; I was so interrupted in a former speech that I made that it was impossible for me to get along.

Now, sir, if there was no sufficient cause for these States by revolution or by secession to withdraw from the Union and to attempt to maintain their position by defensive war—because it was manifestly a defensive war—will you now attempt to reduce them to a state of political slavery such as is unheard of in this country or, I believe, in any other? You propose that a commission, appointed under the provisions of this bill by the supreme court of this District, shall be vested with despotic and arbitrary power to call an election, whether the people of the State desire it or not, to arrange and rearrange districts in these States at their pleasure and to authorize the people to vote or not to vote at their pleasure, having the privilege of adopting a registry of voters in these States. Where under the Government of the United States has a despotism of that sort existed? Where in this country has there ever yet existed, or can there exist, any government unless it be free and representative both in form and substance.

Sir, what kind of an officer would you call one of these commissioners? Is he a Federal or a State officer? Is he an officer of the Government of the United States or an officer of a State government? Is his office legislative, executive, or judicial, or all combined? All combined in one. By this extraordinary bill these commissioners not only have authority legislative, executive, and judicial, but also to set up one government, overthrow another, and install their own officers at pleasure. This they can do under the authority proposed and attempted to be vested in them to make a registry of the men who alone shall vote.

Now, sir, I hold that if these men are Federal officers, then the Constitution is violated in their mode of appointment. Where is the constitutional authority to vest the appointment of a Federal officer in the district court of the District of Columbia. The Constitution provides that—

"The President shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall appoint, ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law. But the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments."

Those inferior officers who are to be appointed by the heads of the Departments must be executive officers necessary as inferior agents in the discharge of the duties pertaining to those particular Departments. If the authority of appointment is vested in the courts of law, of course it is contemplated by the Constitution that they are to be inferior officers of those courts of law, such as tipstaves, prothonotaries, clerks, and messengers of the courts. As for other officers, judges, ambassadors, heads of Departments, &c., their appointment belongs, under the Constitution, to the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and they are, with the exception of judges, removable at his pleasure. Here is a manifest violation of the Constitution.

Again, sir, these commissioners are by this bill to be invested with a power which this Congress has no authority to vest in any officer of the Government, legislative, executive, or judicial; that is, the authority to overturn a State government and superstruct another, in violation of every principle of republican and representative government.

Again, sir, it is proposed in this bill to authorize a certain class of the population to vote in constructing these new governments.

Herein we have a gross violation of the rights and powers of the State governments, who alone have the authority to prescribe the qualifications and conditions upon which the inhabitants of the States shall exercise the right of suffrage. This is a power that does not belong to the Government of the United States. It is contained in no grant of the Constitution, nor is it to be derived by implication from any granted power. On the contrary, the implication is decidedly the other way, because the Constitution in defining who may vote for members of this House declares that those voting shall possess the qualifications of electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature.

Some gentlemen on the other side, in arguing this question, have admitted, as I understand, that the Federal Constitution is a compact between sovereign States. This cannot be denied, because it had no obligatory force upon any State except by its own agreement, that agreement being indicated by its ratification through a State convention. The Constitution was a compact, a treaty, an agreement in writing between all the States, in the nature of a charter, defining the skeleton and framework of a Government to be instituted, with public functionaries to rule according to the provisions of that instrument, to exercise the powers granted, and to respect all the reserved powers and rights of the State.

Gentlemen agree that the Constitution was a compact. They agree further that the compact was violated by the different ordinances of secession which certain States adopted. They agree that, in virtue of that provision of the Constitution which declares the supremacy of the Constitution and laws of the United States, "anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding," those ordinances of secession and acts of State Legislatures looking toward the secession and separate independence of certain States fall to the ground as null and void.

That being the case, they failed to get themselves out of the Union by valid ordinances, by valid acts of secession, by any valid acts of their Legislatures, or by any valid proceedings of their popular conventions. It is admitted that they did not get out in any such way. And we claim that they did not get out at all, but that they were forced to continue in the Union. We hold that not for a moment did they lose their right of representation under the Constitution of the United States, either at the time of secession or during the whole progress of the strife, provided that without obstruction they could have used and exercised their constitutional privilege. But they were forcibly impeded; they were prevented during the time of the war by the military occupation of the country, by armed force in opposition to the Government, from sending their Representatives here.

Now, I have never yet heard that the non-user of a constitutional privilege contained in the solemn covenant of Government between all the States would by any operation of law or reason deprive them of that privilege, and what can you make of it except a non-user during the five years the war was prosecuted? It was nothing but an abstaining from the assumption and exercise of an undoubted right to have their Representatives upon this floor to speak and vote for them, and to legislate in reference to the interests of all the States of the Union, themselves included. They failed to use their privilege, their right of representation. Whether the non-user was voluntary, or the result of obstructing force makes no difference in point of law or logic. They were still entitled to their representation here, and whenever they send their Representatives here we are bound to receive them, or otherwise we are justly liable to the charge of being disunionists and revolutionists, because the Union is one of States under a compact by which only

States unite upon the unalterable principle of equal representation in the Senate and proportionate representation in the Lower House of the Congress.

The only answer that is urged to this legal view of the case—and it is an answer founded neither in fact nor in reason—is that they forfeited their places as States, their rights as States, and their right of representation in the Federal Government, as a penalty due and which can be rightfully and properly enforced against them for their rebellion. Now, this is the first time I have ever heard gentlemen who assume to be jurists or lawyers claim that a State, a political corporation, can commit a felony; that a political State sovereignty, with all governmental powers, except such as they granted to the Federal Government, can be guilty of any known crime or offense against the Constitution of the United States or against any law of the United States in such manner as to make them subject to any kind of indictment, prosecution, judgment, conviction, or punishment.

I will admit that individuals may be punished; but that the number of individuals who have committed transgressions or offenses or crime may be so numerous as to make it bad policy to punish any of them. That is the case here? Not only can you not punish these individuals, but by the treaties and arrangements by which their armies were induced to surrender, as well as by the amnesty of the President of the United States as published, and the pardons by him granted since, nearly the whole body of people, high and low, engaged in the contest for self-government are relieved from all penalties whatever, and are not now liable to be prosecuted, tried, convicted, or punished at all, even in the courts of law. If they have violated the compact, as they concede it to be, and by such violation have forfeited their position in the Union, and their rights as States under the Constitution, why is it so? It is because by their acts of secession and by their resistance to the authority of this Union they have got out of the Union as States. Then the forfeiture of their constitutional right to representation in this Government involves the release of their obligation to obey it. There is no law to indict a State or to define crimes committed by States. There is no mode of procedure of trial by which a State can be arraigned, tried, convicted, condemned, and then punished for any offense.

In regard to the effect of an attempted secession of some of the States from this Union, and an attempt to obtain their independence by force of arms, in reason or law the effect of it can be nothing more nor less than to suspend by reason of obstructing causes their representation in Congress for the time being.

Now, see what they propose. They propose to give to a commission unbounded authority; that commission to be appointed unconstitutionally by the supreme court of this District. I suppose it is known when they vest the appointing power in this court what kind of court it is, and that they therefore look forward to and expect the appointment of a radical commission, a commission composed of men who are continually howling out these hackneyed words of "loyalty" and "disloyalty," of "traitor," "treason," and "rebellion."

These gentlemen, Mr. Speaker, would cease these vituperative cries, they would cease belching forth these words "traitor" and "rebel" if they could at once perceive and understand that the country, that a large majority of the intellectual, the intelligent, and educated portion of it, look upon them in their attempts to eject States from the Union as the actual rebels and traitors instead of the southern people, who are endeavoring under the Constitution to resume their guaranteed right of representation in Congress and their position in the Union.

Abusive epithets of that description may easily be bandied backward and forward with or without reason; but they should not, sir, be thrown out continually against the men who are in favor of the peaceable union of these States under the Constitution, with the rights of representation, with the rights of person and of property, with our liberties preserved; but if it were prudent and admissible to retaliate, might not these terms of reproach be justly and truly hurled at those of the majority who so freely use them, those who are for instituting unconstitutional dominion over ten States of the Union, for creating a sectional military despotism, and for preventing the continuance of the union of all the States under and as required by the Constitution of the United States; for they are not willing that the Union shall be reestablished under the Constitution, but persist in their efforts and purpose to eject from the Union ten States by refusing them representation, while at the same time they are designing to impose upon them a most odious, oppressive, and despotic government.

Now, sir, my programme is this; it is plain and simple: let us be united. You cannot by injustice and oppression prevent the people of this country from quarreling, as families sometimes do, upon measures of policy. You cannot prevent the existence of difference of opinion. You cannot prevent the existence and civil conflicts of parties adherent and parties opponent to an existing Administration. You cannot prevent the formation of the party of ins and the party of outs. You cannot prevent the party that is out from opposing the one that is in.

In a deliberative body like this, having limited legislative powers in regard to any great measure of public policy, there will be differing views and opinions, leading to strife and controversy upon constitutional questions and upon important subjects of public policy, as, for instance, internal improvements in the States by the Federal Government. One party will deny you have any power in the premises; that you have any authority to collect taxes in one portion of the Union to be invested in making internal improvements in another. Men will assert that you do nothing less than prostitute the power of the Government when you obstruct the freedom of commerce and impose duties upon foreign imports for the purpose of aggrandizing certain classes at the expense of others. Of course we will squabble about all these things, but we will nevertheless do it peaceably and courteously, maintaining in the mean time a respect for and obedience to the Constitution and laws of the land. We will not kill one another, we will not make war upon one another or between parties or sections; we will act courteously, and amid opposing views and conflicting though tolerant opinions show to each other that deference and respect which is due from man to man.

Differences of opinion will exist in a republican form of government, and ought to exist; and it cannot, therefore, be expected from the people of the South that by coercive exclusion from their place in the Union and deprivation of their right of representation in Congress they will surrender all their political opinions and prejudices in regard to the extent of the powers of the Federal Government and the reserved rights and power of the States, and humbly get upon their knees and exclaim, "You Radicals are right; you are in power, and we will vote for all of your measures now and forever hereafter." If you expect that sort of slavery, that kind of servile submission on the part of these southern people before you allow them representation upon the floors of Congress, then the Union never will be restored. Were they to make such slavish and degrading confession of repentance and reformation, you will never have any confidence in them; your suspicion and jealousy would remain; and the tenacity with which you have grasped and hold all power, and the dread of losing it and your party ascendancy, will hereafter as heretofore cause you to continue your opposition to the union of all the States and to the admission of the Representatives of the ten southern States in Congress.

It is apparent, sir, that the use of the word "loyalty" in this country by this party means loyalty to them, loyalty to their domination, submission to their will, undisputed recognition of their power and authority now, and a promise for its perpetual continuance. What you mean by freedom is to make slaves of these southern people, to put the State governments of the South in the hands of the negroes, because by robbing the people of the South of their slave property and putting these negroes into power you hope to make them your own submissive slaves.

The term "loyalty" is one inapplicable to this country. This term should be obsolete and find no place in an American lexicon. It means submission, unconditional slavish submission to a feudal superior, whereas in this country we are all equal and there is no such thing as legal or obligatory loyalty to any man or party required of an American citizen.

We are bound to obey the Constitution until it is changed, to submit to the laws until they are repealed; but the right of free discussion always exists. Our whole superstructure of governments, State and Federal, are built upon the declared right of the people to alter, abolish, overturn, and reconstruct their political institutions at pleasure. What does the possession of this right amount to unless we have also the other right to be disloyal in the sense in which that word is used; that is, the right to controvert the views of others, the freedom of discussion, the freedom of the press, the right to object to any feature in the Constitution or laws or policy of the country that we may think subversive of the public good or prosperity? It involves the right to overturn the Government itself—legitimately, I admit, not by faction nor by revolution—but by repealing or changing, in the forms prescribed, an existing Constitution, and the substitution of another by competent authority in its place. And yet, if any southern man should stand up here for the Constitution as it was and should speak against the fearful corruption of the dominant party here, he would be denounced with contempt as a disloyal man.

Some gentlemen say: We offer you conditions; accept this constitutional amendment and you shall have representation in Congress—as though it lay in them, ex gratia, to give or withhold the right of constitutional representation! Sir, you deny this right in violation of right, of justice, and of the Constitution. Conditions! You have no right to make conditions. The right of representation stands in the great charter of the Constitution, and can never be forfeited so long as a State that you wrongfully deprive of representation is governed by and held amenable to the authorities created by that Constitution; so long as you attempt to rule, tax, and govern a State as a State of the Union, so long it is a State of the Union, and its rights as such can only be defeated by a gross violation of the Constitution; in fact, by an entire subversion of free government, pro tanto at least, to the extent you attempt to exercise control over disfranchised States.

Now, sir, this attempt never can be carried out. I know well—I think the country well understand—what the party here in power are attempting to accomplish by the series of measures proposed and the system of policy projected. Those measures and that policy are certainly calculated, if not designed, to uphold their dominion and to perpetuate their power, by keeping alive indefinitely the hostile, vindictive, revengeful feeling that has been engendered by long years of political controversy and strife, and by a bloody civil war, so that the public feelings and sentiments on theirs

SENATE.

(the stronger section) will be so educated, fostered, and strengthened, as to insure their continued possession of place and power. They will, to keep alive forever sectional jealousy and hatred, persistently reiterate the charge of southern disloyalty as furnishing a sufficient reason and excuse for depriving these people of their representation in Congress. If a loyal man comes here and asks admission, and if the State he represents has adopted the constitutional amendment, you say you will admit him. What right have you to inquire into the loyalty of a member? And when you do inquire, what would you ask? Your inquiry would be substantially this: "Are you humble; are you repentant; have you changed your opinions and feelings; are you willing now to subscribe to our dominion, and admit not only that all we have done is right, but all that we may do hereafter will be right?" [Laughter.] And if he answers in the negative you may pronounce him disloyal.

It is upon such a miserable and unreasonable pretext as this that you deprive these States of their right of representation on this floor. The negroes are your friends, and they and the felons and jail-birds are to be admitted to the right of suffrage and allowed to hold office in these States by your bill; and of such persons will be composed the membership of the proposed conventions, the miserable creatures that are claimed to be enfranchised by your civil rights bill, the reckless and unprincipled adventurers from the North who have overrun the South to plunder both the white man and the negro; camp followers, sutlers, Army contractors, and discharged convicts, are the kind and character of persons to whom will be committed, by the operation of this bill, the governments of these States, and who, should it be passed and carried into execution, will send Representatives, "loyal" Representatives, to this House. My God! what a representation it will be. [Laughter.]

I have heard the question asked sometimes, "Would you like to be President of the United States, and receive an ambassador from Hayti; would you like to sit at table with a fragrant African on one side of you?" And I have heard the answer made, "I would never serve in a body where the black man occupied that position on terms of equality with me."

These are the kind of men that are to make these new governments, overturn the existing governments, and send "loyal" representatives to Congress. Now, we understand all this, and the country ought to understand it. It is all a miserable scheme of public policy to destroy the political force and influence of the southern States as members of the Union, devised by a party whose adherents are loudest in professions of devotion to free government and of love of liberty. Ah, sir, Madame Roland exclaimed during the bloodiest period of the French Revolution, "Oh, Liberty, what crimes are committed in thy name!" These men claim to be the special advocates of human liberty and equal rights. They say they must put their friends, their loyal friends, in possession of the State governments and then they will send loyal delegations to represent them in Congress. Oh, yes, they will send loyal delegations! So this bill, if executed, will in effect establish corrupt and despotic local governments for all those States, and place in all the offices the most ignorant, degraded, and corrupt portion of their population, who would rule and ruin without honesty or skill the actual property holders and native inhabitants, making insecure life, liberty, and property, and still holding those States in their Federal relations subject to the most rapacious, fierce, and unrelenting despotism that ever existed, that of a vindictive and hostile party majority of a Congress in which they have no voice or representation, and by which irresponsible majority they would be mercilessly oppressed for that very reason; and this will be continued I fear until the country shall again be precipitated into civil war. We think the design and purpose of this unwise and malignant policy is understood by the representatives in the Congress of the United States. But the country should understand it also, because it is impossible that the American people should long sustain a party who do everything they please; who engage in all sorts of usurpation, and who sustain all sorts of monstrous and vile measures, unwarranted by constitutional law, subversive of republican government, and destructive to the Union of the States. They will not sustain them when they have full knowledge and are enabled to understand the purposes they have in view.

Sir, I am not speaking to that party. What I say I say to the country in the hope that what goes forth to the people of truth and reason will influence the public judgment, in time, by a change of rulers, to avert the impending ruin now threatening the whole country. I could make, sir, a series of charges against that party, the truth of which would find its verification in the history of the times, including the period intervening between the date of their advent to power and the present moment, that when understood and believed by a free people would overthrow any party in any civilized community in the world. I have not time to do that now. We can do nothing with them by argument. We can do nothing by holding up the written Constitution and the laws. They are ruling, dominant, fierce, and triumphant, with such force and powers of numbers that, in the exultant spirit of present possession and friction, they are made blind to the adverse destiny which surely awaits them. Now, in the very zenith of their power they will triumphantly carry all their monstrous measures, tending to produce consolidation of all the powers of the Government of the United States, executive, judicial, as well as legislative, and of all the States, in the hands of the dominant majority of this the legislative branch of the Government.

They have deliberately engaged in an unconstitutional scheme for subverting the executive power of this Government, and to-day a monstrous bill was proposed and referred to a committee by a party majority to overthrow the judicial department of the Government, to overthrow it in all its material characteristics, in regard to its main power of subserving the grand object had in view in the creation of independent departments of the Government. What is the Constitution but a paper with writing upon it—intelligible writing? How can you sustain this Constitution; how can you command respect for its provisions, save by an adherence to it and by keeping within its restraints, and it secured in such respect and restraint by an independent judiciary?

The history of this Congress will show how little respect a dominant majority has for constitutional law, and how gloomy would be the hope or prospect of avoiding legislative encroachment and usurpation without the existence of an independent judicial department of government of powers sufficient to check the inroads of the Legislature upon the Constitution.

It was well known by the wise and sagacious men who framed the Constitution of the United States that that Constitution would not be respected by a dominant party majority in Congress, especially when it attained to a two-third vote, since it would then "Play such fantastic tricks before high heaven,

As make the angels weep."

The framers of the Constitution foresaw this, and hence they provided that there should be a judicial department of the Government, and that the judges should be independent of the legislative department, should hold their places for life, and should only be removed by impeachment in the most solemn form. Why was this done? It was in order that the people might rely upon that department of the Government as standing as a breakwater, as an intervening wall of defense against the invasions and usurpations of Congress in behalf and in defense of the rights of the States and of the people.

Not only was the judicial department thus created and for this purpose, but knowing that a check of that sort was necessary to preserve constitutional rule there was an executive department created for the same identical purpose, an executive department in which was lodged all executive power. The only officer known to the Constitution in which that power is vested is the President. And it is necessary only to ascertain the distinction as to what is legislative and what is executive power in order to know whether any given power belongs to Congress or to the President of the United States. He comes in with his beneficent conservative power and authority placed by the Constitution in his hands of putting a veto upon the unconstitutional action of the legislative branch of the Government, which power can never be overcome except by a vote of two thirds of each House of Congress, as has been the case here lately, and as will undoubtedly be the case repeatedly hereafter. And our only hope of the preservation of a free Government is in the judicial department of the Government, and in the decisions of the Supreme Court pronouncing your acts unconstitutional and void.

The Tariff.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN SHERMAN,

OF OHIO,

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

January 23, 1867.

The Senate having under consideration the bill to provide increased revenue from imports—

Mr. SHERMAN said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: Before the vote is taken on the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island I think it right that I should state the general views which have controlled my action as a member of the Committee on Finance, and which will control my vote on this and the various propositions of amendment that will be submitted to the Senate.

I listened yesterday with great pleasure to the speech of my honorable friend from New Jersey, [Mr. CATTELL,] and was generally pleased with its tenor and scope. It sounded like a good old-fashioned Whig protective speech—the school in which I was educated, the faith in which I was taught, and in which I yet have confidence. But, sir, it seemed to me that the Senator from New Jersey, in his zeal for protection, forgot that we were now legislating under peculiar circumstances, and are compelled to look at a state of facts far different from those that existed before the recent war.

In considering so complicated a subject as a tariff nothing can be more deceptive than the application of such general phrases as a "protective tariff," a "revenue tariff," a "free-trade tariff." Every law imposing a duty on imported goods is necessarily a restraint on trade. It imposes a burden upon the purchase and sale of imported goods and tends to prevent their importation. The expression a "free-trade tariff" involves an absurdity. Free trade implies a trade without restriction, while any tariff is a restriction on trade. A duty of ten per cent. is a limitation on trade as well as a duty of one hundred per cent., and they differ only in degree. So the phrase a "protective tariff" may be applied to every bill imposing duties on imported goods.

The first tariff act, passed soon after the formation of the Constitution, was called a "protective tariff;" one of its leading objects, as declared by Washington, was to foster and protect American manufactures, and yet the general rate of duties was but ten per cent. ad valorem. On the other hand, the tariff of 1846 is commonly known as a "free-trade tariff," and yet the rate of duty levied by it averaged twenty-four and a half per cent. Every duty on imported merchandise gives to the domestic manufacturer an advantage equal to the duty, and to that extent every tariff is a protective tariff. When the duty is so high as to prevent importation it ceases to be a "tariff" and becomes a "commercial regulation." So the general term a "revenue tariff" as descriptive of a tariff is deceptive and is simply tautology. Every tariff bill is a "revenue tariff." The word "tariff" implies revenue, and means a rate of taxation on imported goods. It is simply a mode of taxation adopted by all commercial nations as the most certain, convenient, and least expensive form of taxation. The common meaning attached to the phrase a "revenue tariff" is a general ad valorem tax on imported goods, without regard to the domestic manufacture. Such a tariff has never existed in any commercial country, least in all in Great Britain, where the duties are carefully levied to encourage their own manufactures. They do not now levy duties on manufactures for the same reason that we do not care to levy a duty on anthracite coal. By a vast accumulation of capital, and by severe commercial restrictions maintained for one hundred years, they have a substantial monopoly of important branches of industry. They do not levy duties on such goods because none are imported into Great Britain, and the tariff on them would produce as little revenue as your duty on anthracite coal.

These general phrases, if not always deceptive, are totally inapplicable to any tariff law that any one would propose for the United States now. Free trade, if it means a mutual exchange of commodities with foreign nations without restrictions, is impossible. Our necessities compel us to tax every form of property or production. Every hour of domestic labor contributes some portion of its product to the wants of the nation. Under these circumstances it is the plainest principle of political economy that we should so frame our tariff laws as to produce the largest possible income from imported goods. Revenue is the first, highest, and most pressing want, and it must be so levied as to do the least harm to our own industry. It is in the application of this obvious principle that all the difficulty in framing a tariff law exists. This cannot be done by applying any general rate or rule to all articles. We must discriminate between articles of luxury and articles of necessity; between articles that may be produced in our country and articles mainly produced abroad; between raw materials necessary to the domestic manufacture and completed products of industry. The rate of duty must be modified by a multitude of circumstances as varied as human knowledge, and with details far more difficult than any subject of legislation.

Nor can we now consider the question as we should before the war. Then we had an opportunity to choose between imported articles; we might throw off the duty upon necessities, such as coffee and tea and various articles, because such duties were not necessary for revenue nor useful for protection; but now we are compelled to levy high duties upon everything, not only upon articles of absolute necessity the duty upon which will undoubtedly add to the cost of the articles, but also upon all articles of American production, and even upon raw materials that are indispensably necessary as the basis of our manufactures. We cannot now regard the subject in the same light or from the same stand-point that we did in olden times when the tariff was the great controversy between parties in this country. We have now to consider it in the light of facts created by the war. The first and obvious inquiry of every Senator in discussing the question is, how much is it necessary to raise by a tariff on imported goods? and here I may say that all the revenue that is required to be raised in gold must be raised by duties on imported goods. While we have a depreciated currency it would be idle to require domestic taxes to be paid in gold. It would be to legalize a paper currency and then to repudiate it. In regard to imported goods the case is different. All imported goods are bought with gold; all transactions in imported goods are based upon gold. Imported goods being the product of foreign countries can be purchased only by the money known in the commerce of the world. Therefore, in imposing duties upon imported goods, it is no hardship to levy them in gold, so that the whole cost of an article of that description when it enters into consumption represents so much in gold. But if an attempt was made to levy in gold our domestic taxes it would be very difficult; it would impose on our people a burden they could not bear. It is manifest that we have to raise all the gold we require for Government purposes by means of duties on imported goods.

By the financial policy adopted during the war—it is not necessary for me now to discuss the propriety or expediency of that policy—we are required to raise a very large sum of money in gold. The annual interest upon the outstanding gold bonds of the United States, according to a statement furnished me from the Treasury Department brought down to the 1st of January, 1867, is $82,048,531. By the terms of all the outstanding notes bearing interest in currency, except the compound-interest notes, they are convertible into gold bonds bearing six per cent. interest. That conversion must be made within a year or a little more. When those notes are converted the amount of annual interest that will be required of the Treasury of the United States will be $131,353,977 40. To this must be added the amount required to maintain our foreign intercourse and other gold liabilities, partly growing out of treaties, which it is estimated will amount to $6,000,000 per annum. The expenditures for foreign intercourse, which are disbursed in foreign countries principally, must necessarily be paid in gold, the currency of the world. Adding enough for this item, it is evident that the aggregate amount of gold required to carry on the operations of the Government for the present fiscal year will be not less than $140,000,000 in gold.

In addition to this there are maturing bonds which by the policy of the Government are paid in gold, and which mature before the end of the next fiscal year. Bonds amounting to nearly sixteen million dollars mature during that time, namely: on the 31st of December, 1867, $7,613,000, and on the 1st of July, 1868, $8,169,000. These must be paid in gold; but probably they can be provided for out of the large amount of gold on hand, and need not enter into the elements of our calculation. But at any rate it will be necessary to raise $140,000,000 in gold.

For us now, therefore, to talk about a free-trade tariff is simply an absurdity; and for us to talk about a protective tariff is unnecessary, because the wit of man could not possibly frame a tariff that would produce $140,000,000 in gold without amply protecting our domestic industry. To the extent that the duties are levied upon articles that may be produced in this country the tariff operates as a protection. It is very clear that upon an ordinary year's importation the rate of duty that will have to be levied upon importations in order to produce $140,000,000 will not be much less than fifty per cent. ad valorem, even if we could prevent all undervaluation or smuggling.

I assume, then, Mr. President, that the main, leading, and necessary object of this bill is to produce $140,000,000 in gold, and that we may very properly leave the question of protection to be settled as a matter of detail, with the certainty that any tariff which will yield the necessary revenue will sufficiently protect American industry. The degree of protection on different articles can only be adjusted by a careful inquiry into a multitude of details, while the paramount object—to raise revenue to the amount of $140,000,000 in gold—must always be kept in view.

It is sometimes said that, as this is the great object, it is not necessary to change the present tariff, which will produce that amount, and has in fact during the last fiscal year yielded $179,046,680. The answer is, that during the last fiscal year our importations were swollen beyond any former experience of this country, and cannot be relied on as a basis for the future. Under the very same law the year before the amount of gold revenue was only $84,928,260. It is manifest, therefore, that we cannot depend for the next fiscal year upon the present tariff to produce anything like the amount that it did in the last fiscal year, and even during the current fiscal year the estimated receipts from customs are far less than they were a year ago.

That no estimate of future receipts can be based on the amount of the receipts during the last fiscal year is shown by the peculiar circumstances by which we were then surrounded. When the war closed the southern States were entirely bare of domestic or foreign fabrics. They were without clothing; they were without all those articles necessary for human life, both of domestic and foreign manufacture. The stock on hand, as it is commonly called, in the northern States was very much reduced, so that the very moment the war was over large importations necessarily flowed in, and large demands were made for our domestic manufactures. But that cause has now ceased; the vacuum has been supplied. Not only so, but by the sudden fall of gold, which fell much more rapidly than the prices of labor or of other commodities, goods manufactured abroad became cheaper in proportion than American goods. The American manufacturer could not adapt his prices to the fall of gold because of the high prices of labor and commodities, and these could not be reduced owing to the high rate of taxation and the increased cost of food and all the elements which enter into production. If the American manufacturer could have reduced the cost of his production in the same ratio that gold was reduced he would not have been disturbed by the fall of gold. The valuable statistics presented to us by Mr. Wells show that while gold at times went down to thirty and even to twenty-five per cent. premium, during all that time the ordinary addition to the cost of food was from ninety to one hundred and forty per cent., and the addition to the usual cost of manufacturing was from seventy to eighty or ninety per cent.; so that the fall in the price of foreign goods, which were paid for in gold, was far greater than the fall in the prices of domestic commodities. The domestic manufacturer was suddenly called upon to compete with the foreign market when the advantage was some thirty or forty per cent. in favor of the foreigner.

It was manifest under these circumstances that domestic fabrics must fall off, and that large amounts of foreign goods would flow in to take their place. This led to enormous importations, and thus produced a very large gold revenue during the last year; but that cannot exist longer without utter destruction to our producing interests. It is also clear that if the present relative condition of the price of labor and the price of commodities and the price of food is maintained nearly all our domestic manufactures must cease to exist. It is impossible under the present rates that domestic manufactures can be maintained unless one of two things occur: either a fall in the price of labor, or a rise in the price of gold. Among the numerous gentlemen who gave their observations to the Committee on Finance, it was admitted on all hands that if they could reduce the price of labor they could also reduce the price of their fabrics and without additional duties come in competition with the foreign manufacturers; but they all said that was impossible; the laborer now was getting barely enough to maintain life; there were indeed strikes all over the country; some peculiar branches of industry were able to pay very large prices for labor, but in many cases, especially with the woolen and some other interests, the price of labor had not advanced in proportion to the price of food, so that the laborer was really receiving less now than he did before the war, although nominally getting twice the wages he did before. The reason is that the price of food, clothing, and of all the commodities which enter into his consumption have not declined sufficiently to enable him to live upon a less sum of nominal money.

If the present tariff law be continued in force we cannot expect it to yield more than one hundred and twenty-five to one hundred and thirty million dollars. It is clearly necessary, then, looking at this subject simply in a revenue point of view, to increase the duties on imported goods and to receive a larger amount of duties in gold.

It is not necessary for me to picture the disastrous consequences that would result to this country if we failed to pay our interest in gold—failed to meet our obligations. The absolute necessity that weighs upon us is scrupulously to observe the public faith. During the war we were compelled to make contracts that may appear to our people to be onerous; and yet any man of ordinary patriotism feels that we must observe those contracts to the fullest extent. It is evident, therefore, that an absolute necessity rests upon us to raise by some mode of taxation an amount of money sufficient to enable us to meet our public engagements. The weight of these engagements has never yet rested on the people of this country. The reason has been that the interest on half the public debt was payable and paid in paper; but by the very terms of our obligations the whole of that interest will soon be payable in gold, and then we must meet the burden that will come upon us of paying it in gold.

If your tariff should yield you but $120,000,000 in gold when you have to pay $140,000,000 in gold, the Secretary of the Treasury will be compelled to go into the open market and buy $20,000,000 of gold to meet the deficiency. What would then be our financial condition? If, instead of selling gold now day by day, he was compelled to borrow or buy gold in the open market to meet the interest on the public debt, what would be the consequence? The price of gold would rise. The public engagements could only be met by a sale of our securities in a foreign market. Indeed it would be the saddest spectacle that could possibly be presented. It is manifest, therefore, that we must levy such an amount of duties upon imported goods as will place us beyond all danger from this cause.

Then, Mr. President, when you come to apply the duties upon the various articles of importation it becomes a simple matter of detail. I shall not waste much time in going into the various details now, because the questions will come up from time to time as they are presented; but there are certain matters upon which the committee have acted that it would be well enough to state in general terms.

The most obvious sources of revenue in a tariff bill are items usually classed as luxuries. In levying duties upon these articles there is but one rule laid down, not merely by the English and French writers, but by every nation that attempts to raise a revenue from imports, and that is to levy as high a rate as possible from them without reducing consumption. They are mostly contained in three items: spirits, wines, and tobacco. These are undoubtedly the first objects of taxation; and in most countries, especially in England and France, they yield a very large portion of the revenue. We, however, are unhappily placed in regard to these articles because we produce them ourselves. We make our own whisky and produce our own tobacco, and therefore we do not and cannot look to these items as so great a source of revenue as they do in other countries, especially in England and France, where they produce no tobacco, but import all they use, and where it consequently can be levied upon at the custom-house.

The rates of duty prescribed by the Senate amendment on these articles are substantially the rates of duty prescribed by the House bill, except in one important particular—in the article of wine. It was found on examination, and is shown very clearly by Mr. Wells's report, that wine of a cheap quality, really inferior to our ordinary cider, is imported in enormous quantities at the valuation of less than twenty cents a gallon, and pays a duty of some twenty or thirty cents, and is sold to our people in many cases at four dollars a dozen bottles, or about one dollar a gallon. This is really not the wine of France, or the wine of the country from which it purports to come, but an adulterated article prepared for the American market, having no market value in the country of its production and sent here at a merely nominal price. It is found that by the operation of the present tariff the Government gained comparatively little revenue from it. Last year the revenue from wines amounted to about four millions. The committee have proposed to substitute a uniform tax of fifty cents a gallon which, in my opinion, is rather too small, but which will yield a much larger sum than the present ad valorem duty. I am inclined to think that while a larger rate of duty would probably prevent the importation of a considerable portion of the wine, the amount of revenue received would be greater even on a smaller quantity. The committee thought proper to adopt a specific duty of fifty cents a gallon, and I am willing to try the experiment. In regard to tobacco the law is left substantially as it is except in regard to the single item of cigars, which is somewhat reduced because it was found that the present rate tended to prevent importation and to promote smuggling.

The next items which are always regarded in framing a tariff bill are such articles of common use as are called comforts, or perhaps luxuries—in this country they are the comforts of all classes of the people—sugar, tea, and coffee. The House of Representatives, I think without carefully examining the subject—certainly it was done without the sanction of the Committee of Ways and Means—threw off one half the duty on tea and coffee on the ground that as tea and coffee were used by all classes of our people we ought not to tax them so high.

The truth is that the ad valorem tax on both coffee and tea is far below the general average of our tariff laws, six cents a pound on coffee and twenty-five cents a pound on tea, amounting to about from thirty to fifty per cent. ad valorem. If we had no occasion for revenue, if we were in a position to throw off taxes, if we had no system of internal taxation, if we had no taxes more oppressive and more burdensome than those on tea and coffee, they would be the first we should throw off; but it is manifestly improper now to dispense with a revenue equal to eight or ten million dollars merely to relieve our people from paying a tax that does not weigh heavily upon them. By doing so we would compel the imposition of $12,000,000 in paper money upon our domestic productions. The Committee on Finance, therefore, thought it wise to restore the old rate of taxation, and that yields on the articles I have already named—wines, tobacco, spirits, sugar, tea and coffee—from fifty-five to sixty million dollars, or about two fifths of all the revenue that is necessary to be produced from imported goods. These articles are more stable in their yield, more uniform in their consumption than any other articles on the list. Although used to some extent by all the people the great body of them is used by those who are able to pay for them. Besides, the duties on these articles are more easily and more surely collected. The duties are specific and there can be under this bill no undervaluation. Besides, the articles are heavy; they cannot be smuggled in; they are easily ascertained by weight or measure. They are articles that in all countries are looked upon as the main sources of revenue. We cannot afford to throw off now a certain revenue of $10,000,000. At a time when we are compelled to levy internal taxes upon every branch of our industry, when the widow and the orphan, when the farmer and the manufacturer, when the laboring man and all classes of our citizens are compelled to pay largely increased prices for their food and clothing by our system of internal taxation, we certainly ought not to throw off this, the easiest and best form of taxation. The duties in these cases are left by the Senate amendment where they were before. So in regard to spices: I believe there have been some little changes, but nothing material.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very slight.

Mr. SHERMAN. We come now, Mr. President, to the duties on manufactures, and that for the first time presents the question of protection. In regard to the articles I have already discussed, although we do produce tobacco and wine in this country, the question of protection is not necessarily involved, and we looked upon them simply as a question of revenue.

When you come to manufactures it is necessary in levying the duties to discriminate in favor of our own industry on all articles that can be produced in this country by the ordinary application of skill and labor. It is manifestly the duty of the country to protect American industry to that extent, not simply on account of the old-fashioned argument that we used to have before the war, that as a policy it is better to diversify our industry and manufacture all that is necessary for our own consumption, but on other grounds. We must now protect American manufactures, not merely against foreign competition, but also against the effect of our own laws. This is really all the protection they now need.

If you converse with intelligent men engaged in the business of manufacturing they will tell you that they are willing to compete with England, France, Germany, and all the countries of Europe, at the old rates of duty. If you reduce their products to a specie basis and put them upon the same footing they were on before the war, the present rates of duty would be too high. It would not be necessary for scarce any branch of industry to be protected to the extent of your present tariff law. They do not ask protection against the pauper labor of Europe, but they ask protection against the creation of your own laws. These are our paper currency and our internal taxation.

The American manufacturer comes to you and shows that foreign capital in Canada and elsewhere is not compelled to carry on business operations under the depressing influences that surround us. Manufacturers abroad pay no internal taxes; they do not have to buy with paper money at the inflated prices always produced by paper money. Take the case of the manufacturer of iron. If he was at liberty to hire his labor upon the gold basis and to buy his provisions upon the gold basis, and to buy on the gold basis all the necessary elements which enter into the production of iron, he could compete with the labor of Europe. The advantages of freight and other advantages would enable him to do it. But if you compel him to pay two hundred per cent. for his food—and more than half the cost of all the iron produced in this country is food—if you compel him to pay largely increased prices for clothing for his laborers; if you add largely to the cost of everything that enters into the elements of his production, as a matter of course he cannot compete with those who are not subjected to similar burdens. It is not British or foreign competition that produces distress among the manufacturing interests of this country at this time; it is the effect of your own laws.

The chief evil arises from a depreciated currency. The inevitable effect of paper money is to advance prices far beyond the difference between paper and gold, and indeed it is sometimes held to be one of the virtues of paper money that it does advance prices and give higher wages to labor. I do not wish now to enter into an argument on that question; but we know that the existence of paper money does tend to raise the prices of commodities in this country, and that the American manufacturer cannot, with paper money and with high prices caused by your taxation, compete with foreign productions. What, then, has he a right to ask? He has a right to ask that if your laws impose upon him additional burdens, your laws also should give him additional protection. That is the claim made by these gentlemen, and it is impossible to resist it. They generally ask that as your laws impose upon them burdens caused by the war, your laws also ought to make them a countervailing protection, so that they may stand on equal footing to compete with the productions of foreign countries.

It may be said, then, why not withdraw our currency; why continue our present paper money; why continue our internal taxation? I wish we could do so; but certainly it is now impossible. If we could come back to-morrow morning to the specie standard, and remove all the taxes that we have imposed upon our labor, we should all be glad to do it. I suppose there is not a Senator within the sound of my voice who will not admit that a specie basis is the natural condition of trade; that for a currency there ought to be something stable and valuable which is made valuable by its own weight and the labor necessary to produce it. Every body admits that gold and silver are the only real standard of value; that that which regulates exchanges must be the production of labor—something which can only be quarried out of the earth by labor—something which itself is labor personified. Gold and silver are the product of labor in its most permanent, convenient, and unchanging form, and is therefore the best standard of currency. But, Mr. President, we were driven to the use of paper money; we could not have carried on the war without paper money. The circumstances by which we were surrounded compelled us to resort to these expedients; we had to adopt a system of paper currency; we did the best we could; we could not have got along without it; and I believe that every sensible man who examines our affairs, whether he is a foreigner or a native, must admit that without the free use of our credit, coined in the shape of money, we could not have carried on the operations of the war, because we should not have had a circulating medium with which to pay our soldiers for their services, and to feed their wives and children while they were away from them. Our paper currency was a matter of necessity, but the effect of that currency is to raise the prices of commodities, the prices of labor, the prices of food—to raise the price of everything which enters into the articles of American manufacture. It is necessary for us to countervail that by some legal benefit or protection.

It is sometimes said, and I have often heard the argument made, the foreigner has to pay his duties in gold, while the manufacturer pays his taxes in paper money, and also pays the additional cost of labor in paper money, and they say the difference between gold and paper money is a sufficient protection. That argument would be a very complete reply but for this important fact, that the price of labor and the price of commodities is far more advanced than the price of gold. Gold is the cheapest commodity in the market. The importer has the benefit of that condition of affairs; he has a discrimination in his favor, because while the increased cost of American manufactures has gone up about a hundred per cent., the price of gold is only about thirty-six per cent. above paper. To that extent the system of paper money is a discrimination in favor of the importer of foreign goods. That discrimination was made manifest in its effects by the enormous importation made during the past year by the fact that when gold went down to twenty-five importations increased, while the prices of domestic commodities and of labor did not materially fall during that time. While gold went down from 200 to 125, the price of labor was not materially affected. The large demand for foreign and domestic supplies kept up the market. The necessity of the case compelled the manufacturer to pay these large prices. He had no choice but to pay high prices or close his shop. The result was that he met a competition, not growing out of foreign labor, but out of your own laws, which prescribed currency for him and gold for the importer.

I do not know that I have made myself understood; but this is the real and leading reason why it is necessary to give to the American producer in all the different stages of production some countervailing protection to balance the effect of paper money.

Another reason is, that the system of internal taxation which your necessities compelled you to adopt throws upon the American producer an enormous burden which the foreigner does not have to bear. Take a shop or a mill in Canada, along our frontier, where labor is one half what it is here: do you suppose an American producer can compete with the Canadian manufacturer? More striking yet; take the case of England, where by a long system they have reduced the cost of production to the lowest possible limit, where by their system of taxation they favor all manner of production, where no tax is levied on any kind of production, where the cost of labor is reduced and yet the imposition imposed by the Government amounts to but little, and where the manufacturer gets all his raw material free: is it possible for the American manufacturer to compete with the English manufacturer when he has to contribute to $310,000,000 of internal taxation? It is impossible. We were compelled by the necessities of the war to levy upon him directly a tax of five per cent. on his productions; we levy a tax of five per cent. on his income; we levy a large tax upon every element which enters into the cost of his labor. Indeed it has been estimated, and I think very correctly, that the actual taxes upon American manufactures, if you carry them out to their remote origin, amount to about twenty per cent. on the capital employed. Mr. Wells, in his report, shows very clearly that the various taxes levied upon cotton manufactures amount to about twenty-two per cent. upon the capital employed.

Is it possible for American manufactures to be maintained, for American workshops to be continued, unless the Government is willing to give some protection against its own laws? Can the manufacturer pay these enormous taxes upon the basis of paper money and yet compete with the unpaid or insufficiently paid labor in Europe, where the manufacturer pays no taxes, where he has his raw materials free, where every element is in his favor? I think it is impossible. If, therefore, we would protect our American industry against our own laws we must give the benefit of duties on foreign goods commensurate with the imposition we impose upon our manufacturers and thus enable them to continue the competition that has been carried on for years.

It is not necessary for me to go into familiar facts to show that the effect of domestic competition is to cheapen the price of products. Under the stimulus of our laws great numbers of American manufactures have grown up with a rapidity unexampled in the history of any country. England was more than one hundred years in building up her system of manufactures. Ours have been built up since 1828. In 1828 New England was a mere commercial community; now she is manufacturing. At the time when the great friend of America, the Earl of Chatham, said that the laws of England should be so framed that no shoe-nail should be made in America we could scarcely make one. We imported everything. There was scarce a factory in America; and so it continued, with but slight progress, for fifty years. American manufactures took their birth in 1828 under the heavy restrictive duties of the tariff law of that year. Now they have grown to amazing proportions, until American productions by manufactures alone are ten times the whole importations of this country.

I was somewhat surprised at the tables produced by my friend from New Jersey yesterday, and especially the table prepared by Mr. Delmar, showing that in 1860 the annual productions of this country—agricultural, mechanical, &c.—amounted to $6,700,000,000 in gold. I thought it was pretty large, and I should like to see the elements of Mr. Delmar's figures, but he foots up $6,755,587,957. A large proportion of these productions were in manufactures which have been built up within the last thirty or forty years.

It is manifest, when this enormous industry is brought in competition with a different system of labor, that if you impose burdens upon it in the form of internal taxation and in the form of paper currency, you must give it countervailing benefits. Of the $310,000,000 of taxes levied upon productions in the form of internal revenue, about $170,000,000 is paid directly or indirectly by manufactures. It is true it is finally collected again from the consumer; but, as it is added to the price of the commodity, the manufacturer must reduce his price to compete with the foreigner, or he must abandon the market.

Under these circumstances it is apparent that the present rates of duty although very high, higher than they have ever been before, must either be increased or else there must be a reduction in the price of labor in this country, or there must be an increase in the price of gold. I think we have tried the last experiment very well. I do not believe an act of Congress can affect the price of gold. I do not think it can or will or ought to affect it. Then, unless you give to the American manufacturer some increased protection against your laws, the immediate effect will fall on the great mass of the people in the price of labor and the price of food. They will have to pay these large internal taxes with less daily pay, and the result will be we shall have distress, complaint, not repudiation, I know, but dissatisfaction with your laws. While goods are flowing into this country in great quantities from all the countries of the world, the products of foreign industry, our own industry is being depressed, our manufactures broken down, our shops shut up; and thus you will have dissatisfaction and discontent. The only way, in my judgment, to meet it is to give them, by your legislation, protection equivalent to the taxes you impose upon them and the effect of your currency. Whether the Finance Committee have done this or not is for the Senate to say. I do not wish to go into the details. If I observed the general scope of the tariff bill, as reported by the committee, there is an advance of duties of about ten per cent. on the cost of imported goods that come into competition with our own manufactures. It may vary more or less; but I believe that is the general proportion—an increase of about ten per cent.

Now I come to a part of this bill which is the only one which induced me to engage in this discussion, and that is the proposed duties on agricultural products. Here there is a conflict of interest between agricultural and manufacturing industry, or at least there was supposed to be, but I believe there is not and ought not to be. The manufacturer generally looks upon everything he has to buy as a raw material, and everything that he has to sell as a finished product. The revenue commissioner has fallen into the same error, and he calls wool a raw product. Wool is not a raw product to the farmer, though it may be to the manufacturer, because to the farmer it is the completed product of his industry. So of the cereals, wheat, flaxseed, rye, barley are not raw materials to the farmer, but they are raw materials to the manufacturer who consumes them. They are the result of labor; they are the complete product of the labor of the farmer. His raw material is his land and his labor, while his product is wool, wheat, barley, &c.

Mr. President, if you ever attempt, in the present condition of affairs, to levy your duties on imported goods so as to give to the farmer no protection against competing labor, you will do an act of gross injustice, and such a tariff as that cannot be enduring. We very well know that the great body, I believe four fifths, perhaps five sixths, of our people, are engaged in agriculture. They usually, on account of the weight and bulk of their articles, do not require anything like the protection that other industries do, because the very bulk of their products gives them an advantage in the home market. But if they are compelled on ordinary articles of their production to compete on equal terms with the cheap labor of other countries they will naturally be dissatisfied.

How do you maintain the doctrine of protection in a tariff? You say to the farmers, "Protect our industry, build up our manufactures, and we will start shops in your neighborhood and consume your products; we will give you the benefit of a home market." That is all very well and very plausible, and it has induced the great body of the farming community in this country to be what are called protectionists. Ohio, which was always an agricultural State, was a protectionist State, and the farmers were probably as much so as any other class. Why? Because they believed that by building up manufactures in this country they would have the benefit of the home market. But if a manufacturer in Rhode Island who consumes a million pounds of wool, after he has got the benefit of all the protection he wants on his woolen goods and has raised the price of them to the farmer who has to buy them, turns around and says, "I can buy my wool cheaper in South America, and I am therefore opposed to any duties upon your wool, because it is a raw material," you will find that the farmer will be discontented. He will not be satisfied, and he will not be put off with any such reasoning. You must extend the doctrine of protection to everything that is made up by labor, and you cannot stop short of it. If wool is a raw article to the manufacturer, so is cloth a raw article to the tailor. If you will not give us protection to our products we will give you none to yours. The principle is correct as to wool or it is wrong as to cloth.

In ordinary times protection is not necessary to the farmer, because with all the advantage he possesses in a rich soil and cheap land he can compete with similar products of any other country. Our agricultural industries do not often want protective duties and have rarely called on Congress for them; but now when the prices of all commodities are raised upon him by high extraordinary prices, he has a right to demand and does demand that the same principle of protection should be extended to him as to other industrial interests.

I wish in this connection to make some reference to the report of Mr. Wells on the question of wool, and I do it with sincere respect for the author of this report, because I know from personal observation that he is not only industrious and able in the discharge of the duties imposed upon him by law, but I believe he is as well qualified from his experience and intellect to discharge that duty as any man in the United States; but at the same time in regard to some interests that affect my own constituents he has fallen into many errors.

He is opposed to the proposed increase of the duty on wool, and has supported his opinion with all the reasons that can possibly be given, and he bases it mainly upon the assertion that every cent added to the duty on wool costs the consumer of the wool $6,000,000, and therefore that a duty of ten cents a pound would add to the cost of the wool and woolens consumed in this country some sixty million dollars. There is a great deal of fallacy in this mode of reasoning. Suppose you were to apply that principle to another protective duty. Suppose we should turn round to the iron men and say, "Here, your duties on iron add to the cost of all the iron produced in this country the full amount of duty, and the consumer has to pay that additional value, and all this costs the people of the United States too much." If that is the mode of reasoning there is an end of all protection. You must show that all classes of the community get the benefit of this principle or you must abandon it altogether. You cannot maintain that it is a hardship for the wool interest to demand protection any more than the iron or other interests. Take the case of cotton manufactures, the duties on which are fixed in this bill at from fifty to sixty per cent. Undoubtedly to a considerable extent these duties are added to the cost of the articles to the consumer; and I might make a formidable array of figures to show that in order to sustain the manufacturers who are the constituents of my friend from Rhode Island the people of Ohio are compelled to contribute out of their pockets a number of millions of dollars. That would not be a fair mode of argument, and yet it is precisely the mode of argument with which we are met in regard to the duty on wool. It is strange that the manufacturing interests, who have been maintained by protective duties, should resort to free-trade arguments when the agricultural interest demands a far less rate of prohibition than has been given to them.

But there is an element of error in the computation itself as well as in the principle of the computation. The commissioner without giving us the basis of his computation, declares that there are one hundred and seventeen million pounds of woolen goods manufactured and consumed in this country and that there are imported thirty-three million pounds of woolen goods. He thus puts the whole amount of woolens consumed in this country at one hundred and fifty million pounds. Then he says, as it takes four pounds of raw wool imported into this country to make one pound of woolen cloth, therefore the amount of wool consumed in this country must be six hundred million pounds. That is an absurdity. The largest amount of importations of foreign wool into this country in one year was never over eighty-four million pounds, and the average is about sixty millions; the largest clip of wool ever grown in this country, and that was last year, was one hundred million pounds, while the average is eighty millions; showing but an aggregate of one hundred and eighty-four million pounds or enough to make forty-six million pounds of cloth instead of one hundred and seventeen million pounds.

What is the use of taking a computation of this kind in the face of plain, palpable facts? The wool imported in the form of woolen goods

I leave out of view, because the computation is that one hundred and seventeen million pounds of woolen goods aside from those imported are consumed in this country. That would show a production of wool here amounting to about four hundred and sixty-eight million pounds.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Allow me to say to my friend that these figures are taken from the estimates made by the wool men themselves.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think Mr. Wells has fallen into a mistake.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have read the original report. That does not make it quite so much; he makes it more than they do.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not care who makes the computation, nor do I think the wool-growers did make it. The wool-growers never pretended, and no one I have ever seen pretended that the clip of this country was over a hundred million pounds. It is generally estimated at an average of eighty-four or eighty-five millions, while the highest quantity of wool ever imported into this country was but eighty-four millions, and the average but sixty millions. Two years ago it was only forty millions, and last year eighty-four million pounds were imported, the highest importation ever made.

Let us examine the reasoning upon which the commissioner bases his estimate. He says:

"The number of sets of woolen machinery or series of cards employed in the United States, reported to the Wool-Manufacturers' Association in October, 1865, was forty-one hundred, consuming 2,252,543 pounds of scoured wool and substitutes for wool per week; but these returns, it was stated, did not probably indicate more than three fourths to four fifths of the sets then in actual operation."

Upon a statement that in a certain week in October the amount of consumption in the woolen factories, then driven to their extreme, was so much, and then multiplying that by fifty-two we have the basis of the computation. That is a very insufficient mode of reasoning. I have no doubt that the duty on wool will add somewhat to the cost of the woolens consumed by the people of the United States. To what extent it is difficult to say, because it is very difficult always to estimate how much of the duty will be paid by the importing merchant, how much by the foreigner who raises the wool, how much of it will be added to the consumer, and how much of it will be cheapened by the increased manufacture or by the increased competition in domestic products. These are unknown quantities about which men may theorize as much as they choose. I take it though as a general principle, and admit beforehand that every duty adds to the cost to the consumer.

There is another statement here made in regard to this same matter in which I think the commissioner must have fallen into an error, and I intended to call his attention to it this morning. He endeavors to show that the wool interest is a prosperous one; that the growth of wool is a prosperous and profitable branch of industry in this country, and he quotes from a gentleman who is very highly esteemed by the men engaged in this business, Mr. Randall, who wrote a very good book called the "Practical Shepherd." He quotes from Mr. Randall, who says:

"How very striking is the fact that, during thirty-eight years, [ending January 1, 1862,] and with all the disturbing causes to the wool market, there has not been a single year in which the average price (42.8) for the wool marked 'medium,' would not now pay the actual cost of producing our heavy-fleeced American merino wools." "Of the production of how many other of our great staples of industry can as much be said?"

In this Mr. Randall says that the average price they have received for their wool according to statements up to a certain time was forty-two and eight tenths cents per pound. Then by a marginal note which comes in after the word "now" there is a reference in the report to September, 1866. Any one who would read this report would suppose that Mr. Randall, president of the Wool-Growers' Association, in September, 1866, said that now the average price, forty-two and eight tenths cents per pound is a full remuneration for wool growing.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is a typographical error; it should be 1863.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am glad of that because a good deal of complaint has been made on this point. I was about to say that Mr. Randall's statement, or book, was written in 1863, and was based upon calculations made prior to January, 1862, and prior to any increase on the price growing out of the war. The computation made by him was literally true, that at forty-two and eight tenths cents per pound for wool, the average rate, the business of sheep-growing would be a remunerative one. The paper as printed here, would indicate that Mr. Randall said in September, 1866, that was a remunerative price; but I am glad to hear that it was a typographical error; it ought to be corrected. If the wool-grower now had forty-two and eight tenths cents per pound in gold for his wool—and that was what Mr. Randall was talking about—it would be all he wants, all he could ask. But now this same report goes on and says:

"The present prices of New England, New York, and Ohio unwashed wools (New York Price Current, November 3, 1866) range from thirty to forty-six cents per pound, and at these rates it is claimed that the business of wool-growing, particularly in the States of New York, Pennsylvania, and Ohio, is very far from remunerative."

This report, with the correction of date, shows that while the price of wool for a period of years before 1862 was forty-two and eight-tenths cents in gold, now in currency the average price of that same wool is less than it was in gold a few years ago. Is it possible that the wool-growers can continue their industry upon this basis? Does it not appear from the very facts here stated that all the increased price of that wool and the labor that goes into its consumption, and the elements which form its cost, all of them have been increased by a paper currency and your system of internal taxation, while the product of their industry has not gone up any? Can you suppose the men thus engaged in an industry which yields one hundred million pounds of wool, or at the old rates $42,000,000, can carry on that industrial pursuit without some protection? The manufacturer on the New England or Atlantic coast anywhere starting his mills can send to South America and buy his wool cheaper than he can in Ohio. The cost of freight from Ohio is fully as great as the cost from South America—the precise rates I cannot tell, water transportation is so much cheaper. Is it possible for the wool-grower thus to compete? Unless you give him a protection equivalent to the advance of your paper money, the advance of prices since we have substituted paper money for gold, can you expect him to be satisfied? The wool-growers of this country, as a general rule, are among the small farmers of the country. The great body of sheep are owned in small flocks of from one hundred to two hundred. Very few, comparatively, have large flocks. They are the common farmers of the country, and when they see that their product, upon which they rely to help to pay your internal taxes, has not advanced in price one cent beyond what it was at the beginning of the war, and that they are now with insufficient protection called upon to compete with South America and all the cheap wool-producing countries, can you expect them to be satisfied?

In Canada the duty on Canadian wool is three cents a pound. The average duty, as shown by the tables here paid on South American wool, is a little over four and a half cents a pound. Certain wools are brought in at three cents; certain wools at six cents; certain wools at twelve cents. The average as shown by the tables is four and a half cents. The gold value of the wool, according to this statement, before the war was forty-two and eight tenths cents; so that the actual protection which the farmer now gets to compensate for all the derangement of the currency, for all his share of internal taxes, is only one tenth of what the cost of every pound of his wool was in 1862. Under these circumstances you must expect him to be dissatisfied.

When these two rival interests met together in a convention called by the manufacturers themselves, and the whole matter was there discussed, it was agreed between them after full and ample discussion that the rates of duty reported by the Senate bill should be given them, and they were satisfied with them, and have never called them in question. The manufacturers then made the claim that if the duty was put on wool they ought to have a corresponding duty on the cloth. That was freely yielded. The principle is proper; that is, if a duty is levied upon the raw article, an equivalent amount should be added to the duty on the product in order to enable the American producer who convert that wool into cloth to compete with the foreign producer. That was freely yielded. I trust, therefore, that on this subject of wool which has given rise to a great deal of debate on the present tariff, and which probably is under a more depressed condition at this moment than any other industrial interest of the United States, the arrangements between the wool-growers and the wool-manufacturers will be carried out. I would prefer myself to take it in the very words they have given us, so that if they are not satisfied hereafter they cannot complain of the proper committees of Congress for any mistake. I would take them at their word. I think their demand is a reasonable one, and I would be willing to give it to them as they ask it, so that if there is anything wrong in the practical working of their scheme they themselves may have the responsibility of it.

It is said, I know, that there was a very important class of our people not consulted when this arrangement was made. That is true: the consumers were not consulted, and the consumers have to pay the increased cost; but all other branches of industry in which these same consumers are interested are sufficiently protected by the duties imposed by this bill. The duties on wool and the duties on all agricultural products provided for in this bill are less per cent. ad valorem than the duties on manufactures. This is properly so, because they are so bulky that they protect themselves in great measure, and because on account of the cheapness of our land we have the advantage over foreigners and have less need for protection.

Here, in order to save me from addressing the Senate again, I may say that there is another agricultural interest in which the people of Indiana and Ohio are very largely interested, and that is flaxseed. By the present tariff, with which they are very much dissatisfied, the duty on flaxseed is a little less than eleven cents a bushel. There is a nominal duty of sixteen cents, but a reduction is made from that duty of the drawback on the cake made from imported seed, which reduces the duty in favor of the farmer to about ten and a half cents. The effect of that drawback is that American cake or cake made from American seed in the city of New York, of the same quality and the same kind, lying side by side with the cake made from the imported seed, is not worth so much by five cents a bushel as the foreign cake. That discrimination is made against our own industry. The duty then is really less than eleven cents a bushel, and at present prices it is only about five per cent. ad valorem, while on the other hand on flaxseed oil, which is nothing but the expressed juice of the flaxseed imported from India, there is a duty of twenty-three cents a gallon, or what is equivalent to a duty of about fifty-one cents on a bushel of seed, so that the discrimination made against the agriculturist is about forty cents a bushel. There is great complaint of this. That the crusher ought to have some protection there is no doubt, though I think myself the crushing of the India seed is one of those forced unnatural trades that can only be sustained by a very high rate of taxation, but as it is in existence I am willing to give it a fair protection. That is one point of difference between the House and Senate bill, and as I do not intend to enter into the discussion of the question hereafter I will simply say that the House had the subject before them a long time, and after much controversy settled it I think on a proper basis by giving thirty cents duty on the seed and thirty cents a gallon on the oil which is equivalent to a protection of thirty-seven and a half cents per bushel to the crusher of imported seed. If the oil is imported in the seed it will pay a duty of thirty cents a bushel, which will produce two and a quarter gallons of oil or fourteen cents a gallon. If imported as oil it will pay a duty of thirty cents a gallon, giving to the crusher a protection of sixteen cents a gallon for the simplest form of mechanical labor. Surely this is enough.

Mr. President, there is only one part of this bill to which I wish now to call the attention of the Senate, and that but for a few moments. The Secretary of the Treasury in his annual report states that the extent of the undervaluations and fraudulent importation of foreign goods amounts to about twenty per cent. of the whole. That this is true is known to every one in the trade. In certain articles, which are solely manufactured for the American market, the invoice prices are merely nominal, and as most of the duties are ad valorem they pay merely nominal amounts. The loss from this source and from smuggling according to the report of the Treasury, is $35,000,000 a year. It is manifest that this ought to be corrected, and that all classes, especially the American importer, who is usually honest, ought to seek to remedy it. It is said that on account of this system of undervaluation many branches of our foreign trade have got into the hands of unprincipled men. Merchants who have their chief office abroad invoice their goods and consign them to an agent here, so that we have no responsible person to punish for a violation of our laws. The present remedy is to seize the goods and go through a long litigation about it. On account of the prevalence of ad valorem duties and the difficulty of ascertaining the real value of the goods at the place of exportation frauds that are manifest on the face cannot be detected because there is really no value to the goods in the market at the place from whence they are exported.

This has been a subject of much inquiry in England and France, and it appears that in England they have adopted a system by which they dispense with custom-house oaths, but by inspection ascertain the true valuation of the goods. If in the opinion of the proper appraisers the goods are undervalued the Government simply says to the importers, "I will take these goods at your price, and allow you a reasonable profit on them," and they are sold for public use. The result has been in England, I am told, to break up all systems of undervaluation. The same principle has been introduced into the treaty between France and Italy, a copy of which I have before me, so that if goods are imported from Italy to France, or vice versa, and when received at the custom-house, if, by inspection it is ascertained that they are undervalued to the extent of five per cent., they seize them for the Government, and they are sold for public use. The importer receives his own valuation for the goods together with a profit of five per cent. If he complains he is sufficiently answered by saying, "We took your goods at your own price, at your own valuation; if there is an error you made it yourself." The result has been that undervaluation is too dangerous to be practiced. I do not learn of anybody who ever got the advantage of these Governments except in one case. One of our adventurous Yankee countrymen imported a cargo of clocks into England. They are made here for less than anywhere else. When they reached the custom-house the proper officers, not being accustomed to Yankee clocks, thought they were undervalued and seized the whole cargo and sold them, paying the importer his own price and allowing him ten per cent. profit. This was so rapid and favorable a sale of an American product that another cargo was sent at the same valuation. The officers seized them, too, but the market was already supplied with Yankee clocks, and as they were not really undervalued the second cargo was released and no one was harmed.

This device has been applied in many cases both in England and France with great advantage. The Committee on Finance have therefore introduced into the bill a provision somewhat similar to the English regulation, except that the English law, where the goods sell for more than ten per cent. in addition to the valuation, allows the custom-house officers one half of the excess. The Committee on Finance thought it best not to insert that feature, for the present at least, until the system was tried. The section contained in this bill authorizes the custom-house officers, in the case of undervaluation to the extent of ten per cent., to seize the goods as the property of the United States and sell them. If the importer complains about it he is paid at his own value, and ten per cent. allowed him for profits and for expenses of importation and sale.

With these general observations I leave this bill. Although some portions of it do not meet my views, and I shall probably vote for modifications; yet I believe the bill as a whole will be beneficial. The bill of the House, in my judgment, was defective in several important particulars. In the first place, it reduced the duties on some articles more than we can bear by throwing off half the duty on tea and coffee. Another objection to the House bill was that in many cases the rates of duty were made so high as absolutely to prohibit importation, and consequently to utterly destroy the revenue from certain branches of industry. The present bill, founded upon Mr. Wells's bill, but very materially modified by the Committee on Finance, will give every industry of the country a fair and reasonable protection. It will not reduce the aggregate revenue from manufactured goods, but it will secure a reasonable competition between the foreign and the domestic producer. From the statements made to us I believe that under it every industrial interest of our country can be prosecuted with reasonable success under favorable circumstances, and yet at the same time there will be such a competition between the foreign and domestic producer as to yield us a fair revenue on imported goods.

Nor am I alarmed by the statement made by my friend from New Jersey yesterday, that the amount of goods imported into this country was the enormous sum of $305,000,000. We have got to import goods in order to get revenue, and when I reflect that $305,000,000 is only five per cent. of the magnificent production he shows we have annually made in this country I do not think we need be frightened at the amount of imported goods. We cannot entirely break up the importation of goods without surrendering our revenue. We dare not do that. The necessity rests upon us of raising $140,000,000 of gold revenue. We must not, therefore, materially affect the trade between foreign countries and our own. All that our own people can ask is, that such reasonable protection shall be given to them that the effect of our currency laws and our system of internal taxation shall not operate injuriously to their interests, but that they may have countervailing protection against the operation of our own laws.

Reconstruction.

SPEECH OF HON. JEHU BAKER,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 17, 1867.

The House having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 543) to provide for restoring to the States lately in insurrection their full political rights—

Mr. BAKER said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I rise for the purpose of indicating to the House some reasons why, in my opinion, the pending bill should not be adopted in its present shape, but should be referred to the joint Committee on Reconstruction.

The subject-matter of this bill and of the pending substitute is of a character the most important that can be brought before the American Congress, and it ought therefore to be thoroughly and exhaustively considered; and all experience has shown that an able and well-composed committee is the most proper body for giving due consideration in the first instance to important measures of legislation.

I am not at all satisfied with the bill in its present form, and although there are many large questions collaterally connected with the measure now before the House into which I might illogically enter, I shall confine myself rigorously to a mere statement of my objections to this particular bill, as reasons why it should not be adopted but referred for more mature consideration by the committee. I will read the preamble to the bill, which is as follows:

Whereas the eleven States which lately formed the government called the "confederate States of America" have forfeited all their rights under the Constitution, and can be reinstated in the same only through the action of Congress.

Now, sir, I object to the phraseology of this preamble, in that it employs the term "government" without qualification or restriction as applied to the lately revolted States. The word "government" is the term used for a valid, legitimate Government. When such a Government is not meant we qualify with some adjective, as "so-called" government, "pretended" government, or, better still, "de facto" government. I am unwilling to imply in a public statute, even by the remotest intendment or allusion, that the so-called "confederate States of America" had ever the slightest valid existence as a legitimate "Government."

The preamble further asserts that these revolted States have forfeited all their rights under the Constitution of the United States. Now, I am not prepared to say I agree to this proposition without qualification. I understand that it is the duty of this Government to guaranty to each of these revolted States a State government republican in form. And if it is a constitutional obligation upon this Government to thus guaranty a republican State government to each of these States, then I would really suppose it is their right to receive such a government. The obligation to guaranty appears necessarily to involve the right to receive the benefit guarantied.

Further, sir, I suppose the word "State" includes the people thereof as a part—certainly a very important part—of its contents; and I am of opinion that the people of each of these revolted States have, under the Constitution of the United States, the right of petition. And in my opinion they have the further right to occupy the legal status of citizens of the United States in the most general sense of the term citizen. This I put first upon the general ground that the Government of the United States is their sovereign. Sovereignty over these people is based on the necessary assumption that they are subjects or citizens of the sovereign Power and owing it allegiance. The two things are inseparable. But, secondly and in a more particular sense, we have in the most solemn manner recognized them as citizens. At the last session of Congress we proposed to the States of this Union the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, the first article of which provides that "all persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof are citizens of the United States," &c. Now, sir, the terms of that amendment cover those persons who have engaged in armed revolt against the United States. They were born in the United States; they are subject to the jurisdiction of the United States; and it results by force of the first article of the proposed amendment that they are citizens of the United States. Furthermore, the first section of the civil rights bill—in substantially the same words—declares these people to be citizens. I am not therefore prepared to say, in an absolute and unqualified sense, that they have no rights under the Constitution.

I find myself compelled also to take serious exception to the second section of the bill of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] It is in these words:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the State governments now existing de facto, though illegally formed in the midst of martial law, and in many instances the constitutions were adopted under duress and not submitted to the ratification of the people, and therefore are not to be treated as free republics, yet they are hereby acknowledged as valid governments for municipal purposes until the same shall be duly altered, and their legislative and executive officers shall be recognized as such.

By the operation of this section, the moment this bill passes and becomes a law these respective de facto State governments, established under military power, and not valid unless recognized by the legislative department of this Government, become that instant valid State governments for municipal purposes, long before the scheme of reconstruction contemplated by the bill is effectuated. And let me observe that; for reasons foreseen or not foreseen, this scheme though passed here might never be effectuated; and then we should find ourselves in the awkward position of having recognized in advance as valid for all State purposes these respective military governments. Having once so recognized their validity it may be possible that that recognition might be retracted; but I desire to impress it upon the House that there would be very great difficulty in taking back what we had once declared in due form of law upon such a subject. I suggest that the wiser course would be that this recognition of these de facto governments as valid, retrospectively, should be postponed to such time as the scheme of guarantying loyal, civil, constitutional governments in their stead, may go into practical effect; and that to recognize them in advance would be to incur the danger of further embarrassing the whole subject by the logical consequences of our own illogical procedure.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BAKER. Certainly.

Mr. STEVENS. I find that the second section of my substitute is objected to. My ardent friend from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] on yesterday made great objection to this second section. Now, if it is going to offend any brother I am willing to modify my substitute so as to leave out that second section.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to modify his substitute before any vote is taken. And if no objection is made, he can do so at this time, although the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BAKER] is entitled to the floor.

No objection was made.

Mr. STEVENS accordingly modified his substitute by striking out the second section.

I am also compelled, sir, to take exception to the third section of the bill, which is as follows:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That each of the ten States which were lately in rebellion, and have not been admitted to representation in Congress, shall hold elections on the first Tuesday of May, 1867, to choose delegates to a convention to form a State government. The convention shall consist of the same number of members as the most numerous branch of the Legislature of said State before the rebellion. It shall meet at the former capital of said State on the second Monday of June of said year, at twelve o'clock noon, with power to adjourn from time to time, and shall proceed to form a State constitution, which shall be submitted to the people at such time as the convention shall direct, and if ratified by a majority of legal votes shall be declared the constitution of the State. Congress shall elect a commission for each of said States, to consist of three persons, who shall select, or direct the mode of selecting, the election officers for the several election districts, which districts shall be the same as before the rebellion, unless altered by said commission. The officers shall consist of one judge and two inspectors of elections, and two clerks; the said officers, together with all the expenses of the election, shall be paid by the United States, and said expenses shall be repaid by said State or Territory. Each of said officers shall receive five dollars per day for the time actually employed. Each of the members of said commission shall receive $3,000 per annum, and their clerk $2,000. The commission shall procure all the necessary books, stationery, and boxes, and make all regulations to effect the objects of this act. The President of the United States and the military commander of the district shall furnish so much military aid as the said commissioners shall deem necessary to protect the polls and keep the peace at each of said election districts. If, by any means, no election should be held in any of said late States on the day herein fixed, then the election shall be held on the third Monday of May, 1867, in the manner herein prescribed. Returns of all such elections shall be made to the said commissioners, whose certificates of election shall be prima facie evidence of the fact.

I raise, sir, upon that section the question of its constitutionality. I do not assert positively, much less dogmatically, that it is not constitutional; but I say I cannot see that it is constitutional; and I direct the attention of the House to a clause which I read from the Constitution of the United States:

"He [the President] shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall appoint, ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law; but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments."

Now, sir, the foregoing section of the bill provides that Congress shall elect a commission for each of said States, to consist of three persons, whose functions—large and important ones it will be admitted—are provided for in the section.

It will not be pretended, I presume, that the appointment of this class of Government agents is "otherwise provided for" in the Constitution; and it results seemingly, with entire clearness from the above-quoted clause of that instrument, that if they are to be regarded as officers of the United States—as indeed what else can they be—they must be appointed in conformity with this section of the Constitution; that is, sir, if we are acting under the Constitution. If not, then we are out upon a shoreless sea, without sextant, without compass, without guiding stars to lighten our pathway over the deep. I, for one, do not propose to navigate under any such conditions.

I next draw the attention of the House to the fourth section of the bill, which is in these words:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the persons who shall be entitled to vote at both of said elections shall be as follows: all male citizens above the age of twenty-one years who have resided six months in said State and ten days in the election district; and no person shall be deprived of the right to vote, or otherwise disfranchised, by reason of conviction and punishment for any crime other than for insurrection or treason or misprision of treason.

Confining my remarks on this section to the concluding part of it, I will say that I am advised of the object had in view by the gentleman who put this extraordinary provision in his bill. It was to guard against disfranchisement, by certain iniquitous procedures, which I am told are being instituted and carried on wholesale in these States, or in some of them. It is well, indeed, to guard against that kind of alleged procedure on the part of those who are now controlling the destinies of these States. The object is a good one, certainly; but why shall we provide that all the common criminals in ten States may be voters? Sir, the penitentiaries of these States might disgorge their inmates upon the polls under the operation of this bill. Why, in our dread of Scylla should we drive sheer upon Charybdis?

Mr. STEVENS took the floor.

Mr. BAKER. I will say, before I yield, that in my opinion the Committee on Reconstruction can pilot us more safely and wisely than that.

Mr. STEVENS. This provision only refers to the preliminary constitution, and goes no further than that; then it exhausts itself. I will add that yesterday I received information which justifies this clause in the bill. A gentleman told me he saw last week white men who only received a slap upon the back, while black men received seventeen lashes, every lash bringing the blood; and this they did to show that the law was impartially executed.

Mr. BAKER. That mitigates, but does not remove the objection. I do not suppose it would be a very difficult thing to provide for the end had in view by the gentleman without adopting the extraordinary and unheard-of provision that robbers, thieves, murderers, and criminals in general may be empowered to exercise the elective franchise in laying anew the foundations of a State government. I really think that provisos and qualifications could be devised securing the object of the gentleman on the one hand, and guarding against such undesirable results on the other.

But a more weighty objection, perhaps, than any I have stated grows out of the following portion of the sixth section of the bill:

And be it further enacted, That all persons who on the 4th day of March, 1861, were of full age, and who at any time held office, either civil or military, under the government called the "confederate States of America," or who swore allegiance to said government, are hereby declared to have forfeited their citizenship and to have renounced allegiance to the United States, and shall not be entitled to exercise the elective franchise or hold office until five years after they shall have filed their intention or desire to be reinvested with the right of citizenship, and shall swear allegiance to the United States and renounce allegiance to all other Governments or pretended governments; the said application to be filed and oath taken in the same courts that by law are authorized to naturalize foreigners.

Now, sir, the objection which I take to this language is, that it assumes that the status of a portion of those who have been in revolt against the United States is such that they are not citizens of the United States; in fact, that they occupy the position of aliens to the United States. I maintain such is not the law of the case; and I desire to draw the attention of the House to some authorities on this important legal question, which appear to me to be entitled to great consideration.

The decision of the Supreme Court in what are termed the prize cases I have never known called in question by any loyal man in America. On the contrary, it was everywhere hailed as a most admirable utterance of the court—sound in patriotism and sound in law. A portion of that decision has been cited, if I mistake not, by the gentleman from Pennsylvania to help out the idea that the revolted States did in some way succeed in placing themselves in a position of legal independence of the United States; and this is the part:

"Hence, in organizing this rebellion, they have acted as States claiming to be sovereign over all persons and property within their respective limits, and asserting a right to absolve their citizens from their allegiance to the Federal Government. Several of these States have combined to form a new confederacy, claiming to be acknowledged by the world as a sovereign State. Their right to do so is now being decided by wager of battle. The ports and territory of each of these States are being held in hostility to the General Government. It is no loose, unorganized insurrection, having no defined boundary or possession; it has a boundary marked by lines of bayonets and which can be crossed only by force. South of this line is enemies' territory, because it is claimed and held in possession by an organized, hostile, and belligerent power."

Now, from that language it has been sought to make out some intendment in favor of the position that the rebellion succeeded in some way in placing itself beyond the legal sovereignty of the United States. Plainly the words bear no such meaning. They are to the effect that confederate sovereignty was a thing asserted by the rebels, but not admitted by this Government, nor accomplished as a legal fact. But the court proceeded positively to exclude such an unwarranted intendment by saying in the same immediate connection—

"All persons residing within this territory whose property may be used to increase the revenues of the hostile Power are, in this contest, liable to be treated as enemies though not foreigners."

Well, sir, I submit they must either be foreigners or citizens of the United States; and if they are not to be treated as foreigners, the reason is that they have not by their act of rebellion absolved themselves from allegiance to the supreme sovereignty of the Republic. But the court in the same decision say expressly:

"Now, it is a proposition never doubted that the belligerent party who claims to be sovereign, may exercise both belligerent and sovereign rights."

That is, the exercise of the powers of war, and the extension of belligerent rights to the rebels as public enemies, was, in law, no abdication of the sovereignty of the Government over these same rebels.

And here the court refer to a decision in 4 Cranch, 272, to the material part of which, as bearing directly upon the question I am considering, I call the attention of the House. It is the case of Rose vs. Himely—the decision having been rendered by Chief Justice Marshall, in 1808, long before this iniquitous rebellion in behalf of slavery and against liberty and civilization threw its ugly and bloody front across the pathway of the Republic. In that decision the court say:

"The colony of St. Domingo, originally belonging to France, had broken the bond which connected her with the parent State, had declared herself independent, and was endeavoring to support that independence by arms. France still asserted her claim of sovereignty, and had employed a military force in support of that claim. A war de facto then unquestionably existed between France and St. Domingo. It has been argued that the colony, having declared itself a sovereign State, and having thus far maintained its sovereignty by arms, must be considered and treated by other nations as sovereign in fact, and as being entitled to maintain the same intercourse with the world that is maintained by other belligerent nations. In support of this argument the doctrines of Vattel have been particularly referred to. But the language of that writer is obviously addressed to sovereigns, not to courts. It is for Governments to decide whether they will consider St. Domingo as an independent nation, and until such decision shall be made, or France shall relinquish her claim, courts of justice must consider the ancient state of things as remaining unaltered, and the sovereign power of France over her colony as still subsisting."

Now, the court here very properly say that the language of Vattel is obviously addressed to sovereigns, not to courts. If France had recognized the independence of St. Domingo that would have constituted her a new sovereign State, and put her at once in a position beyond the sovereignty of the mother country. So in our case: if the United States had recognized the independence of the rebel power, that would have placed the revolted States in a position of independence, and absolved their people from all allegiance to their late sovereign Power. But, on the contrary thereof, this Government through every one of its departments, legislative, executive, and judicial, and through a military force of two millions of men, continually disputed the assumption that there was any sovereignty to be recognized in the revolted States. And so with all the nations of the civilized world: not one of them at any time recognized the so-called confederate States as a sovereign Power.

I will next draw the attention of the House to a particular passage from Vattel, which I am sure—at least I strongly believe—I have heard cited upon this floor on more than one occasion by the gentleman from Pennsylvania

[Mr. STEVENS] in support of his very peculiar ideas upon this great subject. Before doing so I will remind the House that in ascertaining the real meaning of a writer it is best to quote him by context and not by isolated passages. Vattel says:

"A civil war breaks the bands of society and government, or at least suspends their force and effect; it produces in the nation two independent parties, who consider each other as enemies, and acknowledge no common judge. These two parties, therefore, must necessarily be considered as the two forward constituting, at least for a time, two separate bodies, two distinct societies. Though one of the parties may have been to blame in breaking the unity of the State and resisting the lawful authority they are not the less divided in fact. Besides, who shall judge them? who shall pronounce on which side the right or the wrong lies? On earth they have no common superior. They stand, therefore, in precisely the same predicament as two nations who engage in a contest, and being unable to come to an agreement have recourse to arms."

But a little further along, in the same chapter, on the same subject, Vattel adds:

"When the sovereign has subdued the opposite party, and reduced them to submit and sue for peace, he may except from the amnesty the authors of the disturbances—the heads of the party: he may bring them to a legal trial, and punish them if they be found guilty."

Now, could that be done if they had attained a position of independence, or if they had succeeded in placing themselves beyond the supreme sovereignty of the State against which they were contending? Of course not. So that the opinion of Vattel upon the subject is quite in harmony with the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States—as indeed with the very reason of the case, with the practice of all nations, and with the opinion of every respectable writer upon public law. I am unwilling to take any step or to cast any vote which assumes that in fundamental law there ever were, for any one moment of time, two sovereign Powers inside of the territory of the Republic. The practical execution of this unbroken legal sovereignty of the Union was obstructed, it is true; but what of that, as affecting my present argument? Every legal authority, every legal right, is liable to be obstructed. If a man commits a crime, murder for example, he may put himself in defiance of the law, and resist or evade its officers for weeks, months, or years. Can it be maintained that in consequence of such an interruption of its execution there is any suspension of the authority of the law—any loss of rightful jurisdiction over the person of the offender? Certainly not; and the principle is the same in the great case as in the small. Here was a gigantic treasonable combination, large enough to require two millions of men, first and last, to put it down; but yet, from the standpoint of the Constitution of the United States, there was no moment at which every one of these parties in revolt did not in very law owe allegiance to the Government of the United States. And if so, if the sovereign power of the United States was, all through the rebellion, a subsisting fact in law, how can it be maintained that these men succeeded in placing themselves in the position of alien enemies, beyond the sovereign jurisdiction of the United States, as we are invited by the sixth section of this bill to assume they did?

As to the power of this Government to decitizenize rebels by its own act and in due form of law I say nothing. No such question is raised by the sixth section of this bill, as I understand it. It contains no words operating in presenti, and accomplishing such a purpose on the part of the Government. It simply assumes that a certain class of those lately in rebellion have, heretofore, by their own action, succeeded in cutting the thread of their allegiance to the Government, and in placing themselves, by their own volition, in the status of aliens or foreigners; and it provides that they may become naturalized as other foreigners. This assumption, as I have endeavored to show, receives no countenance from the law of war, none from the solemn and approved adjudications of our highest court, and is, besides all this, a flat stultification of the entire previous action of every department of the Government.

But, sir, if I should possibly be mistaken in my construction of the language of this section of the bill—if it should be construed as a present legislative declaration, decitizenizing the class of persons therein defined—still I find very great difficulty in giving it my approval. To say nothing of such a policy as an original and open question, I invite the attention of the House to two important considerations already briefly alluded to: first, that such action would contravene the civil rights bill; and secondly, that it would be in violation of the proposed amendment of the Constitution. The first section of the civil rights bill enacts:

That all persons born in the United States and not subject to any foreign Power, excluding Indians not taxed, are hereby declared to be citizens of the United States, &c.

These words, sir, beyond all question, include the very persons whom the bill before us proposes to treat as foreigners. Are we prepared to take back what we have said in that bill; to mar at so early a day that great statute of liberty? I for one shall be slow, very slow, to aid in the mutilation of so noble a statute.

But, sir, there is a still more formidable obstruction barring up the way along which the gentleman from Pennsylvania would lead us. The first section of the proposed constitutional amendment, as already cited in my opening remarks, provides that—

All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States, &c.

These words again, beyond all cavil, embrace the class of persons whom the gentleman from Pennsylvania proposes to treat as in the category of foreigners.

Now, sir, did we propose this amendment of the Constitution in good faith? I certainly so understood it. The Congress proposing it so understood it, of course. The States that are ratifying it, one after another, so understand it; and yet we are now invited to thrust it aside, to ignore its existence as a fact worthy of no consideration, and to enact a statute in flat violation of its provisions. Sir, is it fit, is it becoming in this great Legislature of the nation, to work eight months in the elaboration of a constitutional amendment—a wise, useful, and indispensable amendment, as I regard it—and then, immediately after it is sent to the States, and while the States are rapidly ratifying it, to turn square around and propose to override by statute exactly what we have projected by way of constitutional amendment? Such a line of policy as coming from the gentleman from Pennsylvania becomes the more strange and unaccountable when we remember that it is his opinion, stoutly and often expressed, that it only requires three fourths of the loyal States to ratify the amendment—a number certain to be obtained. Sir, in my judgment there is no proper consistency, no solidity or cogency of action in such a course. It appears to me like a species of trifling, quite out of place in an American Congress, to propose an amendment to the Constitution in one breath, and to proceed at once to disregard the policy it embraces in the next—especially in view of the all but certain prospect of its early ratification.

I next draw the attention of the House to a similar difficulty which it appears to me will grow out of the seventh section of the bill, which is as follows:

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That no constitution shall be presented to or acted on by Congress which denies to any citizen any right, privileges, or immunities which are granted to any other citizen in the State. All laws shall be impartial without regard to language, race, or former condition. If the provisions of this section should ever be altered, repealed, expunged, or in any way abrogated, this act shall become void and said State lose its right to be represented in Congress.

Sir, I regard the concluding sentence of that section as embodying an utterly untenable provision. We have proposed, as I have stated, an amendment to the Constitution, which few of us question will be adopted. Within a very few months it may be a part of the Constitution of the United States. The second section of that proposed amendment leaves it to the States of the Union to determine who shall be qualified electors. Now, sir, the States upon which this bill is intended to act might conform to the provisions of this seventh section, and thus resume their full practical relations with the Government of the Union. Meantime, the amendment having been ratified and become part of the Constitution, these States might so modify their constitutions and laws as to be at the same time in conflict with this section of the bill and in palpable harmony with the Constitution of the Union—in which case the bill enacts its own abrogation, and provides that the States so offending shall lose their right of representation in Congress!

Sir, such a provision is not only untenable, it is nugatory and monstrous. It is no part of American statesmanship or American policy to dismiss from these Halls the representatives of a State whose constitution and laws are in harmony with the fundamental law of the Republic!

Mr. Speaker, I have now said all I intended to say in the way of criticism upon the provisions of this bill. I think it ought by all means to be referred to the Committee on Reconstruction. That committee was constituted for the very purpose of considering this sort of work in the first instance, and in my judgment we shall be all the forwarder by so referring the bill. An ill considered and untenable step will retard rather than advance our progress. I hear much said about vigor of action. Well, sir, I certainly go for vigor; but I also go for something in addition thereto. I want to put some consistency, some law, some common sense into our vigor. I go for hooping our tub before putting water in it. To pour in at the top that which will run out at the bottom is not vigor, but disconcerted weakness. Let this whole business be referred to the appropriate committee; let the committee go to work in earnest; and we shall then be in a train promising a better harmony of the House—better results in the way of matured, sound legislation, than I can at present hope for from any other course of action.

Regeneration before Reconstruction.

SPEECH OF HON. GEO. W. JULIAN,
OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
January 28, 1867.

The House having under consideration House bill No. 543, to restore to the States lately in rebellion their political rights, and the amendment thereto proposed by Mr. STEVENS—

Mr. JULIAN said:

Mr. SPEAKER: In view of the time already consumed in the discussion of the measure now before us, and the general desire of members to reach an early vote on the pending motion to commit, I shall endeavor to address the House as briefly as possible; and I therefore prefer, on this occasion, to submit my views without interruption. I cannot support the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] in its present form; but I shall not vote to send it to the Committee on Reconstruction at this late hour in the session. I believe the time has come for action, and that having this great subject now before us we should proceed earnestly, and with as little delay as may be, to mature some measure which may meet the demand of the people. Nearly two years have elapsed since the close of the war, during the whole of which time the regions blasted by treason have been subject to the authority of Congress; and yet these regions are still unprovided with any valid civil governments, and no loyal man within their limits, black or white, is safe in his person or estate. The civil rights act and the Freedmen's Bureau bill are set at open defiance, while freedom of speech and of the press are unknown. The loyal people of these districts, with sorely-tried patience and hopes long deferred, plead with us for our speedy interposition in their behalf; and even the conquered rebels themselves, who are supreme in this general reign of terror, seem to be growing weary of their term of lawlessness and misrule. Sir, let us tolerate no further procrastination; and while we justly hold the President responsible for the trouble and maladministration which now curse the South and disturb the peace of the country, let us remember that the national odium already perpetually linked with the name of Andrew Johnson will be shared by us, if we fail in the great duty which is now brought to our doors.

Mr. Speaker, my first objection to the amendment proposed is that it practically confounds the distinction between treason and loyalty by allowing the elective franchise to the great body of the criminals who strove, through four bloody years, to destroy the nation's life. No such policy can have my sanction. The sixth section of the amendment, which seeks to guard against this by the affidavit which it requires, would prove a delusion and a snare. I will read the form of the oath which it prescribes:

I, A. B., do solemnly swear, on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, that on the 4th day of March, 1864, and at all times thereafter, I would willingly have complied with the requirements of the proclamation of the President of the United States, issued on the 8th day of December, 1863, had a safe opportunity of so doing been allowed me; that on the said 4th of March, 1864, and at all times thereafter, I was opposed to the continuance of the rebellion and to the establishment of the so-called confederate government, and voluntarily gave no aid or encouragement thereto, but earnestly desired the success of the Union, and the suppression of all armed resistance to the Government of the United States; and that I will henceforth faithfully support the Constitution of the United States and the Union of the States thereunder.

Sir, of what value would be such an oath? In exacting it, instead of protecting the rights of loyal men we should build a safe bridge over which every rebel in the South could pass back into power. How could perjury be assigned upon such an affidavit? By what process could the prosecutor prove, on the trial, the hidden purpose or the secret intention of the party? I have little faith in the oaths of rebels under any circumstances. If our experience in the late war establishes any general rule in such cases, it is that the oath of a traitor proves nothing but the perjury of the villain who takes it. Most assuredly we could not rely upon it where the man who swears runs no risk of being brought to account; and the exaction of such an oath of men who have ruthlessly lifted their hands against their country is scarcely less than a mockery.

But if it be granted that this oath would be honestly taken, it does not follow that we should now restore the franchise on any such cheap and easy conditions. Are we willing thus to degrade and belittle this great right, the highest expression of citizenship, and its truest safeguard? Must we make haste to share the governing power of the country with the rebel hordes who fought us nearly three years, because they grew weary of their enterprise on the 4th day of March, 1864, and desired then to give it up? Is treason against the nation an offense so slight, an affair so trifling, that no real atonement for it shall be demanded? Sir, these are grave questions, and the state of our country to-day demands that Congress shall ponder them. The citizen's duty of allegiance and the nation's obligation of protection are reciprocal. The one is the price of the other, and the compact is alike binding upon both parties. When the rebels broke this compact by attempting the crime of national murder their right of citizenship was forfeited, and the nation has the undoubted right to declare the consequences of that forfeiture by law. It not only has the right, but in my judgment is sacredly bound to exercise it. And why? Because, in the language of Vattel, "Every nation is obliged to perform the duty of self-preservation." The only solid foundation of national security is the allegiance of the citizen; and the most solemn duty which is at this moment devolved upon the Congress of the United States is the duty of keeping the Government of the country in the hands of loyal men. No Government can be secure, and no Government deserves to live, which allows its enemies a common and equal voice with its friends in the exercise of its powers. This nation has hitherto recognized this principle. In the very first years of the Republic Congress sanctioned the perpetual disfranchisement of the leader and principal officers of Shay's rebellion; and the acts of Congress which warrant the exercise of this power of disfranchisement stand in full force and unchallenged on your statute-books. Congress, during the rebellion, deprived of all rights of citizenship those who deserted from the military or naval service, or who, after being "duly enrolled," left the United States or their military districts to avoid a draft. Certainly these offenses are no greater than the crime of treason, persisted in for successive years. The authority of Congress in all such cases rests upon the universal law of nations. It grows out of the contract of allegiance and the duty of every nation to preserve its own life; and therefore no trial and conviction by any judicial tribunal are necessary as a condition of the declared forfeiture. The forfeiture is not declared as a punishment for the violation of any criminal law, but as a safeguard against national danger. It is an expression of the same policy which excludes aliens from the rights of citizens. The power is not unconstitutional, for our fathers, in framing the Constitution, recognized the law of nations, as they were compelled to do, in launching the Republic among the independent Powers of the world. Nor is it at all affected by the question whether the districts lately in revolt are States in the Union or territorial provinces. In both States and Territories the national authority must be held paramount as to the rights of citizenship, which has uniformly been regarded as a national question. If the second section of the first article of the Constitution gives to the States the power to say who shall vote, this must necessarily be understood to apply only to those who are citizens of the United States, since otherwise the national authority might be overthrown by aliens in our midst in combination with citizens. The late war for the Union has been carried on at immense cost for the purpose of demonstrating to all the world that we are a nation; and every nation, according to the high authority already quoted, "has a right to every thing that can ward off imminent danger, and keep at a distance whatever is capable of causing its ruin; and from that very same reason that establishes its right it has also the right to the things necessary to its preservation."

Mr. Speaker, with what face can we denounce the President for his wholesale pardons, and charge him with making treason honorable and loyalty odious, if we ourselves voluntarily clothe with the honor and dignity of the ballot the men who have forfeited all their rights by their crimes against their country? With what consistency can we declaim against the monstrous blood-guiltiness of treason while we extend to the traitor the right hand of political fellowship? Sir, not a single rebel has yet expiated his crime on the gallows. Not one has even been tried. Neither confiscation nor exile has been the portion of the armed assassins and outlaws who summoned to their untimely graves more than three hundred thousand heroes of the Republic, and made the civilized world stand aghast at the recital of their crimes. I do not say we should disfranchise the rebels because the President has allowed them to go unpunished, but that loyal men alone can be trusted to govern the country they have saved, and that the false clemency of the Executive is the exact reverse of a good reason for restoring traitors to power. Nor do I argue that perpetual disfranchisement will certainly be necessary, but that the nation, for its own safety, should withhold the ballot from its enemies till they have proved themselves fit to cast it. No such proof can be adduced. On the contrary, the spirit of treason is now quite as reeking and defiant in the revolted districts as at any time during the war. In the sunshine of the President it has sprouted up into new and more vigorous forms of life, while repentant rebels are unknown, save in the sense of regretting the failure of their treason. Sir, I hope the Thirty-Ninth Congress will not sully its good name by confounding the friends of the country with its enemies in the reconstruction and government of the districts blighted by treason, and thus trample down the great principle that allegiance to the nation is the condition of citizenship and the bulwark of our freedom. To do this would be to surrender our strongest weapons to the President and his rebel allies. It would be disloyalty to the great cause which would thus again be imperiled, and bring dishonor upon the graves of our martyred legions, who perished in deadly encounter with the traitors whom we now propose to restore to their lost rights.

Mr. Speaker, I further object to the measure before us, that it is a mere enabling act, looking to the early restoration of the rebellious districts to their former places in the Union, instead of a well-considered frame of government, contemplating such restoration at some indefinite future time, and designed to fit them to receive it. They are not ready for reconstruction as independent States on any terms or conditions which Congress might impose; and I believe the time has come for us to say so. We owe this much to their misguided people, whose false and feverish hopes have been kept alive by the course of the Executive and the hesitating policy of Congress. I think I am safe in saying that if these districts were to-day admitted as States, with the precise political and social elements which we know to exist in them, even with their rebel population disfranchised and the ballot placed in the hands of radical Union men only, irrespective of color, the experiment would be ruinous to the best interests of their loyal people and calamitous to the nation. The withdrawal of Federal intervention and the unchecked operation of local supremacy would as fatally hedge up the way of justice and equality as the rebel ascendancy which now prevails. Why? Simply because no theory of government, no forms of administration, can be trusted, unless adequately supported by public opinion. The power of the great landed aristocracy in these regions, if unrestrained by power from without, would inevitably assert itself. Its political chemistry, obeying its own laws, would very soon crystalize itself into the same forms of treason and lawlessness which to-day hold their undisturbed empire over the existing loyal element. What these regions need, above all things, is not an easy and quick return to their forfeited rights in the Union; but government, the strong arm of power, outstretched from the central authority here in Washington, making it safe for the freedmen of the South, safe for her loyal white men, safe for emigrants from the Old World and from the northern States to go and dwell there; safe for northern capital and labor, northern energy and enterprise, and northern ideas to set up their habitation in peace, and thus found a Christian civilization and a living democracy amid the ruins of the past. That, sir, is what the country demands and the rebel power needs. To talk about suddenly building up independent States where the material for such structures is fatally wanting is nonsense. States must grow, and to that end their growth must be fostered and protected. The political and social regeneration of the country made desolate by treason is the prime necessity of the hour, and is preliminary to any reconstruction of States. Years of careful pupilage under the authority of the nation may be found necessary, and Congress alone must decide when and upon what conditions the tie rudely broken by treason shall be restored. Congress, moreover, is as solemnly bound to deny to disloyal communities admission into our great sisterhood of States as it is to deny the rights of citizenship to those who have forfeited such rights by treason.

I have thus far, Mr. Speaker, addressed myself to considerations which appeal to men of my own political faith. There is a theory of reconstruction held by gentlemen on the other side of the House, according to which the rebels, the moment they laid down their arms and confessed themselves vanquished, were entitled to resume all their rights as citizens, just as if they had not rebelled, and to set in motion the machinery of their State governments, be represented in Congress, and enjoy all and singular the rights and privileges of other citizens of the United States. Sir, I shall not consume much time in noticing this strange theory, which was so happily disposed of by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLBARGER] on Friday last. I must, however, do its friends the honor of confessing it to be entirely original. I think no such principle can be found in the law of nations. I am quite sure there is no historical precedent for it, and that the precedents are strongly the other way. One of these, and a very notable one, I may refer to, as illustrating the difference between the congressional and presidential theories of reconstruction. I understand that when Satan rebelled against the Almighty he was accommodated with quarters somewhat more tropical and less salubrious than the kingdom he had involuntarily abdicated. To speak plainly, he was plunged into hell; and he "accepted the situation." According to one account of the transaction he said it was—

and he has not been "reconstructed" to this day. But according to the modern theory to which I refer, the devil, when he was finally overpowered and was willing to acknowledge it, was that moment entitled to be reinstated in his ancient rights in Paradise, exactly as if he had not sinned. That I understand to be the Democratic theory of reconstruction. But Satan, devil as he was, never had the infernal audacity to insinuate so monstrous a pretension; and it was reserved for the followers of Andrew Johnson, nearly six thousand years later, to startle the civilized world by its avowal. Mr. Speaker, let me not be misunderstood here. I do not desire to see the rebels follow in the footsteps of their illustrious predecessor. There may have been times when it seemed to me they deserved a similar treatment. It may even have occurred to me, in some of my profaner moments, that if there is not a pretty respectable orthodox hell on the other side of the grave for the special discipline of the rebel leaders, it would seem to be the grandest oversight that divine Providence could possibly have committed. But in confronting the dangers which now beset our country, I put aside these theological fancies; and what I demand, and all I ask, is that Congress shall organize a well-appointed political purgatory, located in the rebellious districts, and keep the rebels in it until by their penitence and a change of their lives they shall satisfy us that they can again be trusted with power. Let us put them on probation; and should it require ten years, or twenty years, to qualify them for restoration, or secure an outside element strong enough to rule the rebel faction, let the time be extended. The grand interests involved plead with us to "make haste slowly," while voices from the graves of our slaughtered countrymen beseech us to "keep none but loyal men on guard." When the rebels, conscious of the ruin they have wrought, shall wash away their guilt in their tears of genuine contrition, then, and not till then, let us restore them to our embrace.

And now, Mr. Speaker, if any gentleman asks me what plan of government I would institute for the probation and pupilage of these districts I am ready to answer him. But before I do that I desire to say what forms of reconstruction I do not favor. In the first place, I oppose any cunningly devised scheme like that reported by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] from the Committee on Territories, with its popular conventions, its committees of safety, its provisional governors, and other machinery designed to meet the ugly fact that we have a bad man in the presidential chair, whose usurpations it is pretended we must checkmate by these extraordinary measures. If the President has been guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors, let him be impeached and hurled from power. I believe he is thus guilty, and therefore I believe our first duty is to call him to account. Instead of gradual approaches and flank movements we should confront him at once with our accusations and demand his trial. Instead of lopping off the branches we should strike at the root of our troubles, and no significance or insignificance of the executive office as now filled should stand in the way of our constitutional duty. If the President is not guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors, in the sense in which those terms were understood by our forefathers, and according to the precedents they had before them, then the right of impeachment is not even a "scarecrow," as Mr. Jefferson styled it. But if I am mistaken, and the country is doomed yet longer to endure his maladministration, then let us adopt precisely such measures of government for the rebellious districts as would be necessary and proper if we had an honest man in the place of Andrew Johnson, thus affording him the opportunity, should he seek it, to provoke new conflicts with the people by opposing our measures. Should his madness fail to supply us, abundantly, with the grounds for a successful impeachment, the sands of his official life will soon run out at the worst, while the management of the rebel territory demands a policy which may last for indefinite years. As the friends of the Constitution and the champions of law, we can best perform our duty by adhering to the well-settled forms and usages of our republican institutions.

I oppose, in the second place, any plan of reconstruction which attempts to reconcile opposite and utterly irreconcilable theories. If the rebellious districts are States, known to the Constitution as such, they have the right to be represented on this floor and in the other end of the Capitol. They have all the rights of the other independent States of the Union, and the work of reconstruction is done already. The logic of this theory, if accepted, not only vindicates the policy of the President, but brands the legislation of Congress for nearly six years past as a deliberate usurpation. This is the rebel theory, and those who have accepted it with all its consequences are consistent and brave men, who are entitled to the thanks of all the enemies of their country. But if you reject this theory, then you are driven squarely over to the policy of unqualified radicalism, for there is no middle ground on which to stand. If these districts are not States known to the Constitution it must follow inevitably that the Constitution knows them only as Territories, for which Congress is bound by the express words of the Constitution to "make all needful rules and regulations." Sir, I am opposed to any scheme of compromise between these theories, and to any plan of reconstruction which embodies in it any elements of the rebel theory. The policy of Congress and the President in recognizing those districts as States, while exercising over them powers utterly inconsistent with the rights of States, has brought upon us our worst troubles, and the sooner we abandon it the better it will be for the country. The nation needs a manly and straightforward policy, and not the weakness and vacillation which spring from crooked and ambidextrous measures which lend strength to the enemies of the Republic.

Mr. Speaker, the theory which deals with the rebellious districts as under the exclusive jurisdiction of Congress rests upon grounds which are logically impregnable. In the first place, their old constitutional governments were overthrown and destroyed by the rebellion. This will not be disputed. Second, their rebel governments, which followed, were destroyed by our arms. This is equally certain. Third, their present governments, extemporized by the President, are military and provisional only, having no validity whatever save that which they borrow from the continued acquiescence of Congress. The President himself can be quoted in support of this position. And fourth, the rebels themselves, having forfeited all their rights by their treason, as I have already shown, have no authority to institute any sort of government within their respective districts, until they are expressly empowered so to do by Congress. If I am right in these positions, these districts are so many geographical divisions of the Republic whose people are wholly without any valid civil government, and without any constitutional power to frame such government; and being solely under the jurisdiction of Congress, and having none of the powers and attributes of States, they are necessarily Territories of the United States. As such they need government till they are prepared for readmission, and the machinery of territorial governments, older than the Constitution itself, is as familiar to the American people as that of the State governments. Let each of these Territories then have a governor, a chief justice, a marshal, and an attorney. Let each of them have a Delegate in Congress, fitly denied the right to vote, while permitted to speak. Let each have a Legislature for the enactment of local laws, subject to the supervision of Congress. Let Congress declare who shall be qualified to vote in these Territories, adopting the same rule already established in the other Territories of the United States and in the District of Columbia. And when local supremacy shall defy the national authority in any of these Territories, let it be effectually cured by the military power of the United States. Under this educational process I would have these rebellious districts trained up in the way they should go, whether the time required for such training shall prove long or short; while in the mean time every inch of their soil will be subject to the national authority, and freely open to the energy and enterprise of the world. This policy, by nationalizing the South, would render life and property as secure in Louisiana as in Maine. It would tend powerfully to make our whole country homogeneous. It would encourage in these wasted regions "small farms, thrifty tillage, free schools, closely-associated communities, social independence, respect for honest labor, and equality of political rights." All these blessings must follow, if only the nation, having vanquished its enemies, will now resolutely assert its power in the interest of loyal men, over regions in which nothing but power is respected.

To all this, Mr. Speaker, it will be objected that it contravenes the policy of the constitutional amendment proposed by Congress at our last session, and therefore cannot in good faith be urged while that amendment is pending. Several replies to this objection are at hand.

Ho. OF REPS.

Reconstruction—Mr. Miller.

39TH CONG....2D SESS.

First, it must be remembered that this amendment was submitted to the several States. Congress had no right to propose it to unorganized districts which had no constitutional governments of any sort, and therefore no power to pass upon the question. Could we, for example, submit this amendment to Colorado or Nebraska, before they have been lawfully declared States? Congress, at the last session, might have waived all formalities and recognized the rebellious districts as States by receiving their representatives, as was done in the case of Tennessee; but we refused to do this. Congress even declined to pass the bill reported from the Reconstruction Committee providing that these so-called States should be received on their acceptance of the amendment. It is perfectly certain, therefore, that Congress reserved for its future judgment the very question which is assumed to have been decided by the objection under notice; or, that if Congress did decide it the decision was the other way. The very utmost that can be claimed by the champions of the constitutional amendment is that the question is an open one; and, being an open question, Congress may decide it to-day by putting territorial governments over these regions, leaving the amendment to the disposition of the loyal States, whose representatives in Congress for nearly six years past have ignored the existence of disloyal States in dealing with the mighty concerns of war and peace and the amendment of the Constitution itself. I believe the pending amendment will be ratified; but in voting to submit it I do not think Congress is at all embarrassed in its present action. I can say, for myself at least, that I am perfectly untrammelled, either by my votes in this House or by pledges or commitments anywhere; while I believe the general understanding at the last session was that the amendment embodied provisions which were demanded as national safeguards, without pretending to supply any final solution of the problem of reconstruction.

But I reply, in the next place, that even if Congress at the last session bound itself by an implied agreement to admit these districts as States on their ratification of the amendment, we are now released from that obligation. With singular unanimity and emphasis they have rejected our proposal, and thereby left us free. Sir, are we bound to wait here five years, or ten years, for them to ponder the question and reverse their decision, after they have already defiantly spurned our offer, allowing the rebel power in the meanwhile to have free course? I do not so understand the bargain, if any bargain has been made. We have the right to plead our release, and the state of the country demands that we shall exercise it. Since our session of last summer great changes have been wrought in the general feeling of the people. We see daily the truth of the old adage that "circumstances alter cases." Public opinion has forced Congress to establish manhood suffrage in the District of Columbia, and thereby to say that that principle should prevail in all the States of the Union. Congress has extended it over the Territories of the United States, constituting an empire large enough to support a population of two hundred million people. Congress has voted for the admission of Colorado and Nebraska on the fundamental condition of their acceptance of the same principle, and thus advertised all whom it may concern that other States yet to be born must comply with the same condition. Most certainly the like requirement will be made of the districts lately in arms against us, whatever may betide the constitutional amendment. God forbid that we should impose conditions upon virgin States of the Northwest, which have never rebelled, and whose people to-day are loyal, which we will not exact of the rebels who have drenched their country in blood! Sir, we cannot trifle with a principle so vital, or expose it to any sort of hazard. I voted last year against restoring Tennessee to her place in the Union, because I feared she could not be trusted without a mortgage from her securing the ballot to her colored loyalists. I hope my fears will prove groundless, but I shall never regret my vote. The loyal people of Maryland to-day, black and white, would be safer under Federal bayonets than under their local government; and Congress, where it has the power, must exert it against the enemies of the country and their sympathizers. I shall never vote to restore one of these rebel districts to power as a State, except upon the condition that impartial suffrage, without respect to race, color, or former condition of slavery, shall be the supreme law within her borders. Sir, we can no longer evade the solemn duty which the logic of events has at last made plain to all lovers of justice; and the man who now thrusts constitutional amendments in our way might as well quote the Crittenden resolutions, adopted by this House the day following the first battle of Bull Run, as the governing principle of the Thirty-Ninth Congress.

I add, finally, and as a conclusion from what I have said already, that the second section of the proposed amendment ought never to be made a part of the Constitution of the United States. It would not now be proposed, if the question were pending as a new one, as our action at this session has plainly indicated. I voted for it, along with the other sections of the amendment, simply as a proposal to reduce the political power of the rebels to a common level with that of loyal men; but instead of cutting down representation in these districts to the basis of actual suffrage, I think we are now ready so to extend the franchise as to make it commensurate with actual representation. An amendment of the Constitution securing this result should have been proposed at the last session. When, in our extremity, we called on the black loyalists of the South to help us through the red sea of war into which our wickedness had plunged us, and they responded to our call by sending two hundred thousand soldiers to our rescue, it thenceforward became the nation's duty, from which no escape was morally possible, to secure the rights of citizenship, both civil and political, to the wronged and outraged millions of the African race in our midst. It thenceforward ought to have been counted a shameful proposition, a flagrant affront to common justice and gratitude, for Congress to propose to the rebels, as a constitutional amendment, that if they would agree to the exclusion of these loyal colored men from the basis of representation, we would agree to surrender them to the tender mercies of rebel State governments, which might wholly deprive them of the sacred right of representation. Sir, I hope no such principle will ever defile the Constitution of our fathers. Aside from its cold-blooded ingratitude to our black allies, it is radically vicious. It impliedly concedes to the States of the Union the right to disfranchise male citizens of the United States over twenty-one years old who are innocent of crime, and thus strikes at the root of all democracy. If "taxation without representation is tyranny," and Governments derive "their just powers from the consent of the governed," the citizen's right of representation is as natural and inherent as the breath of his nostrils. To deprive him of it, unless he himself forfeits it by his offenses against society, is a crime against his manhood, which is the common foundation of the rights of all men. It is an offense against all free government, for the right of one citizen to a voice in its public administration is precisely the same as the right of every other citizen; and no fraction of citizens, however large, can deprive the remainder of their common and equal right. To deny this is to mock the Declaration of Independence and insult the memory of our fathers; and to incorporate the denial into the Constitution of the United States, in words which express or imply it, would strengthen the hands of every rebel in the South, and comfort the enemies of American democracy throughout the world. It would pollute the very fountains of our national life by the unnatural marriage of the Constitution to the foul heresy of State rights, which so recently wrapped the Republic in the flames of war; while it would stand in open conflict with that grand central principle of our great Charter which declares that "the United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government."

SPEECH OF HON. GEO. F. MILLER,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 19, 1867.

The House having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 543) to provide for restoring the States lately in insurrection to their full political rights—

Mr. MILLER said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The bill under consideration is one of vast importance, and demands the serious consideration of this House. Eleven of the States of this Union having rebelled, to wit: Tennessee, Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, North Carolina, South Carolina, Texas, Mississippi, and Virginia, claimed to have seceded and attempted to set up a new government for themselves, to be called the "confederate States of America," after four years of terrible and bloody conflict, such as no nation ever before witnessed, one of the most gigantic rebellions ever inaugurated was subdued by force of arms, and the life of this Republic, though not yet a century old, saved from ruin. During our struggle the monarchical Governments of Europe, save that of Russia, were, as it seemed, desirous for our downfall, and some of them even boasted through their public journals that a republican form of government was a failure. They looked back upon the ancient republics, which flourished for a while, but finally crumbled into ruin, and on their foundations were reared the most tyrannical Governments, with a lively hope that our fate would be no better.

But thanks be to Him who rules the destinies of nations that we had at the head of our Republic a President in the person of Abraham Lincoln, who was destined for the great work of saving the country from the grasp of designing demagogues. He was the choice, and I might add the idol of a free people, and around his administration the true, loyal patriots of the country rallied. After the triumphant reelection of Mr. Lincoln and surrender of the rebel forces, the next great question to solve was how to reconstruct the eleven States lately in rebellion so as to insure a permanent peace. But before this work was fully entered upon, Mr. Lincoln was assassinated, to wit: on the night of the 14th of April, 1865, by a foul wretch of the name of John Wilkes Booth, and of the wounds inflicted died the next day at twenty-two minutes past seven o'clock a. m. This was a sad event for the nation; his death was mourned by all the loyal people of the land; and the only consolation for this bereavement was the loud professions of Andrew Johnson, who, being placed on the same ticket with Mr. Lincoln, was elected Vice President of the United States; and on the day of Mr. Lincoln's death, after taking the requisite oath administered by the Chief Justice, took the presidential chair. It was then hoped and believed that he would follow in the footsteps of his illustrious predecessor.

Immediately after the organization of the Thirty-Ninth Congress there was appointed a committee of fifteen, nine on the part of the House and six from the Senate, denominated a Committee on Reconstruction. This committee after several months' labor, having made a thorough investigation as to the status of the late rebellious States, made a report recommending certain amendments to the Constitution of the United States, to be called article fourteenth, which, after undergoing some modification, passed both Houses of Congress by more than a two-third vote. Said article is divided into five sections, which are as follows:

SEC. 1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

SEC. 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice President of the United States, representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

SEC. 3. No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who having previously taken an oath as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State Legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may, by a vote of two thirds of each House, remove such disability.

SEC. 4. The validity of the public debt of the United States, authorized by law, including debts incurred for payment of pensions and bounties for services in suppressing insurrection or rebellion, shall not be questioned. But neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debt or obligation incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or any claim for the loss or emancipation of any slave; but all such debts, obligations, and claims shall be held illegal and void.

SEC. 5. That Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

This amendment having been submitted to the respective States for their action thereon Tennessee, one of the late so-called rebel States, promptly ratified the same through her Legislature, and was immediately after admitted to representation in Congress, thus leaving ten of the rebellious States unrepresented.

I will now, Mr. Speaker, consider some of the features of the bill under consideration. The original was reported by Mr. STEVENS, from the joint Committee on Reconstruction, on the 20th of April, 1866, embracing two sections, to which the same gentleman, on the 19th of December following presented an amendment embracing eight sections; and on the 16th of January, 1867, he presented to the House a modified amendment embracing eleven sections. On the same day Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, chairman of the Committee on the Territories, presented what he denominated a modified amendment embracing eighteen sections. The first section of the original bill provides that when the constitutional amendment shall have become part of the Constitution of the United States, and any State lately in insurrection shall have ratified the same and shall have modified its constitution and laws in conformity therewith, the Senators and Representatives of such State, if duly elected and qualified, may, after having taken the required oath, be admitted into Congress; and the second section allows time to such States for payment of direct tax under the act of August 5, 1861. These sections presupposed of course the speedy adoption of the constitutional amendment.

The amended bill is more stringent in its terms. Considerable fault is found with the second section even by some of the Republicans, and especially by the ardent gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. PAINE.] upon the ground that it acknowledges as valid for merely municipal purposes the present State governments until legislative and executive officers shall be recognized. I cannot see in that section anything to bring forth so much opposition; it parts with no rights, nor does it acknowledge the validity of the governments formed in those States, except for the purpose therein contained. The third, fourth, and fifth sections prescribe the mode of forming constitutions in the said ten States. The remaining sections direct who shall vote in forming constitutions in those States. There may be some doubt with regard to Congress having the power to determine who shall exercise the elective franchise if they still retain their status as States, but in my opinion there is serious objection to what is contained in the sixth section, which declares that a certain class of persons engaged in the late rebellion have forfeited their citizenship and renounced their allegiance to the United States, and in order to be reinstated must first file their petitions for naturalization, and five years thereafter may on taking the prescribed oath be restored.

I contend, Mr. Speaker, that no rebellious act on the part of the rebels could dissolve their allegiance to the Government of the United States, and consequently they are amenable to its laws and can be tried and punished for their treason, and moreover they could be drafted and forced to serve in our armies notwithstanding they might claim to have seceded. In 3 Dallas, 153, Talbot vs. Janson, it is laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States that even if expatriation exists under our Constitution and laws there must not only be a renunciation of citizenship of the United States, but the actual removal for some lawful purpose; in the same case, on page 153, Justice Patterson, who delivered the opinion of the Court, says:

"It is an obvious principle that an act of illegality can never be construed into an act of emigration or expatriation. At that rate, treason and emigration or treason and expatriation would in certain cases be synonymous."

Hence it will be seen that no citizen, while remaining within the United States, can absolve his allegiance, consequently this section could not be sustained; yet I have no doubt that laws may be passed depriving those engaged in the rebellion of certain political rights. The modified amendment makes some change as to the time of holding the election of delegates to meet in convention to form a constitution and the mode of appointing commissioners who shall direct the mode of selecting the election officers for the several districts; in other respects the main features are the same as that of the amended bill.

The modified bill of Mr. ASHLEY differs considerably from that of my colleague, [Mr. STEVENS,] though, as I view it, it is more complicated, and it will be more difficult to carry out its provisions. The fourteenth section provides that the constitutional convention, when assembled and organized, may divide the State of Texas into two States, and that said convention shall first cede a part of the territory to the United States. I doubt very much whether this extraordinary power could be carried out by this mode of procedure, at least it would be a very doubtful undertaking, and such as I do not think Congress would feel justified in adopting. Upon the whole I am of opinion that my colleague's [Mr. STEVENS] bill is preferable to that of the honorable gentleman from Ohio if somewhat modified, which could be best accomplished by reference to a committee; and as the Committee on Reconstruction is composed of members from each House it would be the appropriate committee to refer it to, and I am therefore in favor of such reference. The reconstruction of these States is a very grave question, and ought not be passed over too hastily.

The learned gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] attacks the bill of my colleague [Mr. STEVENS] with considerable severity. He says in his able speech:

"The gentleman's [Mr. STEVENS's] bill, while it conflicts with the constitutional amendment, totally ignores the first duty of the Congress of the United States to give the protection of law to life and property in the disorganized States."

He also says that—

"The bill and the gentleman's [Mr. STEVENS's] hypothesis would operate as a general jail delivery."

I cannot see how the bill referred to "would operate as a general jail delivery." If its provisions are in conformity with the Constitution and could be carried out, the rebels might find a jail without a delivery, and I am inclined to believe that the fears of the learned gentleman on that point are more imaginary than real; nor do I understand Mr. STEVENS to be opposed to the constitutional amendment, for I understood him to say when I gave notice that at the proper time I would offer the following section to the bill, to wit:

And be it further enacted, That no such State shall be admitted to a representation in Congress until it also ratifies the amendment to the Constitution of the United States which has been proposed by two thirds of both Houses of the Thirty-Ninth Congress and submitted to the respective States for ratification—that he had no objection to this section being added. Much has been said, Mr. Speaker, by members on this floor as to the status of these late rebellious States; some have contended that they are to be treated as conquered provinces, and of course be subject to the will of the conqueror. Of this, which I deem a very dangerous doctrine, I had occasion to remark in a speech delivered in this Hall on the 21st of April last, that by assuming that position we might make ourselves liable for at least so much of the rebel debt as is held bona fide by outside parties, and it is said that about five hundred millions of the bonds are held by persons in Europe.

By the law of nations the conqueror of a province is entitled to the public domain and is bound to pay its debts previously contracted. As this is such a universal rule it does not require authorities to substantiate it; I will, however, cite one, which will be found in Wheaton's Elementary International Law, third edition, page 63, in which it is laid down:

"As to public debts, whether due to or from the revolutionized State, a mere change in the form of government or in the person of the ruler does not affect their obligation. The essential form of the State, that which constitutes it an independent community, remains the same; its accidental form only is changed. The debts being contracted in the name of the State, by its authorized agents, for its public use, the nation continues liable to them, notwithstanding the change in its internal constitution. The new government succeeds to the fiscal rights and is bound to fulfill the fiscal obligations of the former government. It becomes entitled to the public domain and other property of the State, and is bound to pay its debts previously contracted."

Now, sir, we cannot afford to speculate upon such a theory, nor is there any occasion for assuming such a dangerous position. On this point I maintain the same views that I expressed during the first session of this Congress, to wit: that no act on the part of the rebels could take a State out of the Union; that their attempt to do so was frustrated by the force of arms, and that they still remained a part and parcel of the United States; and that all their acts and decrees, so far as regards the United States, were an absolute nullity.

I think I am safe in saying that there are but few who maintain the doctrine that the rebel States are in the position of conquered provinces. There are others who contend that they lost their status as States and are to be treated as Territories, and are again to be admitted as if they never had been States. This, I think, is a mistake, for I do not well see how the rebellion could bring about this fundamental change. It is true that they may have, by their acts, in effect abrogated their corporate powers, or, in other words, suspended the same and thus placed themselves for a time without a protective State government, in which case that injunction of the Constitution of the United States must be invoked, which in the fourth section of the fourth article thereof declares that—

HO. OF REPS.

Reconstruction—Mr. Miller.

39TH CONG...2D SESS.

"The United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government."

And these very words of the Constitution plainly indicate that when a State is once admitted into this Union it must remain a State, and that a majority therein cannot change its government from that of a republican form. The minority, let it be ever so small, is entitled to the protection of the United States, and consequently it is a great mistake to suppose that they forfeit their rights because a majority in a State may rebel. In this view I am sustained by an able writer on the laws of nations; for in Vattel's Law of Nations, page 6, it is laid down that—

"If a nation is obliged to preserve itself, it is no less obliged carefully to preserve all its members. The nation owes this to itself, since the loss even of one of its members weakens it and is injurious to its preservation. It owes this also to the members in particular, in consequence of the very act of association; for those who compose a nation are united for their defense and common advantage; and no one can justly be deprived of this union and the advantages he expects to derive from it while he on his side fulfills the conditions."

And the same author adds that—

"The body of a nation cannot then abandon a province, a town, or even a single individual, who is a part of it, unless compelled to it by necessity, or indispensably obliged to it by the stringent reasons founded on the public safety."

In all our congressional proceedings we have denominated them as States, and I do not see, Mr. Speaker, what is to be gained by the territorial doctrine in regard to those States, even if it was tenable, for we have the full power to so reconstruct them as to protect the loyal people resident therein, and that there are such no one doubts. But recently four million human beings who were held in abject slavery have been emancipated, who are said to be loyal to the Government, and it is our duty to see that they are properly protected. But suppose we should undertake to establish the doctrine that the late rebel States, except Tennessee, are to be considered as Territories: what better position would we be placed in? For when they would present a constitution framed to meet the approval of Congress they would be admitted, and in fact to accomplish that they might readily agree to almost any terms in order to obtain admission and representation, and, this having been accomplished, I would ask, sir, what could prevent them from calling a convention and changing their constitution in any way they may see fit, provided it is not incompatible with that of the United States, and I might also ask what protection would the loyal people in those States then have?

But it is said the civil laws in those States are not sufficient to afford ample protection; I would say then, sir, extend the laws of the United States over those States in such a manner as to give proper protection; and if that is not sufficient then suspend the writ of habeas corpus and let them be governed by martial law until they shall have learned to respect the civil law. But I may be asked if the adoption of a proper constitution in those States is not a sufficient guarantee against future innovations, what is? My response is the adoption of the constitutional amendment, which I believe to be the bulwark of our liberty and a complete barrier against any other rebellion. And now, sir, permit me for a few minutes to examine the features of that amendment. The first section thereof makes all persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof citizens, and also prohibits any State from making or enforcing any law which shall abridge the rights of citizens, &c. This is in effect ingrafting the civil rights bill and affording to all adequate protection, which is so just that I cannot see how any objection can be seriously interposed, unless it is by those whose consciences have been seared with the rebel doctrine that "a negro has no rights which a white man is bound to respect." This section however will relieve those persons who entertain that doctrine.

The second section provides that if any male citizens of the United States, being twenty-one years of age, shall be deprived of the right of voting, except for participation in the rebellion, representation shall be reduced in proportion. This applies to all the States in the Union, but may more materially affect the late slave States. Under the Constitution of the United States, adopted by the Convention on the 17th day of September, 1787, and ratified by the States in 1789, in the representation the whole number of free persons, including those bound for service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three fifths of all others were counted, and now as slavery is abolished the other two fifths would be counted, thus giving the late slave States a representation for all the colored men without extending to them the elective franchise, which would be then about thirty-seven members of Congress for an unvoting population, while on the other hand the other States are confined to the voters, consequently making, in effect, the vote of one white man in the South equal to about three in the North. It must be borne in mind that this amendment is intended for all the States of the Union, and leaves each to decide for itself as to negro suffrage; but if the black man is deprived of that right he is not to be counted in the representation. Is not this just?

The third section prohibits any person from being a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice President, and from holding any office, civil or military, under the United States or any State, who had previously taken an oath as member of Congress or as an officer of the United States or of any State to support the Constitution of the United States and afterward engaged in the rebellion; with a proviso that Congress may, by a vote of two thirds of each House, remove this disability. This, I presume, is the main feature to which the leading rebels object, as they seem extremely anxious to be in a position to make and administer laws for the loyal people of the country. They ought to be thankful that they are permitted to enjoy the benefits of the Government they exerted themselves to overthrow. This section only puts them upon their good behavior, and if any future Congress sees evidence of true repentance and return to loyalty they may, by a two-thirds vote, remove the barrier. But in the mean time these persons must understand that in Government affairs they must take a back seat.

The fourth section affirms the validity of the debt of the United States, including debts incurred for payment of pensions and bounties for services in suppressing insurrection or rebellion, and declares that neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any obligation against the United States or any claims for the loss or emancipation of any slaves, but that all such obligations shall be illegal and void. This is a very important section to the tax-payers of the country. As far as I have been able to ascertain the rebel debt, including the $500,000,000 held in Europe, is not less than $2,500,000,000; besides this the slaveholders assert that they will make claim for their emancipated slaves, which are in number say four millions. Now, counting these at $300 each, we would have $1,200,000,000 more, and this being added to the rebel debt, would make $3,700,000,000.

Now, supposing that the constitutional amendment should be abandoned, how would we stand with regard to this enormous claim? The insurrectionary States being restored to representation their representatives, together with their northern sympathizers, would no doubt favor the assumption of the same by the United States, an attempt to do which might succeed with the influence that might be brought to bear on some future Congress, both at home and from abroad, for it is not supposable that foreigners owning such a large amount as $500,000,000 of the rebel debt would be passive on such an occasion, and especially if we should be so unfortunate as to elect a southern man for President. If this enormous sum should be assumed and added to our own debt what would become of us? When and how could it be paid? Would it not reduce the nation to bankruptcy or at least tax the people beyond endurance? Then the people would see the importance of the policy of the majority of the present Congress. But how can this catastrophe be averted? My answer again is by the adoption of the constitutional amendment, and then to change it there will be required two thirds of both Houses of Congress and three fourths of the States, which it is not likely can ever be obtained. Then may the country feel safe, having a sure guarantee.

But it is said that none of the ten insurrectionary States will ratify it; then let them do without representation; we did without their help in our struggle to maintain our nationality, and now as that struggle is over we can still get along without them; they left these Halls with their own accord to inaugurate a rebellion and they shall not return without the approval of Congress. This amendment is such a guarantee as we have a right to demand, and I assert, Mr. Speaker, that so long as I am honored with a seat on this floor I will never vote for the admission of Representatives from those States until the constitutional amendment is first ratified, in which they must participate.

The next and last section gives power to Congress to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of this article.

President Johnson seems very anxious for these insurrectionary States to have representation in Congress without any precedent condition whatever, notwithstanding the overwhelming verdict of the loyal people as expressed through the ballot-box at the recent elections. In his last annual message he says:

"Ten States, more than one fourth of the whole number, remain without representation; the seats of fifty members in the House of Representatives and of twenty members of the Senate are yet vacant, not by their own consent, not by failure of election, but by the refusal of Congress to accept their credentials."

And he talks about taxation without representation, and also says that those States so modified their laws as to repudiate the rebel debt.

Now, sir, why ought those States be allowed representatives in Congress to take part in reconstruction? Is it likely that they would vote for any restriction? And who ever heard of a judge or jurymen sitting in the trial of his own cause? And yet the President asks that these men shall be admitted at once without any guarantee whatever for future security against the inauguration of another rebellion. He tells us that if they should after admission prove disloyal they may be expelled; but I would ask how could that be accomplished? The Constitution requires the concurrence of two thirds to expel a member, and if such representatives were admitted it is not probable that they would vote for their own expulsion, and by their voting against such procedure, as a matter of course, a disloyal member would be permitted to retain his seat and thus thwart the action of Congress. As to the changing of the laws, I look upon that alone as no security, for how easy it is for them to change back again and make them even more obnoxious than they were before.

We are told, Mr. Speaker, that our proceedings, without representation from those States, are invalid; if that is correct then all laws passed to suppress the rebellion, and also the large debt of $3,000,000,000 incurred to defray the expenses are null and void. Will any man contend that the laws so enacted and debt created are of no effect? Surely no loyal man will promulgate such doctrine. But if it was necessary for those States to participate, then President Johnson is not a legal President, for when he was elected those States were not allowed representation nor permitted to take part in the election of a President and Vice President, and therefore if the present Congress is an illegal body it follows as a corollary that he is an illegal President. It is not necessary, however, Mr. Speaker, to spend time on such an absurd proposition, and I may be permitted to say here that I am sorry that the President of the United States in his journey to the city of Chicago and back made use of such language as is attributed to him in his speeches. It would have been better, far better, for him and the country if he had been more guarded in his expressions. Mr. Speaker, the Republican members of this House are anxious for the restoration of the ten States lately in rebellion, and I might add as much so as the President is, with this difference, that he is in favor of admitting them without terms, and Congress, on the other hand, requires substantial security for the preservation of the country.

Had the life of the lamented Lincoln been spared, or had his successor, President Johnson, cooperated with Congress, reconstruction would ere this have been consummated and the States represented in the councils of the nation; but, as it is, Congress has this arduous duty to perform with the opposition of the President, backed by his mighty patronage, which has been used against the party that elevated him to the Vice Presidency, by which, on the death of Mr. Lincoln, he was enabled to step into the presidential chair. Mr. Speaker, counting the insurrectionary States, we have thirty-six, and if it requires three fourths of them to ratify the amendment twenty-seven States will be required. The fifth article of the Constitution of the United States prescribes that—

"The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or, on the application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid, to all intents and purposes as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress."

Of the twenty-six States all except Delaware, Kentucky, and Maryland have elected Republican Legislatures, who were pledged for the ratification of the amendment; and those of them that have not already ratified it will do so shortly. But in addition to these twenty-three States four more will be required provided three fourths of the whole number are necessary. It is, however, contended by some able lawyers on this floor that it is not necessary to include these ten unrepresented States; and if that position is tenable, then but three fourths of the twenty-six States would be required, to wit, twenty, and upon that hypothesis we have pledged three more States than are sufficient to accomplish this desirable object. But, as I stated on a former occasion in this Hall in regard to the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery, it is a question too important to theorize upon, as there is no telling what the Supreme Court of the United States, as now or shall hereafter be constituted, may decide in regard to the status of these ten insurrectionary States; and these apprehensions are fully illustrated in the recent decision of that court in the Milligan case—a decision which, if not already, will, in my opinion, be more obnoxious than that of the "Dred Scott."

Unfortunately, our courts of error do not keep pace with the progress of the age, for, instead of looking forward and framing their decisions consonant to the times and circumstances in which we live, they are too apt to turn their attention back in search of some stale precedents of the dark ages. I do not, Mr. Speaker, on this occasion intend to discuss the merits of the decision in the Milligan case; but trust that that high judicial tribunal may realize the importance of not keeping too far in rear of the other branches of our Government. The honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] says:

"Let the amendment be ratified by three fourths of the organized and represented States, and it is in vain that conspirators and aiders of rebellion will appeal to the Supreme Court to relieve them from the righteous and just provisions of the decree of the people."

The same gentleman in his speech says also:

"If, therefore, gentlemen are at all apprehensive of any wrongful intervention of the Supreme Court in this behalf, sweep away at once their appellate jurisdiction in all cases, and leave the tribunal without even a color or appearance of authority for their wrongful intervention."

It is in vain, Mr. Speaker, for us to speculate with regard to what "conspirators and aiders of rebellion" will do, for they will stop at nothing that has a tendency to thwart the action of Congress or oppose the rights of the loyal people of the country; and suppose we should "sweep away the appellate jurisdiction" of the Supreme Court, how soon would it be restored in case the Opposition should obtain a majority, or in case it should be deemed by any future Congress that it was inexpedient to take away such jurisdiction? And how would we then stand?

Mr. Speaker, we must look at these grave questions coolly and with deliberation, and not be too sanguine with regard to untried theories; and as we are now vested with power to place our Government upon a sure basis beyond cavil it is our duty to do so, and not to admit to representation in Congress any of these ten late insurrectionary States that persist in the rejection of the constitutional amendment. I repeat, sir, that it is not the desire of the great Republican party to retard the restoration of those ten States to full political rights, but on the contrary they are anxious for a speedy adjustment, in order to secure adequate protection to all classes and conditions of men residing therein, and at the same time afford ample security to the United States Government against any future refractory course that might be pursued on the part of those States. The delay about which we hear so much complaint from a certain quarter is not the fault of Congress, but owing to the pertinacity of leading politicians who participated in the inauguration of the late rebellion.

Sir, they must and will be taught to understand that they are not to dictate as to the plan of reconstruction. That work must be left in the hands of loyal men, who, in the dark hour of our struggle to maintain national existence, rallied around the old flag, and those States must accept the terms that Congress propose or remain without representation, and in the mean time be governed in such a way as may render proper protection to the inhabitants thereof. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the people of those States that they need not be deluded with the idea that they will get back under what is denominated President Johnson's policy, or under any terms more favorable than those dictated by Congress, and their abuse of this body through certain southern journals will not hasten their aggrandizement; and again, it is time that they should understand that rebels, even whitewashed with pardons, are not to be intrusted with the affairs of the Government, and so far as this and the next Congress are concerned I think I am safe in saying that they will find that determination carried out. And now, sir, it devolves upon us to stand firm upon these great questions, and I trust there will be no Republican member found to falter.

The course we laid down at the first session of this Congress was submitted to the people, who were looking upon our actions with an anxious eye, and notwithstanding the fact that all the executive patronage was brought to bear in order to defeat Republican members we were nobly sustained by a grateful and patriotic people and returned here to complete the great work submitted to us; and I trust our constituents may not be disappointed, and that, through the guidance of Him who has signally blessed our arms and dispelled the dark clouds of treason that were hanging over our beloved country, we may be enabled to so reconstruct the late rebellious States as to insure peace, security, and stability for generations to come, so that this Republic may never be distracted by another rebellion.

And now, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, I have to say that the late rebellion caused the sacrifice of too many noble men who fell in defense of the Union, and caused too many widows and orphans, beside the large expenditure of money, to allow rebels to resume seats in the councils of the nation or permit the States lately in insurrection to assume their former position in the Union without an adequate guarantee. Had those ten States manifested the same disposition as Tennessee they might now be in a very different position; but as it is, I see no hurry in granting them representation until we have more evidence of returned loyalty and see a disposition manifested to adopt the amendment; and this is the sentiment of the loyal people of the country, to which we as their Representatives must adhere, and by doing so we will foster our free institutions and make manifest to the world that a republican form of government is not a failure, and it will then be a light for the oppressed nations of the earth to follow.

Government of Insurrectionary States.

SPEECH OF HON. A. J. ROGERS,

OF NEW JERSEY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 7, 1867.

The House having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1143) to provide for the more effectual government of the insurrectionary States—

Mr. ROGERS said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I have not, during this session at least, however much time I may have taken before, occupied the attention of this House much upon the questions which have been before it. In the remarks which I intend now to submit I intend to speak for myself and nobody else, because I may entertain some views with regard to this important question, in which we have all so much interest, that are not entertained by other gentlemen upon my side of the House, and I may appear to disagree in part with the position taken by my honorable friend from Ohio, [Mr. LE BLOND,] that the President of the United States has no constitutional authority to put it in the power of the people of the insurrectionary States to form their present State governments.

I made a speech in this House some seven or eight months ago wherein I took occasion to discuss this question of the power of the President of the United States to lend his aid, as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, to such an extent to the people of the insurrectionary States as that they might form their present State organizations. Because, sir, I hold that such of the people of the South as were engaged in actual hostilities, while they were in rebellion, defying the laws of the country, and preventing the constitutional authority of this Government from exercising its legitimate functions over them, were in such a condition as to have no right to participate in the exercise of the legislative, executive, and judicial powers of the Federal Government.

Mr. LE BLOND. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. ROGERS. I will for a question.

HO. OF REPS.

Government of Insurrectionary States—Mr. Rogers.

39TH CONG....2D SESS.

Mr. LE BLOND. I wish simply to state my position, for I think the gentleman has not stated it correctly. The position I take is this: that the very moment the rebellion ceased these States were entitled to all the rights under the Constitution that they possessed before the war commenced; and having their State governments in full operation all that was necessary to be done was to let them send their representatives to Congress, and to treat their States as fully organized under the Constitution and laws of the Federal Government, precisely as General Sherman provided and stated in the articles of capitulation between himself and General Johnston. That is the view I take. Now, the very moment the President of the United States appointed provisional governors in those States he recognized to some extent their disorganized condition, to which recognition the ultras in this House appealed as a justification for the course they were pursuing.

Mr. ROGERS. The gentleman and myself do not disagree upon the proposition he lays down, that the moment the war ceased the people were entitled to all their constitutional rights as they existed before the war. But the gentleman said that the President of the United States had no right, as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, to lend his aid as such by appointing provisional governors and putting the people in the former position or the original status which they occupied before the rebellion broke out.

I hold this question to be settled by a judge of the Supreme Court, in the opinion given by one of the ablest men on that bench in a case where this identical question of the status of these States and the rights of their people came up. I refer to the opinion of Justice Nelson in the case of James Eaton, who applied for a habeas corpus to be released from imprisonment, to which he had been sentenced by a military commission in South Carolina for the offense of murder alleged to have been committed in that State. Among other things the judge decided:

"For all that appears the civil local courts of the State of South Carolina were in the full exercise of their judicial functions at the time of this trial, as restored by the suspension of the rebellion some seven months previously, and by the revival of the laws and the reorganization of the State in obedience to and in conformity with its constitutional duties to the Union. Indeed, long previous to this the provisional governor had been appointed by the President, who, as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States—and whose will under martial law constituted the only rule of action—for the special purpose of changing the existing state of things and restoring the civil government over the people. In operation of this appointment a new constitution had been formed, a Governor and Legislature elected under it, and the State placed in the full enjoyment or entitled to the full enjoyment of all her constitutional rights and privileges. The constitutional laws of the Union were thereby enjoyed and obeyed, and were as authoritative and binding over the people of the State as in any other portion of the country. Indeed, the moment the rebellion was suppressed and the government growing out of it subverted, the ancient laws resumed their accustomed sway, subject only to the new reorganization by the appointment of the proper officer to give them operation and effect. This organization and appointment of the public functionaries, which was under the superintendence and direction of the President, the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the country, and who as such had previously governed the State from imperative necessity by the force of martial law, had already taken place, and the necessity no longer existed."

I read this for the purpose of showing that Andrew Johnson, in pursuing the course of policy which he did in organizing these States, did no more than his duty imposed upon him by the Constitution of the United States under his oath of office as President and Commander-in-Chief of the military and naval forces of the United States. He was bound to assist them in forming constitutional governments so as to place them in their proper constitutional relations as they existed prior to the breaking out of the rebellion. Because, if the theory of the gentleman from Ohio be true, that the President had no right to lend his aid to the people of those States to form their governments, then the moment he undertook to interfere, either by direction or implication, let alone all mandatory action, he was a usurper and a violator of the constitutional power which was lodged in him either as Chief Magistrate of the nation or as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy. And, sir, I am not willing here, as the advocate of the reconstruction policy of the President, to brand him as such a usurper and violator of the Constitution. Although I do not say that the gentleman from Ohio undertakes so to brand him, yet the effect of his doctrine is the same; it is equivalent to declaring that the President has usurped powers with which he was not clothed by the Constitution in the course which he took in guarantying under the solemn form of law the reorganization of the State governments in the South and their restoration to the same status which they occupied before the rebellion broke out. When the war ended the people of the South were in a state of chaos, and it was indispensable that the President should lend his aid, through the military power, to enable them to elect their Governors, hold their conventions, form their constitutions, and place their State organizations upon republican forms, because the Army swept away all their governments formed under the articles of secession; but this bill proposes to destroy all the present State governments there, and makes no provision for forming any governments there.

Mr. LE BLOND. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. LE BLOND. I would ask the gentleman if those States had before the rebellion republican forms of government?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes, sir; those States had republican forms of government before the rebellion.

Mr. LE BLOND. Wherein did they change their forms of government during the rebellion?

Mr. ROGERS. Why, sir, many of them formed entirely new State constitutions.

Mr. LE BLOND. Will the gentleman designate a single State of the South which formed a new constitution?

Mr. ROGERS. The States of South Carolina, Virginia, Mississippi; and there were others. They all made their constitutions conform to their articles of secession, and provided in all of them that the officers should swear to support the secession governments, and altered all of them in the particulars which required officers to swear to support the Federal Constitution. Their governments were not wholly destroyed, but their forms of government, as they existed before the rebellion, were changed from governments owing obedience and allegiance to the Government of the United States to those owing allegiance to a government formed by usurpation and revolution. They were not the very governments made under our Constitution. And upon no other hypothesis can you maintain or advocate the policy of Abraham Lincoln, or the policy of Andrew Johnson, in reorganizing and setting on foot forms of civil government in those States. That action was based upon the idea that the power was lodged in him to so act, in virtue of the provision of the Constitution making him Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States.

Mr. THAYER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. ROGERS. Certainly.

Mr. THAYER. With the permission of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] I will state for the information of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LE BLOND] one point in regard to which I understand that the new constitution of the State of South Carolina differed from the old one. By the old constitution of South Carolina representation in their State Legislature was apportioned according to the entire population, including both the whites and the blacks. By the new constitution a new apportionment was made, based upon the white population only.

Mr. ROGERS. The old constitutions which were in force in all those eleven States before the rebellion required that any person who held an office under the State government should take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States.

I think there is no disagreement between me and any gentleman on this side of the House in regard to the status of those States not only before but during and also after the rebellion. My position always has been that the States as States never were destroyed. The State itself is one thing; the government of the State is another thing. Our Constitution expressly recognizes States as one thing and the governments of the States as another thing. The Government of Mexico has been several times overthrown, yet Mexico as a State still exists. The States themselves retained their constitutional relations to the Union to which they had been cemented so fast by the blood of our fathers that by no act of their people could any State be separated from the rest without the consent of all the States. But the people of those States, by the force of arms, overthrew the State governments which had been established by virtue of law and set up others outside of the law and the Constitution, and were therefore absolutely void ab initio, unless you admit the principle that a State has a right to secede.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Will the gentleman tell this House how there can be a State in this Union without a government?

Mr. ROGERS. Very easily. I think no one on either side of the House will deny that during the war the governments which had been recognized by our Constitution were suspended and the States existed as such without such a republican form as the Constitution contemplates where it provides that "the United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government." Because the form of government which the President, through the military, was bound to guaranty must be a republican form in the Union; and although these States, under the articles of secession, had governments republican in form, they were not the very forms of government contemplated by the Constitution, because they were set up in defiance of it and claimed to be out of the Union. The President, in using the military to prevent anarchy and chaos South, and to place it in the power of the people to form their State governments, was doing what the Constitution commands the United States to do when it uses the mandatory language that they shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government.

It was because the States were in the Union that the President had authority to enforce the guarantee. "Who could, under the Constitution, enforce this guarantee, except the President, as Commander-in-Chief, through the military power?" The people of the South used force to prevent republican forms in the Union, and by force attempted to set up such forms outside of it. "How then could our guarantee be carried into effect, except by the President as Commander-in-Chief?" He is charged by the organic law to see that the laws of the Union be executed. But this bill overturns the old and the new governments both, and suspends a right in time of peace irrevocably given to the people by the Constitution. I mean the writ of habeas corpus, which the Constitution says shall not be suspended except in cases of rebellion or invasion, and then only if the public safety require it.

I take the ground that there is no place, position, or location where a State can exist outside of the Union; and if those States were within the pale of the Constitution, as the Supreme Court of the United States say they were, all the time during the rebellion, then there can be no such thing as a destruction of a State. The legal Government cannot be destroyed by the null government. The action of the people cannot destroy the status that a State had in the Union. Those States were integral parts of the Union, possessing most of their powers, not by virtue of the Constitution, but as inherent rights belonging to them before it was made. But those rights were so limited by it as to prevent disunion. There can be no such thing as a State outside of the Union.

Sir, let us see what we are attempting to do. We have before us an important question, one deserving grave consideration from every candid man. This is a measure which may result in weal or woe to the people of this country. In my view its consequences must necessarily be most destructive. It is an attempt for the first time in the history of our Government to inaugurate within this Union a government founded on military power; to set up such a government over territory which has heretofore been recognized as constituting States under the Constitution. There are in these ten States six hundred and sixty thousand one hundred and eight square miles of territory, a territory more than equal in extent to the five leading nations of Europe. This territory embraces a white population of four million six hundred and four thousand by the last census, and a black population of three million eight hundred and ninety-six thousand, making a total of eight million five hundred thousand.

These States have a coast line of three thousand miles and thirty-six thousand miles of internal water line, including the Mississippi. The agricultural productions of those States in 1850 amounted to $560,000,000. They have rich natural resources, which are not surpassed by any other portion of the civilized globe. They have Governors, Legislatures, courts, railroads, canals, telegraphs, post offices, and all the machinery of free government. Before attempting to impose upon a territory like this a military despotism we should pause and consider the terrible plunge which we are about to make. It is establishing chains and shackles for civil law. It is the work of wicked men, ambitious of power, who hate liberty and have a contempt for law. Civil liberty and this kind of law cannot exist together; and in the conflict which it will surely bring on if it become a law one or the other must perish. If this proposition can be enforced and be submitted to then liberty is dead, and we will all be wretched mourners around its tomb.

The argument urged by gentlemen upon the other side proceeds upon the assumption that there is in the southern States at the present moment a condition of affairs which renders it impossible for the people there to protect themselves. It is urged that there is an absolute necessity, if there is to be any personal security there, that there shall be a different form of government from that which existed before the war. It is urged that armies and military tribunals are necessary to be established there to secure the rights of the loyal people. This is utterly false. But, sir, this bill imposes upon the South such a government as that which King George attempted to impose upon the people of the American colonies, causing thereby the revolutionary war.

The gentleman from Connecticut has intimated that the southern people have not yet suffered sufficiently. Now, I am not here as the special advocate of the South, but I am the advocate of justice, and I say to the honorable gentleman from Connecticut that no people upon the face of the earth have ever suffered so direfully and calamitously as have the people of the South. Why, sir, we have burned and devastated their cities, we have laid waste hundreds of miles of their territory, we have ruined their prosperous industries, we have filled their homes with lamentation and woe, we have made a hundred of their fields wet with their blood spilled in fierce conflict, we have filled their land with widows and orphans, whose wail of sorrow is now piercing the very clouds. The rebellion was caused by radicalism in the North and South, and your party leaders are as guilty of bringing on the war as the leaders of the rebellion South.

They ought not to be visited with this punishment upon the ground stated, because the masses of them are not responsible for the war. The masses did not bring it about. The innocent babe and its harmless mother, the half-grown lad and the old man in his dotage, are not to be held accountable for it. The great masses of the people were led astray by the ambitious politicians, who desired to remodel the Government that they might control it. Why should we now impose upon the mass of them a military despotism of such a character as to deserve the forcible opposition of every American citizen? In the name of God and our free institutions, I trust the people of this country will not allow their liberties to be crushed by a military despotism of this kind. As one individual I would feel it the duty of every loyal American citizen to resist by force such an attempted invasion of liberty.

I tell you, sir, you will carry this conflict on until you bring about a war that will shake this country as with the throes of an earthquake; a war that will cause the whole civilized world to witness our dreadful shock and fill nature with agony in all her parts, with which the one we have passed through is not at all to be compared.

If you undertake to ride over the decisions of the Supreme and other courts, subvert civil law, and overthrow the Constitution, then, unless we have become slaves and unfit to be freemen, we will not submit without reluctance, even though to sustain our Government it may cost us our blood.

The joint Committee on Reconstruction have published to the country as their opinion that the southern States were not out of the Union, and that their State governments had the right to reorganize and place themselves in their constitutional relations to the General Government.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I hope when the gentleman next goes out to war I may be there to see.

Mr. ROGERS. I am here, sir, to think and speak for myself; and I do say I will oppose despotism to the last extremity, and, as Patrick Henry said, if that be treason make the most of it. It is treason to the Constitution of the United States to place ten of the States of the Union in a time of profound peace under the unrestricted control of martial law, as is done in this bill. I say if the people of the South are not already so oppressed and broken down as to be unable to defend themselves, if they have the blood of Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and the other heroes of the Revolution running in their veins they would protest as our fathers protested against the despotism of King George when the military attempted to deprive them of their inherent right to govern themselves.

But they say we must have guarantees from the South. The gentleman says there is no guarantee against secession. Who is accountable for that? This House and the Senate are accountable. The committee of fifteen, composed of gentlemen of high professional and congressional standing, upon whom was devolved the important duty of framing an enactment proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, did not propose that these should be a feature of it providing against future secession. It was their business to do it. Gentlemen on the Republican side of the House do not want this question settled. They had no idea in presenting the constitutional amendment to the people in the form they have, that it would be accepted. The people are compelled to take the whole of the amendment or none at all. It was so framed that the chance of rejection might be greater. If each section had been submitted by itself several would have been adopted.

Gentlemen say that the rebellion is not suppressed. Is there any rebellion in the South now? Are there any men in arms against the Federal Government? It is a mere attempt to excite the people of the North against the South. It is to put the minority in power at the South.

The question involved has been settled by the Supreme Court of the United States, and upon it there was no dissenting opinion in the court. Those who concurred in the minority opinion in the Indiana case all agreed upon all the points but one. They all agreed that in times of peace Congress has no right to establish military tribunals for the trial of offenses, whether in States that have been in rebellion or not. The only disagreement among the members of the court was as to the power to establish military tribunals in time of war.

I now read from the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in ex parte Milligan:

"Another guarantee of freedom was broken when Milligan was denied a trial by jury. The great minds of the country have differed on the correct interpretation to be given to various provisions of the Federal Constitution, and judicial decision has been often invoked to settle their true meaning; but until recently no one ever doubted that the right of trial by jury was fortified in the organic law against the power of attack. It is now assailed; but, if ideas can be expressed in words, and language has any meaning, this right—one of the most valuable in a free country—is preserved to every one accused of crime who is not attached to the Army or Navy or militia in actual service. The sixth amendment affirms that 'in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury.'"

"All other persons, citizens of States where the courts are open, if charged with crime, are guaranteed the inestimable privilege of trial by jury. This privilege is a vital principle, underlying the whole administration of criminal justice; it is not held by sufferance, and cannot be frittered away on any plea of State or political necessity. When peace prevails and the authority of the Government is undisputed there is no difficulty of preserving the safeguards of liberty; for the ordinary modes of trial are never neglected, and no one wishes it otherwise; but if society is disturbed by civil commotion, if the passions of men are aroused and the restraints of law weakened, if not disregarded, these safeguards need and should receive the watchful care of those intrusted with the guardianship of the Constitution and laws. In no other way can we transmit to posterity unimpaired the blessings of liberty, consecrated by the sacrifices of the revolution."

"The statement of this proposition shows its importance; for if true republican government is a failure, and there is an end of liberty regulated by law. Martial law established on such a basis destroys every guarantee of the Constitution, and effectually renders the 'military independent of and superior to the civil power'—the attempt to do which by the King of Great Britain was deemed by our fathers such an offense that they assigned it to the world as one of the causes which impelled them to declare their independence."

But this bill, sir, proposes to take away the right of trial by jury. These assumptions of power were attempted to be sustained or excused during the war on the ground of military necessity. When we have returned to a state of peace there is no pretended necessity for it.

What has Andrew Johnson done in the formation of these State governments that his predecessor did not do? Mr. Lincoln was revered by you all on the other side, and your whole party clung to him with unflinching devotion. Did not he form State governments for Louisiana, Arkansas, Tennessee, and Virginia, and were they not recognized by Congress? If the State governments organized by Andrew Johnson are void then the government of Virginia and West Virginia, organized under Mr. Lincoln's administration, was also void. The State of Virginia had adopted secession and officially signed the articles of confederation and attached itself to the so-called confederate government long before West Virginia was, by the action of the State of Virginia and of Congress, admitted into the Union and permitted to send representatives to the Congress of the United States. What authority had Congress or the Legislature of old Virginia to agree to the creation of West Virginia unless old Virginia was a State of the Union? Yet, in the face of your premises, you have admitted Tennessee to representation. If it be true that the status of that State had been changed, that Virginia was a conquered territory, then it was beyond the control of Congress and Virginia to make the State of West Virginia a State. It follows upon the radical theory that all the acts performed by any of the officers of these Governments organized by President Lincoln must be void.

If the position taken by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] be correct, that these States are Territories, then we have no right to rule and govern them by military authority. I take issue with the gentleman as to that on the ground that the Constitution nowhere recognizes the right of Congress to govern Territories by military law. Such a power was never known to the Constitution. It is inimical to its spirit, and is a perversion of its intent and purposes.

Our fathers protested against the exercise of this military power by England. It is attempted here to take us back to the days prior to 1776, and to put the southern States in the very status that the Colonies were placed in by England. You will find in the grievances set forth in the Declaration of Independence the very things which are now attempted to be forced upon the southern people. Our fathers asserted in that immortal document, as one of their grievances, that King George kept among us in time of peace a standing army without the consent of the Legislatures of the Colonies. What do you propose to do? You propose to keep a standing army in ten States of this Union without the consent of their Legislatures and to render the civil authorities of those States subordinate to the military power.

It goes further even than this. It proposes to vest in military officers the power to appoint tribunals to try offenders. Sir, this places in the hands of the military the government of eight million people. If that be not despotism, then our fathers were mistaken in the assertion of the grievances against which they rebelled and in the support of which they went into the most glorious Revolution ever recorded in the annals of history.

Another ground upon which they rebelled was that the British Government deprived them in many cases of the right of trial by jury, and made the civil law subordinate to the military power. Now, every one of these objections will exist under the bill now pending. If the people of the South were not at our mercy, if they were not prostrate at our feet, if we had not the power to stamp them to earth, unless they were reptiles unworthy to crawl they would rise as their fathers rose against the mother country. They are not cowards, as their bravery has already demonstrated. Did not the committee of fifteen, in reporting the constitutional amendment which they ask Congress to pass, recognize the existence of these States? They reported a bill expressly providing that whenever any State adopted that amendment and it became a part of the organic law such State should be entitled to full representation in Congress. This shows that these fifteen gentlemen, selected at the commencement of this Congress to devise means by which our difficulties could be settled, were eight months ago clearly of the opinion that these States were entitled to exercise their constitutional functions and to be represented here.

I do not stand alone upon the decision I have read, but have others to which I will refer, which decide that the Federal Government can exercise no rights except those which it was authorized to exercise over its own territory before the rebellion broke out. The war did not give the Government of the United States a right to any new territory; it acquired the right to exercise no new sovereign power that did not exist in it before the rebellion. And when that insurrection was suppressed it simply resumed control of the sovereign jurisdiction which it had the right to exercise over those States as States before the rebellion broke out. It merely acquired possession of its own territory; it proceeded upon the principle of an action of ejectment. Finding that a usurper, an intruder was in possession of some territory over which it had sovereign power, it took possession of that territory again; but it acquired no power or authority which was not lodged in it before the rebellion broke out.

I refer the members of this House to the case of the Amy Warwick, in admiralty. I know there is no use in reading law or making arguments here upon this subject, for there is a predisposition on the part of honorable gentlemen in this House to so conduct the legislation of this country as to perpetuate their political power. They appear to be afraid to allow representation to these people in the South for fear that their present political power may be taken away from them and they thus lose the control of the Government.

"In the case of the Amy Warwick, in admiralty, Judge Sprague, of Massachusetts, said:

"It has been supposed that if the Government have the rights of a belligerent, then, after the rebellion is suppressed, it will have the rights of conquest; that a State and its inhabitants may be permanently divested of all political privileges, and treated as foreign territory acquired by arms. This is an error, a grave and dangerous error. Belligerent right cannot be exercised where there are no belligerents. Conquest of a foreign country gives absolute, unlimited sovereign rights, but no nation ever makes such a conquest of its own territory. If a hostile Power, either from without or within, take and hold possession and dominion over any portion of its territory, and the nation by force of arms expel or overthrow the enemy and suppress hostilities, it acquires no new title, but merely regains the possession of that of which it had been temporarily deprived. The nation acquires no new sovereignty, but merely maintains its previous rights."

"When the United States take possession of a rebel district they merely vindicate their preëxistent title. Under despotic Governments the right of confiscation may be unlimited, but under our Government the right of sovereignty over any portion of a State is given and limited by the Constitution, and will be the same after the war as it was before."

I have also another opinion here of a commentator on criminal law, Mr. Bishop, in which he takes the same ground. Therefore there are four different decisions and opinions, all expressly sustaining the position which the President of the United States occupies.

Bishop on Law, in section one hundred and thirty-two, volume one, remarks:

"Except, therefore, for the clause guarantying republican governments to the States, the United States might, if it chose, after a State has committed what is called an act of secession,"

"legislate for it forever, to the exclusion of any subsequent State legislation. But the clause under consideration provides that the United States shall guaranty to the State a republican form of government. Therefore, as soon as the guarantee is executed, the right of legislation which the United States received from the defunct State government flows out to the new State government."

"When for any reason, as for instance when a State has passed what is termed in these days an ordinance of secession, there ceases to be within the State a government under the Constitution of the United States, 'the guarantee' mentioned in this section of the Constitution attaches, and the 'United States' becomes obligated to give the State a republican form of government."

I stated in a speech which I made here some three or four weeks ago that the liberties of the people were about being taken away. I stated that in good faith; and the legislation now proposed fully convinces me of my prophecy on that occasion. And I am here again to raise my warning voice and proclaim to them that liberty expires in the establishing of a military government over one third of the territory of this nation. Sir, when that shall be done our liberties will have been destroyed, and despotism and tyranny will reign in full and undisturbed impunity; and the place where our fathers and mothers used to drink the love of liberty on the mountains and in the vales will no longer be visited by anything but the rule of despotism and anarchy; and the scenes of Mexico and South America will soon be enacted in our land. God knows I have but one hope, and that is to see the flag of our country waving in triumph from one end of it to the other. I want to see the Constitution of our fathers preserved, and to see civil liberty maintained as our fathers left it to us. I want law, liberty, and order to go down to posterity, as a bright casket of human freedom, unimpaired. I want to see the day when the passions of the hour shall have passed away, and when a generous, humane, and enlightened policy toward a brave, courageous, and noble fallen foe shall be adopted. I want to preserve a reverence for the memory and for the tomb of Washington, which lies in Virginia, and where his sacred dust and ashes are mingling with the soil of that State, as a consecrated emblem of liberty never to be disgraced by governing the land where he lies by a wicked military despotism, as proposed by this bill. I know that men laugh and sneer at such predictions as these. They think that these calamities are not coming upon us. I tell gentlemen that in the heat and excitement of the present time you do not reflect as you should. Party passions often obscure the better reason which should at all times govern our minds. We are warned by George Washington in his Farewell Address, as we are warned by the recent opinions of the Supreme Court, that in the heat and excitement of party passion liberty is easily dethroned.

This Government, sir, has been the model one of the world. It was founded by our fathers upon principles of liberty; it was erected in antagonism to military rule; it was established to secure to every man his rights of civil liberty, where every man's house should be his castle, where the courts of the country should be open to all. Yet if we are to countenance such legislation as this, the day is fast approaching when ours shall be a Government of bastiles, dungeons, cells, anarchy, despotism, secret police, spies, and informers. I grieve to see the day when any portion of the people of this country, whether they have been engaged in rebellion or not, shall be deprived of those inestimable rights which the blood of our fathers was shed to establish. These rights are to be invaded by the legislation which it appears this House is about to pass. It will be the end of free government if such a law be enforced. It deserves to be met by all the force which the people are able to command.

I am anxious to preserve the equilibrium of the different departments of the Government; I desire that the executive power shall be confined to its constitutional limits; I want the judicial power to be restricted to its legitimate sphere; I wish the power of Congress to be exercised strictly within the scope defined by the fundamental law. When these several departments come into collision there results a disorder that must be fatal to the public good.

But, sir, even putting out of view the constitutional question, I submit that as a matter of policy we ought not to pass this bill. Have the people of the South done anything that warrants such treatment? I claim that they are a brave people. I claim that they are "bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh." Their fathers and our fathers, fighting side by side, achieved the liberties of this country.

When the people of the South rebelled against the power of the Federal Government they did no more than has been done by many nations in times past. It was an exercise of revolutionary power; and if they had succeeded in that effort the nations of Europe would have placed the leaders side by side with those who succeeded in vindicating their liberties against the power of Great Britain and establishing a Government on this continent founded upon the principles of constitutional liberty. I wish the President of the United States had been more lenient; that he had been more merciful; that he had been more charitable. If I had been the President of the United States the very moment the rebellion was suppressed I would have recognized those States as restored to their constitutional relations and rights as States of the Union without any conditions or qualifications.

But the course here appears to be to take away the power of the President and lodge it in another person. I should like some gentleman to tell me what authority there is in this Congress to take away a grant of power expressly and mandatorily placed in him as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy. The Constitution says that the President shall—that is the word; it is a mandatory word—be the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States. You are not only trying to take away his civil power, but to take away his military power. An attempt is made in this bill to place the entire military powers of the President in the hands of a commission unknown and unrecognized by the Constitution. The Constitution has reposed certain powers in him, and I hold that he cannot be divested of them by any action of this Congress.

The Constitution declares that he shall be the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy; but you propose by this bill that he shall not be Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy. You say that a General shall establish an army in the South, that he shall establish military law there, and that he and his subordinates may in their discretion authorize the civil tribunals to try certain offenses. You break down and take away the mandatory constitutional grant of power which makes the President Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy.

By what authority can that be done? Is the Constitution of the United States no longer the law? Is the theory to be, as declared by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. RAYMOND,] that we have two constitutions, one real and the other not real—one a written Constitution and the other outside of it? The Supreme Court of the United States says there is but one Constitution, and that it is a law for rulers and people equally in war and peace, and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men at all times and under all circumstances. No doctrine involving more pernicious consequences was ever invented by the wit of man than that any of its provisions can be suspended during any of the great exigencies of government. Such a doctrine leads directly to anarchy or despotism. (Ex parte Milligan, page 7.) If the organic law be not a dead letter, how can you pass this bill taking away from an officer the mandatory power placed in him by the Constitution of the United States and lodge it in another man unknown, unrecognized, and unprovided for in it? You cannot do it without usurpation; and I hope the President will not submit to have the power placed in him by the Constitution of the United States taken away from him, and that he will exert his military power against all traitors and disunionists, whomsoever they may be.

We are all bound to obey the law, and if Andrew Johnson will stand tamely by and see his country destroyed then I say his name would be a slander and a libel on free government, and he ought to go down with infamy and ignominy to posterity as a man who did nothing in the hour of danger to assert the great constitutional rights placed in him by our revolutionary fathers under our organic act. He is a good man and a true patriot, and will not silently see his country die. "What is life without liberty." Free government brought him from a poor boy to as great a man as ever lived, and he deserves as much credit as Washington, and will yet receive it. I know him well enough to say that Andrew Johnson, who stood in the Senate of the United States in 1861 and branded the southern Senators as traitors and disunionists, will not submit to have the citadel of liberty invaded and destroyed without using the civil and military powers to prevent it. He will maintain the Constitution, sir, even to the spilling of blood.

I am a peace man when there can be peace, but without liberty there cannot be peace. But I am not a peace man enough to quietly consent to see military despotism established in the place of civil law. If the Constitution is once destroyed, then the Union will perish with it; I mean the Union made by Washington and Jefferson and the heroes and sages of the days that tried men's souls.

My position may be somewhat in advance of other gentlemen, even on my side of the House. But I do not think it is. I know all gentlemen cannot think alike on these questions. Men will disagree. But what I say is the honest convictions of my heart. I speak for the whole country, and deep-seated is the sorrow I feel for the wronged and abused people of it, North and South.

I know there is a rule of action which ought to be carried into effect by every law-abiding man, that when the court of the highest jurisdiction, upon a question legitimately in issue before it, decides a case, that it ought to be recognized as the law of the land. If Mr. Johnson is willing to have his power taken away, to quietly submit to usurpation of the rights which have been conferred upon him by the Constitution, I am mistaken in the man, because I recognize in him as pure and patriotic a statesman as ever lived. He stood in the Senate of the United States in 1861, amid the hisses of rebels, branding them as traitors and disunionists; and yet to-day he is assailed after all the suffering, anxiety, and trouble which he underwent during the rebellion, as being himself a traitor and disunionist. Let him go on in his good work of reconstruction; he will prevail. He is but following out the impulses of the people during the whole war. It is but conforming to the joint resolution of Congress which passed both Houses, wherein we solemnly declared to the civilized world that the object of the war was not subjugation nor conquest, but to restore the States to all their rights unimpaired.

By that declaration we have pledged ourselves and our posterity in the face of the world that when we put down the rebellion we would restore these people to the rights to which they were entitled before the war. If that was a living principle in 1861, and was right then, is it not now? Have we acquired any jurisdiction or gained any rights or powers by the suppression of the rebellion that did not exist in us during the war? Even up to the close of the war, when General Sherman made the treaty with General Johnson I never heard any man pretend, except Mr. SUMNER on one occasion in the Senate of the United States, that by our becoming conquerors these persons were at our mercy as captors to deal with them as we might see fit.

Even if the conclusion be a logical one, that these States are reduced to conquered provinces; even if they were the conquered domain of a foreign country, the law of nations will not allow them to be governed by military law any longer than civil institutions can be put in motion. The civil law of the conquered country operates as soon as the military can be safely withdrawn. It was so demonstrated in the case of the acquisition of New Mexico and California from the Mexican Government, which was first conquered and then by treaty ceded. Our Supreme Court decided that the laws of Mexico governed that Territory in so far as it was not inconsistent with our Constitution, and in cases afterward arising out of the title to real property there they were decided by the laws of Mexico.

Government of Insurrectionary States.

SPEECH OF HON. E. C. INGERSOLL,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 7, 1867.

The House having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1143) to provide for the more effectual government of the insurrectionary States—

Mr. INGERSOLL said:

MR. SPEAKER: In the view of this case which I shall present I shall discuss the propositions of the gentlemen who have preceded me, who claim that the States have never lost their status in the Union, and that as States within the Union they have all their original rights, among which is the right of representation in Congress.

I shall also discuss the proposition advanced by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] that they are still States, but with certain limitations and qualifications.

Now, sir, I hold that there are but two sides to this question, that they are either States for all purposes and the equals of the other States, or else they are no States at all; I mean political States known to the Constitution. There are geographical States and political States. The southern States lately in rebellion have not changed their geographical character by the rebellion in which they engaged, but their political character only, and they are no longer States of this Union within the meaning of the Constitution. What constitutes a State? I answer an organized community governed by law and having certain geographical limits. A State under the Constitution must not only be an organized community governed by law and having certain geographical limits, but it must, in addition to this, be recognized as a State of the Union by the law-making power of the General Government.

Now, sir, as regards the law, the logic, or the facts of this question, I deny that there is any middle ground to occupy. They are either States for all purposes or they are not States for any purposes under our Government. All the domain belonging to the United States or within its jurisdiction assumes one of two characters, namely, that of a State or that of a Territory. No other condition was ever known. I hold that the rebel States by rebellion destroyed all civil government within their boundaries, and destroyed their political organizations known to the Constitution of the United States, and consequently they ceased to be States of this Union; and by the operation of the act of secession, culminating in armed rebellion, they became the territory of the United States, when we by our successes on the battle-field made a conquest of their armies.

Gentlemen in the argument of this question seem to forget the history of the rebellion. They seem to forget that the rebellion organized a de facto government; that the States that went into secession repudiated by a solemn act in convention the act by which they ratified the Constitution of the United States, thereby becoming members of the Federal Government. Gentlemen seem to forget that they formed a government which from the very necessities of the case was recognized by our Government as a de facto government. By the laws of war and by all international law we were bound to recognize them as a belligerent power, as a de facto government. We did do it for over four years. Not only were they recognized by us, but by most of the civilized Powers of the world as a de facto government, authorized to issue letters of marque and reprisal, to make captures on the high seas, and one whose flag protected those sailing under it. But for that recognition the character of their cruisers would have been changed to that of piratical crafts. They were expressly recognized as a de facto government by the Roman Government in an official communication addressed "to the President of the confederate States of America." As evidence of like recognition by our Government, I refer to an act of Congress, passed in the early part of the rebellion, which interdicted all commercial intercourse between the inhabitants of the United States and the inhabitants of the so-called confederate States. That act made no exception on account of the loyalty of any person residing in the confederate States. It regarded them all as public enemies. It would have been as much a violation of that act for one of our people to have had a commercial transaction with a loyal as with a disloyal person within the jurisdiction of the confederate government. This was an exercise of one of the war powers of the Government. No express authority for this act is found in the Constitution. The Constitution gives to Congress the power to "regulate commerce among the several States," but not to interdict it.

Now, sir, having said this much by way of premise, let me call attention to the position assumed by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FINCK.] He seemed to view it as a matter of surprise that Congress should attempt to control the late rebel States as proposed in this bill, and he challenged history to produce a single instance where a Government had made a conquest of its own territory. Assuming it to be true that a Government cannot make a conquest of its own territory, he held that as a necessary consequence Congress possessed no constitutional power to pass the bill under discussion.

Now, sir, let me answer the gentleman: Is it fair to assume that because history furnishes no example of a nation making a conquest of its own territory that it is impossible under any circumstances for a nation ever to make such conquest? I say it is not.

I challenge him to produce from the pages of history the record of any such rebellion as that we have suppressed. Under what civilized Government was there ever a rebellion that rose to the power and the dignity of a de facto government? Was there ever a rebellion that made such head against the established Government as to create a new Government, occupying and controlling absolutely one third of the territory of the entire country? Was there ever before a rebellion that was recognized as a belligerent power by the civilized Governments of the world? Never, sir. You will search history in vain to produce such an illustration. There never has been before this in any country a rebellion which was recognized as a de facto government by the Government it was contending against, or recognized by the civilized governments of the world as entitled to belligerent rights. But in this case the recognition was complete at home and abroad. The rebel government was recognized as a de facto government, entitled to belligerent rights and protected in those rights under the law of nations.

Mr. Speaker, let me call your attention and the attention of the House to this question: whether the Government of the United States did make a conquest of the confederacy, and whether it did acquire the rights of a conqueror over the vanquished rebel power. Let it be remembered that the rebellion, or the confederate government, first made a conquest of a portion of the original territory of the United States, and erected upon it a government and maintained that government, exercising jurisdiction over the territory thus acquired for five years, and thus became to all intents and purposes a foreign Government, making war upon the Government of the United States, but by the success of our arms we made a conquest of the confederate government, made a conquest of its people and its territory after years of the most sanguinary and desolating war of modern times, and by international law we have a right to exercise over this conquered belligerent power, over this territory wrested by the power of arms from this confederate government, all the rights pertaining to the conqueror, one of which is to control the territory thus conquered, the people thus subjugated by military power. Hence arises our right to dispose of the property, real and personal, of the rebel government as well as to exercise control over its people.

I hold, sir, that in the prosecution of the war against the rebellion the laws of war in the main controlled us, and not alone the written law. Where did you get the power to declare greenbacks a legal tender? Where did you get the power to pass a confiscation law? Where did you get the power to do many of the acts necessary for the preservation of the Government in the prosecution of the war against the rebellion? Did you rely solely upon the letter of the Constitution for the power, or did you rely upon the inherent right of the Government to preserve its own life?

I hold, sir, that the Government of the United States possesses as much inherent power and may exercise any power necessary to self-preservation that any Government on earth can exercise. We are as powerful in war, and may in war legally and rightfully do what the Czar of Russia could do, what the Emperor of France could do, or any other monarchical Government. We possess the inherent right of self-defense, and under that right we may do any act recognized under the laws of war necessary to self-preservation.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman will allow me to ask him a question, and I propose to take him back to the "greenback" question. I want to know whether the gentleman thinks the "greenbacks" were declared legal tender in the exercise of any war power? Does he admit there was no constitutional right to declare them a legal tender?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I hold, if there had been no war, no exigency in the affairs of the Government rendering it necessary, it would have been unconstitutional. I may be wrong, but this is my opinion. I find no power conferred on Congress in the Constitution relating to money except the power "to coin money and to regulate the value thereof;" and I do not believe the Congress of the United States in ordinary and peaceful times has the right to make paper money a legal tender. To make "greenbacks" is not in my judgment to "coin money." But it did have the right to make "greenbacks" a legal tender, in order to preserve the Government from destruction and for the successful prosecution of the war.

Mr. LEBLOND. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I cannot yield now. I cannot yield to have immaterial issues brought in here; but if I had the time I would yield with pleasure for any pertinent question.

I want some gentleman here to tell me the difference between a conquest of the rebel States by the war power of the Government and a conquest of Canada supposing we had had a war with Great Britain. Had we been in war with Great Britain instead of the southern confederacy, and had we made a conquest of the Canadas, would we have the right under the law of nations to establish military Governments there? I answer most assuredly. Would we be compelled to withdraw the military forces as soon as they had surrendered? By no means. We would continue our military forces in the Canadas until peace had been declared and until the new order of things should be adjusted according to the spirit of our institutions and in harmony with our Constitution.

Now, sir, let us look into history and see if we cannot get some light on this subject. It is but a few years since we invaded Mexican soil. After many sanguinary contests our armies marched victoriously to the capital of that country. We made a conquest of their whole territory. Now, on the theory of gentlemen here who oppose this bill, the Mexican people should have protested, as the people of the rebel States have protested, against the occupation of their territory by the military forces, on the ground that they had surrendered their arms and were willing to yield to the situation. What are the facts concerning the occupation of Mexico? We held it until the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo was agreed upon, and we maintained our military force there until we had secured all the objects of the war. After the ratification of the treaty the troops were withdrawn, but not till then.

In regard to the States lately in rebellion there has been no ratification of a treaty of peace. There has been no peace declared. Had peace been declared what would have been the effect? The States in rebellion would have been restored to the Union. The Representatives from those States would have been admitted into Congress on the same terms as Representatives from the loyal States. That would be the highest evidence of the restoration of those States to the Union. The admission of their Representatives to seats here would itself be the most satisfactory evidence that peace had been restored and the highest evidence of the restoration of those States to all their rights under the Constitution.

We have had no declaration of peace, and we have had no peace in fact. We conquered the rebellion. We now have possession of their territory as conquerors, and when did we cease to have the character of conquerors? When did we lay aside that character? Never. We have suspended active hostilities, but we have never given up our occupation of that country by the military forces. To be sure we have not lately controlled it to any considerable extent by military authority, but we have not given up military occupation of those so-called States; neither do we intend to until the rights of the enfranchised and loyal people of such States shall be secured and the peace and safety of the Republic shall be no longer endangered by disloyal rule.

Congress, under the Constitution, has power "to make rules and regulations concerning captures on land and water." Now, sir, during the progress of the war, under the rules and regulations of the Army as prescribed by acts of Congress, which rules and regulations were changed from time to time, our forces captured property of all descriptions, personal and real, and disposed of the same, putting the proceeds into the Treasury of the United States. We captured their officers and soldiers and held them as prisoners of war. We captured State after State from the confederate government, and at last we captured all its States; so that when the rebel flag went down we had captured as trophies of the war the entire rebel confederacy, thus making a conquest of that government and a conquest of its people and of its territory. The gentleman from Kentucky who last addressed the House [Mr. HISE] desired some reference to the clause of the Constitution which gives us authority to regulate and control the southern States lately in rebellion. I point him to that clause which declares that "Congress shall have power to make rules and regulations concerning captures on land and water." But some gentlemen urge that this clause in the Constitution applies only to personal property. I answer that the Constitution makes no distinction as to the character of the property, and the reasonable inference is that it includes everything which is the legitimate subject of capture. We capture towns, cities, and States, as well as personal property, and under this clause in the Constitution Congress has a right to make rules and regulations concerning such captures, and we have the right to dispose of the territory thus captured from the confederacy by sale, if we desire to, or in any other manner. It is absolutely at the disposal of the conqueror. Under the law it belongs to the conqueror, and the conqueror necessarily has the right to dispose of that which belongs to him in any manner he may think best.

We propose by this bill to control the subjugated people in this conquered territory by the military power temporarily until such times as loyal civil government can be established there and maintained without the aid of the military power. But in order to find authority in Congress to pass this bill I am not compelled to go so far with the argument based upon this clause of the Constitution as to even inquire whether it authorizes any disposition to be made of the territory captured or wrested from the confederate government. This clause in the Constitution relates to "captures," and it cannot be denied but that we have authority to make rules and regulations concerning such captures. This bill only proposes to regulate the captured rebels; it does not interfere with property. But I am not driven to rest the right of Congress to pass this bill upon this clause alone. I call the attention of the House to another clause of the Constitution. It is this:

"The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States."

The late rebel States are to all intents and purposes as much territories of the United States, subject to the exclusive control of Congress, as are the Territories of Utah, New Mexico, Montana, or any other Territory belonging to the Government. Congress has not yet vested the people of these so-called States with authority to establish local governments, but has so far retained the right to exercise all legislative authority for them, and in the exercise of that authority we propose to establish temporarily military governments in these so-called States for the security of life, liberty, and property. This is not, strictly speaking, a measure of reconstruction, but a measure looking simply to the enforcement of order. It seems to me clear, then, that, not only under the laws of war and under the law of nations, but under the express authority of the Constitution itself, Congress possesses the rightful authority to establish military governments, as proposed by the bill under consideration.

And here I ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] this question: if these late rebel States are States in the Union, are they not of right entitled to a vote upon any resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution? I believe the gentleman himself holds that the constitutional amendment when ratified by three fourths of the adhering loyal States will be binding.

Mr. BINGHAM. If the gentleman will permit me, I will save him all trouble on that point. I stated that no State can exercise the local functions of a State without having complied with the conditions precedent set out in the Constitution of the United States, which I recited; and these States having broken down their legal State governments have ceased to be capable of exercising these functions. While, therefore, they do remain States for Federal purposes, they have no voice in the matter.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Certainly, for local State purposes they have no existence.

Mr. BINGHAM. Nor for political purposes.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Well, sir, if that is true they are not States enough to "hurt." [Laughter.]

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman forgets one thing: unless they do remain States, with the boundaries of States according to the original law of the State, where is the boundary of this jurisdiction that touches life and property by this bill? I maintain that every thing remains intact, as though no rebellion had happened as to the Federal Government. Unless they are held to be States for Federal purposes there must be a general jail delivery.

Mr. INGERSOLL. This in my judgment does not necessarily follow; but as the proposition of the gentleman is all on our side I do not propose to combat it. They are States for our purposes, but not for their own. [laughter;] so he says. That they are States in the legal sense of the term I deny; they are Territories, nothing more, and as such are subject to the control of Congress, the law-making power of the Government.

But this question I have no desire to debate further with the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] for he lays down the proposition that these are States for Federal purposes, and that it is at our option whether we will recognize them or not as States as regards local legislation or State government. Now, I do not know how I could go further than that. Who could go further? When a State government destroys its civil and political organization surely it ceases to be a State. But let this pass.

The President of the United States, in his proclamation to Governor Holden, declared that the State of North Carolina by the rebellion had become "deprived of all civil government," and by just inference had ceased to be a State. It is by and through its political organization that a State lives, moves, and has a being. When the State government becomes defunct there is nothing left but a dead hulk. Thus much I have said in regard to the status of these so-called States, and I think I have established the fact to the satisfaction of reasonable and intelligent men that they are but territories of the United States, and subject rightfully to the exclusive control of Congress.

And now, sir, a few words with regard to this particular bill. Whether it be the wisest and best measure that can be conceived I will not attempt to say; what will be the effect of it should it become a law I will not attempt to describe; what hindrances will be thrown in the way of its operation by the President of the United States I can hardly imagine; what power he may exercise to delay, hinder, and trammel the operations of the law I can hardly conceive. But before I go further upon this point, I desire to call your attention to the fact that this is a measure looking to the pacification of the rebel States and not to their reconstruction. Now, suppose we lay aside, for the moment, the "rebel States" and talk about the reconstruction of the people of those States. The people, not the States, have been making war upon our Government. Then let us deal with the people, and when we have succeeded in reconstructing them, the States, it may then be said, are reconstructed. Whenever you can throw around the loyal people of the southern States the protection of law, enforced, if needs be, by military power, you will form a nucleus around which we can rally all the Union sentiment of this now suffering and outraged people, and it will grow and expand into a power that will reconstruct those territories upon a loyal basis and restore them to the Union regenerated and redeemed from treason.

But, sir, I will not dwell upon this subject. The labor of the last Congress and of this Congress, so far in the work of reconstruction, has been labor lost. What real progress has been made? The President has tried for nearly two years his policy, and Congress has attempted from time to time to put in operation some plan of reconstruction, but by reason of the opposition of the President and his friends they have all been defeated. The President's policy has not proved to be a success. It is a miserable failure. The joint Committee on Reconstruction have reported this bill to the House and recommend its passage, and I am sure that no member need hesitate to vote for it, for if it become a law it cannot make matters worse than they now are, and it may make them better. Something should be done, and done at once. The condition of things there has been growing worse from day to day since the day of their surrender. Crime is holding a high carnival there; industry is in a great measure paralyzed; the Congress is repudiated and denounced as an unconstitutional body, and the laws of Congress are continually pronounced unconstitutional by the courts of these States, and all that stands in the way of the restoration of the rebel aristocracy to power is crushed out by violence or by the decision of their courts. Gentlemen object to this bill because it proposes to place the people of those States under military authority; but we must remember that these are rugged times, and that to remedy the state of things that exist rugged measures must be resorted to.

The resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution was submitted to them in good faith in the hope that it might be ratified and form an equitable basis for the reconstruction of those States. But so far as those States have acted upon it they have rejected it.

The exercise of civil power under the President's policy has been tried and proved unavailing. Shall this condition of things last always, or shall we try some more stringent measure in the hope that it will result in the restoration of harmony and of peace?

This bill may not, possibly, effect the object desired, but it will have this effect if no other: it will topple over these spurious governments set up by the power of presidential usurpation; it will teach those people that they must look to Congress and not to the President for the terms of peace and reunion. It will teach the President that the law-making power does not intend to yield its right to pass upon the validity of any government that may be formed in these States; it will inform him that he is not the law-making power of the government, but simply the Executive to execute the will of the loyal people as expressed by their Representatives in Congress.

But more than this I will not say it will accomplish, for I am satisfied that the President will do all in his power to defeat the object sought to be attained in this bill. Judging from what he has done in the past I have a right to anticipate his action in the future.

This bill purposely withholds from the President the power to assign the generals who are to command the various districts, and vests that power in General Grant. This is one of the best features in the bill. The loyal people know that they can trust General Grant. He has been weighed in the balance and not found wanting. This in itself guarantees a fearless, honest, and faithful execution of the powers contained in the bill.

I have no fear in vesting this power in the General of our armies, for I believe he will exercise it wisely, prudently, and firmly, as he has exercised all the other powers that have been conferred upon him, and he will appoint judicious and able generals to command these districts. In judging of the fitness, capacity, and qualifications of an officer he has probably no superior in the world.

But I am met by the objection that the President is Commander-in-Chief of the Army, and that he may rescind any order that General Grant may make under the provisions of this bill. I reply that the President by virtue of his being Commander-in-Chief of the armies may rescind any order that the General in his discretion may make.

The President is made by the Constitution for the time he exercises the functions of that office the superior officer of General Grant, and as such superior officer he may possess the power to supervise, change, or rescind an order of the General, but the question is, will he have the temerity to do it in the face of and in violation of this law? If this bill becomes a law it is not assuming too much to say that General Grant will promulgate the necessary orders to carry it into execution. He will assign the various generals selected by himself to the command of these several districts. I am asked in case he does, what is there to prevent the President from rescinding such orders at once? I answer, perhaps nothing except a wholesome fear as to the consequences of the act. As a mere question of power I admit that the President would have the power to rescind any order which General Grant might make in assigning generals under this bill to their various commands. But I ask again, will he dare to assume the responsibility of interfering in such manner? I am asked again, if the President has the power to rescind orders of General Grant why pass this bill? I respond, pass the bill and place the responsibility of any interference in its operations with the President.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. As this bill was originally drawn up I understand that it contained the words "by the President of the United States." Can the gentleman tell why these words were stricken out and the words "by the General of the Army" inserted in their stead?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I can give you my opinion if you desire it, and it is this: that the change was made because we fear to trust the President with this power, for I do not believe if the duty of assigning these generals to the command of the proposed district was left to the President that he would appoint such generals as Sherman, Sheridan, Thomas, Howard, or Heintzelman, but that he would appoint such generals, if he could find them, who would be willing to yield a ready and pliant subserviency to his wishes and to promote his interests and his policy. We are not without instruction upon this point. "To be forewarned is to be forearmed."

It is time it was settled who is master of the question of reconstruction of the rebel States, the President or Congress. We have been deceived once by the President. That was his fault. If we allow him to deceive us again it will be our fault. Now we know him; then we did not—

Mr. HISE. If the gentleman will allow me a moment, I desire to ask him a question.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Certainly.

Mr. HISE. If you are afraid to trust the President with the power you have proposed to be conferred by this bill upon the General of the armies, and you are still of the opinion the President has the lawful authority under the Constitution of the United States to rescind General Grant's orders and take the whole control of the matter in his own hands, then why pass this bill at all?

Mr. INGERSOLL. The President, under the form of this bill, might still have the constitutional authority to rescind the order of the General in assigning the generals to their various commands, yet he would not have the constitutional authority to "take the whole control of the matter into his own hands." I answer further that I would pass this bill because I believe it is a measure demanded by the condition of things in the South; and in the second place, I doubt whether the President has the pluck to rescind whatever orders may be made by the General under this bill; and further, if the President should corruptly rescind the order of the General or refuse to execute the law it would form a good ground for his impeachment. Congress has the right to look behind the mere act of the President, although the act in itself might be warranted by the Constitution, and to inquire into the purposes of the President for doing it. The President has no right to do an act lawful in itself for corrupt ends; so that it would bring the question before Congress for decision whether the President, in rescinding the order of the General, acted corruptly or not, and if so found it would be good ground for his impeachment.

Mr. STROUSE. That will be the only ground you will ever have.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do not know that. I wish I did. And here I will say that I believe we might as well stop the consideration of the question of the reconstruction of the southern States or of the southern people, and turn our attention to the reconstruction of the President. I say this in no offensive sense, and I may be permitted to add that if we have wisdom and sagacity enough to frame laws which will keep him within the exercise of the legitimate powers which are conferred upon him by the Constitution, which will keep him within the pale of loyal and patriotic action, I am not certain but we will be serving our country with more honor and more credit, and with the hope of better results than in endeavoring to reconstruct the rebel States while the President is thrusting so many obstacles in our way. I cannot now say what law should be passed to hedge in and control the President; but any law that could be constitutionally passed that would have that effect I would most gladly vote for.

In my opinion the President has broken loose from his moorings under the Constitution, and I feel it incumbent upon me, as one of the Representatives of the people, to do everything in my power to bring him back. I say this out of no feeling of disrespect to the President. I conscientiously believe that on these great vital questions he is wrong. I will not now say he is intentionally wrong, but the effect of his acts upon the country are just the same without reference to his intentions. But let us do our duty without anticipating what the action of the President may be. I advocate the passage of this bill out of no feeling of vindictiveness toward the people of the late confederacy. I believe that it will result in their good; that it will promote and perhaps secure the restoration of law and order, the necessary foundation of all well-organized society. I do not believe the officers selected by General Grant would abuse the powers reposed in them, but I do believe that they would lend the aid of the military power of the Government for the restoration of civil authority.

The fact that I fear the President, stimulated as he will be by those who cluster around him, will interfere with the military execution of this bill will not deter me from voting for it. The President will be held responsible for his action by the people and by Congress, who are the direct representatives of the people and charged with the execution of their will, subject only to the Constitution. It may be pertinent to inquire here how long this war forced upon Congress by the President shall continue; how much longer shall we submit to it. It might be well for Congress to settle the question now whether we are to continue under the present condition of things for and during the remainder of the term of the President, which expires on the 4th of March, 1869, or whether the President has been guilty of any crime or misdemeanor for which he deserves to be impeached or removed from his high office, and thus remove this paramount obstruction which stands in the way of the reconstruction by Congress of the late rebel States.

Mr. TRIMBLE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. INGERSOLL. For what purpose?

Mr. TRIMBLE. To ask a question.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will.

Mr. TRIMBLE. As the gentleman concedes that the President, by the Constitution, is Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, I desire to know whether the President would not have the power to revoke any order made by any officer of the Army under this bill?

Mr. INGERSOLL. So far as the question of power is concerned I have conceded that.

Mr. TRIMBLE. I mean constitutional power.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Well, for the sake of argument I will concede that also.

Mr. TRIMBLE. I wish to ask further whether it would be a ground for impeachment if he exercised that power in a constitutional way?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I think I have already answered the gentleman's question in a former portion of my remarks, but for his satisfaction I will endeavor to answer it again. I say that it might be a ground of impeachment in this way: if he should use that power for corrupt purposes he would undoubtedly be liable to impeachment, and Congress would have the right to inquire into the motives and objects of the President in rescinding such an order, and if it should appear that he rescinded such order for corrupt purposes Congress would not only have the power to impeach him, but ought to impeach him. The President has no right to exercise even constitutional powers for corrupt ends.

Mr. TRIMBLE. The gentleman will permit me to ask him one further question. The President takes an oath to support the Constitution of the United States; we take a similar oath. Have we the right under the solemnity of our oaths to pass a bill which overrides the Constitution and attempts to deprive the President of the power which he constitutionally possesses?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I answer that we have not the power to pass a bill which overrides the Constitution and attempts to deprive the President of the power which he constitutionally possesses; but such is not the case in the bill before us. The gentleman assumes that the bill under consideration "overrides the Constitution," but his assumption in my opinion is unfounded. If he refers to any other bill it will be time enough to answer it when such bill is under consideration. This bill I hold to be strictly within the constitutional powers of Congress.

Mr. TRIMBLE. The point which I make is this: the gentleman admits that the President, by virtue of the Constitution, is Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is true.

Mr. TRIMBLE. That being conceded, I ask the gentleman whether Congress has the right to deprive the President of his power as Commander-in-Chief and place it in the hands of some one else?

Mr. INGERSOLL. The gentleman will permit me to say that he is mistaken if he understands this bill as attempting any such thing. This bill leaves the power of the President just where the Constitution leaves it. It neither diminishes nor augments it. It simply directs the General of the Army to assign to the command of certain districts created by the bill such generals as he may in his discretion select, and this does not interfere with the powers of the President as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy.

The character of this legislation is not new. The same thing was done many times before, and its constitutionality was never questioned until now. By an act of Congress the office of Provost Marshal General was created, and the duties of that officer were specified in the act. By acts of Congress officers of the Army and Navy by name have been assigned to special duty heretofore, and we propose to do nothing more than that by this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I will now return to the consideration of the subject, the discussion of which I had commenced when I was interrupted by the gentleman from Kentucky. I was speaking in reference to the impeachment of the President and the necessity of determining without unnecessary delay as to whether the President has been guilty of any crimes or misdemeanors for which he should be impeached and removed from his high office. If he is innocent it is due to him and to the country that the agitation of this question should cease, for it must be apparent to all that while this question remains undetermined the country is necessarily agitated on this subject. the commercial and financial interests of the country are disturbed by it, and the prosperity of the country is affected seriously, and the sooner the question is settled the better for all parties and interests concerned.

In these remarks I intend no reflection upon the honorable committee that has charge of this subject; but that this inquiry ought to be pressed at once and without delay is most evident. If the President has been guilty of acts for which he should be impeached, let us not shrink from the responsibility which properly belongs to us. If he is guiltless he should not be unnecessarily haunted with the specter of impeachment. If he is to be tried, and when tried found guiltless, we must then submit to the rule of the President to the end of his constitutional term and suffer him to pursue his devious way. If he is to remain in that office for the coming two years we might as well abandon the question of the reconstruction of the States lately in rebellion by legislative enactment, and at once proceed to fortify ourselves against any further encroachments on the part of the Executive, and content ourselves with such legislation as shall be necessary to prevent the Representatives from the President's "pocket States" from occupying seats on this floor until after another presidential election shall have given us a President true to liberty, true to justice, true to the best interests of the whole country. Then harmony will be restored between the executive and the legislative departments of the Government, then the work of reconstruction can again be resumed and prosecuted to a speedy restoration of these States upon a basis in accordance with the principles of the Constitution. We can certainly endure the present condition of things if the southern States can. It is of more importance to them to have representation than it is to us that they should have it.

If they prefer to continue in their obstinacy rather than yield to the just and humane desires of Congress, I say compel them to bear their equal share of the burdens of the Government and withhold from them the blessings which result from a condition of restoration to the Union and to representation in Congress until such time as they are willing to do justice. Let the responsibility rest with them, it will not belong to us. They have rejected the constitutional amendment proposed at the last session of Congress: perhaps they will like this measure better.

The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LE BLOND,] in his remarks to-day, seemed to be somewhat excited over an anticipated war if we passed this bill. I desire to ask the gentleman where he is going to get his soldiers to make war upon the Government and the Congress of the United States? You will hardly find them in the rebel States. They have had enough of war; they have been thoroughly whipped, and do not desire to be whipped again. You will not get them from the loyal people of the northern or southern States. If you get any at all you may drum up a few recruits from the Democratic ranks, but in the present weak and shattered condition of that party you would hardly be able to raise a very formidable army, and I tell the gentleman if the party decreases in the same ratio in the coming year as it has in the last, the whole party together would not form a respectable corps d'armée.

A MEMBER. How about the bread-and-butter brigade?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Pardon me; I did not think of that heroic and patriotic band, but I do not apprehend much danger from that source; it would be a bloodless conflict; we would have no use either for the sword or the musket; all that would be necessary to make a conquest over them would be found in the commissary department. Order out the bread and butter and peace would be restored.

I ask the gentleman, who is going to command your army in case you make war upon the Government? Do you believe that Generals Grant, Sherman, Sheridan, Thomas, or Howard will command and lead your armies against Congress and the loyal people of the United States? Are they going to make war upon those who have been their friends throughout the long and bloody struggle for the suppression of the rebellion? Are they going to make war upon those without whose aid they would not now wear upon their brows the resplendent laurels of victory which they won? You will find no Grant, no Sherman, no Sheridan, no Thomas, no Howard, to command you, except to command you to disperse. You will not find one heroic soldier who fought to maintain the honor of his country's flag, for the preservation of his country's life, for the suppression of the rebellion, for the destruction of slavery, that will join your army. No, not one.

For one I anticipate no war, and if the President would only lend his ready cooperation to the measures matured and passed by Congress for the restoration of permanent peace the most timorous would not even dream of war, knowing that if such was the fact, harmony and prosperity would be restored without delay. The people of the South would not for a moment stand in the way of congressional reconstruction but for the encouragement held out to them under the presidential policy. Under that policy they see in anticipation restoration to power—yea, augmented power, more power than they had previous to their rebellion. Under the reconstruction policy of Congress they see a diminution of their power unless they enlarge their ideas of justice, liberty, and the rights of man. Should they do this, then their political power would be equal to ours in the ratio of their population. But until they consent to stand upon the platform we stand upon, and in their fundamental laws grant liberty and equality to all men, they will find the heroic people of the North at the ballot-box and here in Congress battling them in the future as they have in the past.

We have laid aside the musket and we hope to be able to complete our work with the ballot. We must gather the fruits of our victories. It has been so decreed by the people, and in this Government the people are supreme. Let us hear no more of a war upon the loyal people and their Representatives.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LE BLOND] and his colleague [Mr. FINCK] denounced with considerable vehemence the action of the majority here as tending to monarchy; that we favored despotism; that we ignore the rights of the southern people; that we are going to fasten upon them governments unsupportable by reason of their tyranny.

How, Mr. Speaker, can any man without blushing make the charge against the Republican Union party that it is despotic; that it is attempting to destroy the liberties of the people; that it is seeking to establish monarchy or an oligarchy; that it is seeking to place the powers of the Government in the hands of the few to the exclusion of the many?

Sir, I have but to point with becoming pride to the record of the Republican party to refute this charge. Has it not enlarged and extended the area of liberty? Has it not taken by the hand the lowly, the poor, the oppressed, and the downtrodden and lifted them up to a political level with itself? Has it not, in opposition to the falsely called Democratic party, stricken the corroding shackles from four million slaves, which the hand of tyranny and despotism fastened upon them, and which the Democratic party kept upon them during three generations? The shackles and that party are going to dust together.

This, sir, is the fruit gathered from the seed planted by the old abolition party many years ago in the free soil of the North. Slavery and oligarchy—the worst features of despotism—were cherished and strengthened by the party calling itself Democratic. When the abolition party came into power it struck a giant blow, and Moloch and his worshipers fell to rise no more.

To whom are we indebted for the repeal of the odious fugitive slave law? To the Republican party that is in power to-day. In its hatred of despotism it struck that hideous law out of existence. To whom is the world indebted for the grand lessons of liberty and equal justice that have been taught and enforced within the past few years? To the abolition party. To whom are the colored people of this District indebted for the recognition of their manhood and their rights as citizens? To that same Abolition-Republican party in Congress here. Standing loyal and true to its professions it was the first party to give the country an illustration of the principles it professed in favor of universal liberty. It voted for the abolition of slavery at the seat of your Government and carried it over your opposition. It conferred throughout the length and breadth of this land the character and rights of citizens upon the emancipated blacks in the face of the opposition of your party and over the veto of your President. Recognizing the right of the black man to liberty it placed in his hands the ballot to protect that liberty.

Its voice is again heard in opposition to the admission of new States with the word "white" in their constitutions. It is against the recognition of the inequality of man; and here again your party is on the side of despotism and oligarchy. The Republican party has ever been the party of liberty, of equality, and justice. That party is now most gloriously fulfilling the hopes of the good men who founded and established this Republic by carrying into practical effect the immutable principle of the Declaration of Independence, "that all men are created equal." For the first time in the history of the Government has this divine principle been recognized by its law-making power and carried into execution. Instead of war the day of jubilee is coming, and this Republican party is going to usher it in. Are we in favor of monarchy and despotism? Are you afraid that the Republican Union party will fasten upon any portion of the people the chains of slavery or any form of despotic government?

Have we not in the face of the fiercest opposition enlarged the area of freedom and made it coextensive with the Republic itself? The Republican party has done all this and more; all for the amelioration and elevation of mankind. Language fails me to portray its glorious deeds in behalf of liberty and justice. I am proud of that party. It has done more to aggrandize free institutions than any and all other parties that ever existed on the face of the earth. A portion of its fame belongs to me. It will descend to my children. The influence of its glorious deeds are not confined alone to the limits of our own country. It has extended across the seas, and is to-day undermining and threatening with destruction the monarchies and despotisms of the Old World. It questions the divine right of kings and their thrones are less secure, and its influence will not cease to be felt and move the hearts of men until the world is redeemed from the thralldom of despotism.

Now, sir, with that sublime record of the past do you suppose it possible for the Republican party to do an act inconsistent with that record, an act that will dim the luster of its immortal fame? No, sir, never. We are making a grand advance. Clothed in the panoply of justice, supported by the unconquerable will of a liberty-loving people, we are invincible. The day is coming, it is not far distant, when justice will be satisfied and the blessings of liberty secured to all, and then a grand and majestic Republic will have risen upon the ruins of the present.

Government of Insurrectionary States.

SPEECH OF HON. G. S. SHANKLIN,

OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 8, 1867.

The House having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1143) to provide for the more effectual government of the insurrectionary States—

Mr. SHANKLIN said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not know whether my present state of health will enable me to express my views fully to the House upon the measure now before it for consideration. I will endeavor, however, as briefly and succinctly as I can to present some of the views and opinions which I entertain in relation to this subject.

Several gentlemen who have preceded me in this discussion have most earnestly stated that this is a measure of as much interest and of as much importance to the American people as any measure which has ever been presented to this Congress or to any deliberative body ever assembled in this country. Permit me to say, that in my opinion it is a measure which, if carried out to the full extent of the powers which are attempted to be conferred by it, is fraught with as much danger to free and republican institutions, to the liberties and rights of the citizens of the States over which it is intended to operate, as any measure ever presented for the consideration of any deliberative body under a republican form of government.

It is proposed by this bill to establish a military government over ten States of this Union, containing a population of perhaps eight million or more citizens. It is proposed to strike down and set aside the State governments which have been established in those States for the protection of the citizen. If the power intended to be conferred by this bill upon this military government is carried out that will be its effect and legitimate consequence.

What are the reasons presented and urged with so much earnestness and zeal for the passage of a measure of this character? The preamble, I presume, states the main reason and ground upon which the friends of this measure intend to base it. The preamble of any act should contain statements true in point of fact when it pretends to give the reasons upon which the act is based. I wish to call the attention of the House to the statements contained in this preamble. Let us test those statements by the facts as exhibited in the history of those States and the governments in existence there, and let us see whether those statements are true or untrue. If they are true, perhaps they might furnish some apology for this measure, but certainly no sufficient justification. If they are untrue, then it has no foundation upon which to stand, and consequently should and must fall. The preamble contains this recital:

Whereas the pretended State governments of the late so-called confederate States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Mississippi, Alabama, Louisiana, Florida, Texas, and Arkansas were set up without the authority of Congress and without the sanction of the people.

Here it is gravely asserted that the "pretended State governments" of those States recently in rebellion were set up without the authority and sanction of the people. Is this statement true? Were those governments set up without authority and without the consent of the people over whom those governments were intended to operate. Four of the States in which this military government is intended to be established were States perfectly organized and in operation, with all the machinery of government, long before the Federal Government was organized by our fathers. In four of those States—Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia—those governments were in successful operation, fully organized by the authority of the people of those States before the Federal Government was formed, and they aided and assisted in the formation of that Government. These governments were established by the people who inhabited those States, and no authority from Congress was necessary or could have been given.

Have those governments, from the time of their organization down to the present time, been destroyed and set aside? If they have, by whom has it been done? By what act of legal or constitutional authority have those State governments been destroyed and set aside? Gentlemen say that these State governments have been destroyed and set aside by the rebellion. Did the Government of the United States wage a war against the confederacy for the purpose of overthrowing and destroying the State governments existing within the so-called confederacy? Was it the object of the Federal Government to overthrow and destroy those State governments? Were those State governments destroyed by the Federal Government? Was there any design upon the part of the Federal Government to overthrow and destroy those State governments? Who has ever proclaimed it? What measure has ever been taken to effect an object and purpose of that sort? But upon the contrary, it was declared upon every occasion and in every possible way by each and all of the coordinate branches of the Federal Government, that its object and purpose was to defend and maintain both the State and Federal Government unimpaired and unchanged, and maintain their connection and union under the Constitution.

Did the citizens of those States, or any one of those States, when they passed their ordinances of secession, when they attempted to destroy their connection with the Federal Government, attempt to destroy those State governments? Was it their purpose or design to overthrow the State governments? No, sir; they did no act to interfere with or destroy those State governments, except to pass their ordinances of secession and accomplish what was constitutionally impossible—break their connection with the Federal Government and throw off their allegiance as citizens. Have they done any act that tends in any degree to destroy those State governments? They have not. During the whole period of this rebellion the State governments formed prior to the rebellion were maintained in all their parts, perfectly organized, with all their working machinery as State governments. All they did or attempted to do was to sever the connection of those States from the Federal Government and to connect themselves by league with the confederate government.

These States, every one of them, at the time this rebellion was suppressed, at the time the rebels laid down their arms, were in complete operation, and not overthrown or destroyed in any sense of the word. And when the Government of the United States took possession of those States they found them organized, with all the machinery of State governments in operation. There was some amendment made to conform them to the altered state of things brought about by the war, but there was no overthrow or destruction of those State governments.

Even after the surrender of the rebel army and up to this time those State governments have never been disorganized or destroyed. Their functions may have been suspended, but they were never destroyed. The legislative branch of the Federal Government is sometimes suspended during the recess of Congress, and does any gentleman contend the Federal Government is destroyed because the legislative branch of that Government was suspended for a period? The war did suspend the operations of the Federal Government in those States, but it did not overthrow and destroy those governments.

Then with what truth can it be alleged that they were pretended "governments set up without the sanction of the people?" And the same preamble further states:

Said pretended governments afford no adequate protection for life or property, but countenance and encourage lawlessness and crime.

Is that true in point of fact? Do those State governments encourage lawlessness and crime? Where is the proof of that important fact? I do not believe there is any proof that either one of those States has or does now encourage lawlessness and crime. Mr. Speaker, I call for the proof, if there is any, that these State governments attempted to be set aside by this bill have been encouraging lawlessness and crime?

Has any State government ever been formed or any governments of any kind with sufficient wisdom and power to prevent the commission of crime or disturbances? No doubt there have been examples of disorder and crime in those States now attempted to be overthrown. What State in the Union has been able to prevent the commission of crime by its own citizens and others within its borders? Go to New England, where they claim to be the most holy of the holy, and you will find crimes committed day after day; and if any individual would take the pains to keep an account of the commission of crimes in those States, as is done in the States lately in rebellion, perhaps it might be found to be nearly or quite equal to the crimes and violations of law committed in those States whose governments you attempt to set aside. Crimes have been committed there, but we have no committee treasuring up every instance of crime.

Mr. Speaker, it is not to be expected a people engaged for four years in a most terrible and disastrous war should at the termination of that war return at once to the pursuits of peaceful life. That people have no doubt by the effects of this war been to some extent demoralized, or a portion of their people have become demoralized by the effects of the war. The camp followers of the armies that have been disbanded have been the fruitful sources of crime in those States. The men who followed the Army for the purposes of plunder and robbery still linger within the borders of those States, and they are the principal perpetrators of crime in those States.

Mr. Speaker, we are told that those States are encouraging lawlessness and crime. Where is the proof? Where is the evidence? The gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] confined his whole argument to a detail of crimes which have been committed within the borders of the States recently in the rebellion. What does it prove? It proves merely there were individuals there, as in every community, who have committed crimes. Is there any evidence that those Governments encouraged them? If there is no proof, the allegation in the preamble must fall, and we are left to conjecture the reason and purposes of its insertion.

Mr. Speaker, there is one great fundamental principle which is the corner-stone of republican government, and which seems to have been overlooked or forgotten in this bill, as well as in many other bills of like kind, and that is that the sovereign power is inherent in the people. It must emanate from them and from no other source. In this our republican Government differs from the Governments of monarchical Europe. There the doctrine is that the sovereign power is in the King. He holds that power except so far as he surrenders it to some other branch of the Government.

Now, sir, what is this sovereign power inherent in the people? It is to form a government for themselves. Does this bill recognize that great fundamental principle? Is any gentleman who is sustaining this measure here a citizen of either one of these States in which it is proposed to establish military government? What right, then, I ask, has a citizen of one State to set up a government for another State?

What power or authority has the General Government to form a State government? The General Government has the right, and it is its duty, to guaranty to every State a republican form of government; but that grant in the Constitution does not confer upon Congress the right to form a republican government for a State. The people of a State alone have the right to form their State government, and it is for Congress to determine after that government is formed whether it is republican in form or not. That is the extent of the power of the General Government. If the people form a government which the Congress shall determine is not republican in form, what would be the effect of it? The government so formed would be a nullity, and the whole subject would be referred back to the people, who would be required to form another, and so on from time to time until they formed a government which was republican in form. When they have done that, then, according to the principles of the Constitution, they would be entitled to a connection with the Government of the United States if within the limits of her jurisdiction and possessed of sufficient population.

But I will hasten on to consider some of the provisions of this bill. It contains very extraordinary provisions, conferring extraordinary powers upon the military governments to be established over these ten States. They are to be divided into five districts, each one of which is to have a military commander over it not below the grade of brigadier general. It provides—

That said so-called States shall be divided into military districts and made subject to the military authority of the United States as hereinafter provided.

Military chieftains or perhaps despots are to be placed in each one of the districts. The third section defines what the powers of these military governors shall be, and while it does not in direct terms attempt to set aside the State governments, yet, if it is carried out, if all the powers attempted to be conferred upon the military governments are carried into full effect, the result will be to utterly destroy and abolish these State governments which are now existing for the protection of the people of those States, and put them absolutely and unconditionally under the control of military despots, despots not responsible to the people of those States. If there is any responsibility anywhere perhaps it is to the Congress of the United States, which claims to exercise all the sovereign power of these governments without regard to the other coordinate branches.

The third section provides "that it shall be the duty of each officer assigned as aforesaid to protect all persons in their rights of person and property." It covers the whole ground of protection of person and property. How are you going to protect these citizens by military authority in the right of property? You must have a remedy to enforce that right, and that must be determined by the military commander of the district. There is no code of laws written or unwritten belonging to a military government. The discretion, the will, the caprice, or the passion of the military commander constitutes the code of laws by which he governs the community.

But this bill goes further. It not only gives the absolute and unconditional control over the rights of property and person, but it declares—

That it shall be the duty of each officer assigned as aforesaid to protect all persons in their rights of person and property, to suppress insurrection, disorder, and violence, and to punish, or cause to be punished, all disturbers of the public peace and criminals, and to this end he may allow civil tribunals to take jurisdiction of and to try offenders, or, when in his judgment it may be necessary for the trial of offenders, he shall have power to organize military commissions or tribunals for that purpose, anything in the constitution and laws of the so-called States to the contrary notwithstanding.

Sir, if you were to add "anything in the Constitution and laws of the United States and the decisions of the Supreme Court made under the Constitution to the contrary notwithstanding" it would be complete and perfect, and there would be no difficulty in understanding the objects and design of this measure.

I would inquire what power any Government can exercise that is not conferred upon these military authorities? You give to them absolute, unrestricted control over the rights of person and of property. You strike down all civil governments. Ah! but there is a clause in this bill which says the military commander may, if he sees proper, confide to the civil courts the trial of offenses against the laws. By the permission of those military commanders the courts may try—not that they shall try; not that they shall have jurisdiction of cases of that government—but with the consent of the military commander alone they may try offenses against the laws. Where, I ask you, is the power left to these State governments to protect either the life, liberty, or property of the citizen? They are made perfectly subservient to this military authority; and any upstart with brass buttons and shoulder-straps, with or without brains or heart may control the courts of law; and the doctrines and maxims of our Government are subverted. I have always been taught that the military is subordinate to the civil authority; but by the provisions of this bill the civil power is made subordinate to the military power, and that, too, in a time of profound and perfect peace. When there is no rebellion, no war, and no prospect of war the military is made the supreme government in these ten States when this bill shall be carried into effect. At the end of the third section of this bill you will find the following:

And all legislative or judicial proceedings or processes to prevent or control the proceedings of said military tribunals, and all interference by said pretended State governments with the exercise of military authority under this act, shall be void and of no effect.

For fear there might be some misunderstanding of the powers intended to be conferred upon these military authorities it is declared that all interference by the legislative, executive, or judicial authorities in those States shall be null and void. I would like to know if it is the purpose of those who drafted this bill and of the committee who reported it to strike down the Federal courts as well as the State courts there? No exemption is made for the Federal courts. All courts within the borders of those States, according to the liberal meaning of this act, are denied the right to try anybody unless by the permission of the military commanders; and the very next section of the bill shows that it was the intention not only to destroy and annihilate the State courts, but to overthrow and overturn the Federal courts which are now in existence in those States. The fourth section provides—

That courts and judicial officers of the United States shall not issue writs of habeas corpus in behalf of persons in military custody, unless some commissioned officer on duty in the district wherein the person is detained shall indorse upon said petition a statement certifying, upon honor, that he has knowledge or information as to the cause and circumstances of the alleged detention, and that he believes the same to be wrongful; and further, that he believes that the indorsed petition is preferred in good faith, and in furtherance of justice, and not to hinder or delay the punishment of crime.

A lieutenant, perhaps, is by this bill set up over a Federal judge, who cannot exercise that highest right and power of the judiciary which was intended for the protection of the citizen, unless he first obtains the permission of the lieutenant or any other military officer who may be in command there. The action of the Federal judge is made subservient to the will and pleasure of these subordinate military officers.

The Constitution of the United States provides that the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended unless in case of invasion, or insurrection, when the public safety may require it. Yet here there is an effort by this bill to suspend the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus when there is no danger, when there is no insurrection, no invasion, when the public safety does not require it; directly overriding that great principle which our fathers ingrafted in the Constitution for the purpose of protecting the citizen against wrong and oppression.

Now, I will ask gentlemen, as they have been repeatedly asked before, where do you get the power and the authority to pass a measure of this character? Do you find it in the Constitution of the United States? That question has been repeated again and again, and there has yet been no response to it. You not only have no authority within the clauses of the Constitution, but you have no shadow of authority there. And this military power and authority which you are now seeking to establish in each of these ten States is attempted to be organized in violation of every principle and feature of the Constitution intended for the protection of the citizen. I will read some of those provisions. The first to which I will call attention is the following, in section two and article three of the Constitution:

"The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury; and such trial shall be held in the State where the said crimes shall have been committed; but when not committed within any State the trial shall be at such place or places as the Congress may by law have directed."

Here is a provision of your fundamental law which declares that all trials shall be by jury. Have you provided in this bill for a trial by jury? You have not. You have denied the trial by jury, coming directly in conflict with that great principle of your Constitution which was intended for the protection of the citizen against oppression.

In the fifth amendment of the Constitution it is provided that—

"No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia when in actual service, in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself; nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law."

Have you provided in this bill for the trial of offenders by or under the presentment or indictment of a grand jury? You provide for the organization, if the commander may think proper, of a military commission for the trial of offenders, not under indictment, but under some sort of proceeding, I suppose, that may be prescribed by the commanding general of the district. You utterly deny the protection which the Constitution here attempts to throw around the citizen. You violate it in spirit and in letter. You violate that instrument from which alone you derive your power to legislate at all; you violate one of the most sacred and fundamental principles of that Constitution which is intended for the protection of the citizen when accused of crime—a trial by jury.

It is further provided in the sixth amendment of the Constitution that—

"In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor; and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense."

Have you in this bill any provision for a trial of this kind? You are proposing not only to try men who may be in the Army and in the military service of the country, but you are proposing to try civilians; and yet you propose to try them, convict them, and punish them without an opportunity of being heard by themselves or counsel, if the military commander should think proper to deny such a hearing. The party who may be accused of crime will not under this bill be guaranteed the right "to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation." There is no provision for providing him "with compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor." What manifest injustice! A man may be tried by a drum-head court martial, no man being permitted to appear in his defense—nay, he himself not being permitted to appear before that august court, a military commission, and defend himself, but convened for his murder while he inclines upon a bed of straw in his prison.

There is to be no appeal from the decision of this court. There is to be no trial by jury. There is to be no relief by the writ of habeas corpus. The accused stands helpless and powerless before that august body, a military commission. This is in direct violation of one of the recent decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States; and I will ask the Clerk to read a short extract from the opinion of that court in the case of ex parte Milligan and others.

The Clerk read as follows:

"No graver question was ever considered by this court, nor one which more nearly concerns the rights of the whole people; for it is the birthright of every American citizen, when charged with crime, to be tried and punished according to law. The power of punishment is alone through the means which the laws have provided for that purpose; and if they are ineffectual there is an immunity from punishment, no matter how great an offender the individual may be or how much his crimes may have shocked the sense of justice of the country or deranged its safety. By the protection of the law human rights are secured; withdrawn that protection, and they are at the mercy of wicked rulers or the clamor of an excited people.

"Time has proved the discernment of our ancestors, for even these provisions, (referring to the provisions of the Constitution designed to protect the personal liberties of the people,) expressed in such plain English words that it would seem the ingenuity of man could not evade them, are now, after the lapse of more than seventy years, sought to be avoided. Those great and good men foresaw that troublous times would arise when rulers and people would become restive under restraint, and seek by sharp and decisive measures to accomplish ends deemed just and proper; and that the principles of constitutional liberty would be in peril unless established by irrevocable law. The history of the world had taught them that what was done in the past might be attempted in the future. The Constitution of the United States is a law for rulers and people equally in war and in peace, and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men at all times and under all circumstances. No doctrine involving more pernicious consequences was ever invented by the wit of man than that any of its provisions can be suspended during any of the great exigencies of Government. Such a doctrine leads directly to anarchy or despotism; but the theory of necessity on which it is based is false, for the Government within the Constitution has all the powers granted to it which are necessary to preserve its existence, as has been happily proved by the result of the great effort to throw off its just authority."

Sir, that court decides that not even in time of war can you try a citizen by a military commission; that the Constitution is as valid and effective and binding in time of war as in time of peace.

It was intended to shield and protect the right of the citizen, and you cannot depart from it. That court decided there is ample power within the limits of the Constitution for the Government of the United States to protect itself from assaults from within and without, but that it must confine itself to the limits prescribed by the Constitution. That court have decided that these military commissions have no judicial power under our Government either in time of peace or in time of war unless so far as the persons in the Army are concerned, yet this bill, in the face of that authority, the supreme law of the land, attempts to create a military court with powers superior to the Supreme Court of the United States, superior to the executive department, superior to everything except this Congress.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have presented the power which is attempted to be conferred upon this court and this Government, and I have alluded to the constitutional provision which prohibits the exercise of this power by that tribunal. I wish the members of this House had lived for a few months under a military government as I have lived for two or three years. If you can find a human being of ordinary sensibilities, who has lived under a military government and prefers it, I would like to see him. I lived under a military government, a military despotism, for two years. I saw the best citizens in the Commonwealth in which I live dragged from their homes and families, without charges of legal offense, and confined in loathsome military dungeons and prisons, without access to them by their friends, a few favorite counselors and lawyers, who hung around the military headquarters, being the only ones who were allowed to approach the unhappy victim. If any of the men who were arrested could raise a few hundred or a few thousand dollars and slip it into the hands of those vampires calling themselves lawyers, he was immediately released without charge of crime or trial; but if he refused to contribute to the amount of his ability, then he was left to drag out a miserable existence in the military prison.

The commander of the department of Kentucky in 1864 had his headquarters in the district I have the honor to represent, and I am credibly informed he issued an order to the provost marshals just before the November election to arrest ten or twelve of the wealthiest and most influential citizens in their several counties and to send them to his headquarters. The provost marshals made arrests accordingly, and they sent the wealthy and influential citizens to the headquarters of the department commander, and they were confined in the military prison. Why the arrest of wealthy and influential citizens? If they did not have the money themselves to take themselves out of prison their friends would supply it. I have been told on good authority that some men were compelled to pay as high as $5,000 to be released.

This same military chieftain established trade regulations and appointed a board of trade composed of traders, who of course would not suffer any man to have a permit to come into competition with them. These men realized by extortions thousands and thousands of dollars, and while they exult in the abundance of their wealth they live under the condemnation and curses of all just men.

These are some outlines of the characteristics of military governments. We may have a better set of military men now. I hope to God it is so. No man who ever lived under a military government wants to see it restored; and I am satisfied if this House could have lived for a few months under military government, and seen the operations of that sort of despotism, this bill would not be passed.

But it is said this is intended for the rebels, against whom the hatred of the so-called loyal men seems to grow greater every day, and which may grow until the last vestige of liberty shall be overthrown. Do you suppose, Mr. Speaker, you can enslave eight million people in this Government and maintain the liberties of the balance? If you enslave any portion of our people you will endanger the liberties of all, and the free institutions erected by our fathers for their descendants, and the oppressed of all nations. Let us pause in our mad career, and bind up the bleeding wounds that have been inflicted by this most unnatural and unnecessary civil war. Let us forgive as we would ask to be forgiven, and that brave and noble people that now lie pleading at our feet will rise up to shed renown upon this mighty nation in the future as they have done in the past.

How transient, how uncertain are all human events! You may be in the plenitude of power to-day and you may be ousted to-morrow. And I hope to God if you do not cease these outrages upon the people of the country, such as you propose here, such as are attempting to be inflicted by your Freedmen's Bureau and your civil rights bills, that the time will not be long before that army which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] seemed to think could not be raised, an army armed with ballots and not with bayonets, will march to the polls and hurl the advocates of this and its kindred measures out of their places and fill them with men who appreciate more highly and justly the rights of citizens and of freemen, with statesmen whose minds can grasp our whole country and its rights and its wants, and whose hearts are in sympathy with the noble, the brave, and the just, whether they live in the sunny South or the ice-bound regions of the North.

Government of Insurrectionary States.

REMARKS OF HON. F. A. PIKE,

OF MAINE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 7, 1867.

The House having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1143) to provide for the more effectual government of the insurrectionary States—

Mr. PIKE said:

Mr. SPEAKER: In the limited time awarded to me I propose to make but two points. First, it does not seem to me that the change proposed to be made by this bill in the management of the southern States is so violent as gentlemen on the other side would have us suppose. They seem to believe that now the people of those States govern themselves, but the truth is, since the suppression of the rebellion, that is, since the surrender of the rebel armies in 1865, the government of those States has been virtually in the hands of the President of the United States. Last session we called upon the President to furnish to Congress the correspondence between himself and the Governors of the States lately in insurrection. In that correspondence and otherwise we have had officially from the Executive a statement of his mode of dealing with them, and it exhibits the fact that the President, whenever he has chosen to intervene, has done so. He has authorized elections, and whenever disposed to abide the results has done so; setting them aside whenever he wished. I need not mention the instances; they will occur to all gentlemen who have read the public prints for the last two years. New Orleans, Mobile, and Richmond are those that occur to me just now. But the general truth is that in all instances whenever the President has not been satisfied with the result of an election or with the result of legislative action in those States he has disregarded it. He, by virtue of his authority as Chief Executive, Commander-in-Chief of the armies of the United States, assuming to exercise within himself the power of the Government, has intervened and controlled those States.

He began with the constitutional convention, directing who should elect the members and who should be elected. He followed it up by instructing those conventions what laws they should pass and what omit, declaring upon what conditions he would allow the Governors elected by the people of the States to exercise the functions of the offices to which they had been chosen. And since he has never ceased for a moment to exercise the supreme control whenever he saw fit, having it in his power to cause them to adopt or reject the constitutional amendments—he being undoubtedly responsible for their rejection by those States—or to do any other act affecting their relations with the General Government.

The proposition of this bill is to regulate and define this fitful control so exercised by the Executive. Instead of allowing him to govern these States by his own mere motu, it puts the supreme control under the General and higher officers of the Army. This authority is not to be exercised freakishly, but only when occasion calls for it. Courts, jurors, and legislators are to understand that the people of the United States expect them to deal justly by all classes of the population and govern themselves accordingly. When gentlemen on the other side of the House come to reflect that the bill does not transfer the government of those States from the people to the officers of the Army, but only from the President to those officers, I hope they will become better reconciled to it than they now appear to be.

That is the first point I wish to make. The second is that there is an urgent necessity for action on the part of Congress. And I submit to the Houses two instances—representative in character—which illustrate the necessity for action.

The first is that of three soldiers stationed in October, 1865, in South Carolina. They happened to be from my own State. They were detailed to guard a small quantity of cotton at a point on the Savannah river called Brown's Ferry. Quiet, inoffensive, their good conduct was testified to by the people of the vicinity at a public meeting called soon after their murder. Indeed these young men seem to have been guilty of no offense to anybody except that of wearing the uniform of the Republic.

These soldiers, so stationed, were set upon by the owner of the cotton—one of the most considerable men in that neighborhood—and five others, were murdered in cold blood, and thrown into the river. There was no altercation or provocation of any kind whatever. The murder was deliberate and fiendish to the last degree.

The men committing the crime were arrested, tried, and convicted before a military commission sitting at Charleston. The examination of witnesses occupied some two months, and every opportunity was given to the accused to make a defense, the Government procuring the attendance of their witnesses. Four of the murderers were convicted, a fifth escaped arrest, and the other was not identified by the witnesses.

These convicts were imprisoned in Castle Pinckney, thence transferred to the Dry Tortugas, and thence by order of the President to Fort Delaware, from which they were released on habeas corpus by Judge Hall of the district court.

Mr. COOPER. Let me ask the gentleman a single question. The gentleman from Maine states that these prisoners were removed from the Dry Tortugas to Fort Delaware by authority of the President. I ask the gentleman to state whether he does not know the fact to be that the Secretary of War assumes all the responsibility for that removal as having been done by himself?

Mr. PIKE. That is the fact. I make no point on the President on this account. After being released these men returned to their place of residence at Anderson, in South Carolina, and there they were received by a general ovation of the people of the place. A witness before the select committee appointed to examine into this case testified that the opinion was universal in Anderson that the men convicted were the murderers. But that made no difference. The people turned out and sanctioned the murder by welcoming the murderers. And no step has since been taken to punish these men. General Sickles, commanding that department, says that they would be acquitted by a jury of the vicinity no matter what the proof of their guilt.

The second instance is that given by General Schofield in his testimony before the select committee I have referred to. The case has already been given in the newspapers, but I prefer the House should have it in an authentic form, and so I ask the Clerk to read from the testimony of General Schofield, who is well known to be no radical. He says the Watson case is a "fair type of a large number of cases in Virginia."

I send to the Clerk's desk the testimony of General Schofield.

The Clerk read as follows:

"This freedman who was killed by Dr. Watson was a servant of one of his neighbors, whose name I do not recollect. He was driving the family of his employer to church on Sunday morning. Dr. Watson's family were also being driven to church at the same time by another colored man, neither gentleman being present. This colored man attempted to drive by the carriage of Dr. Watson's family at a point where the road was narrow and it was difficult for the carriages to pass each other. In the attempt to pass the carriages came in collision, the spoke of one of the wheels in Dr. Watson's carriage was broken. Probably his family were somewhat endangered, but no one was injured. The carriages were extricated and passed on to church. One, two, or more days afterward Dr. Watson called at the plantation of his neighbor, where this colored man was at work in the field, saw the employer and other members of his family, and told them he had come to chastise his negro for the insult offered to his family. He went into the field where the negro was at work and commenced caning him with a small cane, asking him at the same time why he ran against his carriage, or something of the kind. The negro started to run, the doctor called upon him to halt, which I believe he did at first, the doctor pursuing him, however, as if to continue his caning; the negro man ran again; the doctor then drew his pistol, snapped the cap, which exploded without igniting the powder, and pulled the trigger again and fired, killing the negro, or rather wounding him so that he died within a day or two. He attended the negro himself, and also got another physician to examine him. As soon as the wound proved fatal, he presented himself to a magistrate, and was bound over to appear before what was called an 'examining court' in some small sum of five hundred or a thousand dollars. He appeared before that court composed of five magistrates. The facts were developed pretty much as I have stated them, I think, by witnesses before the court. The court decided to discharge him, which discharge, under the laws of Virginia, is an acquittal and a bar against any further prosecution or trial."

I do not select these because they are worse than numerous other instances. They are not. The records of the Freedmen's Bureau is full of just such cases. An enormous number of murders have been committed during the past year in those States. Probably not less than twelve to fifteen hundred soldiers, freedmen, and Union men have been killed. It is almost incredible that in any part of this country such a condition of affairs should exist. But it is not worth while to indulge in sentimental denial when the facts are so well authenticated.

The select committee to which I have referred, in the exercise of the power conferred on them by the House, called upon the department commanders to state to them the condition of affairs within their respective commands.

These States are divided into four departments: the Virginias are under General Schofield; the Carolinas compose General Sickles's department; General Thomas has Kentucky, Tennessee, Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi; and General Sheridan Louisiana, Arkansas, and Texas. Three of these gentlemen and General Baird and General Wood, who formerly had commands in those States, have been before the committee. Their testimony agrees in these important particulars:

1. Justice is denied practically to Union men and freedmen, and offenses against them go unpunished. There have been several instances of the murder of soldiers, but no punishment has been inflicted.

2. That up to this time there has been no change for the better since the suppression of the rebellion, but rather worse.

3. That unless substantial justice is done to the laboring classes hereafter, and to the Union men and northern men who desire to go there to engage in business enterprises, no improvement in the state of affairs can be expected.

4. The courts cannot be relied on—neither magistrates nor jurors can be expected to deal justly in cases between whites and freedmen, or between those who engaged in the rebellion and Union men.

5. So far as they have expressed an opinion the department commanders favor a law like that now before the House.

These gentlemen have had such excellent opportunities for observation, and are so far removed from temptation to partisan exaggeration, that I call the attention of the House to some extracts from their testimony, and ask gentlemen to determine for themselves whether the state of facts they exhibit does not call for immediate action on the part of the General Government.

General Schofield was inquired of in regard to the punishment of crimes committed against freedmen in Virginia.

Question. What is the difficulty; is it in the arrest and presentment, or in the disposition of the men who try them?

Answer. The difficulty is in the disposition of the magistrates and jurors. Where it is a civil question alone, a question of money, uninfluenced by any other question, I think they most always do justice to the freedmen; but where that question is affected by any allegation upon the part of white men of insubordination or disrespect or insolence upon the part of the colored men, that allegation will justify him in the opinion of the local magistrates or jurors for inflicting upon the freedmen any punishment he may see fit; either by driving them off the plantations without wages, or, as has been done in some cases, shooting them.

Practically if the employer on a plantation chooses to drive a colored man off without his wages, alleging that he was insolent or insubordinate or neglectful of his duty, he is without remedy.

The same question was put to General Thomas.

Question. What is the difficulty; is it in failing to arrest the offenders, or in their trial?

Answer. A failing to arrest unless their attention is called to it, and then the trial is generally slurred over.

Question. Does that observation pertain to all the States you have designated equally, Georgia, Mississippi, Alabama, Kentucky, and portions of Tennessee?

Answer. The practice is about the same in each. The sentiment of these different localities is about the same; the prejudice against Union men and freedmen about the same.

Question. From your knowledge what should you say would be the probability, if a murder was committed in that State (Georgia) by a white man upon a freedman, of his being brought before a jury and convicted?

Answer. I do not believe there is much chance of convicting a resident or citizen of Georgia for murder if the victim was a Union man or a negro. If the murderer was a Union man or a negro they would convict him very speedily, or if the man had moved into Georgia since the war and was known as a northern man or a Union man.

Question. Can you suggest any remedy for this state of things?

Answer. The remedy I would suggest would be the establishment of some supervising authority in those States, with power to advise and insist on the impartial administration of justice, accompanied by a sufficient force if necessary to induce the people to feel that the authority is sufficient to enforce its advice or instructions.

Question. As time runs on, and ordinary justice is denied to a large share of the people of these States, is there a fair chance of the state of affairs then improving?

Answer. I think not, because enterprising people, knowing that state of affairs to exist in that country, would be discouraged from going there and entering into business. I do not think the people themselves have either the energy or the disposition to undertake legitimate enterprises; that is, enterprises resulting in the improvement of the condition of affairs in the State and bringing wealth to the country.

Question. You think there must be a substantial basis of justice to accomplish that?

Answer. Yes, sir.

General Sickles is still more emphatic in his testimony. He says it will be impossible to maintain our garrisons in the South unless additional authority is given to the Army to arrest and punish offenses against soldiers.

General Sheridan's opinion is forcibly expressed in his report to General Grant in December, in which he says the trial of a southern man for the murder of a negro in Texas would be a farce.

General Baird and General Wood, in their testimony before the committee, concur with General Thomas in his statement of the present condition of affairs and the nature of the remedy to be applied.

Aside from all humanitarian considerations, I urge the House to consider that it is the wisest political economy to protect labor. A Government that allows its laborers to go without remedy for the non-payment of wages, and even to be shot with impunity for demanding them, cannot expect and should not have material prosperity. God never has so dealt with any nation, and never will.

But a higher consideration than this is that these men so persecuted and destroyed were our friends in the great battle for the life of the nation. These Union men of the South, white and black, are now hunted and destroyed because they are our friends. The Government by means of this assistance emerged from the contest victorious, but it now refuses, and up to this time has refused, to extend its powerful arm in protection of these humble allies. At the close of our revolutionary war Great Britain sought out the loyalists of America who had suffered for adhering to the mother country. A commission was appointed, and after careful hearing the sum of $15,000,000 was distributed among the losers. That sum at that time would be at least equal to $50,000,000 now. Shall this Government triumphant be less liberal than Great Britain defeated? If we do not make up the losses already suffered, in God's name let us see to it that hereafter every Union man of the South of whatever color shall have the fruits of his labor and not be stripped of them whenever a brutal employer may choose.

This bill will do something toward so desirable an object. Let it be passed as speedily as possible.

Government of Insurrectionary States.

SPEECH OF HON. ELIJAH HISE, OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 7, 1867.

The House having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1143) to provide for the more effectual government of the insurrectionary States—

Mr. HISE said:

Mr. SPEAKER: If I had not been prepared, by other measures hitherto adopted and others hitherto introduced into this House, I should not have been less startled at the introduction of this than if I had received the sudden intelligence that the ten States enumerated in this bill had been sunk by some great convulsion of nature and submerged under an oceanic deluge. I acknowledge, however, that I have been to a considerable degree prepared to anticipate the introduction of this or some similar measure in this House by the committee to which I have been attached.

The chairman of the Committee on Reconstruction, in laying the foundation for the authority of this Congress to adopt this most extraordinary measure, has made a most extraordinary assumption, namely, that the States by their attempt to retire from the Union, and the efforts of their people to cast off the authority of the Constitution and laws of the United States and to set up a separate and independent government for themselves, thus giving occasion for the prosecution of a war by which they were finally subdued and their severance from the Union thus prevented, are thereby to be regarded as occupying the position of territories of a foreign country, conquered by us as such, and subject therefore to the unlimited authority of the Congress of the United States, which has complete and plenary power to institute over them or their inhabitants such government, civil or military, as it may choose to establish, regardless of the charter under which the Congress of the United States derived its own existence and authority, and regardless of all the limitations and restrictions upon the exercise of power by Congress therein contained.

Such, sir, is the ground upon which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] assumes to exercise this most extraordinary authority. He likens it to a case of a war with a foreign Power, where the conquered people are dependent upon the mercy of their conquerors even for their continued existence as a people. He founds his assumption upon what he calls the laws and usages of war as defined by standard authorities upon international law and as observed in the conflicts between civilized nations, and by which authority is erroneously claimed to institute a military despotism and impose it upon the people inhabiting that conquered territory, thus placing their lives, liberty, and private estates at the disposal of the commander of the forces detailed to maintain his authority.

I think I have stated briefly as I could the position assumed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania as the foundation of the authority of Congress to pass this bill. On the other hand, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] repudiating expressly the ground of authority assumed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and maintaining that the late insurgent States are still States of the Union, and that they never have been otherwise, claims that the authority for the passage of this or any other measure in regard to the people inhabiting these ten States is to be derived from the Constitution of the United States alone.

Now, sir, in making an argument upon a great constitutional question like this, in such an august assembly as this Congress of a great confederate Government of thirty-eight States, with the high reputation of those gentlemen, they should be able to so put the statement of the case, so connect the line of argument, that there should be no mistake of fact, no misapplication of law, no sophism in their argumentation. What they say should have all the accuracy, the neatness, and completeness of a piece of machinery adapted skillfully in all its parts to the consummation of a perfect whole, so that when it goes to the country it may deserve the influence which they intended it should exercise upon the minds of the people in creating public opinion.

Now, sir, in the first place, I deny that a State once in the Union can ever get out of it except by force—never by law. And in considering this subject we must consider it in the light of the law as applicable, not of force, which would be applicable only in the event that such force is finally successful. If the attempt to sever their connection as States of the Union and to set up an independent Government for themselves did not prevail, then they have not lawfully effected a separation. The force, unless successful, does not alter the law of the case.

The law, then, of the case is undoubtedly this: that this Congress has no existence as a legislative body except by virtue of the fundamental law which spoke it into existence. It has not one iota of authority beyond the grants of power contained in the Constitution of the United States, that power to be carried out and executed by necessary and proper means to effectuate the great ends and objects for which the States confederated and agreed with one another upon the adoption of this constitutional charter. The functionaries of this department of the Government were spoken into existence alone by virtue of that instrument. This statement cannot with truth or reason be denied.

Now, when gentlemen assume the position that a bill before a legislative body is constitutional, they are bound, if it is questioned, to produce the constitutional authority. They are bound to refer to the article or clause which sanctions by fair, logical argument, and by just rules of interpretation, their assumption; because if the power is not found in the Constitution it does not exist, and Congress cannot assume it. He who takes the position that a measure is unconstitutional of course does not, in his judgment, find or admit the existence of the power to pass it or to have it executed; if it is not found by him in his examination of the instrument it does not exist there; and when gentlemen are challenged to show the clause in the Constitution upon which the authority is based they are bound to produce it.

Now, I have given close attention to the discussion of this bill, and though gentlemen have been repeatedly challenged to show their constitutional authority I have heard no intelligible response to the challenge. When asked where they find the constitutional provision upon which to base this bill, they have not answered it. Nowhere from beginning to end of that instrument can they find any authority—in none of the special grants of power contained in that instrument. Hence the gentleman from Pennsylvania has been represented as saying that the Constitution is played out, that the States having made an unsuccessful and abortive attempt at severance and independence the Congress of the United States is under no constitutional obligation whatever in regard to their government or treatment as States of the Union. Thus he sets aside the Constitution and claims that they are conquered territories, whose inhabitants are subject to the will of the conqueror, according to the usages of war as defined by writers on international law.

Now, sir, the answer to that is full and complete by saying that you cannot speak in this Hall. You have no right to utter a word here except by virtue of the Constitution of the United States. You have no authority to pass a law except by virtue of that instrument. If, then, the Constitution is to control, I deny the authority of this Government even in a war with a foreign Power to conquer territory and to take its inhabitants under its arbitrary dominion. There is power and authority to make war and peace, but I am thoroughly satisfied from my reading of our political history, as shown in the essays of three of the most learned members of the Federal Convention, Hamilton, Jay, and Madison, as well as by later authors upon the subject, that it never was intended that this Government should make any other than defensive war. War for subjugation, war for extending dominion, has no authority under our Constitution. Under the war-making power of the Constitution aggressive wars for the conquest of foreign countries and to enslave their people were never intended to be authorized—only war for the protection of the independence of the States of the Confederacy which had been achieved by a long and bloody struggle with a foreign Government—to maintain our rights as a nation on the land and on the sea. The power to raise and support an Army and a Navy was intended only as a means of defense. The right of conquest does not exist under our Constitution, much less the authority to impose upon a conquered territory and its inhabitants a despotic government, such as does not and cannot exist under the Constitution of the United States.

Now, if gentlemen are right in their theory that these States are to be regarded as foreign territories, made foreign by their acts of secession, and the war was waged as a war against a foreign country and resulted successfully by the subjugation of their forces in the field, then the question comes up as to what authority the Government or the Congress of the United States has over the territory and the inhabitants of the territory so conquered. Now, I say that this Government has no right to set up any authority at home or abroad, for foreign or domestic purposes, not conferred by the Constitution of the United States, which was intended, so far as we are concerned, to embody the laws of war and the laws of nations as applicable to our character of government, both State and Federal.

Now, when we had the war with Mexico we conquered nearly the whole of that country. We conquered the States of New Mexico, California, Chihuahua, Tamaulipas, and Vera Cruz, and took possession of the capital of that republic. Yet so well convinced was the then existing Administration, at the head of which was Mr. Polk, that the Government of the United States could not by violence and force conquer and annex foreign territories and, under the Constitution of the United States, govern the people of those territories arbitrarily, that they did not rely upon the right of title by conquest at all. On the contrary, we obtained by the treaty of peace with Mexico a cession of a portion of her territory, for which we paid an equivalent in money.

And when the subject of the admission of California was considered before Congress, and when the subject of imposing a territorial form of government upon New Mexico was under consideration in this House, in which there were then as Representatives the most intelligent, patriotic, and illustrious men that ever adorned our own or any other age, it was admitted that whether our title to the country was to be regarded as acquired by conquest, by subjugation of the inhabitants, and the taking possession of and holding the country by military power, or by cession and treaty, we had no authority to impose arbitrary and despotic government over the people of that country; but the laws and customs of the country as previously existing continued to exist in full force and vigor for their government, except so far as they might be in conflict with the Constitution of the United States.

I therefore ask my friend from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] for whose acumen, judgment, and ability in making nice and accurate distinctions in argumentation as well as in legal application I have the highest respect—I ask him how in the name of common sense he can claim the authority and right to impose upon the inhabitants of these States an arbitrary military dominion contrary to the character of the Government of the United States itself, contrary to the representative principle, and contrary to our constitutional theory, that the military should ever be held to be subordinate to the civil authority?

Mr. BINGHAM. In reply to the gentleman I desire to make one remark which did not occur to me when I was addressing the House. He uses the words "arbitrary military government." I wish the gentleman to understand that I do not recognize any such principle under the Constitution and laws of the United States, nor is it recognized in this bill either. This military authority and government is not to be arbitrary, but it is to be exclusively subject to the law-making power; and one limitation is incorporated in this bill, as the gentleman will observe, and it is borrowed from the Constitution and is the rule of law for the government of every one of these military officers, to wit, "that no cruel or unusual punishment shall be inflicted." And if you can impose one limitation by statute you may impose forty, so that this military government is not arbitrary at all, but is subject to law.

Mr. HISE. I do not intend to inflict a constitutional argument upon the House at this late hour, for I have not time. But I take the ground, and I do not think it can be successfully controverted, that these States are now States in the Union, subject to the Constitution of the United States and the laws enacted in conformity thereto, and consequently entitled to all the rights and powers that appertain to the other members of the Union. I assume this to be an obvious political truth, an actual existing fact, that cannot be contradicted with any show of reason or by constitutional or legal sanction or with a due regard to historic truth; to deny it is revolting to common sense and in opposition to the convictions, nay the knowledge of all unprejudiced men, unless resolved to persist in the grossest error both of law and fact.

What an unwarrantable assertion it is to say that they are not now States in the Union, that they have got out of the Union, although they failed in their effort to do so; although the war was successfully prosecuted to maintain the Union; although the war was waged with the express and solemn declaration on the part of Congress that when it should terminate by the suppression of the rebellion the States would resume or rather continue their existence in the Union as States, with all their equal rights and privileges as such, and with all their institutions preserved intact equally with all the other States.

Now, I will ask again, where is the authority to disfranchise a State; to expel a State from the Union for the purpose of punishment? Why, sir, examine the debates in the constitutional convention as reported in the Madison papers, and you will find that it was contended in so many words, without being contradicted or questioned, that a State as a State could not be punished. Hence in framing our Government it was so constituted as to provide for a judicial and an executive department, so that the powers of the Government and its laws could be executed and made to operate directly upon the citizen. And this was done in conformity to the acknowledged political truth that a State as such was not susceptible of trial, arraignment, conviction, or punishment, and could commit no offense for which their place in the Union could be changed or their rights and immunities under the Constitution annulled. The power conferred was to admit States in the Union: none was granted, for any cause, to expel them from it.

What, then, but malignant and hostile feelings toward the people of those States can be the ground for your determination to rivet this most odious military despotism upon them? If you entertain this feeling of resentment and revenge let it be carried out legitimately. If those men are guilty of a violation of the criminal laws of the United States upon the subject of treason or conspiracy or rebellion, they are amenable to punishment in a regular and legitimate way: they can be if guilty apprehended, indicted, and tried for their offenses in the civil courts of the United States of competent jurisdiction. That is the mode, and the only mode, by which their crimes, if any have been committed, can be lawfully punished. A State as a State cannot be guilty of a crime. Whatever crime may have been committed, if any, in fomenting a rebellion in those States, it is the crime of A, B, C, or D, and they alone can be tried, convicted and punished by the courts according to law and in the manner prescribed in the Constitution. This Congress has no judicial power except for impeachment of civil officers. It has no power to assume by legislation that a State or its inhabitants have committed crimes, and then judge, convict, and punish them by a deprivation of their rights of representation, their right of suffrage, by their disfranchisement, and by placing their property, liberty, and lives under the arbitrary and irresponsible control of a military tyrant, with authority to plunder, imprison, and slay, at his discretion, and provided with a military force sufficient to support such authority. Congress may pass laws defining crimes and fixing their punishments, and when this is done its power in this respect is exhausted. The courts alone can try and punish the offenders.

All the States as corporate political bodies are in the Union, and have been continuously ever since the original thirteen ratified the constitutional compact, and ever since the other twenty-three became parties thereto by their admission into this Union. Four of these States, through their illustrious representatives in the constitutional Convention, were among the most influential in constructing our Government. Nay, it may be said, almost, that Madison was the framer of it. Others of those States have been admitted to the Union under the plenary power of Congress to admit new States. Why admit States? Because essentially and necessarily there could be no government of the Union under the Constitution except by States and the representatives of States being equal in one branch of a constitutional Congress, and being represented also as States, although without equal numbers in the lower branch of Congress. I charge, then, upon the party predominant in this House that setting aside and subverting the Constitution of the United States, they have denied to ten States of this Union their equal representation in the Senate and their proportionate representation in this House, without any authority under Heaven for so doing.

What is the warrant for this bill? Whenever you ask for constitutional authority gentlemen get up and clamor and rant about the "loyal" men and the "freedmen"—the free negroes of the southern States—being oppressed; their property, their liberty and their lives endangered by unlawful misrule. Gentlemen do not appear to understand the fact that in those States all the property-holders, all the land-holders, all the traders and merchants who had capital, including all the best and most reputable citizens, the substantial men disposed and interested to maintain good government, to uphold law and order, and to secure the enjoyment of regulated liberty, were engaged in the movement for secession and separate independence. They composed, I venture to say, exclusive of the negroes, nine tenths of the entire population of all those States. Yet you assert a right to enslave all those people—to make political bondsmen of the men who have the capital of that section, who do the business, who carry on the factories—the men who have a deep stake in the country for the preservation of law and order. These are to be placed under the dominion of their own slaves, now turned loose among them, and of the interlopers, the renegade sutlers, jobbers and contractors and army followers from the North, who return spreading abroad unfounded reports of their having been "Union men" all the time and having been proscribed and persecuted and driven off, not one word of which, in my deliberate opinion, has any foundation in truth. Since the war has closed, since the armies of the rebellion have been dispersed, the actual citizens of those States to whom I have referred, who have a stake in the well-being and prosperity of the country, are the men to whom we should look for the preservation of law and order and the prevention of crime and misrule.

Yet because you suspect and believe if these governments continue in the hands of those men, disloyal men, rebels, traitors, as you continue to call them, and they are allowed representation in the Congress of the United States, which you cannot deny to them without violation of the Constitution; because it is apprehended that they will stop the progress of all your revolutionary measures, all your unconstitutional schemes of policy for monopolizing all the power and patronage of the Government and all the emoluments of office, you design to destroy their States, disfranchise the citizens, whatever may happen, subvert their State governments and laws, and subject the inhabitants to a military despotism.

Mr. PRICE. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. HISE. I have not the time.

Mr. PRICE. It is a plain question, and quickly answered.

Mr. HISE. I must decline to yield the floor.

Now, sir, what is the object of this measure you have inaugurated? A despotic government has existed over these people ever since they surrendered. They surrendered under the hope and expectation on the part of all their intelligent, able, and prominent leaders, of all their distinguished men who before the war had occupied seats in the Congress of the United States, that when the war terminated the Constitution of the United States would be still in force all over the whole country, and that they would be entitled as free men to representation in the Legislature of the United States, hopes and expectations founded upon the solemn pledges of the American Congress, founded also upon constitutional law; yet Congress in bad faith, and contrary to express constitutional injunction, interpose by a joint resolution a barrier to the admission of their representatives into the Senate and House, and declare in substance that they shall be excluded at discretion until such barriers shall be removed.

HO. OF REPS.

Government of Insurrectionary States—Mr. Hise.

39TH CONG....2D SESS.

So from the very period of the termination of hostilities up to this moment there has been a despotic civil government over them. You have extended the authority of your courts over them. You have imposed upon them your internal tax laws. You have imposed your impost duties upon them, and all obstruction to the execution of the Constitution and laws of the United States has been removed; and while you discriminate against them in taxing their agricultural productions, and while you are so legislating as to impose upon them all the heaviest burdens of the Government, and to deprive them of all its advantages and blessings, yet you deny to them their constitutional right of representation here and their right of local self-government. Is not this the very essence of despotic government, to rule those ten States of the Union and all their inhabitants by a governing power wielded by a legislative body made up exclusively of representatives of other States, in which they have no voice, over which they have no share of influence, and which is irresponsible to the people whom they oppress and enslave?

But, sir, do you tell me any respect for constitutional law or the constitutional rights of these States will ever restrain Congress from the exercise of any legislative power, however illegitimate, cruel, and oppressive, which will enrich and aggrandize the represented at the expense of the unrepresented States. See what has been done already. Look at the discriminating tax of three cents per pound upon cotton. Observe how all the patronage and revenues of the Government are dispensed and expended for the exclusive benefit of the North, with a studied discrimination against the South and the southern people. Look at the pitiful indication of sectional malignity against the southern people upon this floor in striking out an appropriation of $10,000 for necessary repairs of the marine hospital at Louisville, Kentucky. Look at the immense patronage given in the form of Government credits and grants of public lands to northern companies for the construction of railroads, while the project of a railroad from the Mississippi to the Pacific on the line of thirty-two, through the State of Texas, by the way of El Paso to the Pacific port of San Diego has not a single acre of land nor a single dollar from the Government. No aid has been given on the part of the Government to push that enterprise; and yet that railroad project is over a country through which the route is everywhere practicable and its construction easy, at a cost much less than that of the other projects so munificently patronized. It will pass through the richest mineral region of the country, is near one thousand miles shorter than any other route, and has the advantage of a location in a latitude where there is a perpetual spring and never any obstruction from ice or snow.

Look at everything done by this Government and you will find the design and end to be for the aggrandizement of the North and the oppression of the South. It all shows that it will inevitably follow, in the nature of things, that the Government by the representatives of one section over the people of another section will always subject the latter to injustice, cruelty, and oppression.

You have kept up a civil despotism in the South up to this very moment, and now you propose to substitute a military despotism in place of it. There is no limitation upon the power of these military satraps. Who they are to be I now distinctly understand. They are to be appointed by—

Mr. ALLISON. Appointed by the President.

Mr. HISE. Appointed by the President! Indeed.

Now, sir, with all deference and respect to the gentlemen who differ with me, it appears to me that these measures, taken as a series, strike at the executive and judicial departments of the Government, consolidating the powers of the Government in the hands of one of its branches, thus abrogating all the checks and guards devised in order that neither of them should absorb the powers assigned to each by the Constitution. But by this bill it is proposed to establish military governors over ten States of this Union, who may rule and control them without any regard to their rights, any knowledge of their laws, or any sympathy for their inhabitants.

Sir, it is a monstrous usurpation of power. This law proposes to consolidate the powers of the Government in the hands of the military authorities, and to perpetuate the authority exercised by the military during the war, the exercise of which in time of peace has been declared to be unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States.

You propose further by this bill to ignore the executive department of the Government by depriving the President of the power to execute this law; for the military tyrants who are to rule the five military districts embracing the ten States are to be appointed by the General of the Army.

The gentleman from Ohio says that the bill requires that persons arrested by the order of the military chief shall be, without unreasonable delay, brought before military commissions for trial. I presume—

Mr. BINGHAM. I wish the gentleman to consider that there is nothing in the text of the bill that justifies him in supposing that the limitation refers to State laws; it is a limitation applicable to all other authorities.

Mr. HISE. The bill provides for no limitation to the authority and power of the commanders of these military districts; but they are invested with full, arbitrary, and irresponsible power. They are not elected by the people. They are not appointed, according to this bill, by the President or the head of any executive department of the Government. They will govern these people regardless of their will; and they are responsible to no higher authority and may imprison for life, confiscate the estates, and take the lives of the inhabitants through the instrumentality of the military tribunals established by themselves. It cannot be expected that such despotic government will be voluntarily submitted to. The people of these States will not endure this degrading bondage under which they must depend for any security of life, liberty, and property upon a callous and rapacious despotism.

Mr. ALLISON. Would you be afraid to trust General Grant?

Mr. HISE. I have had an opportunity of knowing something of this military rule and of the crimes and atrocities which make up its bloody and relentless record of murders, robberies, thefts, arson, and rapes, of arrests and imprisonments committed and done among and upon the inoffensive, unarmed, and peaceable inhabitants of the border States adhering to the Union, and where the people were peaceable. I know that citizens were maltreated, imprisoned, plundered, and put to death without authority of law; and that assessments were unlawfully made upon them, and large sums of money collected and forced from them by threatened and actual violence upon their persons and property.

Such were the bitter fruits of the imposition upon the people of military rule in many portions of the country, within the limits of some of the adhering States, and in every place in the South where the troops were stationed, and through which they made their desolating marches; and all this upon the pretext that the people were disloyal.

Mr. GRINNELL. The pretext.

Mr. HISE. Yes, sir, the pretext, and the same pretext that has been employed always as an excuse for deeds of blood and violence the world over.

Now, sir, this bill does not expressly provide that the negroes alone are to be protected, and that those loyal fellows who come here to Congress and ask to be placed in power over all the property-holders and the virtuous and intelligent men of these southern States, and are to be permitted to oppress and rob them—the negroes. No, because they have nothing to be robbed of. Instead of that the negroes of the country have been taken by force from their masters, contrary to the Constitution of the United States. It is very true that the bill does not say that they—the negroes—are to be the exclusive objects of protection.

However, it might be said here with truth, that this military government is to be provided for the exclusive advantage of the enfranchised slaves and the extremely loyal adherents of the party in power here; and they and the military governors, with the troops furnished for the purpose, will be let loose by this bill to prey upon the other inhabitants, who, under the military government which this bill provides for them, will be, by being oppressed and plundered, by imprisonments and military executions, driven from their homes or exterminated.

Whatever may be the design, such I believe would be the terrible effects of this stupid, cruel, unwise, and unconstitutional measure should it pass and go into operation, regardless of the Executive veto and the opinions of the Supreme Court. This bill, I grant, does not say in express terms that the negroes and the poor loyal white men of the country alone are to be protected. But from the speeches which have been made upon this floor it is perfectly manifest that the men who have been engaged in the civil or the military service of the confederate government while it existed are to be disfranchised and punished, while their slaves and these loyal vagabonds and adventurers, who followed the armies to the South, and who are the authors of the false reports spread broadcast in the North of southern crime and cruelty, are to be placed in power to govern the country. And when this is done, I suppose the southern States will be placed in their constitutional relations with the Government of the United States, and be allowed representatives in the two Houses of Congress, provided they be black, or loyal if white, and are and remain true adherents of the Radical leaders and supporters of their measures.

My friends, the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from New Jersey, have differed in regard to a very material and important question. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LE BLOND] entertains the opinion that the President of the United States had no authority after the termination of the war to appoint provisional or military governors for the ten southern States. But the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] entertains a different opinion on that subject, and he quoted judicial authority and opinion to sanction his view of the question. Now, my opinion upon the law of the case is simply this, that no State can get out of the Union legally; that every attempt of the civil authorities, by ordinances or decrees of conventions or legislative enactments, would not lawfully produce such result, because all such acts, decrees, and ordinances would be nothing more nor less than mere nullities. Being contrary to the laws and the Constitution of the United States, which are supreme, those ordinances or decrees could have no effect to dissolve the connection of those States with the Government of the United States; they could not release or discharge them from their obligation to obey that Constitution and those laws, nor could they have the effect of depriving those States of their reserved powers of local self-government, nor of the rights, immunities and privileges secured to them equally with all the other States by the Constitution of the United States. That is my opinion of the law of the case.

If they had gone on and succeeded in severing their connection with the Union by force, that would have been a breach of the Constitution successfully accomplished by means of a revolution.

Our action as Colonies in severing our connection with England was revolutionary. The law of the case was against us. We were legally subjected and owed allegiance to the Government of England. The King of England was King of the Colonies. And the Declaration of Independence would have been null and void, the Articles of Confederation would have been of no force or effect legally, except that validity and force were given to both by a successful application and use of military power, acquiesced in finally by England herself. But that was not the case in the southern States. There was no successful application of force either by them or by the Government of the United States.

And, sir, the contrary opinion involves those holding it in these difficulties: if these States are out of the Union—you do not admit or contend that they got out by force of arms—by virtue of their civil proceedings, by their enactments in conventions and Legislatures, and by the votes of their people they got out of the Union, then they are still out of the Union. And if you maintain, then, that because they are not States in the Union they are deprived of all the rights of States, including that of representation, under the Constitution of the United States, then they are relieved from all obligation to obey that Constitution. And you have no right any longer to govern them, because you can only govern them as States; and as States to be governed under and by virtue of the Constitution they must have representation.

If they be not in the Union, then they are out as independent States. In such case they are not bound by the laws or Constitution of the United States, and the President would have no authority to appoint their Governors, nor would Congress have power to bind them by its enactments. But if these States are in the Union, they are entitled to representation in Congress and to the right of local self-government, and the President would have no right to appoint their Governors nor Congress the power to establish, alter, or overthrow their local governments. The Congress of the United States has the power to admit new States; but I want to know if there is any power to put States out of the Union by war or in any other way? And if you cannot put them out, if there is no constitutional authority to eject them from the Union as States, then you have no right or authority to deprive them of their representation as States. Now, I admit that Congress did not at first expel them, but that they attempted to go out. Some lawyers on this floor concede that the Constitution is a compact between States, a treaty between the several States contracting with one another; and they concede that all these ordinances are null and void by reason of the fact that they were contrary to and in violation of the compact or Constitution of the United States, because that Constitution and the laws made in pursuance of it are supreme and in direct opposition to such legislation.

Government of Insurrectionary States.

SPEECH OF HON. J. F. FARNSWORTH, OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 7, 1867.

The House having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1143) to provide for the more effectual government of the insurrectionary States—

Mr. FARNSWORTH said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LE BLOND] stated that it seemed to him that it would be the death-knell to civil liberty if we pass this bill. Sir, if civil liberty means the right to slaughter and slay and despoil at pleasure then I trust this is the death-knell to it. This bill was framed for the purpose of protecting the people of the disorganized States, all the people, in their rights.

The necessity of the bill is found in the fact that no such protection is found in the ten disorganized States at the present time, afforded by the courts, or by any civil tribunal.

The power of the courts, and of such governments as they have in those States, is in the hands of disloyal, unrepentant rebels, who still have the same virus and the same hatred of the institutions of our country that they had during the war.

I am glad that my colleague on the select committee to inquire into some of these disorders [Mr. PIKE] has called the attention of the House, and of the country, to some of the testimony which we have taken, and I propose to present to the House some other of the testimony he had not time to read.

I take it that it is no longer a question of doubt it cannot be skulked or avoided or denied, that the loyal men, the Union soldiers and the freedmen, in these disorganized and disloyal States are not protected. They are murdered with impunity; they are despoiled of their goods and their property; they are banished, scattered, driven from the country.

I know that some newspapers and some politicians have been in the habit of denying all this. They state that what we are told by refugees, by these exiles from those States, is all false; that they are made-up reports to effect northern sentiment; that there are designing men traveling north for the purpose of exciting sympathy with their tales of suffering, and that there is no foundation for their reports. But when the military authorities, all with one accord, unite in telling us that there is no protection for life and property there is no longer any reasonable doubt. We have testimony that unless the military is clothed with some additional authority there the United States garrisons and troops will have to be withdrawn. Why? Because if a soldier is brutally murdered, and the military arrest the offender he is taken from their hands by writ of habeas corpus, issued by the State courts and is discharged.

And it is mean and damnable for us to send soldiers clothed in the United States uniform into those States thus to be murdered, unless we provide some means of redress. General Schofield, who has never been considered a Radical, but always, I believe, very conservative, says that—

"The courts throughout these States fail to do justice to the freedmen—that is, fail to punish white men for assaults and outrages committed on the freedmen."

He says, also, that—

"The courts not only fail to punish outrages and assaults but they fail to administer justice in matters of contract between freedmen and white men."

If, for instance, a freedman is kicked off from a plantation and clubbed, and brings suit before a magistrate for the wages due him, and the white simply asserts that the freedman was insolent, the court dismisses the case.

General Thomas says:

"I cannot say that it is habitual for them (the civil authorities) to exercise a disposition to bring these people to justice, (i. e. those who commit crimes against loyal men.) They do it sometimes, because they know that the offenders will be arrested under General Grant's Order No. 44, and held until they are tried."

"I do not think the civil authorities are disposed to administer justice if left to their own will."

He further says that trials are not impartial.

General Baird, who was in command of the district of Louisiana, says:

"Murders were frequent. In some instances I think the civil courts would do justice to the negroes where no feeling was aroused or question raised in regard to the rebellion, and as between white men and black men, or Union men and rebels. If any such question was raised, as a general thing it would be impossible to get justice done."

"In case of murder of freedmen it was almost impossible to get the man arrested, and if arrested he would be sure to get released on very low bail. I remember one such case, where the man was released on $300 bail."

General Wood says, in regard to Mississippi, "that there is no diminution of crime, and punishments are seldom inflicted."

General Sickles says, in reference to South Carolina and Georgia, that the courts do not furnish any redress for murder or other crimes committed upon Union men, freedmen, or soldiers, and that unless the military can be clothed with power to protect themselves and punish offenses committed against them, the garrisons will have to be withdrawn.

Sir, it is impossible to find an officer of any considerable rank, who has spent three months in any of those States, in command of any district, or as superintendent or assistant commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau, who will not make the same statement.

Then the question arises, is it the duty of the Government to afford protection to our people there? There is no adequate protection now to Union men, to soldiers, or to freedmen in those States. I care not what laws you pass here, so long as they remain a dead letter because there is no power there to enforce them. No matter what enactments you may place upon your statute-books, unless there is some power provided to enforce them in those States they are good for nothing. Crime of all descriptions runs rampant through the land. These people are holding out their pleading hands, they are looking to us with ghastly faces, they are imploring us now, as they have been for the last two years, to give them that protection which they never yet have had afforded them. Therefore the joint Committee on Reconstruction have reported this bill in accordance with the recommendations of their commanders; in accordance, I believe, with the sentiments of the General of the Army, and of every other loyal man who is desirous that this shall be a Government in fact as well as in name. This bill is intended to give to that people the protection which we owe to them, and which they so much need.

I have just received a New Orleans paper, the New Orleans Tribune, of the 27th ultimo, which contains an account of the brutal treatment of a family in Texas. I send it to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"A VICTIM OF REBEL HATRED.—We published yesterday in our paper the funeral notice of the death of Mrs. Martha G. Temple, wife of Captain C. H. Temple, late of the Union Army."

"As the case is one burdened with those deep and burning wrongs not unfrequently practiced by the high-toned chivalry of Upper Red River against northern men and loyalists whose fortunes have been cast among them, we have taken the pains to inquire into the particulars attending it and although our space will not permit of a history of all the circumstances leading thereto, we deem it proper to present the following outline for the benefit of our readers here as well as at the North."

"Captain Temple, the afflicted husband, has been a soldier of fifteen years' service in the United States Army. In one of the first engagements of the war he was dangerously wounded by receiving a ball in his right lung, a fracture of the skull, and the carrying away of a part of one foot by a shell. After recovering from these wounds he reentered the service in a regiment of Illinois cavalry, and rendered distinguished services in East Tennessee as a scout, when he was again wounded. The close of the war found him in service with his regiment in Arkansas, near Pine Bluff, where he married the daughter of a Union man from Tennessee.

Moving from thence to the Upper Red river country, he engaged in planting in partnership with some citizens of Sevier county, Arkansas, where, in consequence of the great influence which he exercised over the freedmen, he was permitted for some time to labor unmolested. His untiring energy produced him a very considerable crop of cotton, although once overflowed by the freshet of the river, when most other planters failed to secure any crop whatever. About the time his cotton had begun to mature his fancied security was soon withdrawn and a series of persecutions substituted. His life was threatened on every side, and attempted on several occasions, during one of which he was again wounded. About two months since, finding his situation so precarious, without the protection either of civil or military authority, the life of himself, family, and freedmen, as well as his property, in constant peril, he came to this city for the purpose of securing the assistance of the military in getting his family and property out of that country, as he could not have done so otherwise. He was granted an escort of twenty men by General Sheridan, all that could be spared at the time.

Upon his return home with the detachment mentioned, under command of Brevet Major Granger, he found his house vacant, his young wife and infant driven to take refuge among the freedmen some miles into the interior of Arkansas, and a young man in his employ, named Davidson, who had also served in the Union army, compelled to fly to the woods to escape being murdered. His horses and cotton were seized by his partner in the planting business, and the former taken away into the interior of the country. The force sent for his protection proved wholly inadequate, and were in great danger of being massacred by the infuriated reconstructed Johnsonians, who assembled in numbers upward of three hundred strong, fully armed, at Boston, Bowie county, Texas, Linden, Texas, and Richmond, Arkansas, the three towns adjacent to where he, Temple, had lived. It was found necessary for the officer commanding the detachment to avoid Boston and Richmond, but being compelled to pass through Linden, in hopes of securing the interference of the United States troops and thus bring on a conflict, a gang of freedmen, shackled and chained, were paraded and marched through the streets in the presence of Captain Granger and his troops. All means of transportation, either for Captain Temple and family or the troops, was denied, and the sale of subsistence refused, and the party was compelled to travel upward of one hundred miles, most of the way on foot. The wife of Captain Temple rode the distance in an ox-cart, exposed during the time to the inclemency of the weather, and for several nights without shelter, until the party arrived at Jefferson.

The conclusion of this barbarous treatment has been that Captain Temple, wife, and child arrived in this city on Monday evening in a destitute condition and prostrated from hardships and exposures. Mrs. Temple was with great difficulty carried from the state-room on the steamer Alabama to the rooms of Major Carroll, where she remained in a sinking condition until Thursday night, when she expired. Captain Temple is now lying in a prostrated condition in the room with the dead body of his young wife, and it is considered if he recovers at all it can only be for a brief period."

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] yield to me for a moment?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I understood the gentleman to say to the House that this measure reported from the joint Committee on Reconstruction was in accordance with the wishes and views of all the distinguished commanders of our Army. Now, if that is a fact, it is one that this House and the country are entitled to know, on account of the singularly good opportunities possessed by those commanders of ascertaining the character and condition of those communities. If the gentleman makes that statement advisedly I would be glad to know the fact.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I did make that statement advisedly. I have mentioned the names of Schofield, of Thomas, of Baird, of Wood, of Sickles, all of whom have testified before a select committee of this House.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. And Sheridan?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The testimony of General Sheridan has not yet been taken. All those whom I have named have testified with one accord that there is no other method of protecting loyal men, white or black, in those rebellious and disorganized States than by clothing the military with the necessary powers. I said of the General of the Army that I believed this bill was in accordance with his views. I cannot speak authoritatively or "by the card" so far as he is concerned.

It is for the reason that we desired to bring these facts before the House that my colleague on the committee [Mr. PIKE] and myself have occupied the time of the House. My purpose is to nail to the counter this denial of the rebels and their sympathizers that these outrages and disorders exist. It is to place the matter of fact beyond a peradventure. There can be no possible doubt or question in reference to the matter when military commanders of different schools of politics, who have no political or personal ends to serve by their testimony, have stated under oath the true condition of things in the South.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we need spend no more time upon the facts. I take it the fact is settled that adequate and necessary protection to the Union people in those States is not afforded and cannot be under the present system of government, because of the popular hatred which exists against all loyal men. I propose now to say a few words with regard to the bill itself and the power of Congress to pass such an act. It is claimed on the other side of the House that this bill is, in several particulars, in derogation of the Constitution. It is objected, in the first place, that we violate the Constitution by directing the General of the Army to assign officers of a rank not below that of brigadier general to the command of certain districts. It is said that as the Constitution clothes the President with the right to command the Army, therefore we cannot direct any other official to assign an officer of a particular rank to a special duty. I do not believe in that doctrine. I think that I can find numerous instances in various statutes which have been enacted during the war wherein we have by law directed, for instance, that the Provost Marshal General shall perform a certain duty that the Judge Advocate General shall perform a certain duty; that the General of the Army or the Lieutenant General shall assign officers to certain duties. If we should declare in this bill that the General of the Army shall assign a particular officer, naming him, to a special duty, there might be some question raised about such a provision; but that Congress has a right to direct that officers of a certain grade shall be assigned by the General of the Army to particular duties seems to my mind a matter beyond controversy. Why, sir, the President only can command the Army in obedience to the law and for its execution. Congress commands both President and Army.

It is said that the Committee on Reconstruction have, in framing this bill, changed the provisions of a similar bill which was introduced by a Senator from Oregon, [Mr. WILLIAMS.] That is true. The Committee on Reconstruction have struck out the words "by authority of the President." I am very glad that this has been done; and I will state why. I want to put the President into a position in which he will be obliged, by affirmative action, to place himself in the way of a law of Congress, if he is disposed to obstruct the execution of that law. If you require the General of the Army to run to the President every time he wants to make an assignment of an officer to a particular duty, and the President chooses to say, "I am engaged and cannot attend to the matter now," and thus by a sort of negative action defeats a law of Congress, he is not placed in the position in which he would be if he should by a positive order direct Grant not to assign an officer to this particular duty. Let him thus array himself, if he will, against the express provisions of a law of Congress, and then he will be placed in a position where there will be no difficulty about dealing with him. I say again, that as to the right of Congress to direct that an officer of a particular grade shall be assigned for certain duty to a district, without even naming the district, I have no doubt whatever.

It is said that by this bill we propose to upturn and destroy the civil tribunals in these insurrectionary States. Why, sir, who gave them civil tribunals? What kind of civil tribunals have they? The President stated, after the war had concluded, that those States were left without civil governments; that there was chaos there; that all civil government was overthrown. He said this repeatedly. Did anybody doubt it then? No. And his friends upon the other side of the House will not, I suppose, contend now that he was not right in so saying. Then if those States were left without civil governments at that time, who has given them civil governments since? Where did they derive their authority to set up civil governments? Have they any civil governments which are entitled to recognition by the sovereign power of this nation?

If they have set up any governments it has been under the direction of the President of the United States. This is the first time, if we pass this act, that the Congress of the United States has passed any law giving them any kind of government. We are, sir, now doing what we ought to have done in May, 1865, and what, in all probability, Congress would have done had it been able to assemble and had an opportunity to legislate upon the subject. These are called civil governments, and yet the only tribunals they possess it seems are used for the protection of crime.

Mr. KUYKENDALL. My colleague says they have no civil governments down there. Now, what then is referred to in the third section of the bill, where it is declared the commanding general may allow civil tribunals to have jurisdiction? What civil governments are referred to?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The civil tribunals they have in fact. I was speaking about legal tribunals. It is certain they have certain governments set up there in fact, which are not derived from any authority given by the law-making power of the Government. In my judgment none of those civil governments are lawful, and it is very certain that they are now in the hands of the rebels.

We may as far as we please make use of the agencies which are now in existence in those localities. We may if we see fit allow them still to act in reference to certain matters. And I am convinced of the power of Congress to pass this bill for the purpose of giving them some kind of government.

Talk of civil governments! They are not civil governments, but on the contrary are very uncivil. [Laughter.]

Now, the object and purpose of this bill on the part of the Congress of the United States is to secure the full protection of the persons and property of our own citizens. And the Government that does not do that is not worthy the name of Government. I ask gentlemen to point out any other way in which we can protect the rights of loyal citizens there except by clothing the military with this power. I have given this subject some thought and attention during this Congress, and no man is more anxious for restoration, reconstruction, or whatever name you may please to call it.

I am not disposed to let any theory stand in the way. I do not care whether you call them Territories or States. I do not care whether you call them conquered provinces or disorganized States, but I do care that the great Government of the United States under which I live shall enforce protection of the rights of all its citizens. If any gentleman will point out to me any other mode by which liberty and property will be secured in those disorganized States than that provided for in this measure, I will be glad to hear it. I know of no other method. The military commanders to whom I have alluded say they know of no other method. There is no other method. I repeat, again, if gentlemen can tell me of any other method I should like to hear it. Certainly I have not heard any gentleman upon this floor point out any other.

Surely, sir, there has been time enough. We have allowed nearly two years to pass, and we find instead of things growing better they are every day growing worse and worse. When the rebellion was ended, when Lee and Johnson surrendered, for a few months there was comparative peace in the South. The rebels felt subdued so long as the military held power there. They were in a great measure subdued and peaceful, but the moment the policy began to be developed of pardon, restoration, and amnesty and all that, these men began to creep out of the holes where they had skulked and hidden themselves and assumed the airs of braggarts and talked about constitutional rights as if they had any constitutional rights.

Mr. LE BLOND. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Yes, if it is a very short one.

Mr. LE BLOND. Did I understand the gentleman correctly as saying that General Grant favored the proposition now pending?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. No, sir; I said I believed he did; but I could not speak from authority.

Mr. LE BLOND. I suppose the gentleman does not claim to have any personal knowledge.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I do not, sir; it has been the policy of the President and his Cabinet which has brought things to this state in the South. His policy of pardoning rebels, restoring them to power, and giving into their hands the reins of government in their States, develops at once the hatred which is natural to them and which has not been cured. Every commander, every one of the military men who have been in the South during the war, and who has remained there since, will tell you the same story. Things are not as they were at the close of the war. Why? Because then these men knew and realized the fact that they had no constitutional rights, and that all that was left to them was to ask for mercy. They were content with that at the close of the war. A Union man in the South was then at a premium. He was courted and his influence was sought after by these unwashed rebels. But when the President told the rebels he would protect them at the expense of the Union men, then the Union man was at once at a discount and the rebel at a premium. Now the Union men are murdered, persecuted, driven from their homes, and despoiled of their goods. They have no security. And that state of things is growing worse and worse all the time.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think I see the dawn of a better day in the passage of this bill. I am very glad indeed that the committee have been enabled so unanimously to agree upon such a measure as this. I hope it will pass this House by an overwhelming majority and become a law. I do not expect that this is all that should be done, but I consider it as an entering wedge of the right kind and driven in the right direction, for the first duty of the Government is to afford protection to its citizens.

Government of Insurrectionary States.

SPEECH OF HON. W. E. NIBLACK,
OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 9, 1867.

The House having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1143) to provide for the more effectual government of the insurrectionary States—

Mr. NIBLACK said:

Mr. SPEAKER: When I first sought the floor a day or two since I did feel very much like discussing at some length the questions involved in this bill. Since that, however, the debate has taken so wide a range, and some of the grounds which I intended to occupy have been passed over so ably by other gentlemen, that I have ceased to have that personal desire to participate in this discussion at any great length at this period of the debate.

I regard this as one of the most interesting, and at the same time important, measures that has been introduced during the present Congress. It brings up legitimately for discussion every power of this Government, civil and military, legislative, judicial, and executive. It brings before the House all the questions that have been presented upon this subject of reconstruction for discussion again, if we see proper to avail ourselves of the latitude which is usually allowed in debates of this sort.

At the commencement of the late civil war I felt that this question of the relation of States to the General Government, if the war continued long, would inevitably be the great question of the times. I felt then, as I feel now, that it was one of the first duties of the first Congress that assembled after the commencement of the war to provide for some contingencies which have since happened by appropriate legislation, and whatever neglect may have occurred in failing to provide for those contingencies I assert with all due respect rests upon the Congress of the United States. It is true at one time during the war a bill was passed by Congress for the reorganization of the rebellious States, as they are termed; but from disagreement between Mr. Lincoln and Congress that bill failed to become a law. That failure is in no sense justly chargeable to the present Administration nor to the present minority in Congress.

When the war closed this whole question was therefore very suddenly and to a great portion of the country very unexpectedly precipitated upon the administration of President Johnson. I concur—and in that declaration I know I am liable to the charge of being considered somewhat extreme—I concur in the view expressed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LE BLOND] yesterday that the best arrangement that could probably have been made, in view of all the difficulties that surrounded the question at the time, was to have indorsed the terms of capitulation agreed upon between General Sherman and General Johnston, recognizing the then existing State governments of the insurgent States upon their compliance in good faith with those terms of capitulation. Whatever relations they had theretofore sustained to the so-called confederate government were swept away by the collapse of that government. Every extraneous matter having relation to the rebellion certainly ceased to have any valid and binding authority or force upon those States when the confederacy expired, and only the naked State governments remained, which could have been immediately used in the restoration of law and order. I always thought it would have been better, as a practical question, to have acceded to and sustained those terms of capitulation. But, sir, in the temper in which the country then was, in view of the embarrassment that then surrounded the President of the United States, it is no matter of surprise now that he failed to concur in that arrangement of General Sherman. I did not complain of him for not doing so, for I confess the question was surrounded by many and very great difficulties, some of which I may have failed to fully comprehend.

When the Administration failed to sanction what General Sherman had done it became necessary for it at once to adopt some other policy which would secure to the people of those States some sort of civil government. President Johnson, conforming to the policy of his predecessor on this subject, proceeded to appoint provisional governors for these States.

Now, sir, I am free to confess that I always regarded these appointments of provisional governors with some degree of disfavor; and I have always had some doubt as to the legality of the acts of a governor so appointed, unless his acts and conduct were ratified by the people of the State over which he was appointed to preside. That question, however, has failed to become one of any practical importance in the present position of affairs. Whatever may have been the power or want of power of the President in the premises the people of these States have accepted them as acting governors, and have ratified and recognized their acts as binding upon them. To my mind that relieves the question of any further embarrassment.

The States, under the auspices of these governments, have reorganized their constitutions with such amendments as they thought necessary to accommodate themselves to their changed condition and circumstances. I therefore contend, and have always contended, that, at least in the absence of any other power asserted to be and claiming to be the State governments of these States, these reorganized governments are, and of right ought now to be, recognized as the legitimate governments of these States, entitled to all the powers which appertain to the administration of their local affairs.

Well, sir, we are now confronted fairly and squarely with the question whether we shall recognize these State governments as valid and having authority for any purpose, or whether we shall not. That view of the question was very fairly presented yesterday by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER.] He admitted very frankly that if these reorganized governments in the lately insurgent States are valid State governments we have no power to pass the bill under consideration. On that point there is not that I am aware any controversy. The validity of these State governments being admitted, all the use we can make of the military power within those States in time of peace is to aid in certain contingencies in the execution of the laws within them already enacted by the proper legislative authority. If, on the contrary, they are States for no purpose, then it has been the duty of this Congress from the first hour in which it assembled to the present time to provide other governments, territorial or otherwise, for the government of these districts of country once known as States. But, sir, from disagreements of opinion, and perhaps other causes, which I may not fully understand, this Congress has failed in any manner to recognize them as States in the full political sense of the term, and yet it has failed to decree that they are not States, and thus, notwithstanding the immense interests involved, the whole subject has been allowed to move on, in this anomalous and unsettled condition, to the present time.

I know it is charged that this failure on the part of Congress to adopt some affirmative and decided policy is due somewhat to the action of the Executive of the United States. I do not really know just how far the President has failed to cooperate in all respects with the present Congress, or has thwarted any action intended to secure this object. I only know that there seems to be some disagreement on this question. But I have discovered, as we have all witnessed to-day in the passage of the Nebraska bill, that when the President has failed to give his sanction to any other measure upon which the dominant majority in this Congress have united they have always been able to carry their proposition over his veto. Why, therefore, has not this Congress adopted some measure of reconstruction? They can pass, if there be need for legislative action at all, any measure they choose. There is, therefore, no good reason for charging the failure upon the Executive. The blame rests rather with the majority here, who cannot it seems agree upon any proposition which will command the party strength.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to ask my friend a question. I understood him to state that Congress had by no act recognized these States as States since the rebellion. I wish to inquire of my friend if in the act apportioning representation among the several States they were not recognized as States, and further, if in the apportionment the direct tax of $20,000,000 levied upon the people of the United States there was not a clear and unequivocal recognition by act of Congress of the existence of these States since the rebellion?

Mr. NIBLACK. I did not intend to go into that branch of this question, or to be understood as saying that Congress had not in any manner recognized the existence of these State governments. On the contrary, as the gentleman has suggested, I am prepared to affirm upon all suitable occasions that this Congress has indirectly and by collateral legislation, in the manner suggested by the gentleman, and perhaps in other ways, recognized the existence of these State governments. That matter has been discussed oftentimes in this House and elsewhere. And what I was endeavoring to say, what I desired to be understood as saying, was that Congress had, by no direct legislation upon this subject of reconstruction, either affirmed or denied the validity of these State governments, but has left it a question somewhat of construction and inference as to their status by the acts it has passed upon other subjects and not bearing directly upon the subject of the restoration of these States to their former relations with the Government.

I will come now directly to the consideration of the bill now before the House. As I stated in the outset of my remarks this bill, to my mind at least, really presents more questions of interest than is presented by any other measure which has been submitted to this House and to the country since the close of the war. It commences by a preamble which is intended as a declaration of the views of Congress upon the conduct of the executive department of this Government, both during the administration of Mr. Lincoln and the administration of Mr. Johnson. It is a statement also of what Congress is asked to announce as the legal effect of the reconstruction policy of both Mr. Lincoln and Mr. Johnson in regard to the States enumerated. The preamble is as follows:

Whereas the pretended State governments of the late so-called confederate States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Mississippi, Alabama, Louisiana, Florida, Texas, and Arkansas were set up without the authority of Congress and without the sanction of the people; and whereas said pretended governments afford no adequate protection for life or property, but countenance and encourage lawlessness and crime; and whereas it is necessary that peace and good order should be enforced in said so-called States until loyal and republican State governments can be legally established: Therefore, Be it enacted, &c.

Now, I concede, Mr. Speaker, that this preamble is no part of the bill; it may be stricken out without affecting in any way its provisions. When a preamble to a bill is adopted, however, it usually becomes an important and sometimes an essential part of it.

Now, what is the nature, character, and evident purpose of this preamble? It bases the proposed action of Congress upon the pretense that no proper State governments have been erected within the lately rebellious States; that they have not been sanctioned by the authority of the people. Therefore, because the people have not sanctioned what has been done in the alleged attempt at reconstruction, Congress must intervene without reference to what the people wish or desire in those States, and take the whole power of the Government into its own hands.

Now if, as there intimated, and as I fully concede, the assent of the people is necessary to the reconstruction of any State or to the establishment of a government within it, then I hold it is not the duty of Congress to provide a military government for these people, but to make provision at once by which they may re-establish civil government if the present State governments are to be swept away. But this bill does not pretend to do anything of the kind. On the contrary, I think it can be construed in no other light than as an attempt to set up military governments in place of the State governments now there, obliterating all State lines, and not founded in any sense upon the consent of the people. It is founded simply upon what is claimed as the authority of Congress, to do as it pleases with the States lately in rebellion, without reference to any constitutional limitation.

This preamble is a reflection upon all that has been done by the executive authority upon the subject of reorganizing those States; and it applies, and I call the attention of the House to the fact, that it applies as well to what was done by Mr. Lincoln in regard to the States of Louisiana, Arkansas, and Virginia, as to what has been done since by Mr. Johnson in the other seven States included in this bill. The blow that is intended to be inflicted by this preamble upon the present Executive necessarily reaches back and applies in a great measure to the acts of his predecessor. I do not pretend to discuss the relative merits of Mr. Johnson and Mr. Lincoln in those respects. These matters have already been discussed more ably and at greater length than I have the power or the time now to do.

The first section of this bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c. That said so-called States shall be divided into military districts and made subject to the military authority of the United States as hereinafter prescribed, and for that purpose Virginia shall constitute the first district; North Carolina and South Carolina the second district; Georgia, Alabama, and Florida the third district; Mississippi and Arkansas the fourth district; and Louisiana and Texas the fifth district.

Thus it is proposed to establish military governments—for if it amounts to anything it amounts to that—in those ten States, without regard to the old State boundaries or to the present State lines. That, however, is merely a preliminary to what follows. The second section provides—

That it shall be the duty of the General of the Army to assign to the command of each of said districts an officer of the Army not below the rank of brigadier general, and to detail a sufficient military force to enable such officer to perform his duties and enforce his authority within the district to which he is assigned.

Now, the remarkable feature in this section is that instead of declaring that the President of the United States shall do these things, as is usual in all similar legislation, so far as any previous legislation has ever been similar to this, it is provided that the General of the Army shall exercise this power—not the President, not the War Department, but the General of the Army.

Now, while I have as much confidence in the military capacity of the General of the Army of the United States as any member of this House, yet under the Constitution he is but a subordinate officer to the President. The President, by virtue of the Constitution, is the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States; and if this bill should become a law he could still, notwithstanding its provisions, prescribe to General Grant the duties which he shall or shall not perform in regard to this as all other military measures. I take it, therefore, that if this bill should pass in its present form it could have no legal effect in tying up the hands of the President. All that you can make of it is simply a personal reflection upon the President, attempting to confer upon the General of the Army authority which constitutionally belongs to the President. This provision, therefore, can have no other effect than to illustrate the animus of the bill or of those who reported it.

The third section provides—

son and property, to suppress insurrection, disorder, and violence, and to punish, or cause to be punished, all disturbers of the public peace and criminals, and to this end he may allow civil tribunals to take jurisdiction of and to try offenders, or, when in his judgment it may be necessary for the trial of offenders, he shall have power to organize military commissions or tribunals for that purpose, anything in the constitution and laws of the so-called States to the contrary notwithstanding; and all legislative or judicial proceedings, or processes to prevent or control the proceedings of said military tribunals, and all interference by said pretended State governments with the exercise of military authority under this act, shall be void and of no effect.

This, Mr. Speaker, presents the great and important question for the consideration of this House; in other words, it is the important and controlling section of the bill. As was properly remarked yesterday by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER,] the military power of this Government in all matters pertaining to its civil administration is but the police force of the Government. It is but an auxiliary of the civil power when called upon in the execution and enforcement of the laws. In order, therefore, that the military may exercise any proper authority in the so-called rebellious States there must be some civil government, some civil authority, in aid of which the military shall act.

The bill declares that the "rights of persons and property" shall be enforced and protected by the military authority; but it does not define what are the "rights of persons and property" of the people in those districts of country. It does not pretend to define what those rights are or any civil rights pertaining to the people of the section of country to which it applies. If the pretended State governments of which the bill speaks are not legal governments and have no power to enact laws, then of course all of the pretended laws of these pretended States defining the rights of citizens, defining the rights of person and property, are void and of no effect. There are no State laws, then, to execute by the aid of the military within these so-called States. If there are no State laws, then I submit, Mr. Speaker, there are no laws of Congress applicable to the emergency. It amounts simply to this: that there are no laws now in force, either State or national, pertaining to the local administration of this district of country known as the lately rebellious States which the military can be called upon to aid in executing.

If the military authority in the district, therefore, has any power at all, or attempts to exercise any power, it must in some way define by military power what the rights of the people shall be, and then proceed to protect the people in those rights so defined by military power, thus surrendering all power, executive, legislative, and judicial, to the military.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] tells us this is to be followed by some legislation defining the rights of these people. In all candor and in all fairness, Mr. Speaker, we are commencing at the wrong end of the difficulty if Congress must legislate on the subject at all.

The first great duty, it seems to me, is to either define, or cause or allow to be defined, the civil rights of the people interested in this measure by proper and competent legislative authority. Then, if the civil power shall be unable to execute the laws for the protection of those rights, it will be time enough to invoke the aid of the military in the work of preserving law and order.

This third section which I am considering, in defining the duties of the officer to be placed in command of the military district, provided for in the first section, provides that among other things "he may allow civil tribunals to take jurisdiction of and try offenders." What civil tribunals? Does it mean the State courts? If so, then it must mean that the military commander shall recognize the validity of the laws of these States or not, in his discretion. Was ever such a power conferred on a military officer in any country claiming to be free? Sir, it devolves upon this officer the decision of a question which Congress seems not to have had the courage so far to decide. Congress has heretofore in this contest about reconstruction claimed that the decision of everything pertaining to the lately rebellious States belongs to it; yet in this section one of the great and controlling questions pertaining to these States is referred to the decision of a military officer to be designated by the General of the Army. This surely must have been an oversight on the part of those who reported this bill.

Government of Insurrectionary States—Mr. Niblack.

It is also provided in this third section, in further defining the duties of the officer in command of a district, that—

When in his judgment it may be necessary for the trial of offenders, he shall have power to organize military commissions or tribunals for that purpose.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I did hope, in view of the late decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of ex parte Milligan and others, and in view of the plain reading of the Constitution, this matter of military commissions had been set at rest. In that case, as we all know, it was decided that military tribunals cannot try persons not in the Army or Navy or the militia in actual service for civil offenses, and that it is not competent for Congress to confer this power on such tribunals. Even the dissenting judges who delivered opinions in that case do not claim for Congress the power to confer on military tribunals such unlimited and undefined jurisdiction as the section in question contemplates.

I know it is claimed that this decision relates only to the people of what is known as the loyal States; but, sir, if it is worth anything it applies in times of peace at least to all the States and to the people of all the States.

The Constitution of the United States applies to men in the lately rebellious States as well as in the loyal States.

Mr. DUMONT. Will my colleague yield for a question?

Mr. NIBLACK. Certainly.

Mr. DUMONT. The Supreme Court of the United States, in the decision referred to, say: "No hostile foot has ever pressed the soil of Indiana." I wish to inquire if my colleague, in commenting upon that decision and agreeing with the majority, agrees with them in the assertion of that as a fact? Is it true in point of fact that no hostile foot ever pressed the soil of Indiana? Is not my colleague aware that a bill has been introduced—certainly one, if not more—during the present session of Congress, providing for the adjustment of damages occasioned by the raid of Morgan and other hostile troops from the rebel States into the State of Indiana, and even into the gentleman's own district?

Mr. NIBLACK. Mr. Speaker, I have not time now, nor do not desire to go into an examination of all the arguments used by the court in the case. I concede that there were some raids into the State of Indiana in which some damage was done, but I do not attach any importance to that fact as affecting the logic of the decision.

Mr. DUMONT. I understand my colleague to concede as matter of fact that that assertion is not true.

Mr. NIBLACK. Whether true or not the fact is an immaterial one in the consideration of the legal points involved. I again admit there were some raids into that State, but no insurrection. It never was the theater of war in the sense in which that term was used in the decision to which the gentleman refers and to which I am referring.

But, sir, as I was remarking, the civil rights bill declared that every person either born or naturalized within the United States, without regard to race or color, shall be deemed a citizen of the United States. That is general; it applies to the lately rebellious States as much as to the loyal States. The Freedmen's Bureau bill recognized people in all sections of the country, and especially in the southern States, and of all races and colors, as being citizens of the United States, entitled to the protection of the laws of the United States. Now, sir, I care not how great the crimes of any citizen may have been, or what may have been his short-comings, what may have been his degree of disloyalty or of his rebellion against the Government of the United States, he is still a citizen if he falls within the provisions of our laws in that respect, and is entitled to all the protection of any other citizen in the administration of the laws. If he shall be convicted of his crimes it must be under some law constitutionally enacted. Conviction even of the highest crime does not necessarily abrogate his civil rights or destroy his citizenship unless that conviction shall be followed by capital punishment. It is no more lawful to feloniously assault or kill a person under conviction for a high crime than the most worthy citizen.

Therefore, every man entitled to the protection of the Constitution and laws of the United States can claim the benefit of this decision, and can insist on being tried by a jury of his countrymen. The Constitution on that subject says that—

"The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury."

Not in one section, not of one class of people, not of one class of crimes, but the trial of all crimes, except the case of impeachment, shall be by jury. This bill, therefore, runs counter to that provision of the Constitution.

The Constitution also provides, as is quoted in the decision to which I have referred, much of the argument in that decision being founded upon this provision, that—

"No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia when in actual service in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law."

That provision is plain and unequivocal; there is no necessity for any doubt about the construction of it, and it is against the authority claimed in this third section, the assumed right to try civilians, persons not connected with the Army or Navy or the militia in actual service in time of war, by military commission.

But the fourth section is, in my judgment, so far as it goes, more objectionable in some respects than any other portion of the bill, though not so important, perhaps, in its consequences as some others. It provides—

That courts and judicial officers of the United States shall not issue writs of habeas corpus in behalf of persons in military custody, unless some commissioned officer on duty in the district wherein the person is detained shall indorse upon said petition a statement certifying, upon honor, that he has knowledge or information as to the cause and circumstances of the alleged detention, and that he believes the same to be wrongful; and further, that he believes that the indorsed petition is preferred in good faith, and in furtherance of justice, and not to hinder or delay the punishment of crime. All persons put under military arrest by virtue of this act shall be tried without unnecessary delay, and no cruel or unusual punishment shall be inflicted.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if this bill contained no other obnoxious provisions, that would be sufficient to induce me to vote against it. It is proposed that in the present condition of the country the right shall be given to suspend the writ of habeas corpus, when the Constitution guarantees that the writ of habeas corpus shall only be suspended in time of rebellion or invasion. On that subject the Constitution says:

"The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it."

To authorize Congress, therefore, to suspend the writ of habeas corpus there must be an existing rebellion, or else an invasion of the country.

This has already been conceded by some gentlemen who have seen the importance of this question. But they have attempted to apologize for the exercise of this power, or to argue in favor of it, on the ground that the country is still in a state of war. Well, Mr. Speaker, if this country is still in a state of war the people are not aware of it. There are, I concede, some slumbering embers still remaining of that great fire which swept over the States lately in rebellion, but I am only surprised, considering the terrible struggle through which the country has passed, that we have not had more lawlessness and irregularities than we have had following the dissolution of our great armies.

Mr. Speaker, the President was authorized early in the war to declare States in insurrection under certain circumstances. This power, in my judgment, carried with it the right to declare when the insurrection had ceased. The President long since proclaimed that the rebellion had ceased and that the country was again at peace. Our soldiers enlisted for a given time, or during the war. After the cessation of hostilities, in the spring of 1865, all, or at least nearly all, of our soldiers enlisted during the war were, with the approbation of Congress, as I infer from the circumstances, mustered out of the service, because the war had terminated, and because the terms upon which they had enlisted had been complied with. And yet more than a year and a half after these volunteer soldiers were mustered out of service, because the war had closed, we are met by the declaration in this House that the country is still at war, and that, being thus at war, we are justified in taking military jurisdiction of all the country lately in rebellion, and of suspending the privileges of the writ of habeas corpus throughout its limits.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to go into the questions of international law discussed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS,] defining the different degrees of hostility which may exist from time to time between two nations at war with each other. Theorize as we may, the common sense of mankind will pronounce that when one army totally and unconditionally surrenders to the other the war is at an end. Applying that proposition to our condition, war ceased to exist in this country more than a year and a half ago.

A well man needs no remedies; it is only when he is sick that you can require him to submit to medicinal applications. A country at peace does not need and ought not to allow martial law and other summary remedies incident to a state of war. Gentlemen on the other side feel and recognize this. To obviate this difficulty they are now driven to assert that a state of war still exists between this Government and the people of the States to be affected by this bill. If they can succeed in establishing this proposition there will then, and only then, be some pretext for the war measures proposed in this bill.

The fifth and last section of the bill we are considering reads as follows:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That no sentence of any military commission or tribunal hereby authorized, affecting the life or liberty of any person, shall be executed until it is approved by the officer in command of the district, and the laws and regulations for the government of the Army shall not be affected by this act, except in so far as they conflict with its provisions.

This section, Mr. Speaker, does not require more than a passing notice. It is intended as a limitation on the power conferred in the third section of the bill. It does not obviate any of the constitutional objections to that section, nor in any other manner materially improve it. It would be murder to take the life of a civilian under the sentence of a military commission or tribunal, as provided for in this third section. The effect of this last section could only be to make the commanding officer a party to such murder, or where a civilian is thus imprisoned, by his approval to make him liable for a false imprisonment. Sir, it is unreasonable, it is unjust, to place any gallant officer of the American Army in such a dilemma.

Sir, I yield to no man in my admiration for the Army of this country. We have always had and now have an Army which compares very favorably with that of any other country of the civilized world. It is an Army of which the country is and always has been justly proud. And I am willing to avail myself of every fitting opportunity to honor that Army and every worthy member of it. And in the objection which I make to the military jurisdiction which is proposed to be conferred by this bill I intend no reflection upon any officer or soldier connected with that Army. But we all know that the officers and men of our Army are selected, not with reference to their knowledge of municipal laws and the rights of persons and of property, but with reference to their gallantry, their bravery, and their prowess as soldiers in the field. Military officers are expected to have some knowledge of international law; but they are not required, so far as I am advised, to give any special attention to the local or municipal laws of the country or to the manner of proceeding in the civil courts. They are, therefore, not selected with reference to this matter of civil administration, but for other and far different purposes. And I really think that any officer of the Army of the United States, no matter what he might feel that his duty required of him, would do otherwise than very reluctantly assume the duties required of him by this bill should it become a law.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I concede as fully as any gentleman here the pressing necessity that exists for a full and complete restoration of this Government. Our greatest need is to be again united and to have all the States once more in harmony with each other and with the Federal Government. In our present condition the power of this Government is sectionalized and localized. No measure can pass this Congress in opposition to certain localities and to certain interests. No one, therefore, regrets more than I do that the majority here have not been able to agree upon some proposition or to adopt some line of policy tending toward a speedy reunion of the whole country. To me the process has seemed an easy one ever since the present Congress assembled. And that is, whenever a gentleman presents himself as a Senator or Representative from any one of the lately rebellious States, armed with his proper credentials and possessing all the necessary and proper qualifications for the position he claims, admit him at once, and so on, considering each case separately if thought more desirable, until all the States and districts are again represented. This once accomplished, all other minor matters could soon be, and I have faith soon would be, adjusted.

The majority here, however, assume that some preliminary and affirmative legislation is necessary before Senators and Representatives can be admitted from those States or before the legal existence even of those States can be recognized. If this be so, why has not such legislation been adopted? Ample time has intervened. As I have already remarked, the majority have power to pass laws independently of the President's objections. They seem never to have failed to pass any measure over the President's veto when they earnestly resolved to do so. Why, then, this delay about reconstruction?

First one proposition is brought forward and then another. Each is in turn discussed and then postponed, laid aside, or defeated. Just before the adjournment of the last session of this Congress certain amendments to the Constitution were agreed to and submitted to the several States for adoption. Recently, however, they too have been cast aside as insufficient for the emergency. It is now pretty well understood that these amendments were only a bridge to carry the majority over the late elections. It is now claimed that more radical measures must be resorted to, and that the military power of the Government must be invoked to do the work. As has been well said by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. RAYMOND,] a recurrence to military power in matters of civil administration is usually the last resort of a decaying republic.

Gentlemen on the other side will pardon me, I hope, if I confess that the impression has stolen upon me during our deliberations here that complete and final reconstruction (as it is termed) is just what a large proportion of them do not want at this time. With the lately seceded States unrepresented and uncounted in the Electoral College the majority stand a good chance for a new lease of power in 1868. With these States represented and their votes counted it is not so certain with them. In this I do not intend to impute corrupt or base motives to any one. Gentlemen undoubtedly believe that the policy of procrastination is the better policy, else they would not adopt it. All seem to be anxious that something looking to restoration ought to be done, yet nothing efficient for any practical purpose is done. Now, is there not some purpose in this seeming disagreement? Some gentlemen of the majority have reluctantly admitted of late that Congress has no affirmative policy on the subject. They denounce the President for having a policy, but adopt none themselves. I have therefore come to the deliberate conclusion that the long talked of policy of Congress in regard to this subject simply means no policy and indefinite procrastination. By this means this question of reconstruction will again be thrown as a football into the canvass of 1868. I have also ceased to expect that any practical measure of reconstruction will be adopted or at most be allowed to go into full effect until after the next presidential election. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] has had the candor to announce, on more than one occasion I believe, that the continued ascendancy of his party is a matter to be provided for at almost every hazard, and that to that end the majority are justified in using all the powers in the possession of Congress.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there are many methods of carrying an election, there are many means that may be used to perpetuate party ascendancy; but the last five or six years have demonstrated that one of the surest means of carrying an election is not to allow your opponents to vote. This the majority doubtless well understand. Hence perhaps we ought not to expect them to place ballots within the reach of those whose votes they may not be able to control.

Then, again, high tariffs and other monopoly interests are holding high carnival in the present divided and disorganized condition of the country. With the States all represented in Congress they might not fare so well. Better let well enough alone, say some who believe in those things, and they are in no haste about reconstruction. Thus it is, sir, that the highest and dearest interests of this country are made subordinate to party exigencies and to special and particular interests. No wonder, then, that trade languishes and commerce declines.

I hope, sir, I am mistaken in some of the predictions I have made to-day. If I shall find that I am, none will be more rejoiced than I will be. Hoping all things, trusting all things, I shall await with intense interest the result of this measure and of everything else affecting the unity and prosperity of this great country.

Government of Insurrectionary States.

SPEECH OF HON. T. E. NOELL,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 12, 1867.

The House having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1143) to provide for the more efficient government of the insurrectionary States—

Mr. NOELL said:

Mr. SPEAKER: It is said that liberty dwells in the mountains. Nations which are poor have more patriotism than those which are wealthy. The accumulation of wealth begets corruption. The mass of the people were always strong enough to vindicate their rights, but the wealth of tyrants has always been too strong for a corrupted people. It is said that republics are short-lived; "whom the gods love die young." History bears sad testimony to the incapacity of people to preserve free Governments when they have grown wealthy. Cæsar never could have risen to power except upon the bended necks of a people whom he could buy with largess. Noble patricians feasted on nightingales' tongues and oppressed the poor of the once proud Roman republic. When the two great tribunes, Tiberius and Caius Gracchus, called upon the people to strike for their rights, they were murdered by popular mobs incited by patrician largess.

The Constitution of the United States was a patriotic reaction against the tyranny of George III. Our forefathers lived in a wilderness and had among them no upper-ten to corrupt the lower million. But now no man can sustain himself as a popular leader unless he seeks to promote some private interest at the expense of the general welfare. The Constitution which cost such sacrifice is to be destroyed. We are to forget the lesson taught us by the sufferings of our forefathers. We are to abandon a free Government and retrace our steps through the blood of the late rebellion to a commercial despotism. The whole theory of the Government is to be changed. Governments do not derive their powers from the consent of the governed. Its powers are delegated by the all-powerful military arm of a central despotism. The military is no longer to be subordinate to the civil, but armed provost marshals, with shining shoulder-straps, with pistols and sabers girded on their waists, are to invade the sacred precincts of justice, and before their unlimited power the vanquished citizens of ten States of this Union are to stand with hats off to await whatever the caprice of a martinet may inflict upon them.

Hitherto the meanest felon in the land or the most helpless citizen was guaranteed the benefits of the Constitution of the United States. The infant child's property could not be taken in violation of the Constitution. The man who had murdered his mother, his wife, or his child could still appeal to the Constitution of the United States, and wo to those who denied him its benefits! But the Constitution is now swept away by the unwritten constitution of mob law. Minorities have no rights. Congress wishes to make Grant President, and with his approbation he is first constituted military dictator. Henceforth in our political conflicts the specters of Marius and Sylla will rise in our midst. Væ victis is our motto.

It was a sublime sight to see a million brave men rally to the call of the President of the Republic, to see a million strong arms raised in solemn oath to do battle for the Constitution, to see a million republican soldiers fighting and falling for the liberties of our common country; for the liberties even of the enemies ranged breast to breast and muzzle to muzzle against them. Our soldiers did their duty nobly, and their days of battle are over. Now we have a new war—the war of the politicians. Waterloo had its Thenardier. There are followers to every army, who prowl about and rob the bodies of the dead. But their offense is small compared to the crime of those who rob a nation's fallen patriots of their honor and fame.

We were suddenly informed that these sister States were dead. The nation looked at the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] to know what big joke he was getting off, for he perpetrates huge grim jokes frequently. It was a joke on Great Britain when Cromwell was made Protector; it was a joke on France when the uncle and the nephew were succinctly constituted consul and president of that republic; but this was the grimmest joke that was ever perpetrated on the world." It made even the iron men laugh; it was enough to make a horse laugh! No doubt the lean, starved, spavined, army horses which had worn themselves to bony skeletons dragging around artillery and baggage wagons in the war for the Union rubbed their noses against each other's visible ribs and said in their horse dialect, "That's a big joke on us!" Dead!

Ay, there's the rub;
"For in that sleep of death what dreams may come" of golden visions and of mighty fortunes! Dead was the word. The gentleman from Pennsylvania said "dead." The distinguished gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COLFAX,] who presides so worthily over this House, said dead, and all Hoosierdom echoed the word. Members from Illinois said dead, and the Suckers of that State wiggled their tails with joy at the discovery. The peal of dead States went out from the Alleghanies and reverberated from the Rocky mountains. The people rubbed their eyes in surprise. My distinguished colleague from St. Louis asked, "When did they die?" "Humph!" you replied, "they have been dead all the time." Imagine the surprise of the venerable Rip Van Winkle when he came down from the Catskill and was informed that his old chums Frank Stein and Nick Vetter had been dead and buried and rotten for fifteen years, and you will have some idea of our astonishment when we were gravely informed that these States had been dead four years. This was the end of that sublime farce in which two million men had been the actors and the world the audience. It was but to consummate a scheme of northern Machiavellism that we went to war. The old flag which floated in the skies above the smoke of every battle-field, with every star bright upon its folds; the old flag which floated upon every sea and gladdened the heart of the American citizen everywhere; the old flag under which brave men fought and died; which was wrapped around their dead bodies by their comrades in arms as a sacred winding-sheet, was all a flaunting lie! Ah, when the gentleman from Pennsylvania perpetrated that joke it was enough to convulse the Goddess of Liberty with dying laughter and shake her from her pedestal above this Capitol.

An American poet, sitting amid the ruins of the palace of the Cæsars, and looking back through the dim vista of past ages, had a vision. The ruined palace sprung up and was re-peopled, and he found himself in an enchanted ball-room, surrounded by people engaged in joyous revelry—

"Full of youth and grace and beauty, flaunting plumes and purple palls, Robes of gold and silver tissue, jeweled stars and coronals;
Perfumed airs and flaming candles, peals of laughter,
mirth, and song,
Merry music, dizzy dancers, floating dreamily along;
Some in gay saloons were feasting, some at gaming tables strove,
While along the terraced gardens others walked and whispered love."

But, with the fitful caprice of all dreams, the dancers were all suddenly transformed—

"Hideous specters, grim and ghastly, filled the corridors and hall!
Guests and servants and musicians, hideous specters were they all.
Yet the horrid transformation seemed no hind'rance to the ball!

Still the band made merry music, grinned and wagged their skulls about.
Bearing salvers and refreshments ghosts went gliding in and out.
Whirling on in wildering waltzes went the dancers close embraced,
Each his bony arm entwining round his partner's fleshless waist.
Bony feet in circles blending, fleshless fingers interlaced;
Still they feasted, still they flirted, laughed, and
jested as before;
Plumes and coronals and chaplets, stars and crosses still they wore."

If these States be dead, why, then let us cut loose from them. If they are united to us as closely as the Siamese twins are to each other, there is the more necessity for dissolving this monstrous connection of the living and the dead. Professor Galvani, who invented the electro-magnetic battery, thought he had discovered the elixir of life. When his grandfather died he is said to have expressed joy, for now he could bring him to life and restore him to a more healthy state than before his death. He applied the poles of the battery to his grandfather's legs and the old gentleman's corpse sprang upon its feet. He applied it to his face and the corpse grinned. He applied it to his arm, and the galvanized corpse knocked the professor down and fell down itself. The professor buried his grandfather's corpse, and tried no more experiments on dead men.

It is a lamentable fact in human transactions that neither Governments nor parties are impelled to do any act for the sake of justice or humanity. If an idea is advanced which is not coupled with an interest or penalty, it is regarded as a theoretical dream and laughed at. Heaven tempts the selfish saint to virtue, and hell drives the wicked from vice. Take away Heaven and hell and you would find a Socrates now and then—probably with the liver complaint.

In England, when government was secured permanently, the land interest controlled it. The landholders were the aristocratic few and could combine to build up that interest at the expense of the other interests of society. They passed laws giving bounty for the exportation of corn and prohibiting its importation. This increased the price of corn and gave large profits to the landholder. When the manufacturers grew strong enough to vindicate their interests in Parliament the corn laws were swept from the statute-book.

From the foundation of the General Government of the United States there were two general interests contending for supremacy in the national councils: the manufacturing and the agricultural. The manufacturers lived in a cold climate, which made them vigorous, active, and persistent. The blue-eyed northman has always borne down the swarthy southron. If the people of South Carolina were Connecticut clock peddlers that State would have been in the Union on her own terms long ago. The soil of the manufacturing districts is sterile, and it is "root hog or die" with the inhabitants. [Laughter.] This produces a thrifty people. It is said that a Yankee baby once lay in his cradle and rolled his eyes around till he invented a new back-action rocker, for which he took out a patent as soon as he was old enough to talk. [Laughter.] The influence of circumstances in producing ideas of thrift is forcibly illustrated in Kansas. It is said that boys ten years of age sit round on the street corners of Leavenworth City late in the night smoking cigars and making plans for jayhawking in Missouri. [Laughter.]

The manufacturers had a definite increase to gain by tariffs. If the tariff on iron is raised one cent a pound it is equal to raising the price of all iron on hand two cents per pound. The tariffs only affect the farmer indirectly and in a manner not noticeable, like rat holes in a barn floor. He finds his plows cost more and his wagons and all the implements of husbandry, but he never traces this back to its cause, but pays out his whole profits in little drips without asking a question. If the amount he pays thus were footed up at the end of the year, and he were asked to plank it down in one pile, no farmer would suffer the imposition.

The manufacturers were the few capitalists, and could combine; the farmers are the many, scattered abroad over the whole country. A combination and active exertion of influence is the great source of strength to any measure. What is everybody's business is nobody's business. The farmers do not form combinations to vindicate their own interests; they do not desire to take any advantage over any other class of persons, consequently they have no organization and plan to set their claims before the country. The fewest number take the pains even to think for themselves. A farmer reads an agricultural paper, and perhaps a political partisan paper which some politician has advised him to subscribe for. The agricultural paper commands his earnest thought, for it relates to his business, and he must test every statement in it before he believes it; but the partisan paper does his political thinking, and he does not give himself the trouble to weigh its statements in the light of probability or reason.

As I was traveling through my district I noticed a curious circumstance. Wherever I found a house standing which had been built before the war, (in many localities all were burned by troops on one side or the other,) I saw remnants of old newspapers pasted on the walls. I could almost infallibly tell from the character of these paper remnants what had been the sympathy and action of the family during the war. The papers had done their thinking and instilled into their hearts loyalty or disloyalty. What a sad thing to reflect upon, that good men should be shot, their mothers or children driven from home, and their houses burned and property destroyed, all on account of the accident of having subscribed for a newspaper. This ought to be a warning to all persons never to take a paper. [Laughter.] The prospect of a definite gain, or the fear of a definite loss, will stir up any class to unusual labors.

Take the tariff on iron; the cost of plows, shovels, hoes, wagons, wheelbarrows, axes, cutlery, and every thing most useful to farmers is doubled. It is the same case with thrashing-machines and the engines and gearing of mills. The price of railroad iron is raised so much that the building of a railroad is a most herculean task. Several railroads have been projected in southeast Missouri, and every natural inducement exists for their completion; but they can never be built at the present cost of railroad iron. The cost of steam-boat building makes the freight of farmers' produce enormous. The cost of ship-building, owing to high tariffs, has become so enormous that American vessels are driven from the ocean and foreign vessels do our carrying trade. The vessels which carry American produce to foreign markets are built upon the Clyde and the Tyne. Our tariffs compel us to patronize the ship-builders who launched the Alabama. Instead of being a first-rate Power, we are not even a third-rate Power upon the high seas. Out upon the trackless waste of the world's waters the ocean wayfarer seldom meets the stars and stripes. A great deal of sympathy is expended here upon that hybrid race of mixed breed Spaniards, Indians, and negroes, known by the generic name of greasers, headed by a mongrel president; a nation of revolutionists whose daily murders are enough to appall mankind; but we have no blush of shame tingling our cheeks at the humiliation of the United States in foreign commerce. The godfish aristocracy had bounties for fishing in order to build up a navy; even then they loved bounties.

But I digress. I was speaking of the power of combination and legislative influence, of the capitalists and manufacturers. From the causes I have mentioned there was every prospect that centralization would be the theory of our Government in the beginning. The Hamiltonian idea was undoubtedly stronger than the Jeffersonian. The power of combination; the definite gains of special interests and indefinite loss of the general interests; the active influence of the capital of manufacturers in collecting statistics and lobbying bills through by bargains with other special interests, all seemed to give the manufacturers an easy victory.

But Whitney invented a cotton-gin; slavery became profitable, the planters of the South grew into an agricultural aristocracy. Free labor was crushed out because it could not stand competition with a class of laborers who worked for their victuals and clothes. Small plantations were overshadowed because the planters of large plantations could undersell the small. The man who must make enough profit from the labor of five hands to support his family cannot sell as cheaply as one who makes the support of his family from the profits of a hundred laborers' wages. The large plantations gradually extinguish the small. The planter bought more negroes to work more land to buy more negroes. As his profits increased his lands spread out, his fortune was like a pyramid, continually rising in height and continually broadening at the base. Planting was the most profitable channel capital could find, and the planter had no money to invest in stocks or manufactures; all the wealth of the community was absorbed in this investment. The rich became richer and the poor became poorer. The planter was independent of the handicraft of his neighbors; he needed nothing of domestic manufacture but a few coarse fabrics for his slaves. His household consumed silks, wines, and other foreign luxuries. Between the rich and the poor there was a complete social disintegration; even negroes boasted of the number of slaves owned by their masters, and a poor man's slave could not pass muster for respectability. Thus was aristocracy built up in the South.

Slavery did the same thing in the Roman republic. Prior to the fall of Carthage slaves were used only as household menials; the lands of the republic were parceled out; each Roman cultivated his little farm with his own hands. After the fall of Carthage the Roman Senate, moved by the invectives of Cato and influenced by the hatred of the people toward the ancient enemy, who had but lately swept like a simoon of wrath over Italy, decreed that the inhabitants of Carthage and her allied cities in Greece should be sold into slavery. The devastations of Hannibal had made corn scarce. The Carthaginian slaves were sold into Sicily and used by the planters in the cultivation of corn. This was the first time that slaves had been used as agricultural laborers in the Roman republic. Mark the consequence. The scarcity and high price of corn made slavery profitable; soon every farmer purchased all the slaves he could to assist him in cultivating land. All the lands of the people and the immense public domain were engrossed by wealthy planters. Every conqueror brought home a train of slaves to grace his triumphal car. Cæsar brought half a million from Gaul. Slave traders penetrated to lands where the Roman eagles never perched. The Eternal City became a slave market. There might be seen in the same mart the voluptuous Syrian and the shaggy Siberian, the black-skinned Ethiopian and the cultivated Carthaginian, the savage Bushman and the refined Greek, all for sale. The successful planters became very wealthy, and the poor became doubly poor. Some of the Romans owned as many as twenty thousand slaves each. A bloated aristocracy sat like an incubus upon the Roman people. The latter were oppressed with all the burdens of the Government, and frequently seized by the planters and held as slaves. There was no redress, for there was no habeas corpus in those days. Abject poverty induced many of the poorer class to sell themselves into slavery. When a noble patrician feasts on nightingales' tongues his epicureanism presupposes a thousand plebeians starving for bread.

So slavery has always produced aristocracy. In the South the capital increased, and the aristocrats increased in fortune and diminished in number. The great planters were not too many to combine for their own protection. Their property in slaves were in danger of aggression from the central Government, so they upheld the doctrine of States rights. Their interests were agricultural; and all they asked of the central Government was to be let alone. Thus slavery appealed to the shibboleth of States rights, and confronted the aggressive centralization of the manufacturers.

The Republican party, under one name or another, has always secretly upheld the doctrine of prohibitory tariff and strong central Government, coupled with ideas of internal improvement; but in 1856, in Frémont's platform, the doctrine was boldly proclaimed. That same year Buchanan's Cincinnati platform declared that it was a usurpation of power in the Federal Government to build up special interests, at the expense of the general interests. Buchanan beat Frémont, distanced him, for the agricultural sections were alive to their own interests.

In 1860 Mr. Lincoln's platform contained the doctrine of prohibitory tariff, and the platforms of Douglas and Breckinridge both condemned the doctrine that manufactures should be fostered at the expense of agriculture; but in 1860 the fire-eaters of the South played smash, nominated Breckinridge, and elected Mr. Lincoln. As long as the Democratic party held together nothing could defeat it. The conflict was waged like all conflicts, political and military, by the few against the few, the slave-holder against the manufacturer, the aristocrats South against the aristocrats North, Greek against Greek. The planters would always have beaten the manufacturers, because land cultivation embraces more voters than manufacturing. But now the aristocracy of the South has been humbled, the cornerstone of the confederacy has been dashed to pieces like a potter's vessel.

The farmers scattered abroad over the land can concert no plans to protect themselves from the aggression of the northern aristocracy of capitalists and manufacturers. Henceforth there is no power that can resist these northern vampires which batten upon the corruptions of the central Government. The Democracy has—

"Dropt from her nerveless grasp the shattered spear, Closed her bright eye, and curbed her high career."

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] can well afford to exult at the helpless condition of the farming interests and avow the purpose of the Radical party to lay such heavy burdens of taxation and commercial restrictions upon them that the farmer boys of the West will be driven from their father's homesteads to seek positions as laborers in the factories of manufacturing nabobs in the East. I thank him for the bold avowal of the intention to legislate in Congress so as to diminish the number of farmers and increase the number of manufacturers. If he did not let the cat out of the bag he let her tail through the loop-hole when he acknowledged that purpose. Farmers cannot gather statistics, employ lobbyists, pay newspapers, keep up party discipline, or even take measures to inform themselves of the wrongs perpetrated against them. They are superior in strength of numbers, but powerless because of their want of unity.

"This gloom dispel, the light of heaven restore, Let me but see and Ajax asks no more."

When the southern representatives withdrew from Congress the manufacturers had a high old time. Tariffs were increased several hundred per cent. on manufactures of iron.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] eloquently described the general prosperity and quickened industry in the North during the war. The capitalists of the North grew rich. He hired a foreign substitute to fight for the flag of his country, or perhaps bought a contraband substitute. I am told that negroes were shipped from Nashville, Tennessee, and sold in Cincinnati, Ohio, at $1,000 apiece. Northern negro traders retired after the war with princely fortunes and with glorious reputations for loyalty. There was no war in the North, (except against copperheads and peace-sneaks.) All went merry as a marriage bell; things went on swimmingly.

But the rebellion collapsed! Lee and Johnston surrendered; tidings of peace flew over the land on the swift wings of the lightning; a cry of joy was heard from a patriotic people; but the tidings came upon these thriving speculators like a fire-bell in the night. The South laid down her arms on the terms of Lincoln's policy? the southern States to resume their relations with the Government? southern congressmen to vote with the representatives of western farmers? the old Union to be restored, and the farmers no longer to pay tribute to the capitalists? Too bad, too bad! Some means must be devised to exclude these States from the Union. Andrew Johnson is President; urge him to abandon Mr. Lincoln's policy and hold these States as military provinces. But Johnson will not accept the dictatorship. He at least was thoroughly in earnest in this struggle to save the Union. He spurns the kingly power which is offered him, and avows himself the tribune of the people. If he could only be bent to yield to the demands of the loyal bankers and loyal manufacturers and loyal ironmongers, and break up this Union and establish their schemes forever; if he would only wink at Congress the thing could be done. But he will not bend. His square old back is not made of bending stuff. He will not even wink at Congress. He stood like a rock upon the firm base of his own strong convictions when the strong billows of secession lashed around him. He will not swerve from that conviction now, not even so much as bat his eye. The slimy things upon the sea of corruption crawled around him and licked his hands and licked his feet, and would have licked him elsewhere; but when they found his stern, inflexible purpose to do right they crawled away and hissed at him, and they determined to sting him to the death.

During the war a northern aristocracy had grown strong. It had money, and consequently social influence. Did you ever reflect that the non-slave-owners of the South, whose interests were diametrically opposed to slavery, were stronger supporters of that institution and more hostile to free-soilism than the slave-owners? Where abolitionists have been mobbed in the South the mobs were incited by and composed mainly of non-slaveholders. This is a curious and instructive fact. The passions and sentiments of the upper class are reflected in the lower class, and increase in intensity by the reflection. The clansmen of Scotland hated each other more inveterately than their plaided chiefs. The influence of the moneyed aristocracy was plainly seen in the North in the last election.

What was the effect of the tariff laws? It excluded foreign goods. This compelled farmers to purchase of manufacturing monopolies at higher prices, thus paying them tribute. It excluded grain-growers from the European market, for we cannot sell where we cannot buy. It diminished the revenues at the custom-house, for if goods are not imported they pay no custom duties. By diminishing this revenue the deficiency had to be made from taxes on the land interests, where it all falls at last. But farmers voted for these radical tariffs.

The national banks are an immense moneyed aristocracy. The banker purchases $100,000 worth of United States bonds and puts them in his vaults; he draws the interest on them twice a year; he pays no taxes on his investment; he issues and uses and gets interest on $90,000 worth of currency; the United States pays for printing and issuing the currency; thus he draws a double interest on his investment, pays no taxes, has his banking expenses paid, and sends out upon the country a rotten currency which is not legal money to pay debts.

The national bonds exercise a large influence in society. They are held mostly by capitalists of the eastern States and of Europe. In Missouri the people were plundered so during the war that they had no money to invest in these profitable, untaxable stocks. That is why we must use test oaths to keep loyal. If property taken by the Army had been paid for in Missouri as punctually as it was in Ohio, Indiana, and Pennsylvania, we would have more money and more bonds among us, and would consequently be more loyal. If you had given to our ten thousand State volunteers the same bounty that you gave to volunteers from other States we would have had more money in every community and would have been more wealthy. You raise your taxes from Missouri, and you draw all the money, which if circulated in the community would increase the labor of wages. You take it out of the State by taxes and pour it into the hands of eastern bond-holders; and you refuse to give our soldiers their bounty. If they had been negroes they would have received bounty. Here an idea strikes me concerning the future loyalty of the South. Slavery having aggregated the lands of the South into large plantations, that institution being destroyed, these lands will have to be sold out into small farms suited to free labor. When the planter sells he must invest his money; there is but little prospect of manufactures in the South for fifty years. There is no profitable investment in the South. His own interest will lead the planter to invest in United States stocks, that being the best investment in the United States, and in its character resembles a local investment, because the interest may be drawn in any locality. I believe a man does not have to take the oath before he can buy a bond. Once bond-holder, these planters will be more "loyal" than the now bond-holding negroes. I will bet two to one that the first repudiationist elected to Congress from the South will be elected by the negroes. Who will take the bet?

These national bonds drain the wealth of the country from the poverty-stricken localities and pour it into the laps of wealthy communities. It is an aristocracy holding millions of property exempt from taxation. What produced the French revolution? It was the wealthy, who had purchased patents of nobility, which exempted their property from taxation, thus increasing the burdens of the poor.

When the Roman armies went to war they passed out through the gates of Janus. The temple of Janus was surmounted by the statue of that god who had two faces looking in opposite directions. Janus was one of those pagan gods who, having eyes, saw not, and having ears heard not; but he was a marvelously proper emblem of the two-faced idea which sent an army forth to war. He was a fit emblem of the divinity which shapes our ends in war. There is always the idea of the fighting class and the idea of the class which reaps the benefits of the conflict. The conflict which we have just gone through was on both sides a rich man's war and a poor man's fight. The soldier, under a generous impulse, throws himself into the ranks and becomes food for powder; but the power behind the throne is the cold plotting speculator. At the South we see two passions in harmony, the selfish interest and pride of the aristocrat and the devotion of the people to their native States. In the loyal Army we see the two passions combined, namely, the patriotism of the people and the commercial ideas of the North.

Old Ezekiel, walking down by the river Chebar and gazing with clear vision into the blue ether, saw a large wheel revolving and rising up and going down, and looking closely at it saw a smaller wheel inside, and the small wheel controlled the large one. It would not require much of political clairvoyance to see in the war for the Union a wheel within a wheel; and the lesser wheel, which controls the greater, has its center at the "hub of the universe." When a call was made for troops patriotism was aroused; but a class who remained at home gave or withheld their "moral support," according to the policy that was pursued. I saw five thousand people at Indianapolis in 1862 resolve with explosive enthusiasm that they would contribute no more men nor money to the war unless Lincoln emancipated the negroes. You do not suppose that this idea was original with the Hoosiers.

When Mr. Lincoln was coming to the capital in February, 1861, to be inaugurated, he made speeches to the people in several places. At Independence Hall, in Philadelphia, he addressed the people. He unfurled the old flag and called upon the people to stand by him in the great crisis which was coming and be true to their patriotic instincts. Here in this Hall the Declaration of Independence had been signed and the people felt impressed with awe, and felt as if the spirits of our forefathers, who had staked their lives and fortunes for our freedom in 1776, were hovering over them. It was a time when the voice of faction was hushed among all good people by the dread of impending calamity.

Mr. Lincoln stirred the patriotic impulses from the lowest depths of the hearts of his audience. But he was interrupted in his eloquent appeal by the sharp voice of a Pennsylvania ironmonger, who inquired, "What about protection on iron?" There, sir, before the war commenced, was an illustration of the two principles at work. If these principles are followed up we will have a clue to many things otherwise inexplicable. Patriotism was the main wheel which rolled over insurgents and crushed the rebellion; but commercial ideas and financial schemes were the wheel within the wheel. It was patriotism which convoked the reapers in the harvest of death; but property interests on both sides dictated the policy. Of all the dying exclamations of earnest men upon the battle-field who ever heard a commercial idea alluded to? No southern soldier ever said, May the Lord perpetuate slavery and aristocracy. His exclamation as he yielded up the ghost was, "May God protect my State from the Yankee vandals." It was love for his State and dread of northern oppression which made him join the rebel ranks. I have heard of no example yet of a Union soldier turning to his companions to utter with his last breath the great wish of his heart, saying, "May the Lord raise the tariffs and make the North rich," or "May my country long enjoy national banks!" No; when stricken with the fatal wound he felt that death was tugging at his heart, he exclaimed with the pride of one who had given his life in a glorious cause, "God save the Union." I venture to say that had you boldly avowed your purpose to subjugate the South, destroy the Union, and violate the Constitution in order to establish the supremacy of the commercial and financial ideas of the North you would have had few of the patriotic soldiers who came forward at their country's call. You might have enlisted an army of bounty-jumpers for the pay, or of thieves who expected to thrive on the plunder of the South; but these would not have been likely to have put down the rebellion.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Banks] has an amendment which he gave notice he intended to tack on to this bill. It contains the substance of the Louisiana bill which we passed to-day. It proposes to take these States, one at a time, and send into them congressional and military satraps to establish governments in the South on the "loyal basis." In speaking of his measure of reconstruction, the gentleman said our duty consisted in three words, "liberty, emigration, census." The liberty he proposes is the military despotism inaugurated in this bill; the liberty of martial law; the liberty of a people who have no rights, whose courts are struck down and whose citizens are conquered enemies; the liberty which a people may enjoy when turned over to military satraps released from all responsibility except to carry out the purpose for which Congress sends them, namely, to humiliate and degrade the people.

This bill places the people under martial law for an unlimited time. The gentleman said it would not do to allow all of the States to come back into the Union at once. What laws are to govern in the mean time? The United States has no code, and the codes of the States are annulled. Are these military satraps to govern by the Plymouth code or the Blue Laws of Connecticut? We may expect to see in some loyal police gazette in the South (for all disloyal ones will be suppressed) "John Smith sentenced to twenty lashes for kissing his wife on Sunday," or "Sarah Brown hung as a witch," or "Peter Jones burned as a Quaker," or "Jane Tompkins sentenced to a ducking-stool for scolding;" and at the end of the sentence the godly, Puritan fiat, "Thus saith the Lord!" The object in setting up governments South is not to give the people a voice, but more effectually to stifle their voice. It is the kind of liberty the French people enjoyed when every house was placarded with "Liberty, fraternity, equality—or death!" The kind of liberty extended to the people of Lyons when Collet d'Herbois went down to that city and assembled ten thousand men, women, and children, and shot them with artillery and musketry, and turned loose republican soldiery on them, and hackled them to pieces with sabers, and then razed the city, and placed over the ruins the inscription, "Lyons rebelled, and Lyons is no more." The kind of liberty extended to French Girondists, when they put them in a ship and scuttled it and they sunk to the bottom. Strange things are done in the name of liberty, and the most implacable tyrants are the hydra-headed despots—democracies.

Emigration is the next object after liberty. The gentleman proposes to give bounties to loyal men to go there to take control of the government. The people of Massachusetts have great faith in bounties. It was their principal way of fighting in the late war. The black citizens of these States, invested by all authority, are to run the whole machinery of government. It matters not how large or how small this class may be, they are to exercise the full sovereignty of the States. The idea which gentlemen on the other side of the House have of republican institutions is that only they are entitled to enjoy the privilege of citizens who will indorse the commercial and financial schemes of the Radical party. No man is entitled to exercise the prerogatives of a free citizen unless he is in favor of their national banks and upholds their divine tariffs.

Then, Mr. Speaker, he proposes to remodel the census there. I do not know whether he proposes to kill off everybody that does not belong to his party, or whether he proposes by more civil means to drive away those who do not agree with him. He proposes to remodel the census of that country as the British East India Company did in India; to remodel the census as Great Britain is doing with Ireland; to remodel the census of the South by driving out her white population and bringing in by bounties a new population to occupy that country. He proposes to remodel the census by confiscating the land of the South and turning it over into the hands of the black sans-culottes. He proposes to remodel the census there by turning over all the revenues of the Government, all the property of the people into the hands of irresponsible speculators, who go down there for the purpose of making fortunes. Henry Ward Beecher, in a lecture delivered in this Hall some time ago, said, in speaking of the capabilities of human nature, "Smelt any man and he will run pure gold." Now, our friends of the Radical party are establishing a system by which these speculators are going down South to smelt the negroes; and if they do not run pure gold, they expect that they will run greenbacks copiously.

It has been said by several speakers here that the people who have the control of the governments in the South believe that the confederate cause was right and that we must break down those governments for the purpose of making that cause odious. Now, sir, I am one of those who believe that the great mass of human beings in this world, so far as their moral qualities are concerned, are about alike. I believe there is as much virtue in the people of the South as there is in the people of the North; I believe that there was as much loyalty in the people of the South in 1860 as there was in the people of the North; I believe that they were as truly devoted to the doctrines which had been inculcated into their minds as were the people of the North to the doctrines in which they had been educated.

The people of the South have fought and died for their principles. They left wives and children poor and bountiless; they dared all the dangers of the battle-field; they have endured everything that a brave people could endure. I think, therefore it would be nothing but sheer cruelty, and would subserve no good purpose, to inflict upon them by our legislation, humiliation. Every family has given some victim to the cause. Can we expect the survivors to curse the memory of their dead relatives, and can we not be magnanimous enough to leave them the poor gratification of believing that they died without dishonor?

I noticed at the close of the rebellion in the Atlantic Monthly, a journal which I very frequently read—not because I favor its politics, but because I want to know what is going on—a journal published in the "hub of the universe," a poem which attempted to describe what should be done with the South. It was entitled a "Jaguar Hunt," in which the people of the South were designated as the bloody jaguar; and it was there inculcated that they should be hunted like the jaguar to his den and killed without mercy.

The Jaguar Hunt.

The dark jaguar was abroad in the land;
His strength and his fierceness what foe could withstand?

The breath of his anger was hot on the air,
And the white lamb of peace he had dragged to his lair.

Then up rose the farmer, he summoned his sons;
"Now saddle your horses, now look to your guns!"
And he called to his hound as he sprang from the ground

To the back of his black pawing stud with a bound.
Oh! their hearts, at the word, how they tingled and stirred!

They followed all belted and booted and spurred.
"Buckle tight boys," said he, "for who gallops with me,

Such a hunt as never before shall he see!"

With wide nostrils smoking, and flanks dripping gore,
The black stallion bore his bold rider before;
As onward they thundered through forest and glen,
A hunting the dark jaguar to his den.

In April, sweet April, the chase was begun;
It was April again when the hunting was done:
The snows of four winters and four summers green
Lay red-streaked and trodden and blighted between.
Then the monster stretched all his grim length on the ground;

His life-blood was wasting from many a wound;
Feroocious and gory and snarling he lay
Amid heaps of the whitening bones of his prey.
Then up spoke the slow eldest son, and he said:
"All he needs is just to be fostered and fed,
Give over the strife; brothers, put up the knife;
We will tame him, reclaim him, but taken not his life!"

But the farmer flung back the false words in his face;
"He is none of my race who gives counsel so base!"
"Now let loose the hound!" And the hound was unbound,
And like lightning the heart of the traitor he found.
"So rapine and treason forever shall cease!"
And they washed the stained fleece of the pale lamb of peace;
When lo! a strong angel stands winged and white,
In a wonderful raiment of ravishing light!

Mr. Speaker, I have seen a great many confederate soldiers who enlisted from my district. Most of them were directly interested in the overthrow of slavery, as they were poor men, with whose labor slave labor came into competition. Still, though they were crushed down by this aristocratic system, they ardently enlisted in the confederate cause. I asked them what they had been fighting for, and they said they had been fighting for the old Constitution. This is the idea which influenced thousands upon thousands of those who went into the rebel army. They believed that the abolition party of the North was violating the Constitution of the United States; they believed it had invaded the sacred precincts of the rights of the States; they believed a consolidated despotism could not be established in place of our free Government unless this abolition party was put down; they therefore took up arms against the Government.

Now, sir, we may think that the southern people were silly in having taken up arms against the Government. It has been repeated here day after day that secession arose from their extreme and unconquerable ignorance. When they went into the rebellion we are told they did not know what they were fighting for. If they did not know what they were fighting for we ought to be more inclined to forgive them, especially since we have ascertained that we did not know what we were fighting for. When we consider how many confused ideas, distorted opinions, and blind passions may be found in the labyrinths of every man's brain we will not judge harshly.

Sir, this whole system is wrong. If history teaches any lesson plainly, it is that a nation's happiness, freedom, and perpetuity depend upon the exercise of toleration. This lesson is written in the blood of every nation which has fought for freedom. Gentlemen may talk about the laws of nations and quote Vattel and Grotius. To quote from commentators on the laws of nations is sheer nonsense. Who made the law of nations? There is no such law. These commentators derive their laws from precedents set by nations of the Old World, and principles foreign to the genius of an enlightened Government. In this country no man or class of men can impair the freedom and prerogatives of the meanest citizen. Were we to conquer Mexico to-day we would have no right to set up an oligarchy of mestizoes or a monarch over that country.

We are greatly exercised lest the Emperor of France should set up a monarch in Mexico. We fear to have a monarchy on our borders. But it gives us no uneasiness that in our own country, under the very wings of the American eagle, freedom is to be struck down, the sovereignty of the citizen is to be denied, and a throne of despotism erected in every southern State. The governments of that broad country, richer than the fertile lands of Egypt, are to be farmed out by the moneyed aristocracy in the North to speculators and to emigrant mercenaries, and to all others who may be willing to

"Crook the pregnant hinges of the knee
Where thrift may follow fawning."

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] holds up as a precedent in international law the conduct of Russia toward Circassia. The Czar exterminated and drove out the fair inhabitants of that country, depopulated it, and re-peopled it. The gentleman alluded to this episode in Russian history as a triumph of administrative ability worthy of imitation. We are to grind the people of these States under the heel of a central despotism, and if they become restive and offer any excuse, we must be ready and prompt to

"Let slip the dogs of war."

It is a mistake to suppose that proscription and force can preserve our country. We must trust to the conservative influences of society, and if they fail our country is lost.

SPEECH OF HON. T. E. NOELL,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 11 and 18, 1867,

The House having under consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That Governments were made for the people and not the people for the Government; that every adult citizen of sound mind in any State or Territory has the right to a voice in the formation of the constitution of said State, and in the representation and laws of said State, and that any State which disfranchises any class of its citizens on account of sex is not republican in form and should be overturned by Congress.

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia is hereby instructed to report to this House, without delay, a bill so amending an act entitled "An act to regulate the elective franchise in the District of Columbia," which passed Congress January 8, 1867, as to abolish the disfranchisement of persons from voting on account of sex.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary are instructed to report a bill calling a convention and authorizing every adult citizen of sound mind in the State of Massachusetts to vote for delegates to said convention for the purpose of making a constitution for said State republican in form.

Mr. NOELL. Mr. Speaker, I have been asked frequently if I were sincere in advocating woman suffrage. If my principles are sound, why inquire my motive? You do not believe a Democrat can uphold woman suffrage in good faith. It is the old story, nothing good can come out of Nazareth. People must believe that politicians are sincere, for they look to them for earnest advice. But politics is a farce. The actors in the play smile at each other behind the scenes and congratulate themselves that they have "knocked" the people. I, unlike most public men, belong to no party; and unlike the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] no party belongs to me—but a politician does not. I am sick of names and quibbles. It is Nero fiddling while Rome is burning. We discuss interminably the difference between tweedle-dum and tweedle-dee, and get each other on the hip by calling the yeas and nays. The Congressional Globe of last session had more wind in it than Ulysses' bags. A little seriousness of purpose would act as a great carminative to that journal. One party contends that this is a white man's Government; the other party demonstrates that it is a black man's Government. One party contends that the southern States are in the Union as now organized on the white basis; while the other party says that they are out of the Union (which they are, considering the Radicals have the power to exclude them) and that they shall not return until they come back "Union end foremost," which means negro end foremost. Why need we prolong discussion on that question? The Radicals have the power and will adopt any expedient to perpetuate it. Revolutions never go backward. All discussion could only appeal to the sense of justice or mercy of the dominant party. Talk to a Radical about justice! you had as well sing love-songs to a mantua-maker's dummy. As to moving a Radical's bowels of compassion, he has no such bowel in his body. If he has, it is the vermi formis, not subject to be moved.

"A rose by any other name would smell as sweet,"

The history of civilization is the history of peace. Historians have but little to say of the history of civilization. The task of writing history has devolved upon men, and nothing is important in their eyes but throat-cuttings, blood-lettings, stratagems, and spoils. Garrulous history likes to curdle one's blood with the details of all that is monstrous, cruel, and wicked. Historians are a kind of biped jackals, who riot in human carcasses. What a glorious feast were the mountains of skulls piled up by Tamerlane to mark the progress of his conquests! Piles of human heads cut off and stacked up, numbering thousands. The stories in the Arabian Nights of Bagdad under Haroun al Raschid are not as interesting as the history of Bagdad with ninety thousand human carcasses on the streets. Who civilized the world? Neither Guizot nor Buckle nor Hallam can answer this question. We must glean along the waste stubble-fields, whence history has garnered her stores, for facts to aid us in solving this question. We derived our civilization from Rome; the latter derived her civilization from Greece; and this last country derived her civilization from Egypt. Who civilized Egypt? The women!

That was a long time ago, say you? Yes, it was long ago; but there was the same little difference between men and women then that exists now. It was long before the soil of Massachusetts was trodden by that painted and tattooed race of human beings against whose barbarism our Puritan forefathers turned those civilizing engines of Christianity, gunpowder and Holland gin. It was before Irish potatoes had offended the statistics of learned philanthropists by overstocking the world with surplus human beings. It was before anti-nicotine societies were formed; before nice young men smoked cigars or old women consoled themselves with pipes. It was before the Monroe doctrine had been promulgated in America. It was shortly after the great flood, when the world was hung out in the universe to dry. Egypt was the cradle of civilization, of the arts and sciences; the sciences of astronomy and astrology, the useful arts, and the black arts, all were taught here; for amid the universal barbarism of the world Egypt had civilized herself. Egypt civilized the world, and the women civilized Egypt. The periodical overflows of the Nile caused the people to meet together in the high places. The men and women mingled together, every one bending his or her energy to minister to the general welfare during the overflow. Here the native genius of the women displayed itself in devising conveniences and comforts and in the various ways in which genius must assert itself when the conventionalities of society are broken down. The dull, plodding, thick-headed men of Egypt—the most talented men in the world—found that they knew nothing compared to the knowledge of the women. For their own interest they constituted the women the controlling class. We have no Nile to overflow and break down the conventionalities of society; but we are threatened by a destructive overflow of the Niger, and I think it is time to bring the women into the high places.

The women of Egypt were the traders and merchants. They enriched that country and gave a start to the arts and sciences. They were the heads of families. When the parents grew old the daughters and not the sons were bound by law to support them. In the marriage contract the woman promised to support her husband and the husband in turn promised to obey his wife. The Egyptian women traded in Tyre and Sidon; the Arabian merchants carried on traffic between the Hindoos and the Egyptian women.

That wry-necked, sweet-scented fellow of Macedon (Plutarch says he smelt like cinnamon) might well feel proud of the conquest of this country and celebrate it by building the city of Alexandria; and when the little corporal of Lodi crossed into Egypt to build by conquest the fabric of an oriental dream, well might his soul expand as he said: "Soldiers of France, from yonder pyramids forty centuries look down upon you!" Napoleon did not say anything of the mummies of illustrious females, through whose eyes, now empty, gluey sockets, once beamed the civilization of the world, probably before the descendants of Noah's crew could find a roosting place on Corsica. Napoleon, like all warriors, held that only one function belonged to women—to breed men for the ranks. Some one asked him who was the greatest woman in France; he replied, "She who has borne the most children."

Balmes in his work on Philosophy attacks the old theory of the inertia of matter, and asserts that all things are naturally in a state of motion. The philosophy of the world has always been that war is the normal condition of man. In Sparta deformed children were killed because they could never make warriors. Since the day that Cain killed Abel the history of the world has been written in blood. Individuals and communities are playing always a mutual game of grab, and the longest arm and the strongest arm takes the prize. The women cannot fight, and they have always lost their rights in the game of grab. Among barbarians the women perform all the work, except the pleasant sports of hunting and fishing. Women attend to the property of their husbands, they grind corn, skin the game, cook, tan the skins of animals, and make garments and perform other duties. Spinning and weaving has done more to humanize mankind than anything else. This of course was the invention of woman. The old line runs:

"When Adam delved and Eve span
Who was then a gentleman?"

The women taught mankind to wear fine clothes. Adam was not made with breeches on. As a symbol of power Eve was entitled to them. She was the controlling genius in Eden. The devil knew which one to tempt. Fine dressing was the first impulse to commerce. Babylon, with her fifty miles of wall and her hundred gates of brass, her stately palaces and hanging gardens, was built by a woman. Its fabrics of scarlet and fine linen, rich vestments and embroidery, were the handiwork of women. Carthage was founded by a Phœnician woman, and the traders of that city used to transport the jewels and fabrics of the East to the barbarians of the West. The women of Babylon used to dress and shape jewels. They did not have diamonds, but they used to grind the purple amethyst, the green emerald, the blue sapphire, the red, red ruby, and other stones as precious in their eyes as diamonds.

Andromache fed and curried Hector's horses, and when he died she embroidered his death scene. Helen of Troy embroidered a great work during the siege representing the different battles of the siege. Would that some versatile female would embroider a scene representing the reception of a loyal Congress! It would require a brown rag for the groundwork. Sumptuary laws were passed against women. In the time of Romulus women were forbidden to taste wine, and several husbands killed their wives for violating this custom. The women, to be above suspicion, used to kiss every man who called on them. If the Congressional Temperance Society will inaugurate that custom we will all join it.

When Europe was overrun by barbarians commerce was destroyed and agriculture interrupted. The lands were all seized by the warlike chiefs and the people plundered. The allodial tenures of the Saxons and the feudal tenures of the Normans were alike adaptations of war. Peaceful pursuits were universally discarded, and the great landholders were robbers, who lived by the saddle. The mass of the people were like so many cattle attached to the land, the absolute slaves of the baron. Every noble was intrenched in a castle defended by strong walls and broad ditches. There could be no ingress or egress until the gate was unbarred and the drawbridge let down. Sentinels paced around the castle through all the silent watches of the night. Under the allodial tenures the people had no protection. Each baron was lord and master of his own manor and all its vassals. They could own no property, they lived on his bounty, were his tenants-at-will, and paid him whatever he exacted as rent, tithes, donations, fines, or customs. Every person was forced to deliver himself into this slavery to some baron to be protected from robbery or murder, for there was no law of protection except the will of a powerful chief, and he only protected his vassals. His vassals could not marry without his consent. The custom of borough-English by which property descended to the youngest son sprung from a custom on the part of the lord of the manor to have possession of the brides of his tenants the first day of marriage, from which the oldest son might not resemble his father.

There was a law in France that a lord returning from hunting should not kill more than two serfs to warm his feet in their bowels. Noble lords frequently shot serfs on tops of houses to see them tumble off dead. These noble lords were funny fellows and played grim pranks.

No trade was allowed or carried on except by peddlers, who prowled about the country with such portable articles as they could carry on their backs. Traveling peddlers were not so welcome as mendicant minstrels, who sung bacchanals at drunken routs and sung the praises of warlike valor. Peddlers had to pay heavy licenses for the privilege of trading, and incurred great danger of being robbed or killed. So common was the murder of these wretches that if a noble lord laughed in company he was frequently asked if he had killed a peddler. But notwithstanding the danger and heavy tax upon them peddlers did travel about selling small wares and fabrics. Those who live in places remote from cities will bear me out in the assertion that nothing short of death will ever stop a peddler. They are a class of unsung heroes who are daunted by no obstacle.

There being no commerce, all the produce of the land was consumed in its crude state. The corn and cattle were used to feed retainers who lived upon the bounty of the baron, and were his slaves in peace and his followers in war. This kept a standing army quartered in every manor.

But these standing armies could not remain idle. The chieftain of a thousand retainers plundered his neighbor who was only five hundred strong. To prevent this the weaker nobles combined and set up a common chieftain to whom they paid allegiance, and who protected them from rapacity of the strong. Thus arose feudalism and the establishment of a sovereign liege. International wars rendered it necessary for all the barons of a nation to unite under one sovereign. So nations drifted into monarchy, and allodial tenures changed to feudal tenures, held of the king. From that time forward commenced a struggle on the part of the central power to strengthen itself against the power of the barons. The struggle was long and severe. The men who were vassal slaves were rallied first under the standard of the king and then of the barons, and each had to appeal to the vassal's interest and hold out inducements for him to fight in the way of new liberties granted him. King John, who is always spoken of as a tyrant, did more of his own accord to establish the liberties of the people than any sovereign who ever reigned in England. He built up the free boroughs and strengthened the people against the barons. In the charter which the barons demanded at Runnymede the bulwark of English liberty was established; but the barons only put in these grants of liberty to the citizens to enable them to obtain the assistance of the people to force the king to relinquish claims which were obnoxious to the barons. Thus the men, being able to fight, had their liberties extended to them as bribes to help contending chieftains fight battles for dynasties and successions. We always pay our allies in war and politics, and whoever has the power to help us may command his terms. But the women could not fight battles, and therefore they are as abject slaves as they were in the darkest ages of history.

While this struggle of barbarians was going on how were civilization and peace growing? The wars of the middle ages sprung from the fact that there were large armies of retainers in every castle, whose daily labor was battle and plunder, and whose recreation was feast and wassail. Defenseless women were liable to be ravished by any robber ruffian who captured one. To prevent this they were shut up in strong castles, where they were guarded from the spoiler. Afterward, it was sufficient for any valiant chieftain to declare a woman under his protection, and that he would avenge any insult to her. This gave rise to orders of chivalry and knighthood, and a woman might demand protection from any knight, and he was bound in honor to extend it to her. The pride of the men being flattered by this tribute to their power, the sentiment of chivalry became enthusiastic. The women cultivated their charms assiduously to make themselves objects of devotion. They decorated their persons with costly ornaments and gave fresh encouragement to the hitherto persecuted peddlers.

The women had always been the chief patrons of the peddlers. It makes a man aguish to see a peddler come to his house. He always tries to send him off before his wife gets a glimpse of him. If the biographies of all these strolling peddlers were written, I do not think a single example could be found where one had unpacked his bundle and showed his wares and fabrics in the presence of a woman without finding a purchaser. The courage displayed by those strollers in those barbarous days appealed to woman's nobler feelings and excited her sympathy. Women are never commonplace. Most women, when they read the lives of old Jack Sheppard, Dare-Devil Dick, or John A. Murrell, wish that their husbands were just like these heroes. Every girl of sixteen, poetically inclined, wishes she was a bandit's bride. Desdemona married a negro because of the dangers he had incurred. The Sabine women so admired the pluck of their Roman ravishers that they pleaded for and remained with them. This heroic instinct caused the ladies to take the peddlers under the wings of their protection.

Costly fabrics and jewels from the farthest ends of the world were eagerly sought for, and every lord desired his lady to appear more beautiful than any other woman in the world, and was ready to run his sword through any man who doubted that she was the most beautiful: a kind of demonstration entirely satisfactory in those days and at this time. These ornaments were costly, and could not be had unless paid for at great expense. Household expenditures increased fearfully. The barons could not afford to consume all their crude produce in supporting retainers; so the retainers were dismissed and the armies disbanded, and peace necessarily ensued. Thus the women of the middle ages instilled refinement and love of virtue and true valor into the men, built up society on a solid foundation, scattered the standing armies that filled every castle, gave an impetus to commerce, and established the arts of peace; for women, since the days of Delilah, have been averse to men's belligerent propensities.

Notwithstanding woman has been the lovely instrument through which civilization has been imparted to the world, she has received but little benefit from that civilization. One of the proudest titles of an Eastern prince is that he is the husband of a thousand wives. A distinguished member of Congress, whom, alas! Congress extinguished, told me that he saw at Constantinople the harem of the Sultan driving out. They raised the little flap windows of their carriages and peeped out on the sly, (for all women are like Blue Beard's wives and must see what is going on.) They were beautiful women which his Serene Highness the Sublime Porte had purchased to gratify his sublime appetites. A big black eunuch, the tallest that could be found in all Ethiopia, passed along by the windows and put his hand in and these women kissed it.

From what is our system of housing and hampering women derived but the barbarous customs of duennas and eunuchs? We cage them up like precious wild beasts, not like tigers and hyenas to keep them from devouring us, but to whet their appetites that they may have the better stomach to devour us. It is said that women do not ask to vote. Is that any reason why we should withhold from them a right which is a prime necessity with her? The Scripture teaches us to sit modestly down toward the foot of the table and wait to be invited up to a more honorable position. In the last election in Missouri every one knew that every man who was disfranchised desired to be restored to his full powers as a citizen, yet nowhere did rebels take any prominent part. Some of their over-zealous and excessively timid friends advised them to keep their mouths carefully closed. I believe, sir, if the rebels had taken an active part in the last election we would have been more successful; but wiser men than I thought different. If a rebel opened his mouth to complain of the flagrant outrages perpetrated against him, all the milk-and-water conservatives in the community flocked around him and begged him for God's sake be quiet and not to manifest any interest whatever in politics. Many rebels gained a disgraceful popularity by truckling to this spirit and joining the Radicals in a crusade against themselves and their fellow-sufferers, and were accounted "honest men" for so doing.

Did the negroes ask to be emancipated? You say they were praying for it secretly. I have no doubt they were. But did a negro ever say in the presence of a white man that he wanted to be free? No. He always proclaimed loudly that he had rather live with "Ole Massa." He was afraid of the "Bobolitionists," and little negro children would run under the bed and roll their white eyes around in fright when you told them that the Abolitionists would catch them. But while the negro professed such contentment, while he laughed and danced and sung "A nigger will be nigger any way you fix him," he felt that something was wrong with his race; and he often met in conclave in a distant cabin with a gang of his fellow-blacks, eating his master's chickens and plotting means to escape, and discussing the chance of his emancipation. Take away the Freedman's Bureau to-day and leave to a vote of the people, white and black, and they would almost unanimously vote to reestablish slavery. Social power and physical power control sentiments and expressions. You had to drag the negroes from their houses in the South like hampered cattle. You drew them away from the plantations just as our forefathers brought them from Africa. We offered large bounties and bought them. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] said wisely that universal suffrage would not make the South loyal, because the negroes would vote as the whites wished. Women do not ask to vote, because they know that they would be cried down as strong-minded. It is supposed that none but long-haired men and strong-minded women are in favor of this measure of justice. Therefore women say they do not wish to vote. They are afraid to kick against the goads.

They are taught from childhood that they must be deceitful. The whole system of their education leads them to suppression of truth. A woman's no proverbially means yes. The first deceit which a girl learns is the concealment of her age, preparing for future contingencies. They know that men and owls like spring chickens; and to cater to men's craving for tender meat, girls never get older than sixteen. If a well-bred girl is asked to marry she invariably says, "No;" but her sweetheart knows by her drooping eyes and heaving bosom that she means yes. If he has ever seen Forrest, or read Marryatt, he will know what to do; he will encircle her fragile waist with his arm and exclaim tragically, "O, dearest Stella, shiver my jib-boom if I sail life's voyage without thee!" She then falls into a limber swoon, and weeping upon his manly breasts exclaims gushingly, "Noble Fitzhugh Fitzpoodle, you must ask my ma!" At this the loving ma, who has been standing in an adjoining room waiting for her cue, comes in all unsuspecting and smiles a greeting to the terror-stricken young man.

The daughter (who has been carefully taught by her doting mother to set her snares for Fitzpoodle) now looks disconcerted and fades away like a guilty thing and sobs violently in the adjoining room. The mother looks grave daggers at the agitated Fitzhugh, demanding by a silent and awful stare what this means. The noble Fitz stammers incoherently that her daughter has the crimpiest hair and the bustiest form of all the ladies in the land, and that he wants to make her his own absolutely. The tragic mother raises her hands on high and exclaims, "Oh, Heavens!" She turns pale, her eyes become fixed in vacancy, she swoons a rigid swoon, and falls into Fitzpoodle's arms. Stella hears the noise and rushes in with flaming eyes and hair beautifully disheveled, and shrieks, "Oh, my ma's dead!" The gouty old father comes hobbling down stairs. At the first glance of his wife reclining in Fitzpoodle's arms he feels a twinge of the "green-eyed monster." But another glance satisfies him that this is only a rehearsal of a little farce which was played on the eve of his own marriage.

The mother slowly revives, but becomes slightly delirious and talks about the ingratitude of children preferring strangers to their mothers, and the brutishness of young men, who cause such distress by marrying their favorite daughters. This is only the farcical part. There is a deep tragedy underlying most marriages, and that is that prudent mothers bargain off their daughters for so many shekels. Women are an expensive and useless commodity which must be disposed of to the best advantage. Like oysters, they cannot be kept fresh. They must be sold in reasonable time or pickled in vinegar. This bartering of intelligent human beings to the highest bidder, with all the odious consequences of being yoked together by the law, is the cause of bickerings and heart-burnings and unhappy homes. This causes ennui, dissipation, extravagance, and crime. Women are sold like cattle among both savage and civilized nations. A knowing writer describes the marriage of the noble savage as follows:

"If he wants a wife he appears before the kennel of the gentleman whom he has selected for his father-in-law, attended by a party of male friends of a very strong flavor, who screech and whistle and stamp an offer of so many cows for the young lady's hand. The chosen father-in-law, also supported by a high flavored party of male friends, screeches, whistles, and yells (being-seated on the ground he can't stamp) that there never was such a daughter in the market as his daughter, and that he must have six more cows. The son-in-law and his select circle of backers screech, whistle, stamp, and yell in reply that they will give three more cows. The father-in-law (an old deluder, overpaid at the beginning) accepts four and rises to bind the bargain. The whole party, the young lady included, then fall into epileptic convulsions, and screeching, whistling, stamping, and yelling together—nobody taking any notice of the young lady, (whose charms are not to be thought of without a shudder)—the noble savage is considered married, and his friends make demoniacal leaps at him by way of congratulation."

Women are repressed in every way. They must follow certain fashions, or they become the subjects of animadversion. Their high aspirations are subdued by careful teaching. Have you ever considered that the minds of the young can be molded like wax? Compté, in his Positive Philosophy, says, that conscience and taste are creatures of education. Take two children exactly alike, and the circumstances which surround them in childhood will make one a saint and the other a sinner. The mind of a woman is regarded as a secondary consideration. The study of cosmetics engages her whole attention. Mathematics is a hidden book to her, and she learns geography only at the watering places. She learns French in order to perplex the male sex by throwing gibberish in their teeth. She learns to soak lithographs in turpentine and daub them over with variegated colors, not so brilliant as those of the rainbow, but much more solid, and then she asks you how you like her painting. I have been crucified fifty times by being called on to admire these hideous "efforts of genius." She learns to make wax-flowers, making a wonderful improvement on nature, there being no withered petals nor worm-eaten leaves in wax-flowers. She learns the mysteries of botany, and talks so glibly of shooting shrubs and pistils that you become apprehensive lest she should touch off a bouquet at your devoted breast. She learns from her botany that charming dialect known as the language of flowers. If you give a young lady a flower she invariably blushes and asks you "Do you mean it?" If you give her a pink she knows that in your eyes she is the pink of perfection. If a rose, she is sweet sixteen.

If in a pleasant walk through the woods on a May morning a sweet nymph, over whose head thirty summers have shed their brightness, should hand you a violet, she means that she is too young to leave her mother. If a scrawny matron of fifty hands a bellicose old codger a sprig of sunflower, it is a gentle hint that she is "fat and forty." Bear in mind that two-score and ten does not deprive widows of sentimentality.

"Old age ne'er cools a widow's blood."

If a buxom maid who weighs ten stones hands you a "touch-me-not," she intimates that she is a frail thing, and mutely beseeches you not to crush her. If you walk in the garden with an old maid whose personal charms are in the inverse ratio of her fears of attack upon her purity, be careful not to give her a poppy. She will immediately take fright and ask you to "spare her honor." If an old bachelor, in attempting to play the gallant, should pluck a daffodil and present it to a widow, she will faint in his arms, and he will find himself like the venerable Mr. Pickwick, with his head in the matrimonial noose—for all unwittingly he has said "Will you marry me?" and she has by this widows' pantomime signified that "Barkis is willin'." If a laughing girl, with a rosy, pouting mouth, gives you a tulip, she means "kiss me if you can;" and I would not give much for a man that could not.

A few years ago the girls had a great fancy for phrenology. They discoursed wisely on bumps and temperaments. They freely permitted male gawks to fumble over their jaunty little heads and discourse on their bumps. I confess to having read Lavater, and who would not when such were the inducements? What a glorious privilege to hold in your hand these beautiful temples of divinity! To think, too, of the magic fancies, the bright dreams, the quaint oddities, and little schemes that have flitted through the teeming brain within. But now these heads are sacredly guarded from the touch of rude fingers. If you attempt to caress a girl by stroking her front hair, she will cry out, "Take care of my rats!" or if you attempt to touch the back of her head you are rolled away to an illimitable distance by a resistless waterfall.

Girls have another highly intellectual diversion, telling fortunes. The art of divination has always been appropriated by the women. The sibylline books were written by a woman. The oracle of Delphi was a woman. In the ancient times in Greece and Rome the women, as a class, were oppressed as they now are, but having a great knack of knowing secrets and being skilled in the art of foretelling events they became divinities. As late as the eleventh century a temple was erected at Venice for the worship of Joan of Aragon. It was at first erected for the joint worship of herself and her cousin, Duchess of Gause; but it being suggested that two female divinities could not dwell in harmony together it was dedicated to her alone. No astonishing occurrence was ever related to a woman that she did not invariably reply, "I told you so." A man once informed his wife that the cow had swallowed the grindstone. "Yes," says she, "that's always the way. I told you yesterday the old cow would swallow that grindstone." Among the gipsies the women tell the fortunes. In the New England States a century ago nearly every door had a horseshoe nailed over it to guard it from the spells and enchantments of the old women who were regarded as witches. If a woman were old and ugly this was prima facie evidence that she was a witch, and it required but an idiot's tale to send her to the gallows. Our Puritan forefathers were as merciless in exterminating old women as their descendants are in exterminating rebels.

On one occasion eight persons were hung in a lot. As they swung in the air Parson Noise pointed to them exultingly and said, "There hang eight firebrands of hell." But our Puritan forefathers were like their descendants, God-fearing people; and whether they engaged in burning old women, murdering Indians, or kidnapping negroes and selling them into slavery, they found Scripture for it all. And whether these Puritans were banishing Roger Williams, squelching Mrs. Hutchinson, persecuting Quakers, disfranchising all persons not belonging to their church, or whether disfranchising rebels and enfranchising negroes, selling white women to Virginia planters or emancipating slaves which their ancestors had kidnapped, there is always the same valid reason, "Thus saith the Lord!"

But I was speaking of the faculty which women enjoy of fortune-telling. At an evening party, when gossip has been exhausted and the women whose countenances are excruciatingly ugly have been several times told by nice young men that they look charming; when the weather has been fully discussed; when one half of the party have emphatically said, "This is a fine evening," and the other half have replied with equal emphasis, "Delightful," so that there can be no cavil or doubt about its being delightful; when silence has ensued and some one of the party has made that facetious and original remark, "Quaker meeting," a young lady fixes her eyes on a susceptible young man and says "Adolphus, can you tell fortunes?" In a twitter of excitement he replies, "No, Zuleika; can you?" She answers, "A little," and draws up to the table. She knows of a rival to whom Adolphus pays occasional visits. In a dextrous turn of the cards she makes him in love with her brunette rival. The cards describe her person accurately, and disclose some things new to Adolphus. The rival has a catarrh in her nose and has false teeth; she wears plumpers in her mouth, and her heart is guarded by the same defenses as those behind which General Jackson so successfully repulsed the assaults of Pakenham at New Orleans. Thus the meek-eyed Zuleika dissects her rival divinity to the great amazement of Adolphus. Then the cards tell of one who loves Adolphus; and the cards describe Zuleika. The fates leave to Adolphus the privilege of a choice between the two rivals. If he marries the dissected he is to have storms in the morning and hurricanes at night, and die poor and childless. If he marries the fortune-teller he will be worshiped by her through life, he will accumulate riches and have nine children, (that is the magic number that all men aspire to,) who will live to bless his old age. The trick of telling fortunes is a good thing if well followed up. Gamblers run horses, astronomers make almanacs, politicians predict elections, and girls tell fortunes. Which is the most uncertain?

Next in the order of female accomplishments is music. Many an old bachelor has been devoured by the sirens. A writer in the Spectator said that marriages were more frequent in the spring than any other season; that the system was warmed up and a redundancy of animal heat inflamed the amatory passions. But music will thaw a man out in the dead of winter, and open the flood-gates of his affections. Shakespeare says—

"The man that hath no music in himself,
Nor is not moved with concord of sweet sounds,
Is fit for treasons, stratagems, and spoils."

The dove coos to his gentle mate; the dog howls with delight at the winding of the hunter's horn. When the dreadful marches and stern alarms of grim-visaged brigadiers are over they smooth their corrugated brows and—

"Caper nimbly in a lady's chamber To the lascivious pleasings of a lute;"

For—

"Music hath charms to soothe the savage breast"—That is, some music. I have heard music better calculated to make tame beasts mad. But the appreciation of music is purely a matter of taste. No doubt the tympanum of a female cat's ear vibrates with pleasure at the sound of her favorite Tom wailing in the garret, and many persons derive equal pleasure from the falsettos of a fashionable opera singer. The poet says:

"Sweet is the cry of a new-born babe;"

but very little of that sweetness will do me, especially in a stage-coach. I got my fill of music once. I became acquainted with a young lady who played the accordeon. We met by chance; her mother kept a boarding-house. She was a healthy girl—a robust girl. She sang through her nose, and ever the burden of her song was—

"I'd be a butterfly."

For six months the tune was quite refreshing; then I began to grow tired of it, and finally in my tortured soul I poured forth a prayer that she might be a butterfly and flit away to other places.

I have enumerated some of the accomplishments of girls who are expected to move in good society. Their education teaches them deceit, seductiveness, and vanity. The idea of her being a helpmeet is long discarded by society. This idea must be generated by a higher civilization than we now enjoy. Women are, as a class, burdens on society. Their lives are devoted, not to high purposes or useful pursuits, but to creating a comeliness of person in themselves which will entice men of inflammatory feelings from the freedom of single-blessedness. We are amazed at the harems of the East. We do not reflect that there may be harems with only one woman in them. When Artemus Ward was in Utah one of the elders died, and all his wives flocked around the wax-works man and besought him to marry them. He replied that they were pretty enough, and individually he would not object to marrying any of them, but that it was the muchness of the thing that he objected to. That is the difference between our system and that of the East. What baser prostitution than for a woman to marry a man for his money, when she had as lief take a toad in her bosom as to enfold her arms about him? We talk about the heathenism of Oriental girls who dance lasciviously in the presence of the men to inflame their lusts; but if the Asiatics should peep over at their civilized antipodes they would see in the fond embrace and lascivious "round dances" much to shock their ideas of propriety.

I have frequently attended balls and sat in obscure corners and indulged in philosophy; but philosophy is trite and is little needed. What spectacle more humiliating than to see young ladies sitting like "the four and twenty tailors, all in a row," decked in costly jewels and rich laces, eager as so many roaring lions seeking whom they may devour? Their dressing makes them caricatures on humanity. Fashion! What folly and misery does not that word invoke. Paris leads the fashion in dress and Eugenie leads the fashion in Paris. She is passé, therefore shall all Christendom wear large hoops; she has a bald spot on the crown of her head, therefore shall all shave tonsures on their heads. In the time of the elder Bonaparte there was great lack of population owing to the wars, and all the energies of society were devoted to supplying the deficiency. It was the fashion for women to appear matronly, so they stuffed their waists to attain fashionable proportions, and look as interesting as possible. Now, the women have a propensity for being squeezed in that locality—hence small waists. What if our great grandmothers could walk out from their pictures on the walls and appear in fashionable circles, would not all the young ladies snicker and say, "Grandmother, what makes your waist so big; grandmother, what makes your hair so prim; grandmother, what makes your back so straight?" But would not the old ladies be surprised in turn at the dress of their great granddaughters? When they saw the long trails, the tilting hoops, the embroidered petticoats, the laced waists, the cotton busts, the red-topped boots, the saw-dust legs, the rats and mice and braids and crimps, the jet chains and frizzles; but above all, when the old ladies saw the wonderful waterfalls of our girls, they would go back into their pictures and giggle forever.

I have briefly alluded to the position and aspirations of women who are above want. The brainless creatures who desire to elevate themselves above the rank of mortals and make themselves the laughing stock of devils. It is this class of well-bred fools who do not wish to take upon themselves the burden of thinking. Their first business is to catch husbands, or if they have succeeded, their lives are devoted to playing the part of namby-pambies. The mind demands some excitement, and for want of something sensible to entertain themselves, women fly to dissipation. Some put in their time reading novels, others gad around among their neighbors, and the majority, like Mrs. Toodles, go to auction. These little endearing freaks are all well in a handsome young lady, but when she gets old and her teeth are rotten, and her skin tanned with dropsical affections, her breath fetid, and her body unsymmetrical, such nonsense becomes intolerable. The subordinate position occupied by old women is not a matter of surprise to me when I consider how they are reared.

We laugh at women concealing their ages. How heroically they struggle to retain the only source of power left to them! A woman looks into the glass as she is wont to do to smile at her own loveliness and lo! she sees the faint lines of a crow's-foot about her eyes. She turns pale. A sickish feeling comes over her. She throws herself on her bed and weeps. She has played the fairy all her life, and has indulged in the wildest caprices of her bountiful power. Men have been her willing slaves; but her magic wand is broken! Let not the world know that she has crow's-feet around her eyes or her power is gone forever. Henceforth when she smiles it is only a grin of the lips; a horrible corpse laugh, which maintains the eyes in deadly placidity! Gray hairs on a man's head are only the spring flowers of a green old age, but on a woman's head they are the waifs of a desert island, toward which she is irresistibly drifting; an island bleak and barren and lonely. The rounded form, the blooming cheek, the pearly teeth, the laughing eye, where are they?

"Gone glimmering through the dream of things that were!"

Not for her the social converse, not for her the power of intellect, not for her the pleasures of literature, not for her the teachings of philosophy; she is a dethroned queen, who must forever weep in the darkness of a mental dungeon for the kingdom she has lost. Her royal scepter has been shattered and its fragment thrown into the great reservoir of chaos, where all things destructible go. When the beauty of one of these dolls has faded, she leads forevermore an isolated and joyless life.

"Old, old, chilly and cold,
With the icy frosts and gathering mold
On the hoary head and the weary heart,
So lonely and sad would fain depart.
Old, old, chilly and cold,
'Tis a weary, dreary thing to be old.

"Old, old, wrinkled and gray,
Tottering along on the time-worn way,
Marked by the graves of the loved that are fled,
Strewn with the hopes that are withered and dead.

Old, old, wrinkled and gray,
Lonely and desolate, passing away!"

Our Puritan ancestors did practical charity to their grandmothers when they hung them as witches.

What shall we say of the condition of the lower million? While the upper ten need the ballot to teach them that they are mortal and are to be the helpmeets of men in politics as well as household affairs, the lower million need it to give them an equal chance with their fellow-mortals in their life struggle, their labor for bread. All over the North we sing the plaintive strains of suffering negrodom, but the Song of the Shirt is not fashionable. It is not set to music, and no tune will fit it. The song is jerky and knock-kneed, and tells of quaint bony starvation.

"With fingers weary and worn,
With eyelids heavy and red,
A woman set in unwomanly rags,
Plying her needle and thread—
Stitch! stitch! stitch!
In poverty, hunger, and dirt,
And still with a voice of dolorous pitch
She sang the 'Song of the Shirt!'"

"Work! work! work!
While the cock is crowing aloof!
And work! work! work!
Till the stars shine through the roof!
It's Oh! to be a slave
Along with the barbarous Turk,
Where a woman has never a soul to save,
If this is Christian work!"

"Work! work! work!
Till the brain begins to swim;
Work! work! work!
Till the eyes are heavy and dim!
Seam, and gusset, and band,
Band, and gusset, and seam,
Till over the buttons I fall asleep,
And sew them on in a dream!"

"O men, with sisters dear!
O men, with mothers and wives!
It is not linen you're wearing out,
But human creatures' lives!
Stitch! stitch! stitch!
In poverty, hunger, and dirt,
Sewing at once, with a double thread,
A shroud as well as a shirt."

"But why do I talk of death?
That phantom of grisly bone,
I hardly fear his terrible shape,
It seems so like my own—
It seems so like my own,
Because of the fasts I keep;
O God! that bread should be so dear,
And flesh and blood so cheap!"

"Work! work! work!
My labor never flags;
And what are its wages? A bed of straw,
A crust of bread—and rags—
That shattered roof—this naked floor—
A table—a broken chair—
And a wall so blank, my shadow I thank For sometimes falling there!"

"Work! work! work!
From weary chime to chime,
Work! work! work!
As prisoners work for crime!
Band and gusset and seam,
Seam and gusset and band,
Till the heart is sick and the brain benumbed,
As well as the weary hand."

"Work! work! work!
In the dull December light,
And work! work! work!
When the weather is warm and bright;
While underneath the eaves
The brooding swallows cling,
As if to show me their sunny backs
And twit me with the spring."

"Oh! but to breathe the breath
Of the cowslip and primrose sweet—
With the sky above my head
And the grass beneath my feet.
For only one short hour
To feel as I used to feel,

Before I knew the woes of want
And the walk that costs a meal!"

"Oh! but for one short hour!
A respite however brief!
No blessed leisure for love or hope,
But only time for grief!
A little weeping would ease my heart,
But in their briny bed
My tears must stop, for every drop Hinders needle and thread."

"With fingers weary and worn,
With eyelids heavy and red,
A woman set in unwomanly rags,
Plying her needle and thread—
In poverty, hunger, and dirt,
And still with a voice of dolorous pitch—
Would that its tone could reach the rich,
She sung the 'Song of the Shirt.'"

As population increases some get rich, but the pauper class increases tenfold. In London live the merchant princes of the world, in costly palaces, but in the dark alleys and squalid hovels, the garrets and cellars of that great human ant-hill, dwell a class of wretches who are walking illustrations of poverty, misery, and vice. They belong to the pauper, which is such a great hobgoblin in the eyes of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.] We, too, have a pauper class growing up in the United States, which has been fearfully increased of late years by the calamities of war and the fluctuation of money values. Our pauper class must for two hundred years consist exclusively of women and invalids. The extent and cheapness of land is such that every able-bodied man can get good wages. The invalid can be supported by public charities. But who shall provide for poor women?

"Old King Cole was a merry old soul,
A merry old soul was he,
He had a little girl and he kicked her out of doors
Because she was a she!"

What shall be done with the women? The world has been asking that question more than three thousand years. The answer might readily suggest itself. Let the women have an equal chance to take care of themselves. If they fail, then let us devise a means. Women have been bartered as merchandise, housed up in harems, made to perform such drudgery as men would not do, until men have an abiding faith in their own superiority in all lucrative employments. God made woman free and gave her the gift of understanding, and gave her hands to work. Let us not out of an excess of love tie her hands and let her starve.

An Irish farrier once sent a bill to Lord Donahue: "For doctoring your honor's mare to death, £3 5s." Are we not guarding the women to death? Ordinarily a woman has but one means of livelihood—that is her needle. Oh, the pains of stifled breasts and aching eyes and dizzy heads that daily ascend, a voiceless prayer of millions of sewing-women, to the throne of Him who created woman for some purpose. Think not that the dumb prayer of myriad aches is unheeded. A tree grows up in strength and beauty; a poisonous worm is gnawing at its roots; slowly will the tree wither, its leaves fall off, its fruit turn bitter, until at last it is dead as if blasted by the shivering stroke of a thunderbolt. We cannot violate the laws of nature with impunity. If women are raised higher or dragged lower than nature intended, evil must befall. Among the Hindoos, woman is regarded as only a thing to be used for animal gratification. When her husband dies, these people are too fastidious in taste to want his leavings; therefore his widow is only an incumbrance to society, and she is taught and compelled by her religion and her Government to burn herself to death with the body of her deceased husband. The cruelty of this custom shocks us. Let one of my radical friends who is voting against women's franchise go out on Pennsylvania avenue, and before he walks five squares he will see a Babylonian woman dressed in scarlet and fine linen, and burnt with fire more scorching than the blazing fagots of a Hindoo widow's pyre; a fire which corrodes the body and sears the soul; a fire which raged in Sodom and Gomorrah long before the skies rained brimstone, and before Lot's wife had crystallized into a salty monument of woman's curiosity. She will give you the wink; but do not follow her. She is the Apocalyptic woman whose "footsteps lead down to hell."

These scarlet women are the holocausts of society. They are mostly uneducated. They have all been pretty girls, and have been innocent babes. Take one of the most depraved of these wretches and trace back her life, and you will probably find that it was not want of virtue but want of bread which dragged her down the fatal abyss of crime. She has been tenderly reared by a fond mother, who has often, as she lay at her breast, gazed into the blue depths of her beautiful eyes, has parted her downy hair caressingly, and kissed her with all the pride and rapture of a mother's love, little dreaming that the child's beautiful lips would ever be polluted with oaths and obscenity. The child has grown up and is left in the world with no capital but her beauty. Brainless and breadless she must henceforth do battle for herself. Bread alone does not satisfy; she must dress, for her business is to catch a man. Before she is aware of it she is in debt. Then the struggle and humiliation commences. There is no honest labor for her to do, but hard drudgery, poorly paid. The seducer comes to her with an offer of bread and clothes and undying love. In a fatal moment of weakness her virtue is conquered, and she submits to his embrace. She is henceforth to be banished from society, and rush down to lower sinks of infamy, until the last step, where all good Christians consign her, to hell!

Her seducer grows tired of her. She hangs about him like a faithful dog; but never more, oh, never more, shall a smile of affection greet her in this world. And what can she hope in the next? She swigs down the fiery Hollands, blurs out oaths, obscenities, and blasphemies because she is given over to perdition and the fiend is gnawing at her heart. Her seducer moves in good society, attends church, and marries and is an exemplary man in every way. Does it not strike you that there is something wrong somewhere? If women were allowed to clerk in stores and perform any labor which they have the capacity to perform, there would be more independence among them, and they would be less subject to the temptations of evil. Virtue is instinctive with woman. When she falls, the blame, in nine cases out of ten, does not rest with herself. The question of the education and employment of women is one of the gravest in the world. On this question we are in the same condition which the barbarous ages left us.

I have shown you that the Radical party was a "whited sepulcher." That it had no republicanism in it; that it sought to enfranchise the negro for commercial and financial schemes. This will not satisfy the people. Woman suffrage is a grand principle pervading society in all its ramifications, and increasing in importance till the millennial day when "seven women shall lay hold of one man," but the interest in the negro will soon flag. I fear the conflict which he will have to suffer at the polls. The instincts of race are so strong that Germans and Irish can scarcely vote together without fighting, because one is sanguine and the other phlegmatic. The instincts of the Caucasian and African are more widely different. Why have not Chinese or Indians ever taken part in politics on the western frontiers? I fear we cannot make a white man of a negro by act of Congress. What says the poet?

"You may break, you may shatter the vase, if you will,
But the scent of the roses will hang round it still."

When you mount the Pegasus of Republicanism, let him soar as high as the American eagle. If you mount this gallant steed to trot quarter-races around the Gulf States, you will be the laughing stock of the world!

What harm will it do to allow women to vote? Those who do not choose to vote may remain at home. I have been told that this would corrupt society and make women rude. Is there anything corrupting in a man's going to the polls with his wife and his daughters, and all of them putting their ballots into a box? The very fact that women were to be at the polls would close every drinking saloon and keep every community orderly on that day. Women attend Fourth of July orations and public speaking in every decent community, and if there is any person who forgets the proprieties that are due to their presence, there are twenty stalwart arms to put him out or take him to jail.

CAN CHARLES SUMNER consistently ask for the enfranchisement of the negroes when a majority of the adult citizens of Massachusetts of sound mind and good character are disfranchised? The election of two negroes to the Legislature of Massachusetts does not wipe out the stain from her escutcheon. And who are the disfranchised? The gamblers? No. The drinkers of whisky? No. The smokers and chewers of tobacco? No. The criminals and convicts? No. The politicians and other vagrant non-producers? No. It is the frugal, industrious, and virtuous class which is disfranchised. It is the busy housewife who gets up in the morning and cooks her lazy husband's breakfast, while he is in bed snoring like a brute; who remains faithfully at home all day like a guardian angel watching over his household; and who darns his socks at night while he is rollicking at the club-house spending his money and her money.

The very name of woman has been in all ages the synonym of virtue. The Lybian women were allowed to participate in the sham battles and wrestling matches at the festivals of Minerva. It was the religious belief that any woman who had ever been unchaste would be wounded in the battles and the penalty was death. Yet nearly all the women participated and came out unscathed. Suppose such a qualification should be prescribed for members of Congress, do you think you would ever call the previous question again on the other side of the House? You would do well if you could get the ayes and noes. We are asked to disfranchise the white rebel because he is an aristocrat, and to enfranchise the negro to break down this aristocracy. But the aristocratic manufacturer of Massachusetts, who sports a gold-headed cane and wears a broadcloth coat with a tail much resembling a cod-fish shall vote, while the poor factory girl who wears her life away with dreary, unpromoted toil, has no voice in the Government.

The husband and wife are one in law, and he is that one, her lord and master. He may give her a thrashing every morning, and if arrested and tried for beating her, he pleads molliter manus imposuit, and comes clear, for she is his slave in law. She may be intelligent and thrifty, striving hard to earn a livelihood for her children, whom, under no circumstances, can a mother abandon. But her drunken sot of a husband can drive her about from pillar to post and prevent any one from even giving her shelter. How often do we see advertisements in the newspapers, "I warn all persons not to harbor my wife!" If she works hard to accumulate property or earn a support for herself and her children he must take the proceeds, for he is entitled to her wages, and money paid to her without his authority is no payment in law. She cannot dispose of her separate property, make a will, nor even a dying donation without his written consent. These barbarous statute laws are being modified in some States, but are not the social laws against women still more oppressive?

In no State are the statute laws as liberal toward women as they should be. Why? Look at the materials of which elections are composed! The saloon influence is the acknowledged strongest power in every community. Look at the workings of that influence (always hating and hated by women) in last election. The Radicals had the money. They held the public offices, and were supported by all the moneyed powers in the North. A Radical canvasser buys half a gallon of radical whisky (which has paid a radical tax for the distillery of two dollars per gallon for the whisky, and is, notwithstanding this tax, sold at $1.75 per gallon, radical poison;) with this bottled lightning he drenches the voter, and this sovereign and lord of creation goes reeling up to the polls as drunk as a fiddler's dog to vote "according to the spirit that is in him." Do you not think his poor starving wife could vote as wisely?

You shut woman out from all the easy and honorable ways of earning a livelihood. A short time ago the important national work of making a statue of Mr. Lincoln, to be placed among the art monuments of this Capitol, was by Congress committed to the hands of a young female artist, whose personal worth and brilliant talents place her among the brightest stars in the constellation of American genius. The selection of this young lady to make the statue provoked cruel criticism from venomous pens, which was satisfactorily answered by the following just criticism on the superior genius of male artists:

"It has been said in Congress and elsewhere that it was beyond the ability of her girlish hand to deal with such a subject; that it 'needed the masculine grasp.' &c. Well, a good many artists of the male persuasion have grappled with it during the past year, and the result has been the turning out of Mr. Lincoln in almost every conceivable style. We have him striking a Napoleonic attitude, with distended eye and arms crossed over a protuberant breast. We have him glowering, with Forrestian air, at a set of broken handcuffs. We have him pointing with melodramatic swagger to an ax and rail. We have him in Roman toga, very much to the disadvantage of his lank figure. We have him in bulging trousers, a smart Talma cloak, and with his strongly-marked grotesque features so idealized as to pass for a Byron. We have him holding all sorts of documents at all sorts of angles, sometimes poised on his left leg and sometimes on his right.

"The masculine grapplers seem to have about exhausted themselves, and the result is not so decisive as to exclude competition. Suppose we give the feminine grasp a show. Her model is yet in the rough, but it shows points of excellence that promise well. The attitude is Lincolnian, and the artist, who made her study from life, has succeeded in catching the benign expression of face that should be perpetuated in a statue of Mr. Lincoln.

"As regards the charge of audacity in the young artist aspiring to contest honors with the Crawfords, Greenoughs, Persicos, and others, whose works adorn the Capitol, we cannot exactly see it. We can see nothing to discourage her from emulation in the series of squats in question—the squatting squaw and the bowling Columbus on the eastern portico, the squatting white woman, squatting Italian, Indian, impossible hunter, and nondescript dog on the other side of the steps; the squatting Washington in the eastern yard, shirtless and shivering, with hand uplifted as if calling upon a just Heaven to launch its thunderbolts upon the sculping scallawag who set him out there upon a cold chunk of marble in such inadequate costume; the squatting 'civilization' group, crouched under the pediment; or in the sweet-potato-shaped 'America' in Madge Wildfire head-dress, (would to Heaven she could squat!) surmounting the dome of the Capitol."

If a woman is highly educated she may teach school; if not, she must be a sewing-woman, a beer-jerker, or a harlot! If she clerks in a store she is an exception, and must meet the scornful criticism of the world. Nice young men, counter-jumpers, the tulips and daisies of society, who labor under the heavy responsibility of supporting small mistresses, are the proper persons to measure ribbon, sell hose, and corsets, and vote! How many sunny-haired girls grow up to find that their freedom of labor is curtailed, their ambition hopeless! They find it necessary to cultivate the baser and more artful part of their natures in order to catch a man. She must have a man to protect her from that beast of prey called society. Whence arises this dread among women of becoming old maids? They are willing to mate themselves with men far inferior to them in every way.

Many a woman of genius whose heart beat high with ambition has exclaimed in the agony of her slavery, "Oh, that I were a man!" Many an old maid whose hopes in life were blighted because she could not catch a man, has sat by her window at night and looked out into the black vault of heaven at the stars twinkling in the distance and longed to fly away to another world where she might be somebody. What is more mournful than the plaint of the old maids:

"Fourscore and four of us
Poor old maids!
Not a penny in our purse,
Poor old maids!
Dressed in yellow, pink, and blue,
Poor old maids!
Nursing cats is all we do,
Poor old maids!"

They meet nothing but frowns from the world and they take these feline little creatures to their bosoms.

If a poor man has a family of daughters his life is a misery to him, and his heart aches when he asks himself, "What will become of my children when I die?" The wealthiest men in the land have commenced life as poor boys. Every young man has a fair prospect for a fortune; but what woman ever made a fortune, or ever rose by her own exertion from poverty, except by the wages of sin?

"There is a tide in the affairs of men Which taken at its flood leads on to fortune."

"There is a tide in the affairs of women Which taken at its flood leads—God knows where!"

A soldier lays down his life for his country; he leaves a widow and helpless children. How is she to maintain her little family? She must depend on the cold charities of the world or marry again! If she asks for employment she is only a woman, and a pauper at that—who heeds her complaints?

"At my casement I sat by night,
While the wind far off in dark valleys
Voluminous gathered and grew,
And waxing swelled to a gale.
Far off 'twas a people's moan;
Hard by 'twas a widow's wail!"

But we are told to wait. This will complicate questions. What more simple than to follow a principle to its corollaries? It is said that woman suffrage will bring odium on negro suffrage! Have the women got so low down in the scale of humanity that their privileges would bring odium upon the enjoyment of the same privileges by the untutored African? If so, shame upon this barbarous people who have reduced them! Why should we wait? There are thousands of women, widows and orphans of men who have fallen in battle, starving and freezing for want of the ballot. There are thousands of virtuous women who are on the brink of crime for want of bread. There are thousands who are now in the meshes of Satan and cry loudly for help; for bread! Why wait and refuse to discuss measures when such grave results hang upon the issue?

It would be superfluous to discuss woman's capacity to vote. She is the natural superior of man in every way. A poet says of Nature:

"Her 'prentice han' she tried on man,
And then she made the lasses O."

I grant that she is not now as intellectual as man. She has not the education. She has never been taught to think. The women know as much about law as the majority of doctors; and much more about medicine than lawyers. What lawyer could have ever invented catnip tea? All things require cultivation and education. When the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] takes snuff, the whole radical party sneezes; but I do not believe he could blow a half bushel of potatoes out of his nose as I have seen many a juggler do. Distinguished ci-devant conservatives, political acrobats, might display wonderful powers of contortion in the arena of politics, but they would find themselves hard put to it to imitate the flying leaps of Mr. Merryman, and would grow dizzy in following Blondin and turning somersaults on a tight-rope over Niagara Falls.

Let us allow women the chance to use their learning, and they will soon become educated. Let us allow women to be useful to themselves and to society, and they will cease to be so helpless and will be more courted. Why is it that a barbarian woman is a subject of purchase, the man being willing to trade his cattle or his other goods for a wife? It is because they are useful. Why is it that when society has become civilized every inducement and penalty is needed to force men to marry, and women are willing and anxious to marry without?

The author of the Spirit of Laws, (Montesquieu,) who has observed society closely, gives the following reasons:

"Young women who are conducted by marriage alone to liberty and pleasure, who have a mind which dares not think, a heart which dares not feel, eyes which dare not see, ears which dare not hear; who appear only to show themselves silly; condemned without intermission to trifles and precepts; have sufficient inducements to lead them on to marriage. It is the young men that want to be encouraged."

Among the ancients a variety of inducements were offered to tempt young men into matrimony. Not content with these, by the wisest legislators disagreeable circumstances and punishments were annexed to a bachelor state. Among the Lacedaemonians old bachelors were obliged every winter to run naked around the market-place, singing a song which pointed out their crime and exposed them to ridicule. It is said that old maids hate the men. Who can blame them? The worm when trampled upon will turn and sting the heel which grinds it. Athenæus mentions a festival where the women seized the old bachelors and dragged them around the altars and beat them severely. At a festival of Ceres the women shut out all the men and dogs and kept them out all night to air their devotion. At a festival of Bacchus the daughters of Mynia, all being in love with young Hyphasus, (he had violated the injunction, "Never court but one,") they killed the young man, cooked him, made a fair divide, and ate him.

These are mere straws in history, but they serve to show which way the wind blew. The oppressions of society force women to marry, and the men refused to marry them, and they took advantage of the superstitions of the men to pay them up, (as a good wife sews up a drunken husband in a sheet and beats him.)

While the Romans preserved their primitive simplicity of manners, wives were in such demand that the Roman youths seized by force the Sabine women and married them. But when civilization had made costly ornaments of women and deprived them of usefulness, men ceased to marry. Cæsar offered rewards to men to marry. Augustus, to check the debauchery of the people, laid heavy fines upon men who remained unmarried. The Roman knights pressingly petitioned him to relax the severity of that law. He ordered the whole body to assemble before him, and to separate the married men on one side and the unmarried men on the other. He told the married men that he would appoint them to all the offices, and confer on them all the honors and emoluments of the government, (constituting them the bread and butter brigade of the Roman empire.) Then, turning to the bachelors, he denounced them, and revived the Popean law, which imposed a heavy fine on them, giving them twelve months' time to marry and be relieved of the fine. Some married infants in the cradle, they being less expensive than grown women; others grumbled at the fine, but paid it, saying it was cheaper to give away half their estates than to support the luxury of a wife.

Can woman see any pleasure in the part she plays? She may be gay and festive while in company, showing off her fine clothes, but at night, when this costly paraphernalia is laid aside, what a dreary sense of her own littleness comes over her. She realizes in their bitterest significance the words of the preacher, "vanity of vanities." This is why our daughters and wives look pale and care-worn early in life. There is a "skeleton" in every closet. When she is married all her accomplishments are laid aside. The man who is wedded to a musical wife bewails his lot.

Why is it that with the increase and wealth of a country woman only becomes more burdensome on society? The new demands for labor springing out of the diversification and division of labor find no place and offer no wages to woman. Men's wages increase, but women are still helpless burdens on the community. In my district this is not the case. We have not only the prettiest girls in the world, but the most useful women. The men find great difficulty in getting married, for the girls are independent and can earn a livelihood without marrying.

But look around in your cities and you will see a great contrast. There the women are like ravenous wolves or cunning man-traps. A man has to "beware of the vidders!" A poor man is in continual trepidation lest he should fascinate one of them. If he is married he brings his nose to the grindstone. She can be of no earthly use to him in business, her ideas run in a different current from his, and she can have no social relations to him except to ask him the news and detail to him the gossip and slander of the day. If she asks about his business he frowns, and if he inquires about household affairs he is pertly informed that it is none of his business. Women put on airs of frailty. A young lady in company will cut a pea in two, it being too large for her delicate mouth; but as soon as she is alone she will cram a whole corn-dumpling down her throat.

I know that success in my undertaking to enfranchise the women is not likely. When I look around in this Hall and see so many men whose bald heads and hooked noses denote that they have passed that period of life when even the heroic retreat of Joseph has any merit in their eyes, I feel discouraged. The gentleman from Pennsylvania—the modern sea-green incorruptible, who was so reluctant to visit Harrisburg—is an old bachelor. He knows that if women were in power the scepter would pass from Israel. When the great archangel of radicalism is hostile to the female cause, what may we expect of his imps?

Then the clerks in cities who compose the voting class will be hostile to this measure. If women were allowed to clerk in stores these counter-jumpers would lose their places. They fear the competition. The saloon influence, the strongest power in the land, is hostile to woman suffrage. A woman whose husband and sons have been poisoned would not show much quarter to the dealer of poisons. Here again the people of my district are more fortunate than in most localities. A man may get gentlemanly tight or even gloriously drunk at any corner-grocery in southeast Missouri without disturbing the peace, killing his neighbor, beating his wife, or voting the Radical ticket; for our saloon-keepers sell good liquor. Other parts of the State are less fortunate. I need not tell you how much "red-eye," "tangle-foot," and "bust-head" it took to roll up four thousand Radical majority in the St. Joseph district. When I advocate woman suffrage it is not because my constituents need it, but for the advancement of the civilization of the world. Like Anacharsus Klotz, I am the friend of the human race:

"No pent-up Utica contracts our powers,
But this whole boundless continent is ours."

The women of my district would probably not exercise this prerogative, but it is their right and they should have the privilege to exercise it. As long as the men vote right the women would be slow to obtrude themselves upon the public. But in great public emergencies they would step forward and save the nation.

Rollin in the introduction to his Ancient History, mentions Aristophanes' play, Lysistrata, and comments on it as follows:

"One of the principal magistrates of Athens had a wife of that name, who is supposed to have taken it into her head to compel Greece to conclude peace. She relates how, during the war, the women, inquiring of their husbands the results of their counsels, and whether they had not resolved to make peace with Sparta, received no answers but imperial looks and orders to mind their own affairs; that, however, they perceived plainly to what a low condition the Government was declined; that they took the liberty to remonstrate mildly to their husbands upon the rashness of their counsels; but that their humble representations had no other effect than to offend and enrage them; that in fine, being confirmed by the general opinion of all Attica that there were no longer any men in the State nor heads for the administration of affairs, their patience being quite exhausted, the women had thought it proper and advisable to take the government upon themselves and preserve Greece, whether it would or not, from the folly and madness of its resolves. 'For her part,' she declares that 'she has taken possession of the city and treasury in order to prevent Pisander and his confederates, the four hundred administrators, from exciting troubles according to their custom, and robbing the public as usual.' She goes on to prove that the women only are capable of retrieving affairs; that admitting things to be in such a state of perplexity and confusion, the sex, accustomed to untangling their threads, were the only persons to set them right again, as being best qualified with the necessary address, patience, and moderation."—Rollin's Ancient History, vol. i., p. 69.

When France was beleaguered by foes and was about to fall under the dominion of a foreign scepter, the dark-eyed Maid of Orleans buckled on her armor and headed her nation's hosts and saved her country. And at a later day, when terror reigned in the republic, and a radical party, drunk with blood, had struck down religion and law, when every fireside was invaded and the busy guillotine chopped off the head of conservatives all day and all night, day after day, until men were struck dumb with fear, the blue-eyed Maid of Caen came down to Paris, and Charlotte Corday struck her dagger to the heart of the chief of the infernal triumvirate and turned back the red waves of the surging revolution. Women are timid and averse to destroying anything; but when danger is so great that the stoutest hearts of men are appalled, a woman's courage rises to the full height of her divine nature, and she is always ready to sacrifice herself for the good of others. I read yesterday an account of a tornado which swept along the Mississippi river above Vicksburg. When it struck the house the father called to his children to escape from the house and he ran off himself. The mother, with that God-given heroism which women alone possess, rushed in to save them, and the roaring hurricane dashed down the building upon her and she died with her children.

These resolutions single out the District of Columbia and the State of Massachusetts as the theater of experiment. The District was put under the absolute dominion of Congress that it might be the Utopia of the nation. Tom Corwin related an anecdote of a pioneer company which went out to Oregon to found a settlement. They run out of provisions, and had to subsist on such roots and herbs as they could find. One day they got a mess of greens which proved noxious, and made them all sick. They had with them an orphan boy that no one took any particular interest in. They concluded that whenever they found any herbs that they had never seen they would make this boy eat of them first, and if they did not kill him they could all eat them. The District of Columbia is our orphan child, and we have tried negro suffrage here. We cannot do worse than we have done, and that gives me confidence to press this measure. Let me say generally that men are fast losing sight of the great principles of patriotism and justice. They are generally controlled by implacable hatred and prejudice or by sectional selfishness and greed. Women could not do half so badly as the men.

Our boys in blue have intermarried with the dark-eyed girls of the South; and the gallant boys in gray have won the affections of golden-haired maids of the North. Let us unite political affinities with these personal attachments which are constantly springing up in every community and our whole people will soon have their hearts full of union.

Though I have no hope of practical results from this Congress, I confidently expect that the Forty-First Congress will come here pledged to give the women their rights. If the prominent women of the United States withdraw their support from the Radical party, it will fall to rise no more. If you provoke opposition from such women as Mrs. Mott, Mrs. Stanton, Anna Dickinson, Lucy Stone, and Fannie Gage, they will drive your radical orators from every stump in the North. Who get up your organizations and societies; who raise your funds; who get up your sanitary fairs? The women! It was through them that millions of dollars have been raised for the men of the Radical party to spend. I tell you that every woman of talent throughout the North is impressed with the conviction that she is injured by this forced repression and social ostracism. They say truthfully that genius and talents have no sex.

There is a general reform steadily progressing over the North, especially in the Empire State. There every woman may control her own property as a femme sole. She may enter into copartnership, trade, or engage in any business, and nothing mars her prospects except the influence of social custom and prejudice. That is being rapidly overcome, and the men have been brought down a peg. They condescend to assist their wives in the hardest drudgery. They provide conveniences and make their homes comfortable and their work light. It is a spectacle of great significance and moral sublimity as you pass by a New England farm of a winter evening to see the devoted husband with his head against the sides of old Brindle, squeezing the foaming milk into the pail, while his flaxen-haired first-born stands in front feeding her with "nubbins" and his loving wife is near by affectionately holding the calf. Such a scene is well calculated to inspire the friends of humanity with hope.

Intelligence is gradually restoring to women the rights that are withheld from her by force. The world is fast learning that war costs more than peace. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] demonstrated to us that it cost this Government over two million dollars to kill an Indian, and with that amount we could support the whole Indian race for a longer time than it takes to make the longest campaign. Killing is the most costly amusement which mankind enjoys. Let the women vote and we will have no more war. A woman would bear a great deal before she would plunge the country into war, for she is more injured by war than any other portion of society. Among the Romans the women were not taxed for war debts. On one occasion, in a great distress for money, a tax was laid upon the property of women. Hortensia and four thousand Roman matrons appealed to the prætor. She made a speech against war, and against the injustice of taxing women for war, that has come down in history as a remarkable piece of eloquence. The prætor struck their names from the tax list.

The women are oppressed because they have submitted without a murmur. But that time is now past, and from this time on this question will be agitated. Our forefathers submitted to the imposition of unjust taxation without representation until the burdens became so onerous that they passed non-intercourse resolutions and threw off the yoke of Great Britain. This last Government in 1812 assumed prerogatives inconsistent with the honor of our nationality, and our Government laid an embargo on our ports, and the British lion was forced to drop his tail and waive his high pretensions. Let the women imitate our forefathers and have nothing to do with men who deny them their rights, and these self-constituted lords of creation will soon be humbled as the British lion was.

Last night I attended the temperance meeting in this Hall. I listened to the eloquent speeches from the cream of orators of the United States. The startling character of the revelations were enough to freeze one's blood and make—

"Each particular hair to stand on end,
Like quills upon the fretful porcupine."

Intemperance we were told filled our jails and penitentiaries; scattered misery and starvation over the land; struck down giant minds and made them driveling fools; corrupted society from its foundation; invaded the forum and the pulpit, and even provoked international wars. A distinguished speaker said that a few years ago Lord Buckingham introduced into Parliament a resolution asking for a committee to inquire into this great evil which was destroying the revenue of the nation and the bone and sinew of the realm, and that he was laughed at. But Lord Buckingham was a man of great eloquence, and before he sat down he changed their laughter to tears and forced them to give him his committee, which committee had made an able and convincing report in behalf of temperance. I thought of my own effort here to get a committee in behalf of a cause lying back of surface reforms, and how I was laughed at by grave men who never laugh except to sneer, and how a little select committee of five was refused me. Then I wished for the eloquence of the great temperance reformer that I might command the serious attention and impress my convictions upon the House. Oh, if I had the eloquent Voice of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] I would make this House ring with ore rotundos until I brought you all to a sense of justice. So much for Buckingham.

After I left the Hall the graphic pictures drawn here haunted me until I fell asleep. Then I had a dream, which was not all a dream. A spirit stood beside me dressed in white raiments. Said I, "Who are you, young man?" He replied, "I am the spirit of just men made perfect." He had an empty bottle under his arm, with which he struck the table where the head-notes of my woman-suffrage speech lay. Immediately I saw an election, and the spirit said "1860." The people ranged themselves along the bar-rooms and said it was "candidates' treat." The candidates treated and drank, and everybody had a jolly time. Then I saw the elected candidates assembled in Congress, and great discussion arose, and the partisans on one side went out and took a drink, and came back saying, we will have our way or fight; and the partisans on the other side went out and took a drink and came back saying, we will have our way or break up the Government. The good men tried to counsel moderation, but neither faction heeded their counsels.

Then the spirit struck his bottle on the table again and the scene was changed. I saw the sky red with the glare of a thousand stricken battle-fields, and heard the opening roar of war, and saw brave men fall, and heard curses and prayers ascend from two million begrimed warriors toiling and fighting, and I saw two million families wring their hands with agony of suspense or despair. Said I, "What means this?" The spirit replied, "This is man's sport; it is the jolly dance of war!" Then I saw a black cloud of men in the distance, and saw a great bird of prey hovering over the whole army, and heard this bird scream with delight. Said I, "What bird is that?" The spirit replied, "That is the American eagle." Said I, "Young man, what makes the eagle scream so?" He replied, "Because the colored troops fought nobly."

Then I saw another army, five hundred thousand strong, headed by young captains, who shouted and laughed as the champagne bottles popped around them; and in the train were old, palsied, bottle-scarred veterans, nodding their heads with driveling imbecility. Said I, "What means this army of scare-crows?" He replied, "That is the army of drunkards in the United States." "Where are they marching?" said I. "To drunkards' graves," said he. "Fifty thousand fall each year in the United States." I saw a million ragged women and children, with pinched, hungry faces following the drunkard army to perdition. Said I, "Is there no way to disband these armies?" He struck the old junk bottle on the very head-notes of my speech, and immediately I saw five million white-breasted martins fly up as if released from a cage, and as they rose in the air they flocked around the American eagle and picked him feather by feather, until he was fain to perch in his eyrie, and a white-winged dove of peace hovered over the land! And over the drunkard's army I saw a fierce hawk. "This hawk," said the spirit, "is the liquor vender, who sinks his poisonous fangs into the proudest in the land, and drags them to the drunkard's grave." Then the white-breasted martins darted at him and tore him limb from limb.

Then I saw millions of paper fragments falling gently from the skies. "These," said the spirit, "are the ballots of the women who have suffered from war and whisky." When the hawk was dead an angel hovered over and emptied the horn of plenty upon a happy people and war disappeared from the earth; grog-shops were supplanted by places of industry and thrift. I saw Katy lead Dick to the polls, and as they walked and whispered lovingly, they said: "We have removed all temptation and closed the corner-grocery." Then the spirit dashed the old junk bottle on the hearth-stone saying, "There is no more use for this." And I saw an angel of the fireside gather the fragments and make a flower vase of them, and a bunch of fresh blooming posies shed their fragrance over the room. "Now," said the spirit, "every woman will have a husband, and what is more, every man will have a wife." If there are any other members who are, like myself, "Josephs," they can interpret that dream.

Civil Government in Louisiana.

SPEECH OF HON. B. M. BOYER,
OF PENNSYLVANIA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 12, 1867.

The House having under consideration the bill reported from the select Committee on New Orleans Riots (H. R. No. 1162) for the reestablishment of civil government in the State of Louisiana—

MR. BOYER said:

MR. SPEAKER: I am not as well prepared to enter upon the discussion of this bill now as I would have been if I had supposed that a measure of this kind was to be introduced and put upon its passage at this time. I am not as well prepared as I should have been if it had been supposed when the House adjourned yesterday that debate would be allowed upon this bill to-day at all. But unprepared as I am, and without notes or previous arrangement, I shall endeavor to present my objections to this measure in such form, however desultory, as that they will be at least understood for whatever they may be worth in substance.

This is another example of that impetuous legislation to which this House has been too much accustomed. There are excellent reasons, which unfortunately do not seem to have found a lodgment in the minds of the gentlemen who represent the Republican party here, why a measure so important as this should be properly debated and considered. There certainly can be no good reason why a bill so important and involving in its consequences the interests of so many thousands of people should be hurried with hot haste to its passage under the operation of the previous question after but two hours' debate. It seems to be much easier for the dominant majority in this House to unite in a measure which aims at the destruction of States than in a measure intended to restore them. They have as yet agreed upon no plan for the restoration of the Union; but to keep the States apart there have been many devices which commanded the united radical vote of this body.

No plan for the restoration of the Union has succeeded, because no plan of reunion will suit this Congress but one which will perpetuate the dominion of the Republican party. It is not because the Constitution will not be obeyed, nor because the laws cannot be enforced that the ten excluded States are deprived of representation upon this floor. It is not, therefore, because this Union cannot be restored that we are still a divided nation. The difficulty is not because you are not able to bring back the citizens of the southern States to their allegiance to the Government, but because you cannot at the same time convert them into radical Republicans.

MR. SPEAKER, what does this measure propose? It proposes, sir, to abolish a State government. It proposes to wipe out a State constitution. And what sort of a government and what sort of a constitution is it here proposed to subvert?

The constitution under which the government of Louisiana is at this time in peaceful and successful operation is the constitution adopted more than two years ago, and ever since that time recognized and obeyed as the constitution of that State. Every civil office in the State of Louisiana has been filled under its authority. Two successive State Legislatures have been elected, have met, and have adjourned under its provisions. Everywhere throughout the State of Louisiana the courts are open and speech is free.

I admit that the constitution which it is proposed by an act of Congress thus to abolish was not originally a constitution regularly made with the active coöperation of the whole people of the State. The authority to assemble the convention which originally framed that constitution was an authority emanating from a major general commanding the Department of the Gulf. But a majority of the parishes in the State sent delegates to the convention, a constitution was framed and submitted to the people of the State, and ratified by them; and the Governor of the State issued his proclamation that it had been regularly adopted. The whole people of the State of Louisiana have since then acquiesced in it and obeyed it as such for more than two years past, during all of which time Congress has not interfered. If there were anything in the existing government of Louisiana which was subversive of the principles of the Federal Constitution, or if there were anything in the constitution of Louisiana so unjust in its provisions as to call for the speedy application of a remedy for the sake of humanity, there might indeed be some pretext for such a measure as this.

But it is a constitution framed by the very men who now ask this Congress to destroy it. It abolishes slavery and prohibits the Legislature from recognizing the right of property in man. It prohibits the payment of the rebel debt; it authorizes the Legislature to extend suffrage to such of the colored population as by military service or by taxation to support the Government or by intellectual fitness may be deemed entitled thereto. It disqualifies from holding office, either of profit or trust, and from exercising the elective franchise, every person convicted of treason. Such is the constitution which this bill proposes to nullify; and the State government established under this constitution is the government which this bill proposes to overthrow.

I well know that Congress is besieged by individuals claiming to be loyal citizens of the State of Louisiana, who say they have been driven from their homes by political persecution. I know that there are such in this city at this time; probably there are some of them at this time in the galleries or in the lobby of this Hall and within the hearing of my voice.

Some of them may be patriots, but all of them are office-seekers and political agitators, and most of them intemperate in speech and action. It can easily be shown, also, that those most prominent among these gentlemen are not men whose antecedents justify them in setting themselves up as the accepted standards of loyalty and Unionism in Louisiana. Some of them were confederate office-holders, and took the oath of allegiance to the confederate government. Some of them were members of secession societies in the early part of the war, organized to exercise espionage over the movements of Union men. I could name some among them who voted in favor of hanging Union men for their Union sentiments, and who assisted in driving them beyond the lines of the State for no other reason than that they stood by the flag of the nation. I will not name them here; I have named some of the most prominent among them in the minority report, which, as a member of the Committee to investigate the New Orleans Riots, I had the honor yesterday to present to this House. I have named them in that report, and I have accompanied the mention of their names with the proof. I maintain that even these men can live safely in Louisiana; but they are here to traffic with their bogus loyalty and to manufacture political capital out of their voluntary martyrdom.

These men tell us that they cannot live in peace in the State of Louisiana, and they ask us for their sakes to establish another government there. Look to their antecedents, and it will be seen that it is office they want rather than peace. They were the advocates of the rebellion when it was strong; they deserted it when it became weak. They were only political adventurers then; they are but political adventurers now; and what they want is not a better government in the State of Louisiana, but they want a government so constructed that under it they can obtain the monopoly of the offices. That is all they want.

At the foundation of this proposed change of government in Louisiana are two motives. One is to get hold of the offices of the State; the other is to bring Louisiana ultimately into this Union with a Radical-Republican representation in Congress. Why is she and why are the other nine States that have no representation upon this floor excluded, while Tennessee has been admitted? Tennessee was a part of the confederacy; Tennessee seceded; Tennessee fought gallantly in opposition to the Union cause side by side with Louisiana and South Carolina. Why is it that Tennessee is not proscribed? Why is it that we see her Representatives upon the floor of this House? There are two reasons. One is that Tennessee bent her knee in subservience to radical rule. She elected a radical Legislature and a radical Governor, by the help of certain restrictions imposed by the Federal Government upon her voting population. The other reason is that the President of the United States is himself a citizen of Tennessee, and it was too striking and practical a refutation of the radical theory of exclusion that an "alien enemy" should sit in the presidential chair.

But gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber seem to think that they cannot afford to admit any more of the "wayward sisters" into the national family; not that Unionism would thus be put down, because the representatives of all the southern States, if admitted here would constitute a powerless minority; but the fat offices would slip away from the Republican grasp, and the tyranny of the two-third majority would come to an end.

In order to bring in the now excluded States of the South at some future day as States in subservient accord with the dogmas of the Republican party, it is necessary to resort to certain measures of coercion subversive of their rights as States in the Union. Louisiana is to-day to be selected as the victim. If the experiment succeeds, it will be tried on all the others. It is unblushingly proposed by this bill to effect that purpose by establishing a negro government in the State of Louisiana. The fifth section of the bill extends the right of suffrage to the colored population without restriction. There are in the State of Louisiana about twenty-eight or thirty thousand white voters. If suffrage is extended to the colored population, as it will be if this bill passes, there will be from thirty to thirty-five thousand negro voters. Therefore, the State of Louisiana will pass out of the hands of white men into the hands of the negroes as soon as the government organized under this bill shall go into operation.

But this does not seem to be sufficient in the eyes of its authors to insure the accomplishment of the design; and therefore it is that this bill provides in addition for the disfranchisement of a majority of the white voters of the State. Rufus King Cutler, one of the most influential leaders among those who set themselves up to be the peculiarly "loyal" men in the State of Louisiana, in his testimony before the investigating committee, after mentioning the statistics of population to which I have just referred said, that after the extension of suffrage to the negroes and the disfranchisement of white men (just as is provided in this bill) he believed that with the help of the military power of the United States the local government thus established might be maintained. One might suppose that gentleman had drafted this bill; it accords so well with his notions of what the government of Louisiana should be.

And who is he who sets himself up as the indicator to this Congress of the kind of government which ought to be established in that State? There was during the war a rebel company known in the confederate army by the name of the "King Cutler Guards" a company equipped at the expense of the individual I have named. I shall not consume time by going over in detail the loyal antecedents of the other gentlemen to whom I have alluded. I refer those who have any curiosity upon the subject to the report of the minority of the investigating Committee on the New Orleans Riots.

I have not heard urged upon this floor by the honorable gentleman who reported this bill, and whose first intention it was to pass it without any debate, any reasons assigned why the existing government of Louisiana should be abolished; and therefore it is impossible for me to take up his argument as I should like to do, step by step, and show upon what sort of a foundation this proposition rests. I cannot analyze his argument, because he has presented none; and it is therefore left for me to anticipate what possibly might be the excuse which would be offered if he had condescended to offer one at all.

It was said some time ago, when the committee was appointed to investigate the New Orleans riots, that there had been registered in this Congress—in some secret Republican caucus, I presume—a decree that the government of Louisiana was to be subverted, and the State reduced to the condition of a Territory, and that a committee of three had been appointed to go down to New Orleans for the purpose of hunting up an excuse for such legislation. If we look to the report of the majority of the committee, and to this bill submitted by the chairman, it appears that the committee has come fully up to the demands of its mission.

It will be a surprising thing doubtless to the people of Louisiana when they learn a committee, sent to New Orleans for the purpose of investigating a local riot, put upon trial in secret session the State of Louisiana itself, and now hold accountable before this Congress and the nation the entire people of the State for a local disturbance in which a few hundred were engaged, and which was confined to a few squares within the city of New Orleans. It might have surprised even me, as a member of that committee, if I had not had some previous experience in this body, when I found the range which the inquiry was taking, and the determination to hold accountable for its consequences so many thousands of those who never had any knowledge or warning of the disturbance. The riot of the 30th of July does, indeed, embrace some circumstances much to be deplored; but I maintain that it did not arise in any degree whatever out of any hostile feeling which the people of the city of New Orleans or the people of the State of Louisiana entertained toward the Government of the United States. It was a riot which under similar circumstances could have been provoked in any other quarter of the Union.

But while the committee was investigating the origin and progress of the riot, there was "lugged" into the examination a great deal of testimony bearing on the general sentiments and feelings of the people of the State of Louisiana, not by the introduction of facts, but of opinions. The facts themselves were meager enough, but the opinions were as strong as the majority of the committee could desire; for they called to the stand as witnesses upon this point the very individuals who by incendiary speeches and revolutionary acts and threats of violence had themselves produced the riot, and they came before the committee and swore through their own case as a matter of course.

It would have been much more conducive to the ends of impartial justice if there had been some consultation between all the members of the committee as to some impartial system to be pursued in the examination of witnesses in the case; and that would have been done if it had been intended to make this investigation profitable for any other than a party purpose.

If the public sentiment of the State was to be inferred from the testimony of witnesses called by the committee, it would have been more in accordance, in my judgment, with the ends of a fair investigation, and more productive of light upon this important question if it had been so arranged that from all parts of the State men not involved in the movement of the conventionists of the 30th of July had been summoned to testify in regard to the state of affairs in their respective localities. When the committee did allow, upon the suggestion of citizens of New Orleans, witnesses to be called whose opinions on public questions might be regarded as reliable from the character of the witnesses themselves and from the position they occupied in society and in the State, it will be found upon reference to their testimony that the government of the State of Louisiana as it now exists is a government in which justice is for the most part fairly administered in the courts and elsewhere, without distinction of race, color, or political opinion.

Most of the witnesses here alluded to had been Union men, not such Union men as the "latter-day saints," to whom I have before referred, but men who were loyal in the beginning, when the rebellion seemed to be strong and when public sentiment was overwhelming in its favor, men who stemmed the secession tide, who resisted the influences which were employed to carry the State of Louisiana out of the Union, as long as resistance could be of any avail, and therefore men to whose judgment and statements of fact we ought to pay a decent regard. The individual instances in which facts were testified to showing injustice in the courts were very few. There was but a single district in the whole State of Louisiana in reference to which there was any proof whatever that the course of justice had been obstructed or that jurors were influenced by their political feelings.

I do not propose to take up the testimony and show in detail what appears in the evidence. I leave that to the members of the House who desire to enlighten themselves by the perusal of the testimony hereafter to be printed and laid before them. I see, at this moment, in the hand of one of my colleagues, the chairman of the committee, an advance copy of the printed testimony; and if he or any other gentleman on the other side desires to make a speech on this subject I have no doubt he can select from different parts of it much which, standing by itself, would seem to favor the views of those who are pressing the passage of this bill, for the testimony is voluminous and varied. Time does not permit me to enter upon that sort of analysis of the testimony, and all I propose to do this day is simply to refer gentlemen to the testimony itself, and to ask that before they vote upon this bill they shall take time to look it over and to investigate the subject in a manner befitting the magnitude of the occasion.

It is no light thing to take away the government of a people and blot out the existence of a free State.

There are those in this Hall who profess to regard with veneration the precepts and example of the late President. I have always myself regarded the memory of President Lincoln with respect, because whether he was right or wrong I always thought he loved his country and was actuated by patriotic motives. In reference to this very government of Louisiana, one of the very last councils he gave near the close of his Administration was that the government of the people there, inaugurated under the constitution of 1864, should be encouraged. You remember well the homely but apt illustration by which he enforced his counsel. You could sooner get a fowl by hatching the egg, said he, than by smashing it; and that although this government of Louisiana might then not be precisely all that might be desired, it was a move in the right direction and ought to be fostered and sustained by the Federal Government. But no chickens are allowed to be hatched by this Congress unless the eggs have upon them the label of the Reconstruction Committee, and warranted to produce radical Republican fowls. [Laughter.]

A MEMBER. Shanghai. [Laughter.]
Mr. BOYER. Therefore it is that the committee of fifteen, organized nearly two years ago for the purpose of restoring this Union, have sat upon their basket of eggs without producing a single well-developed living fowl; and we have at last the authentic announcement of the chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] made yesterday to the House, that the eggs were all addled. [Laughter.]

I do not say that the government of Louisiana is perfect in its operation or that no injustice is ever suffered there. I do not say that in every court in that State every judge is infallible and every jury unbiased. I know of no States and I know of no courts anywhere within the limits of this broad land to which we can impute absolute perfection and infallibility. But I do say, that as a general thing and in the aggregate the State government of Louisiana as it now exists, and as it is now administered, under the constitution of 1864, is a government in peaceful and regular operation, under which, in general, the laws are faithfully administered and the rights and interests of the people of that State of all classes respected and preserved.

HO. OF REPS.

I do not say that at this very moment there ought to be withdrawn from the State of Louisiana every Federal soldier, nor that it may not still be useful to exercise some supervisory power over the police regulations of the city of New Orleans or elsewhere in the State of Louisiana. But I do say that the laws which we now have will enable us to do that, so far as it may be necessary, and that there is no occasion for passing other laws for that purpose.

Whatever in that direction needs to be done can be done hereafter as it has been done heretofore. The peace of the city of New Orleans and of the State of Louisiana can be preserved now and hereafter as I maintain that it has been heretofore preserved, as a general rule, during the whole two years of the existence of the present State government. Since that government came into existence there has been but one riot that we know of anywhere within the limits of the State of Louisiana, and that was a riot confined to a small portion of the city of New Orleans, and in which comparatively few of the inhabitants of that city can in any way be shown to have been engaged. And even if we put the very worst interpretation upon the acts of the rioters, how can we, with any show of justice, hold seven hundred thousand inhabitants of the State accountable for a local disturbance?

I have discussed this measure thus far as a question of justice and policy more than as a question of constitutional right. I do not propose to enlarge upon the latter aspect of the case upon this occasion; nor should I feel inclined to do so even if I had time. The principle involved has been often discussed in this House. But I do say that there has never been a measure proposed, even in this Congress, which presents to my judgment a clearer usurpation of constitutional power or a more flagrant and tyrannical subversion of popular rights than the bill now before this House, which seeks to set up against the will of nine tenths of the white people of Louisiana a negro government in that State, supported by military force. This bill, in effect, establishes a military dictatorship; because in all things the civil government which it pretends to establish is subordinated by its provisions to military supervision and control.

How does this bill accord with the pledge which was given by an almost unanimous vote by this Congress to the people at the outset of the war, and during the progress of the war repeatedly renewed, that the war should be prosecuted only for the purpose of restoring the Union "and maintaining the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired?" It was by that pledge that you recruited your armies; it was by that pledge that you were enabled to man your Navy; it was by that pledge that you were enabled to rally the whole people of the North, of all political parties, as one man in defense of our nationality. By that pledge, and in that sign, you triumphed over the rebellion; and now, when you feel yourselves secure, instead of redeeming that pledge which you gave to the loyal people of the North, and to the loyal people of the South as well, you introduce bills here which provide, in express terms, for the dismemberment of this Union, and which regard neither the dignity nor the equality nor the rights of the several States. Borne upon the wave which the war-storm rolled over the nation you floated into power. I admit that you are entrenched everywhere throughout the country in possession of State Legislatures and the Governors of States, and you feel yourselves strong because you assume that at the recent elections you were indorsed by the people. But have a care lest you tempt too far the credulous confidence of your countrymen.

There have been measures, of which this is one, introduced and passed in this Congress which tend to revolution; such a measure as this is revolution itself. And if gentlemen persist in their vain attempt to radicalize the South, if they are not content with southern allegiance but insist upon southern support for their party measures; if they are not content with the absolute abandonment of the right of secession, which, as all here well know, has been surrendered by the citizens of the South in good faith; if they are not willing to receive back these States as States when their people in good faith are willing to renew their allegiance to the General Government; if they protract these unhappy dissensions too long; if they falsify their pledges too grossly and too persistently, the country will some day awaken to the full knowledge of the fact.

Gentlemen should remember that although rebellion such as we have had is a crime it is possible to make even rebellion respectable. The red-handed rebel striking for a freeman's rights against the oppressor's wrongs is applauded by mankind and glorified in history. Let this Government beware, so that its acts may breed no such rebels here as did George III and his British Parliament.

Magnanimity is the crowning grace of the conqueror.

When Cæsar burned without reading them the letters by which some officious spy sought to reveal to him the offenses of his enemies and the treachery of his pretended friends, he became in the estimation of posterity a greater man than if, like the majority in this Congress, he had instituted mousing committees to go all over the country for the purpose of making out cases to justify punishment.

The Roman Senate, when it made citizens of its alien and conquered enemies, was engaged in a nobler and a wiser work than the members of an American Congress plotting for the disfranchisement of millions of their own countrymen.

I do not suppose anything I can say will alter the predetermination of a single member of this House. I know that the passage of this bill cannot be prevented if it has already been resolved upon by the majority, and I would not have deemed it of any utility for me to say one word in opposition were it not for the fact that as a member of the committee who have reported this bill, I owe it as a duty to myself and to my constituency to clear my skirts of all responsibility in the matter.

I have not thought fit to repeat here the particulars upon which I have commented in the minority report to which I have referred. If, however, the riot which happened in New Orleans on the 30th of July is to weigh with members in their action upon this bill, it would be a source of some satisfaction to me if I could imagine that the report had been read. Of that satisfaction, however, I am deprived, as it was only presented yesterday, and not as yet in print. It is, however, so far as the action of the majority is concerned, a matter of little practical importance if, as it seems, when the select committee was appointed the decree had already been registered that the State government of Louisiana was to be subverted and a new government established by Congress more in accordance with the designs of the Republican party. Still it would have been a more discreet policy on the part of gentlemen on the other side if they had paused until the country might at least be supposed to think that the subject had been fairly examined. To pass this bill at this time must appear not only to this House but to the entire people of the country as if the case had been prejudged, and as if this committee was sent forth, not for the purpose of eliciting information, but merely for the purpose of making out an excuse for an act of tyranny the perpetration of which had even then already been resolved.

REMARKS OF HON. J. W. HUNTER,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 15, 1867,

On the bill (H. R. No. 1143) to provide for the more efficient government of the lately rebellious States.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote against this bill because of its dangerous and mischievous tendencies, and because every interest of the country demands the peaceable restoration of the Union in all its fullness and integrity. This bill is contrary to the whole theory of the contest in which thousands of brave men have died. We certainly waged this fearful war to prevent a dissolution of the Union. The victory won, are we living up to our professions, or are we allowing a noble purpose to degenerate into silly contentions and personal abuse of those who happen to differ with us in the political contests of the day? Who will not remember when Congress assembled in this Hall in trembling anxiety and in prayerful hope that the life of the nation might be saved? I ask attention to the great resolution of this House, adopted on the 22d of July, 1861:

"Resolved, That in this national emergency Congress, banishing all feelings of mere passion or resentment, will recollect only its duty to the whole country; that this war is not waged upon our part in any spirit of oppression, nor for any purpose of conquest or subjugation, nor purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or established institutions of those States, but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution and to preserve the Union with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired, and that as soon as these objects are accomplished the war ought to cease."

Somewhat different from the resolutions of the present day. But "new occasions bring new duties." What were the duties of that hour, with the rebel flag floating within sight of your Capitol? Did any one think of inquiring into the political views or of the kind of votes then lately given by the hundreds of thousands of the brave men who came freely to offer their lives in defense of their country; to stand between you and certain destruction; when these heroes, coming back victorious, but marred, scarred, and maimed with the wounds received in the war, and having, perhaps, by the favor of the President of the United States been appointed to some minor office? It seems to become the new duty of the occasion to look these brave men in the face and reject them from office because they happen to have voted contrary to the views and wishes of the dominant party at the last election. The President himself is vilified and abused, and even those who in the least sustain him in this his great offense are branded as traitors and in complicity with rebels.

It is said that the most belligerent parties now in the South are the parsons and the women. Who are the most belligerent among us; who are the strongest advocates for war-like measures upon a beaten and a vanquished foe—a people so poor and impoverished that the benevolent of our larger cities are at this moment collecting money to save them from starvation? Are they not identified with the party who, by continued agitation on this and kindred subjects, strive to keep themselves in power; who war upon the President, upon the small minority in this House, upon any one, just to keep their hand in practice? But however necessary to the life of a party it may be to keep up a system of agitation and commotion, it is not exactly what the great mass of the people want. They want a quick, quiet settlement of our national difficulties. The great national wish is for a peace which will embrace the whole land; that trade and commerce shall be allowed to flow in their accustomed channels; that every feeling which would bind and cement a people together should be encouraged. To accomplish this I am willing to vote for any measure having clearly in view the complete and final settlement of our difficulties coming from any quarter, from any individual, or from any of the great leaders of this House. It matters not to me so that this great object is attained. I am in favor of forever setting aside the concoctors of the late rebellion; they should "Never more be officers of mine."

Yet no vote of mine shall be given which would blot one star from the flag nor one State from the Union.

With care we may escape the dreadful dangers which now surround us, become a truly united people, with energy to restore, beautify, and stimulate the great resources of the country, and take our stand as the foremost nation of the world. We can do none of these things under this bill.

REMARKS OF HON. J. H. DEFREES, OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 12, 1867,

On the bill (H. R. No. 1143) to provide for the more efficient government of the lately rebellious States.

Mr. DEFREES. Mr. Speaker, but little over six months ago this Congress submitted a plan to the country providing a way by which the States lately in revolution might be restored to "their practical relations with the General Government." That plan was supposed at the time to have been a liberal one upon the part of the loyal States, and the generosity of the people of those States was fully manifested when the question came to be submitted to them for consideration. None doubted but that the disorganized States would readily accept of the constitutional amendment as a finality, and thus forever settle the existing difficulties. But in that expectation the country has been disappointed; and it is not necessary to discuss the question whether such refusal was brought about by the Executive, as some allege, or whether the rebellious spirit alone that seems yet to exist on the part of the community that inhabit those States caused its rejection. One thing, however, is a fact, that all the disloyal States have repudiated it.

Under these circumstances it would seem that something further in the way of legislation should be done—in addition to the proposed constitutional amendment, which I believe should still be exacted as a condition—which will speedily cause to be organized republican governments in those States, and which will give full protection to all the people.

To effect this object a number of bills have been drawn and reported to the House, and among them one by myself; but they have all alike have been swallowed up by the great maelstrom that exists here, the committee of fifteen on reconstruction, and will never again be permitted to see the light of day. According to the rule adopted nothing that relates to a reorganization of the rebel States can be considered, unless it comes through that committee, and is by it indorsed. Notwithstanding this state of facts, I will take the liberty to recur to some of the leading features of the bill submitted by me, which, I think, if they were carried into operation, would furnish a government that would give peace and quietude and protect all the interests of the people of every class.

In the first place, after setting forth the facts connected with the organizing of the present governments in the preamble, it provides that marshals shall be appointed in every county in each State to organize a board preparatory to holding an election of the people, irrespective of color, and permitting all to vote for delegates to a convention (except certain leading rebels) to be assembled at the capital of each State, at a given time, for the purpose of making a constitution. When such constitution is made and ratified by the people, and indorsed by Congress as being republican, then the existing local governments that have been set up by executive authority shall cease to be. Again, provision is made, as an inducement to the citizens to acquiesce in the proposed plan of government, for an amnesty, to apply to all who may have been engaged in rebellion, restoring them to full citizenship, and releasing them from liability for their treason, excepting those that will be excluded by the proposed constitutional amendment from holding official position; and all such are disqualified from not only voting, but from serving as delegates to any one of the State conventions provided for. This provision of course is conditional, and is only effective should the new government go into force in good faith. The President is required to furnish sufficient force from the Army and Navy to protect the people in carrying out the provisions of the law.

Such are the general features of the bill, and it seems to me, guarded as it is, that no injustice can arise to any, but that all may join in the measure of organizing a fundamental law for their State, and assist in putting into motion the machinery of Government. I am aware that most of the measures heretofore proposed for organizing those revolted States have been based upon the principle that none but those who wholly abstained from taking any part in the rebellion, or did not sympathize with traitors, should take part in reconstruction. That position now, whatever may have been its correctness, is hardly tenable. The proposed constitutional amendment ignores any such idea, but upon the other hand fully restores all to their original rights, except a certain class especially provided against. For the interest of the general welfare, and especially for those who inhabit these disturbed States, it certainly is essential that a homogeneity of feeling should be encouraged, and all the past blotted from memory as far as may be, and that the pulse of the nation once more beat in unison, so that we may go on and fulfill the expectations of the liberty-loving in establishing an empire where equal and exact justice is meted out to all people, irrespective of nationality.

Mr. Speaker, I have but little expectation that any views that I may entertain will meet with much favor from the Committee on Reconstruction. They have peculiar notions of their own, and they occasionally report something upon the subject; but they take good care to hedge around their propositions with such parliamentary obstacles as will prevent an amendment even to be offered to their bills. Not long since that committee gave us a bill in the shape of a territorial government for the rebel States, but it contained some provisions not fully satisfactory to a majority of the House; and by vote, after discussion, it was recommitted to the same committee for alteration or amendment. It was expected that in a short time the bill would be returned containing amendments in accordance with the views, as near as possible, that the discussion had drawn out. But, sir, what was the surprise a few days ago when, instead of reporting a bill providing for civil governments for the revolted States, one was sent to this House establishing a military despotism all over the South—a measure unheard of and unprecedented in the history of our legislation. When in the annals of the world was it ever necessary for a Republic in full vigor of its power, and the people in more than three fourths of its territory indorsing and sustaining by their moral force its government, was it necessary to abandon its effort to furnish its people with republican civil Government and force upon them a purely military organization whose dictum is the supreme law? The necessity, if one exists, for resorting to a measure of this character is strong presumptive evidence that the great Republic is on the wane, or that those who are now directing its affairs are not capable of grasping the situation and bringing out of it such events as the people demand.

This bill furnishes no solution to our difficulties. Instead of providing the means whereby the people might organize a government upon a proper basis, it will tyrannize over them worse than the despotisms that are now in existence in that part of the country where the law is to be enforced. Was there ever a time that the military, when the power of State was conferred upon it, that it ever sympathized with the masses of the people? The whole system of military law partakes of aristocracy, and our brigadiers, as well as those of lesser degree, will in a short time be in sympathy with the rebel aristocracy of the South, for they yet control the wealth of the country, and the poor white loyalists and freedmen will feel the force of military rule. In case of controversy between the aristocrat and the freedman, your corporal, who may be vested with a little "brief authority," sits as umpire between the parties, although he may be as ignorant of law and justice as the musket he carries on his shoulder; yet there is but one appeal from his decision, to that of the brigadier, who will be governed by the known rules of military discipline, and his judgment is final. Why, sir, in the darkest days of the rebellion, when it almost seemed as though the nation's life must perish, no such power was conferred upon an officer of the Army. If a citizen was so unfortunate as to fall under the ban of military law he had an appeal from a military court to the President of the United States, where his case was revised, and a decision had upon its merits uninfluenced by camp surroundings.

Sir, it would seem that the warning voice of history can make no impression upon the friends of this measure. When Rome placed her civil power in the hands of the military her history was written as a republic. Her liberties were soon swallowed up, and an emperor swayed a scepter over her people. It will not do to say that such can never take place in our country. So thought the ancient republics. Inaugurate the military power over one third of our Republic and there is no telling where the end will be. I know it is said that this measure is but a temporary one, and only intended to operate until Congress can establish civil governments. When will that be? This session is almost at its close, and where is the plan for civil government? Why not place the civil government in the foreground, and let the military, if needs be, assist in putting it into operation?

But, Mr. Speaker, what laws in those revolted States are to be put in force by this military government? Certainly not those made by the governments that the President set up, for these are called illegal. Not the laws of Congress, for Congress makes no laws of a police character to be enforced in the States. Congress makes no laws to regulate the dealings between individuals. Congress makes no laws regulating the settlement of estates and the divisions of property. Congress makes no laws for punishing burglary or arson. What laws, then, are to be enforced? None, sir, but the dictum of the brigadier. He is governor, legislature, and judiciary. His will is supreme, and all have got to bow to it, and acknowledge him "Lord of all he surveys."

Sir, the loyal people of this country want no such despotism organized in any part of the Republic. What they demand is a government that will give all equal rights and have those rights amply secured. They want a civil government to go in advance of the military, and to have the military subordinate to it, to be used only as a handmaid to assist, if necessary, the enforcement of the enactments made by it. A system of reconstruction is demanded of a permanent character, that all may know that when its requirements are complied with, that then there will be an end to the subject—a plan based upon the immutable laws of justice, and left with the people to adopt, under such disabilities for engaging in treason as Congress may think right for the future safety of the country. When that is done we will have discharged our duty, and the responsibility of refusal will be left with those for whose especial benefit the law was enacted.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN H. RICE,

OF MAINE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 13, 1867,

On the bill (H. R. No. 1143) to provide for a more efficient government of the insurrectionary States.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. Mr. Speaker, amidst the conflict of opinions and the "confusion of tongues" upon the condition, the disposition, and the restoration of the late insurrectionary States and the people thereof, I have not intended to utter a word nor express an opinion in this House, save by my votes, until the introduction of the bill now under consideration. But, sir, this measure involves principles of such vast magnitude, so broad in their scope, so extended in their operation, so questionable in their shape, and may become so revolutionary in their character, that I cannot give it my support without expressing my fears for the future of the country, and briefly giving my reasons for the reluctant vote which I may be constrained to record in its favor. Some of my friends upon this side of the House seem to regard it as a great measure of reconstruction, a grand panacea for all our ills, and the final resting-place for the Republic after the long agony and the "bloody sweat" of war. If such is the haven in which the nation is to be finally anchored, then, sir, I can only exclaim in hopeless agony of soul, "God save the Republic!" for nothing less than Almighty power, working through miracles such as the ages have not seen, can preserve in such a shell the soul of republican liberty.

If such be the dread extremity to which we have come at last, if this is to be our abiding place, then we have wasted our substance for naught. Ay, sir, we have shed the best blood of the nation in vain, and the bereaved and mourning widows, fathers and mothers, sisters and brothers all over the East, the North, and the great West must have added to the poignancy of their grief the conscious heart-crushing fact that their best loved ones have died as the contending hosts of the South have died, for a "lost cause;" that victors and vanquished are alike defeated; and the surviving soldiers of the Republic, that grand army of citizen patriots, now returned to the peaceful avocations of life, will look back to the battle-fields of the desolated South and sigh that they, too, did not go down with their comrades in the shock of battle and in the glory of conscious victory, rather than survive the great principles for which they fought; that the great triumph won by their prowess should thus by our folly "be turned to ashes in their mouths." Heaven grant that we may so escape from the perils that surround us and which may be involved in this measure as to avert the curses of those who have thus sacrificed and fought for the preservation of the Union upon the true basis of constitutional and republican liberty.

Mr. Speaker, if that vast portion of the Republic lately given over to rebellion and bloodshed, but now prostrate before the power of the Government, is to be held for an indefinite period as a subjugated province under military rule, divided and subdivided into military departments and districts, instead of retained as States in a grand Union of States, governed and controlled by a law-loving and loyal people, according to the principles and through the forms of civil rights and process, then a thousand times, ten thousand times, better that we had let our "erring sisters" depart in peace, and so saved the hecatombs of precious lives and the untold treasure expended in the fearful struggle through which the rebellion was subdued. If I believed for a single moment that such would be, or could be, the settled policy of the great party with which I have the honor to act, I would spit upon this bill and spurn it under my feet. In sorrow and in sadness I would part company with my friends here and pass over to the other side of this Chamber, and there, with the disconsolate, feed upon the dry husks of degenerate and demoralized Democracy for the few remaining days of this Congress; and then, disheartened and discouraged, retire to the quiet walks of private life; and there, with sorrow for the past, in anguish for the present, and hopeless for the future of my country, close out the remaining years of an unprofitable life. But, sir, I am glad to hear it generally declared, and I fully believe such to be the fact, that this is only designed as a temporary expedient, inaugurated because of present and urgent necessity to protect the loyal people, white and black, in these States, and save them from plunder, rapine, and murder.

With this understanding only, and upon the finding and report of the joint Committee on Reconstruction, based upon the testimony of distinguished officers of the Army in whom we and the people have full faith and confidence, that such necessity and such facts exist, do I consent to give this measure in any form my support. I cannot and I will not go home to my constituents with such evidence upon the record, and tell them that I refused to give the best relief in my power to bestow, even by the support of a measure so distasteful as this. My fear is that the remedy may be infinitely worse than the disease. The disease is said to be present and imminent, and that the proposed remedy will cure and not kill the patient. This may be so if it be quickly and skillfully applied, and with this hope I consent to put the medicine into the hands of the military doctors, but with the full conviction that if the operation shall be oft repeated or long continued that the patient will surely die. I do not stand here to dispute nor controvert the evidence. The witnesses are highly respectable, and have had full and most ample opportunity to observe the facts and the condition of things upon which they testify. I must say, however, because I believe it to be my duty so to state, that so far as my observation has extended in the South, I do not agree in the statement of facts adduced nor in the conclusions arrived at.

During the last summer and autumn I spent several weeks in the State of Georgia; and there mixed freely and unreservedly with all classes of the people, from the log-cabin of the poor man to the residence of the State Executive; from the squalid poverty of the one up through all the gradations of society to the refined and luxurious elegance of the other. I expressed my political sentiments freely and fully, on all proper occasions, and among all classes, without a word of insult or even rudeness from any one; and I must say, and it is with pleasure that I say it, that, in my judgment, no such state of things then existed there as to demand or justify for a remedy a measure so extreme and revolutionary as the one now under consideration. If this bill was designed to operate upon that State and that people alone I would, upon the judgment I have stated, promptly and unhesitatingly vote against it; but from the evidence adduced in the case I must suppose that a different state of facts exist in other portions of the southern country, and that this or some other prompt and "heroic" remedy is imperatively demanded. I shall therefore be constrained to vote for the bill, modified, I trust, in some respects, with the hope and expectation that some measure more in consonance with the spirit of our institutions may soon be brought forward which shall displace military power under this bill, if enacted, and give to the well-disposed, loyal people of the South protection and justice under the beneficent ægis of the Constitution and the civil law. In the mean time, the well-disposed and law-abiding in the sections where they dwell and have control must wait in patience and hope until their good example shall extend to and regenerate the people of the more rebellious sections.

Mr. Speaker, if I understand this bill, it will if enacted and executed extend martial law and military power over and into every part and portion of the territory named therein. It vacates all civil government at the will of a military commander; the courts of law, whether Federal or State, must be closed, or else proceed under the indorsement and permission of a post captain. All civil and judicial authority must necessarily end, for the exercise of either under such circumstances would be a mockery and a farce. It again inaugurates the "drum-head" and the "military commission," which I had hoped had passed away forever, in place of the forms, if not the substance, of civil government and judicial process, which have been assumed and exercised since the flag of the rebellion went down before the victorious banners of Grant and the "boys in blue." While the war lasted in visible organized force I willingly, gladly, and steadily voted here for every measure which would give strength to the military arm of the nation; and now I only submit to this measure with any degree of patience or favor upon the express finding of the committee, that the rebellion still continues in fact, not by open, manly warfare, but by permissive violence and outrage, against all men in the South who dare to love and honor and vindicate the Government of the Republic and the flag by which it is represented.

Mr. Speaker, I yet hope that the facts upon which this report of the committee is based have been overdrawn, or if not, that the southern people may be speedily convinced of the folly of their course and correct their behavior, so that in either case the necessity for the enactment and continuance of this extreme measure may cease. I trust that the bill may be amended so that it shall show upon its face that its friends regard it as only a temporary expedient for a desperate emergency, and to cease its operation when some reasonable and effectual plan of restoration shall be agreed upon. There is nothing now in the bill to show that it is not a final and permanent measure of reconstruction, (if I may so abuse the term,) to be deliberately adopted and adhered to as the policy of the majority in this House. If that idea had been distinctly negated in the bill, I might have voted for it without wearying the House with these remarks, but still with great reluctance, as I shall now do. If the Republican party expects to maintain its supremacy in the councils of the nation it must not plant itself upon the theory or the fact that the great section of the country so lately or now in rebellion is to be governed for any great length of time by military power alone. If it does it will utterly fail, and will go down before the indignant will of the people as hopelessly and as ignominiously as the Democratic party fell under the withering curse of their loyal hearts. And yet this bill does not upon its face show any other theory. It should not, I am aware, contain a party platform. I do not mean that; but it may and it should, in my judgment, negative in its preamble the legitimate and mischievous presumption of which it is susceptible.

I admit, sir, that I am jealous of military power exercised other than in subordination to the civil authority in times of comparative peace, even if delegated to the distinguished officers contemplated by this bill. With all their great skill in arms, with all their great patriotism shown upon hundreds of battlefields, with all their great qualities of intellect, purity, and public virtue, with the undivided hearts of a grateful people in their possession, still they are but men. (like the rest of us somewhat,) and being but men they are unfit to exercise the functions legitimately pertaining to civil and judicial power, except in case of war or absolute necessity, unless they first divest themselves of all military authority and proceed in strict accordance with the great precepts and principles and the prescribed forms of civil and judicial process.

Mr. Speaker, I would willingly see the distinguished General upon whom it is proposed to confer the extraordinary powers of this bill so divested of his military functions, but only to take up and retain for the prescribed term the higher position of Commander-in-Chief of the Army and the Navy, as provided by the Constitution of the United States, with the highest title which the people of the Republic can bestow superadded. Such, I believe, is the desire of the true and loyal people. But, sir, I greatly fear that that desire will be defeated if we thrust upon him any of the duties of that great office prematurely and contrary to the true intent and meaning of the fundamental law of the land.

Mr. Speaker, I believe the most earnest desire of the people whom we represent upon this floor to be the restoration of the southern States and the reconciliation of the southern people, in true loyalty of heart and mind, to the Government and the laws of the great nation under which it is our pleasure as it must be their lot to live. Can it be accomplished by measures like this? In my judgment, No! We are beginning at the wrong end of our work. We set up military power and through that hope to inaugurate civil government. We may with as much reason expect the noonday light to follow the setting of the sun. The two powers always have and always will be in direct antagonism, and can only be kept from collision by making the latter supreme over the former. We should build up or recognize civil governments in these States upon a loyal basis, and then, if need be, call in the military power to maintain and defend them, as prescribed by the Constitution and laws of the country. This measure does not contain a single element of reconstruction, restoration, or conciliation, but the reverse. The people ask for peace, and we give them war; they demand reconstruction, and we give them redestruction; they want restoration, and we give them annihilation; "they ask for bread, and we give them a stone."

The loyal and law-abiding people of the South, those who "accept the situation" in good faith, desire protection and conciliation, and so far as we know the opinions of such now in this city, they do not approve this measure, and many of them look upon it as the last knell of their failing hopes. Still we are told that rapine and murder stalks abroad at noon-day throughout all the South unrestrained and unmolested, and that we must instantly pass this bill to stay the Moloch of blood. And upon the statement of facts we must do it. No man will go further than I will to protect the true men of the South or of any other section from such a state of anarchy. But I warn my friends upon this side of the House that we cannot stand before the country long upon this measure. We must work out the fruition of the people's hopes and demands for peace and restoration in something more in accordance with the spirit of our institutions than bold, naked military power. I have no doubt that in some parts of the South a state of things exists which will fully justify the extreme remedy embodied in this bill, but I do hope and I must be permitted to believe for the future peace and welfare of all parts of the country, that it is not so throughout all that section. If such be the fact, our troubles and trials as a nation and a people have but just commenced. I have just received a letter from a reliable and most intelligent friend who has been long in Texas, in which some facts are stated bearing directly upon this question. I will read it to the House:

SHREVEPORT, LOUISIANA, January 26, 1867.

MY DEAR SIR: I see that a committee has been appointed in Congress to investigate the murdering of Union soldiers in South Carolina and elsewhere. On the 30th August last two of our soldiers were shot without any provocation at a post where they were on duty, about eighteen miles from Jefferson, Texas. Their names were privates Nathaniel Eylan and John Bull, both of company F, eightieth United States colored infantry. The murderer was one Jack Phillips, of Jefferson, and at that time holding some civil office. A complaint was made by the officer commanding the guard to the civil authorities and a warrant was issued; but after the troops were withdrawn from that station, which was a few days after, not the least effort was made to arrest him, and in a few weeks he returned to Jefferson, and has been there since, unmolested by the civil authorities. It is not considered an offense in that section to kill a negro, and especially a negro soldier.

There is no law or protection in this section for the poor colored man; but they are being murdered in cold blood every week; and where is the strong arm of the Government? Heart-rending scenes have been brought to my attention all through the past year, which if you gentlemen in Congress could see and know as I do would induce you to do something for the race whom you have taken from slavery in name, but whose freedom in fact you have guaranteed. It is criminal to take these people from the protection of their masters and leave them in a land of murderers and ruffians with no protection. Your Freedmen's Bureau bill amounts to nothing, for they, that is the officers of the bureau, have no power, or are not allowed to exercise any, except to tell the outraged negro where the office of the justice of the peace is; a sort of guide-post for them. Your Army amounts to but little, for in officering the new regiments no care seems to have been exercised to appoint men possessed of heart, soul, and intellect. I could recite more atrocities and outrages against freedmen in eastern Texas and northwestern Louisiana than would fill one hundred pages like this, and more facts than all the committees and inspectors sent down here, fattening upon the luxuries of rebels' tables and hearing their hypocritical statements. We are to be mustered out. My address for a few days—say two or three weeks—will be 16 Natchez street, New Orleans, care J. H. Hatch, when I shall go north to Maine.

Respectfully, &c.,

CHARLES W. LOWELL.

Major Eightieth United States Colored Infantry,

Hon. JOHN H. RICE, M. C.

Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding this dark picture, I yet have hope for a peaceful and in some degree satisfactory solution of our difficulties. The Legislatures of the southern States have unwisely, and in some cases rudely, rejected the constitutional amendment submitted by this Congress at its last session. I still have faith to believe that that just and conciliatory measure may yet be ratified by many of these States by an appeal to the people from the action of their representatives. It should be remembered that probably three fourths or more of the men in the South who have voted upon the question of the ratification in their Legislatures would be disqualified under the provisions of the third section. This may be the reason for their action, but no such reason exists in the minds of the masses of the people, for probably nineteen twentieths will not be so affected. It ought not to be supposed, and it is not a fact, that the masses there have any desire to retain or sustain the original breeders of the rebellion in places of trust and power; on the contrary, they must know from their sufferings, if not by their reason, that all their ills have been brought upon them by their words and acts of misrepresentation and deception. They do have and will have faith in the men who opposed secession, and then, after being beaten upon the stump, went with them into the ranks and fought for a cause which they knew was wrong and in which they did not believe, and had predicted would fail. These men will now have power, while the unrepentant secessionists will be cursed and forgotten.

It may be said that this class of men (the copperheadists as they were termed) are no better than the other class. I do not think so, for all must understand the difficulties of their position. I have no doubt that some of the secessionists are now better disposed to the Government and accept the situation in better faith than some of the cooperationists, but the general rule must be the other way. I believe, sir, that the true policy for us to pursue is to divide the people of the South in political sentiment, so that they will organize into antagonistic parties instead of consolidating into one party, and that party in affiliation and acting in conjunction with the Democratic party of the North. Just so long as such a state of things exists, just so long the country will be in peril, for we cannot keep these States out forever, and with the great States of New York and Pennsylvania, so nearly divided politically between saints and sinners as they are, we are liable at any time to pass into the power of a reunited, a reconstructed, but not a regenerated Democratic party, for it will be under the control of the rank copperheads and the unconverted secessionists. The first financial shudder, the first commercial agony that shall sweep over the land will unsettle and overturn our majorities in those two great States, and then we shall "gnash our teeth" in agony, and the Republic will again go darkling through the realms of political infamy, and quite likely culminate again in blood and disaster.

I beg my friends here to open their eyes to this great danger. Do not lay the flattering unction to your souls that the Democratic party is dead. It is hardly asleep, only a little dormant, while generating and bottling up virus for future mischief. It is the political worm in our body-politic which never dies. It is "coppered and copper-fastened," and will ride out the storms of political adversity and come safely into port, provided it can recruit its old officers and crew from the South. Our only safety is to take out its fangs, and the only way to do that is to divide the people of the South. If we are wise we can do this. How? Let us properly appreciate the great work that has been accomplished by the war, the radical and revolutionary fact that slavery has been abolished, and that the southern people, or the great mass of them, recognize and concur in the living, glorious truth that it is so, and would not have it restored if they could. This breaks the great material bond, the one strong political cord that held them united and bound them to the Democratic party before the war. There is no earthly reason why they shall again unite in that affiliation, and they will not, unless we are idle and fail to properly use the instrumentalities within our reach. They know very well that all the promises made to them before the war by the Democratic leaders were shamelessly broken, and that they deceived them as to the feelings and the promised action of their followers in the North in case of war.

Let us, then, appeal to the people of the South, the laboring, suffering millions there, and indoctrinate them with the true principles of republican liberty, instruct them in the manhood of free labor, and the advantages of free schools. The foundation of reconstruction must be laid deep and solid in the hearts and minds of the common people. We can reach and touch them now by words and acts of kindness. Some of them may at first turn from us with revilings, because of their ignorance of us and the motives which actuate us; but we can surely forgive those who are ignorant and have been misled and deceived by others. They are stricken and suffering from the desolations of war and the bitter pinching of poverty and hunger, and shall we also smite those whom God has stricken? No! Let us discriminate in their behalf, while we visit incorrigible and unrepentant rebels, those who have been instrumental in bringing the wrath of God down upon them and upon us, and are still inciting the people to deeds of wrong and violence, with the full force and vengeance of the Government. This I know cannot be accomplished here to any great extent; these Halls are not peculiarly dedicated to deeds of charity and Christian benevolence. It is easier for us to than to bind up the wounds of the suffering, light up the minds of the benighted, and feed the mouths of the hungry; but surely in executing justice we may as far as possible discriminate against those who "sin against light and knowledge," and in favor of the poor and the suffering. While I will go as far as any one upon this floor in the just punishment of the former, I am free to confess that my heart opens in sympathy toward the latter in their dire distress. Now is the time for the great pulsating, benevolent heart of the North to pour out the warmth of its love upon the suffering poor in our own land, and to thrust its broad, generous hands deep down into its capacious pockets and from thence draw out and distribute generous supplies for their shivering bodies and their hungry mouths, and this without inquiring as to their past offenses, but only as to their immediate needs.

I hail with intense satisfaction the great deed, the munificent gift, the generous act of the distinguished philanthropist, Mr. George Peabody, in placing in the hands of trustees more than two million dollars for "the educational needs of those portions of our beloved and common country which have suffered from the destructive ravages and the not less disastrous consequences of civil war." I hope that others who have the ability may make additions to that fund; and that it may go on accumulating and distributing its blessings until every child in the sunny South, "without distinction of race or color," shall be able to read and understand the noble letter through which the great gift was made and the trust created. Such will be for the "healing of the nation."

Mr. Speaker, I will with the permission of the House have printed as a part of my remarks, the correspondence which consummated this grand transaction, so that it shall be preserved forever in the annals of the nation, and made a sweet place of rest for the weary student while plodding through the ponderous tome. An oasis, the one green spot, amid an infinite waste of words.

To Hon. Robert C. Winthrop, of Massachusetts; Hon. Hamilton Fish, of New York; Right Rev. Charles P. McIlvaine, of Ohio; General U. S. Grant, of the United States Army; Hon. William C. Rives, of Virginia; Hon. John H. Clifford, of Massachusetts; Hon. William Aiken, of South Carolina; William M. Evarts, esq., of New York; Hon. William A. Graham, of North Carolina; Charles Macalester, of Pennsylvania; George W. Riggs, esq., of Washington; Samuel Wetmore, esq., of New York; Edward A. Bradford, esq., of Louisiana; George N. Eaton, esq., of Maryland; and George Peabody Russell, esq., of Massachusetts:

GENTLEMEN: I beg to address you on a subject which occupied my mind long before I left England, and in regard to which one, at least, of you (Hon. Mr. Winthrop, the distinguished and valued friend to whom I am so much indebted for cordial sympathy, careful consideration, and wise counsel in this matter) will remember that I consulted him immediately upon my arrival in May last.

I refer to the educational needs of those portions of our beloved and common country which have suffered from the destructive ravages, and the not less disastrous consequences of civil war.

With my advancing years my attachment to my native land has but become more devoted. My hope and faith in its successful and glorious future have grown brighter and stronger, and now, looking forward beyond my stay on earth, as may be permitted to one who has passed the limit of threescore and ten years, I see our country united and prosperous, emerging from the clouds which still surround her, taking a higher rank among the nations and becoming richer and more powerful than ever before.

But to make her prosperity more than superficial, her moral and intellectual development should keep pace with her material growth, and in those portions of our nation to which I have referred, the urgent and pressing physical needs of an almost impoverished people must for some years preclude them from making, by unaided effort, such advances in education, and such progress in the diffusion of knowledge among all classes, as every lover of his country must earnestly desire.

I feel most deeply, therefore, that it is the duty and privilege of the more favored and wealthy portions of our nation to assist those who are less fortunate, and, with the wish to discharge so far as I may be able my own responsibility in this matter, as well as to gratify my desire to aid those to whom I am bound by so many ties of attachment and regard, I give to you, gentlemen, most of whom have been my personal and especial friends, the sum of $1,000,000, to be by you and your successors held in trust, and the income thereof used and applied in your discretion for the promotion and encouragement of intellectual, moral or industrial education among the young of the more destitute portions of the southern and southwestern States of our Union; my purpose being that the benefits intended shall be distributed among the entire population, without other distinction than their needs and the opportunities of usefulness to them.

Besides the income thus derived, I give to you permission to use from the principal sum, within the next two years, an amount not exceeding forty per cent.

In addition to this gift I place in your hands bonds of the State of Mississippi, issued to the Planters' Bank, and commonly known as Planters' Bank bonds, amounting, with interest, to about eleven hundred thousand dollars, the amount realized by you from which is to be added to and used for the purposes of this trust. These bonds were originally issued in payment for stock in that bank held by the State, and amounted in all to only $2,000,000. For many years the State received large dividends from that bank over and above the interest on these bonds. The State paid the interest without interruption till 1840, since which no interest has been paid, except a payment of about one hundred thousand dollars, which was found in the treasury, applicable to the payment of the coupons, and paid by a mandamus of the Supreme Court. The validity of these bonds has never been questioned, and they must not be confounded with another issue of bonds made by the State to the Union Bank, the recognition of which has been a subject of controversy with a portion of the population of Mississippi.

Various acts of the Legislature, namely, of February 23, 1842; February 23, 1844; February 16, 1846; February 28, 1846; March 4, 1848, and the highest judicial tribunal of the State have confirmed their validity, and I have no doubt that at an early day such legislation will be had as to make these bonds available in increasing the usefulness of the present trust.

Mississippi, though now depressed, is rich in agricultural resources, and cannot long disregard the moral obligation resting upon her to make provision for their payment. In confirmation of what I have said in regard to the legislative and judicial action concerning the State bonds issued to the Planters' Bank I herewith place in your hands the documents marked A.

The details and organization of the trust I leave with you, only requesting that Mr. Winthrop may be chairman and Governor Fish and Bishop McIlvaine vice chairmen of your body. And I give to you power to make all necessary by-laws and regulations, to obtain an act of incorporation if any shall be found expedient, to provide for the expenses of the trustees and of any agents appointed by them, and generally to do all such acts as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of this trust.

All vacancies occurring in your number by death, resignation, or otherwise, shall be filled by your election, so soon as conveniently may be, and having in view an equality of representation so far as regards the northern and southern States.

I furthermore give to you the power, in case two thirds of the trustees shall at any time after the lapse of thirty years deem it expedient, to close this trust, and of the funds which at that time shall be in the hands of yourselves and your successors, to distribute not less than two thirds among such educational or literary institutions, or for such educational purposes as you and they may determine in the States for whose benefit the income is now appointed to be used. The remainder may be distributed by the trustees for educational or literary purposes where ever they may deem it expedient.

In making this gift, I am aware that the fund derived from it can but aid the States which I wish to benefit, in their own exertions to diffuse the blessings of education and morality. But if this endowment shall encourage those now anxious for the light of knowledge, and stimulate to new efforts the many good and noble men who cherish the high purpose of placing our great country foremost, not only in power, but in the intelligence and virtue of her citizens, it will have accomplished all that I can hope.

With reverent recognition of the need of the blessing of Almighty God upon this gift, and with the fervent prayer that under His guidance your counsels may be directed for the highest good of present and future generations in our beloved country, I am, gentlemen, with great respect, your humble servant,

GEORGE PEABODY.

WASHINGTON, February 7, 1867.

Upon the receipt of the above letter by Hon. Robert C. Winthrop, a meeting of the gentlemen named in it was called to consider the matter, whereupon the following resolutions were presented by Bishop McIlvaine, of Ohio, and signed by those trustees present in Washington:

Whereas our honored countryman and friend, George Peabody, has, in a letter just communicated to the undersigned, made known his determination, out of a grateful sense of the manifold goodness with which God has prospered his life, and of an earnest desire to promote the best interests of his fellow-citizens, to devote a munificent donation of property for certain most wise and beneficent uses, indicated in said letter, and has requested us to take in trust the charge and management of the same: Therefore,

Resolved, That the undersigned, being the trustees assembled in Washington, deeply sensible of the honor conferred on them by a trust of such eminent importance and responsibility, and realizing their dependence upon the guidance and blessing of God to be enabled to discharge its duties with such wisdom and faithfulness as may best secure the benevolent designs of the gift, do hereby accept the office of trustees of the same, and promise our best exertions in its behalf.

Resolved, That we hereby express to Mr. Peabody our grateful appreciation of the enlarged and unprecedented generosity which, after having bestowed on the poor of the city of London a bounty that drew forth the admiration of Europe, and after having exceeded the same in his recent return to his native land in benefactions to institutions of learning and education in the middle and eastern States of the Union, has now crowned the whole with this last deed of patriotism and loving kindness so eminently calculated to bind together the several parts of our beloved country in the best bonds of mutual well-doing and regard.

Resolved, That we express to Mr. Peabody our respectful and affectionate prayer that in the gracious providence of our Heavenly Father his valuable life may be long spared to witness the success of his benevolent contributions to the happiness of his fellow-citizens in all parts of his native and beloved land, and that many of those whom God has blessed with large possessions may be induced to follow his example of wise and noble employment of wealth for the good of man and the glory of God.

Mr. Speaker, I for one would willingly vote to donate from the public Treasury an equal sum for a like purpose were it not that it might be invoked as a precedent in the future for similar appropriations. As a plan of reconstruction it would be far more effective and largely less expensive than "an army with banners." I have no earthly doubt that $5,000,000, judiciously expended for the relief of the actual sufferings of the people of the South, would do more to reconcile and restore them and the States to amicable relations with the Government than twenty times that sum expended in the execution of measures like this now before the House. But, sir, I have been led away from the line of my argument into theories which may be regarded by some as weak and impracticable, and perhaps by some others as trenching close upon the confines of political heresy.

When I "ran off the track" I was about to say that our great battle must be fought with the Democratic party for a division of the southern people into political parties, and that the abolition of slavery rendered that a natural and an easy thing to do. Upon the basis of the constitutional amendment, notwithstanding its present rejection, I believe, together with other reasonable conditions, that more than one half of the southern States could be carried for the Union candidates in the next presidential election. The Democrats rely upon their old game of representing themselves as exclusively the friends of the South and of the southern people; and the strongest possible argument against the intelligence of the people there is that they succeed so well in making them believe it, when in fact they were before the war, during the war, and are now their greatest enemies. If that party or the President had declared in favor of the amendment it would have been carried, and the southern States might have been represented here today in accordance with the expressed will of the northern people in their most emphatic action at the polls.

If all other measures fail, as they may fail in this Congress and in the first session of the next, we should in my judgment make a vigorous effort to carry a part of the southern States for the amendment by a direct appeal to the people. I believe this may be done and thus destroy the power of the Democratic party, which after all I regard as being the great enemy with which we have to contend. That power confronts us here and it confronts us there. Strike it down there and it falls here and everywhere, and with it falls all the wrongs and the violence and the outrage that now prevails at the South and which distracts us here to-day. I do not mean to charge our friends on the other side of this House as directly or indirectly encouraging such a state of things, for they are all "honorable men," and many of them my personal friends, who would not be guilty of any such offense; but the fact of their great power in the States I have named and some others of the northern States, induces the southern people who are disloyal and ill-disposed to exercise their "amiable qualities" in committing wrongs and outrages upon defenseless negroes and loyal white men, and relying upon the Democratic party for friendship and general amnesty.

If the measure now before the House shall fail to become the law, as I think it will in its present shape, and if no better measure can be agreed upon as a finality upon this question, let a grand political campaign be inaugurated upon the basis of the constitutional amendment and universal manhood suffrage. The proposed amendment is I know quite generally misunderstood by the people of the South. I so found the fact, and I did not find but very few who made objection to it after they understood it, other than those who would be disqualified from holding office under the third section. If the masses of the people can be induced to accept it in good faith, probably no better method of reconstruction and reconciliation can be devised. I believe that a line of towns and counties and States from the mountains of West Virginia down to the Gulf can be carried, by proper effort, and through the instrumentalities I have named, and thus dividing the southern country again, now in the interests of peace, transversely to that other division made by the hosts of war. Not by a pathway strewn with the desolations and ruin of war and lighted by the glare of burning towns and hamlets, but one made joyous by the blessings of peace and contentment. This effected, the belt would rapidly expand, left and right, to the dashing waves of the Atlantic in the east and to the murmuring ripples of the Rio Grande in the west. Then the great desire of the nation's heart, the rich fruition of the people's hopes, the grand consummation of our labors—reconciliation, reunion, and restoration, these three in one—will have become an accomplished fact.

Then from the fountains of wealth in the North the waste places of the South will be rapidly rebuilt, and the ever-rushing tide of human migration from the East and from over the sea, no longer turned westward by the dark barrier of slavery, will spread itself throughout her borders. Then the land will bud and blossom—in all the valleys and upon the hillsides, along the rivers and the arms of the sea, upon the mountains and the broad savannas—with the ripe, rich fruits of human industry, directed by the impulse of free minds and the energy of willing hands. That diversity of employment and production will then obtain which was impossible under the old system of labor, and the want of which has kept the South lagging behind the other sections. Not only will her rich fields and savannas produce increased riches in cotton, corn, and sugar, but her mountain sides, touched by the wand of freedom, will pour forth rich streams of mineral wealth. Her coasts and her rivers will whiten with the sails and hiss with the steam of commerce and navigation; and the waters of her numerous streams will laugh and sparkle amid the revolving wheels of manufacturing machinery. Thus, under the stimulus of free labor, with a free Bible and free schools everywhere and the blessing of God, the nation will be regenerated and take a new start in the race of prosperity and empire. Slavery was the "dead-line" which divided the sections. It has been obliterated by the sharp point of the bayonet and the atonement of blood. Let us not raise another wall in its stead, but stand together in republican equality upon the broad plain of a common country, a common brotherhood, and a common destiny.

These views, Mr. Speaker, at the present time, may seem extravagant and Utopian; but, sir, if wisdom and true statesmanship shall govern the hearts of the people and the action of their representatives, all that my words have indicated and even more will be accomplished. It is time for us to abandon the idea that the southern people are to be punished for their treason by excluding them from participation in the Government under which they are to live. The question to be determined is, are they loyal and well-disposed toward the Government now? I believe that the great body of them are so. They do not want to fight any more; they have had enough of that; they do not desire to have slavery reestablished even if they could; they know that it has been the fruitful cause of all their trials and sufferings, and they do not desire that their children shall be subject to the like. We cannot exclude all who have given aid to the rebellion in the South from participation and voice in the Government and preserve even the semblance of republican institutions there. The grand foundation-stone upon which our form of government rests is equal, unrestricted manhood suffrage, and the sooner we reach uniformity in all the States in that respect the better it will be for all. We cannot set up a military government nor an oligarchy in one part of the country and maintain it for any length of time without endangering the entire national edifice. If we are wise we shall not try the experiment beyond the bounds of absolute necessity, but hasten forward as speedily as possible to the auspicious day when all government and divisions of government in our happy land shall rest securely "upon the consent of the governed."

REMARKS OF HON. F. E. WOODBRIDGE, OF VERMONT,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 18, 1867.

The House having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1143) to provide for the more efficient government of the lately rebellious States—

Mr. WOODBRIDGE said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I think it will be admitted by all that when we adopted the constitutional amendments at the last session of Congress it was with the understanding that upon their ratification by the rebellious States restoration to the Union and representation in Congress would naturally and perhaps necessarily follow. We went to the country upon that ground and made it an issue in the elections last autumn. A triumphant and overwhelming majority of the loyal people sustained us. The South, instead of accepting our reasonable and generous propositions, hurled them back upon us with derision and scorn, and regardless of all law, either human or divine, and with a recklessness and hate worthy only of demons, have oppressed loyal men; refused to protect their persons or property; driven them from their homes and their States for no other reason than because they stood by the grand old flag; and, if accounts are true, they have beaten and scourged and murdered the poor freedman, and never in a single instance has the offender been punished.

In this condition of things an additional duty is imposed upon Congress, and that is, first of all to provide some means whereby loyal men in the South shall be protected in their persons and property. Under this paramount obligation of the Government to all its loyal citizens the bill introduced the other day by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STREYENS,] called the military bill, was justifiable, and met with my support. However inconsistent with a Republic martial law may be, or however onerous a military government may be, Congress, as the supreme legislative body of the nation, may establish either or both when the safety of the Government or of the people demand it. I was not particularly pleased with the bill, and greatly prefer the amendment which has passed the Senate and is now under consideration. I greatly doubted the constitutionality of the provision directing the General of the Army to detail officers, not below the rank of brigadier generals, to command the districts into which the ten rebellious States were divided, upon the ground that Congress has no authority to grant to any one a power the exercise of which directly infringes upon that clause in the Constitution which makes the President of the United States the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy.

Somewhat distrusting my own judgment, however, and differing with several gentlemen, for whose opinions I entertain the profoundest respect, I supported the bill, believing that the Senate would relieve it of any unconstitutional provisions. It seems that the Senate agreed with me, and in the amendment have given to the President the power which in the original bill was conferred upon the General of the Army. The country demand of the present Congress two things respecting the rebellious States: one is such legislation as will protect loyal men, black and white, in their lives, liberty, and property; the other is some well-defined plan or platform, by which the loyal people of the South may reorganize and reestablish State governments, republican in form, which may be recognized and accepted by Congress, and they thereby become entitled to representation as States in the Union. This Congress, sir, will be untrue to itself and untrue to the country if it adjourns without accomplishing these two results, and I doubt whether the party can sustain itself which fails to do so.

Mr. Speaker, I will very briefly examine the proposed amendment for the purpose of convincing gentlemen, if possible, that it will meet the exigencies of the times and the demands of the country. I confess, sir, that it does not entirely suit me. While, in my judgment, the purposes which we seek may be fairly attained under its provisions, I would prefer such alterations as would have nothing to intendment or implication. But, sir, as we have but one day left in which to get the bill into the hands of the Executive it is necessary to have early and speedy action; and the fact that, so far as I am informed, it met with the favor of every Republican Senator, induces me to believe that any material changes would cause delay.

Two objections are raised against the bill. First, that the rebellious States will be in the hands and under the control of rebels until their restoration to the Union; and second, that the third section confers suffrage upon all, including the prominent and leading rebels, or, as some have expressed it, grants universal suffrage and universal amnesty. I deny both these propositions. The amendment in its preamble states that no legal State governments or adequate protection for life or property now exists in the ten rebel States, and that it is necessary that peace and good order should be enforced in said States until loyal and republican State governments can be legally established; and for that purpose it is provided in the first section that the rebel States shall be divided into five military districts and made subject to the military authority of the United States. The second section provides that the President shall assign to the command of each district an officer of the Army, not below the rank of brigadier general, and detail a sufficient military force to enable him to perform his duties and enforce his authority.

SENATE.

Reconstruction—Mr. Davis.

39TH CONG....2D SESS.

The third section prescribes the duties of the commanding officers, and they are to protect all persons in their rights of person and property, to suppress insurrection, disorder, and violence, and to punish or cause to be punished all disturbers of the public peace and criminals; and to enable them to perform this duty they may allow the local civil tribunals to take jurisdiction of and try offenders, or when they deem it necessary for the purposes of justice they may organize military commissions or tribunals for that purpose; and provides further that all interference under color of state authority with the exercise of military authority under the act shall be null and void. Hence, sir, it will be seen that under this bill the State governments in the rebellious districts are simply permissive so far as the administration of justice is concerned. When under wholesome laws the rights of person and property are properly protected by the local courts military power does not interfere, but when the loyal man, black or white, is not protected in all his rights, either by reason of unjust laws or disloyal public sentiment, then the officer in command erects his military court and administers even justice to all; and so, sir, it seems to me that during the period of military occupation under the bill, ample provisions and safeguards are established for the protection of the persons, property, and rights of loyal citizens, and that under no circumstances if the provisions of the bill are faithfully executed can rebel supremacy or rebel malignity trample upon the rights of the loyal.

Such, sir, is my answer to the first objection to the Senate amendment. It is, however, further objected that under the provisions of the fifth section suffrage and amnesty are granted to the leading rebels. Sir, if I so regarded it I would oppose the measure; for never, never, until there have been many works meet for repentance and growth in grace for years, would I permit one of that wicked, oath-breaking class either to hold an office or to vote. But, sir, the bill is not obnoxious to such criticism, and gentlemen who adopt such a construction are in my judgment mistaken. It is true that the fifth section provides that when the people of any one of the rebellious States shall have formed a constitution, &c., plainly implying that all male citizens over twenty-one years of age may vote for members of the convention by which the constitution shall be framed; but, sir, does this grant suffrage to all? Not at all, sir. It simply grants to all the right which has ever been held sacred in this country—alike to the innocent and the guilty—namely, the right of petition. It neither directly or by implication grants suffrage or amnesty to leading rebels. Still, sir, I will favor an amendment, if gentlemen consider such an amendment important, providing that no person disqualified from holding office under the third section of the proposed constitutional amendment shall vote for members of the convention elected to form the State constitution.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think I have shown that under the military provisions of this bill we secure protection to all the loyal people, and the question now arises as to whether the bill provides a plan or platform whereby the insurgent States may return to their allegiance and a practical restoration to the Union upon conditions that are just to them and safe for ourselves. I think it does. It provides that the State constitutions shall be in conformity with the Constitution of the United States in all respects; that it shall be ratified by a majority of the male citizens of the State, twenty-one years old and upward, of whatever race, color, or previous condition of servitude, who have been resident of the State for one year previous to voting upon the question of ratifying such constitution, except they may be disfranchised for participating in the rebellion or for felony; that the elective franchise shall be guaranteed to the black man as well as to the white man; that the constitution shall be submitted to Congress for examination and approval; that the Legislature elected under the constitution shall adopt the proposed constitutional amendments, and that said proposed amendments shall have become a part of the Constitution of the United States before any of said States shall be restored to the Union and become entitled to representation in Congress; and that until all these conditions precedent are complied with, the military arm of the Government shall be charged with the protection of the person and property of every loyal citizen.

The bill secures universal suffrage on the one hand, and on the other prevents any person from holding any office, civil or military, State or Federal, who in the exercise of any prominent office had taken the oath to support the Constitution of the United States and then engaged in rebellion or given aid or comfort thereto. The future safety of the country demands all these guarantees, and if they are accepted by the rebellious States, fraternity will follow and the future of the South will be as bright and glorious as her past has been wicked and oppressive.

SPEECH OF HON. GARRETT DAVIS, OF KENTUCKY,
IN THE UNITED STATES SENATE,
February 16, 1867.

The Senate having under consideration as in Committee of the Whole the bill (H. R. No. 1143) to provide for the more efficient government of the insurrectionary States—

Mr. DAVIS said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: It is not my purpose to attempt a discussion in detail of the bill under consideration, or of the different propositions to amend it, offered and suggested, or of the twin measure, "A bill for the reestablishment of civil government in the State of Louisiana." That work has been performed in so masterly and complete a manner by Senators who have preceded me in this debate, the revolting injustice and oppression contemplated by each and all of these propositions have been presented by those Senators with so much distinctness and fullness, and in such vivid colors, as to render all further efforts to perform that part of the work wholly superfluous. But I state the proposition broadly, that Congress has no constitutional authority, no power whatever to pass these or similar measures; and I propose to state some principles and to read some authorities in support of that position.

The Constitution is the source and the only source of all the powers of Congress. If it be invested with any that are not written down expressly in the Constitution it is because they are principles of national or maritime or some other body of law, that are adopted and embodied into the Government of the United States by some language of that instrument.

How and by whom was the Constitution made? The Colonies, by their Declaration of Independence in 1776, each severally became a sovereign and independent State, and each for itself clothed with every political power and every attribute of sovereignty possessed by any nation.

The second of the Articles of Confederation is in these words:

"Each State retains its sovereignty, freedom, and independence, and every power, jurisdiction, and right which is not by this Confederation expressly delegated to the United States in Congress assembled."

There are several other articles to the same effect.

These Articles of Confederation did not form a Government, but merely a league, leaving each State possessed of its full sovereignty to perform or not perform, according to its own will, its engagements and duties to the Confederation. There was no mode of coercing a defaulting State, except ratione ultima, by force of arms, as among independent nations. It failed essentially to fulfill the purposes for which the States had designed it. Every intelligent American felt the absolute necessity of a more perfect Union of the States and a vigorous Government to manage their affairs. The Congress had no authority to call a convention to take these subjects into consideration; and therefore the States voluntarily, and each by its separate action, chose delegates to meet together in this momentous consultation, in which the delegates from each State represented a distinct and independent sovereignty. This Convention proceeded to form a plan of union and government for all the States, and to recommend its adoption by them. It provided for the formation of a common Government with three separate and coordinate departments, legislative, executive, and judiciary, to which the States should delegate a part of their sovereignty and powers, particularly named, and chiefly in the organization of each department, and which were appropriate to enable the common Government to manage the affairs of the United States with each other, with foreign nations, and the Indian tribes.

Such a Government, being made for limited purposes and by the grant of named powers from States having the possession of all political sovereignty, the whole of that sovereignty, except what was thus transferred to the common Government or expressly placed in abeyance, remained with the States. The Supreme Court has repeatedly decided that this was an inherent principle of the Government. The Constitution was adopted and became the Government of the United States by the action of the people of each State in sovereign Convention. There was a provision that—

"The ratification of the conventions of nine States shall be sufficient for the establishment of this Constitution between the States so ratifying the same."

Each State being sovereign and possessed of the perfect right and power to adopt or reject, it could not be the Government or have any obligation on any State until its adoption by such State. North Carolina and Rhode Island refused for a year or two to adopt the Constitution, during which period each was a separate and independent sovereignty and nation; and if they had adhered to that position, and had not been conquered by the other States, would have so remained to this day.

The innate, but unexpressed principle, that all powers not conferred by the Constitution on the common Government, did not satisfy our vigilant fathers, who at least valued as much the rights which they had not delegated by it to the General Government, and which were to be exercised by each State for its own domestic government, as they did the possession and exercise by the common Government of the powers with which it had been invested. Therefore, the people of all the States added this amendment to the Constitution:

"The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

This principle has been frequently recognized by the Supreme Court, both as inherent in the original text of the Constitution, and as again expressly established by the amendment which I have read. In the case of Briscoe and others against the Bank of the Commonwealth of Kentucky that court says:

"The Federal Government is one of delegated powers; all powers not delegated to it, or inhibited to the States, are reserved to the States or to the people."—11 Peters, 250.

The same principle is as distinctly recognized by that court in many other cases; and among them is that of the mayor, aldermen, and commonalty of the city of New York against Mien, (11 Peters, 139,) in which the court says that—

"A State has the same undonable and unlimited jurisdiction over all persons and things within its territorial limits as any foreign nation, where that jurisdiction is not surrendered or restrained by the Constitution of the United States."

There are other authorities to the same effect, but this is the plain principle of the Constitution. The authorities upon which I rely clearly establish these positions:

1. That the Government of the United States is one of delegated powers.

2. That it has no powers which the Constitution does not confer upon it.

3. That the Constitution must have invested Congress with some power that will cover the bill under consideration, and the passage of which will be an appropriate exercise of that power, or it will be void if passed.

The advocates of this measure, and especially the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD,] claim that the war powers of Congress give authority to pass it, and that the military and naval forces of the United States having suppressed the rebellion in the lately revolted States, Congress was thereby placed in the position of the conqueror of those States, and by the laws of nations became invested with all the rights and powers in those States that one nation at war with another would acquire by its conquest. I propose to examine this most novel and startling proposition. Congress by one provision of the Constitution is empowered—

"To declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and make rules concerning captures on land and water."

And by another provision—

"To provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions."

Other provisions of the Constitution declare that—

"The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several States, when called into the service of the United States," and he "shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed."

The Supreme Court, in the Prize Cases, (2 Black, 666,) says:

"War has been well defined to be that state in which a nation prosecutes its right by force."

And in the same opinion (668) it says:

"By the Constitution, Congress alone has the power to declare a national or foreign war. It cannot declare war against a State or any number of States, by virtue of any clause in the Constitution. The Constitution confers on the President the whole executive power. He is bound to take care that the laws be faithfully executed. He is Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several States when called into the actual service of the United States. He has no power to initiate or declare war either against a foreign nation or a domestic State. But by the acts of Congress of February 28, 1795, and 3d of March, 1807, he is authorized to call out the militia, and use the military and naval forces of the United States in case of invasion by foreign nations, and to suppress insurrection against the government of a State, or of the United States."

The learned court, when it announced that Congress "cannot declare war against a State or against any number of States, by virtue of any clause in the Constitution," could have added with as much truth, "nor any other law or claim of power." Our Constitution establishes not only a complicated, but a peculiar and unique, at the time, form of government. Other forms of government afford no aid in determining the character of ours, the extent of its powers, or their distribution among its different departments and officers. They may be resorted to for the purpose of ascertaining their meaning of phrases and language which our Constitution has borrowed from them; but they, or any powers which they impart, cannot have the effect to overrule any provisions of our Constitution, to nullify any powers organized by it, or to change their investiture from any of its departments or officers, much less to confer new powers upon the Government and to indicate which of its magistracy are to execute them. This practice of drawing analogies between the monarchies and despotisms of Europe and the Government of the United States, and interpreting its powers, and their distribution by those other Governments, has produced in our country much error and mischief. Our Government has but a single source, the Constitution, in which is written down its whole law, and that is "the supreme law of the land." Any and everything in the constitutions and laws of the States, in the laws of nations, maritime law, and all other bodies of law, in conflict with the Constitution, or any of its provisions, fall by its touch and before its intrinsic power: it could not otherwise be "the supreme law of the land."

In giving construction to it, resort must be had principally to its text, and then to the debates of the Convention which formed it, to the defects of the system it was intended to supersede, and the exigencies of the country that required a more vigorous Government, to the contemporary expositions, and its interpretation in the decisions of the Supreme Court. When brought to these tests, the Constitution will be found to establish clearly these propositions:

1. Congress can constitutionally make war only against foreign nations.

2. Congress has no authority to make war upon a State for any purpose.

3. When the people of one or more States make war against the United States, by resisting forcibly the due execution of their laws or rebelling against them, it is the duty of Congress to raise the necessary military and naval power to enforce the execution of the laws and to suppress the rebellion.

4. When the insurgents have been suppressed and submit to the authority, Constitution, and laws of the United States, arms can no longer be rightfully used against them.

5. In any conflict of arms between the United States and any portion of the people the former have no rights of conquest whatever.

I propose to make some further examination of these positions, and will treat of the first two together.

When it is observed that the Constitution, in after clauses, expressly authorizes Congress to use military force to execute the laws of the Union, to suppress insurrections, to repel invasions, and to protect every State against domestic violence, being all the forms in which internal war can be made, it cannot be doubted that its previously established power to declare war relates to foreign nations only. If it had been intended to comprehend domestic wars also they would not have been specially provided for in later express enumerations. The debates of the Convention, the Federalist, and other contemporaneous expositions of the Constitution show clearly that the power "to declare war" was intended to operate only against foreign nations; and that construction having been given to it by the Supreme Court it is not now an open question.

If Congress has no authority to make war upon a State, and that position can be established by argument, it would also demonstrate that its power to declare war would necessarily be restricted to foreign nations. For the United States to declare or make war against one or more States, and conquest and subjugation to ensue, would be for the whole to destroy its parts, the body its members, and where would the operation of such a principle stop? There was no proposition or thought in the Convention to confer on the common Government any such power; but it was proposed to authorize it to coerce the States by military force for particular ends. Mr. Randolph, in the sixth resolution of his series, embodying his ideas of some of the principal features of the new Government, among many others, proposed that it should have power "to call forth the force of the Union against any member of the Union failing to fulfill its duty under the articles thereof."

In the plan submitted by Mr. Patterson, for himself and several of the deputations, a similar proposition, but in a more circumscribed and special form, was offered in this language:

"That if any State, or any body of men in any State, shall oppose or prevent the carrying into execution such acts or treaties, the Federal Executive shall be authorized to call forth the power of the Confederate States, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to enforce and compel obedience to such acts, or an observance of such treaties."

This proposition was lengthily debated on several days by the Convention. It was opposed ably and earnestly by Madison, Hamilton, Wilson, and other members, and finally rejected.

In April, 1787, Mr. Madison, in a letter to General Washington, speaking of the approaching Convention, and the new Government it would probably propose to the States, incorporated these passages:

"An article should be introduced expressly guaranteeing the States against internal as well as external dangers."

"In like manner, the right of coercion should be expressly declared. With the resources of commerce in hand, the national administration might always find means of exerting it either by sea or land. But the difficulty and awkwardness of operating by force on the collective will of a State render it particularly desirable that the necessity of it might be precluded. Perhaps the negative on the laws might create such a mutuality of dependence between the general and particular authorities as to answer this purpose."

Mr. Madison, in a letter dated October 24, 1787, to Mr. Jefferson, then our minister to France, wherein he gives a synopsis of the new plan of Government recommended by the Convention, introduces this paragraph, speaking of that body:

"It was generally agreed that the objects of the Union could not be secured by any system founded on the principle of a Confederation of sovereign States. A voluntary observance of the Federal law could never be hoped for. A compulsive one could evidently never be reduced to practice; and if it could, involved equal calamities to the innocent and the guilty, the necessity of a military force both obnoxious and dangerous, and, in general, a scene resembling much more a civil war than the administration of a regular Government. Hence was embraced the alternative of a Government which, instead of operating on the States, should operate without their intervention on the individuals composing them; and hence the change in the principle and proportion of representation."—Writings of Madison, volume one, pages 290, 344.

Mr. Madison here announced to Mr. Jefferson what the Constitution so distinctly shows: that the Convention had abandoned the principle of the Articles of Confederation, which was the great weakness of that system; that its powers could only be executed by the intervention of the States; and had framed a Government to execute itself by acting directly upon its objects and the people. Also, that it had refused to adopt the principle of coercing the States by a military force to obey the laws. The Convention which framed the Constitution never intended that the Federal Government should have the power to initiate civil war by coercing a State by military force for any purpose. Mr. Madison's prescience was that such coercion would be civil war. A proposition to give to Congress the power to veto the laws of the States also was made in the Convention, and repeatedly and lengthily pressed in earnest debate, and was rejected.

The substitutes for these proposed coercive powers, which the Convention adopted, were to make the Constitution, and the laws made in pursuance of it, the supreme law of the land, and to require the judges in every State to be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding; to require the Senators and Representatives of Congress, and the members of the several State Legislatures, and all executive and judicial officers of the United States and of the several States to be bound by oath or affirmation to support the Constitution; to enforce the execution of the laws of the Union; to suppress insurrections and repel invasions; and on the application of the Legislature (or of the Executive when the Legislature cannot be convened) of the several States to protect them by force of arms against domestic violence; by the courts to punish treason against the United States; and to adjudge all cases, in law or equity, arising under the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States.

Congress is not empowered to make any war upon the States or the people; but when the execution of the laws is resisted, or an insurrection, or rebellion, which is only a big insurrection, is made against the United States, the Government of the United States has the constitutional authority to intervene with arms, Congress to raise the forces, and the President to direct them as Commander-in-Chief. The resistance to the execution of the laws and the insurrection are criminal, and equally criminal whether with or without the sanction of the State authorities. The mode of putting them down is, in all respects, the same in the one case as in the other; and all the actors in both are guilty of treason against the United States, and the only kind of treason which, under the Constitution, can be committed: "levying war against them or adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort;" and persons charged with this crime cannot be tried by martial law or military tribunals, but only by the civil law and courts and juries, and according to the mode prescribed by the Constitution. The forms of trial and the kinds and amount of punishment are the same, whether the traitors acted with or without or even in defiance of State authority, and in each class of cases the crime is individual and personal, and so is the punishment. Every traitor is to be tried and punished for his own crime; the State is not to be tried and punished at all:

"No person shall be convicted of treason unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or on confession in open court."

"The Congress shall have power to declare the punishment of treason; but no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture, except during the life of the person attained."

None but a person can commit or be convicted of treason. A State cannot, but a person may be brought into open court and make confession of treason. The blood of a person may be corrupted by attainder of treason, and he may be subjected to a forfeiture of his property and rights during life, and such other punishment as Congress may declare; but these ideas are not applicable to States.

But, Mr. President, the position of Senators who support the measure under consideration is still more extreme and absurd. It is that the United States, having by force of arms suppressed the rebellion, by the laws of nations has acquired over the States whose people, or, as gentlemen phrase it, the States that revolted and were subdued, the rights of a conqueror.

This question, and the whole subject, is not to be considered and decided by the principles of national law alone, but in connection with the Constitution of the United States. That is the supreme law of this land everywhere and at all times, in war and in peace. Any principle of national law or any other law that is in conflict with the Constitution has no authority whatever in the United States, and here is no more to be regarded than if it had never had effect or existence anywhere. That is the supremacy of the Constitution. Let us examine this claim made for the Government of the United States, for Congress, of the rights of a conqueror over the southern States by the Constitution, its principles, and provisions.

Section three, article one, reads:

"The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof, for six years."

In second paragraph, section one of article two, is this provision:

"Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress."

Article five is in these words:

"The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or, on the application of two thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress."

The Federal Government was made by the States, and they become to be united by and according to the Constitution. It made them "The United States of America." One of the great purposes of the Federal Government is to preserve, defend, and perpetuate the States:

"The United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and on application of the Legislature, or of the executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic violence."

The States were the primary and deep foundation stones upon which the new Government was reared. Their existence, perpetuity, and position in the Union are provided for all through the Constitution, and the Government clothed with the necessary civil and all the military power of the United States to give them that guarantee. In the House they were severally invested with a representation in proportion to their numbers; in that of the Senate they were made equal; and in the presidential election, each State was given the number of electors that she had Representatives and Senators. The Government of the United States had power by arms to enforce its laws, to suppress insurrections and rebellions against them, and to protect each State against invasion and domestic violence. It has ample power to defend, to preserve, to perpetuate the States; but not an iota to attack, to conquer, to obliterate a State. It is an innate principle of our system, that while it lives one of the States cannot die; yea, that it might perish and all the States yet survive. When the execution of the laws is resisted, or an insurrection or rebellion breaks out, the Government has one power, one duty: to enforce the execution of the laws, to put down the rebellion even by military force; these effected, the whole power for the occasion is exhausted, and the sword as against the people and the State is to be sheathed. The power is to conserve, not to destroy; to prevent revolution, not to make it; to uphold the States, not to obliterate them.

The Constitution not only founded the Federal Government upon the States, but it adopted them as part, an indispensable part, of its machinery. That Government could not be administered, could not exist without a Senate; and Senators can be chosen only by the State Legislatures. A President is one of its vital organs; and that officer is to be chosen by electors, and those electors can be appointed only in the manner directed by the Legislatures of the States, and there is no other authority to act in the premises.

In the fortieth number of the Federalist, Mr. Madison wrote:

"The State governments may be regarded as constituent and essential parts of the Federal Government; while the latter is in no wise essential to the operations or organization of the former. Without the intervention of the State Legislatures the President of the United States cannot be elected at all. The Senate will be elected absolutely and exclusively by the State Legislatures."

When the Legislatures of two thirds of the States make application to Congress to call a convention for proposing amendments to the Constitution, Congress is required by the Constitution to call such a convention; and when amendments are proposed in that mode, or by a two thirds vote of both Houses of Congress, they cannot become a part of the Constitution without, but do upon being ratified by the Legislatures or conventions of three fourths of the States. It is not only unsound, but it is preposterous to assume that the men who fill the offices of the State governments by committing treason, rebelling against the United States, can thereby destroy a part of the indispensable machinery of the Government, by which alone a Senate can be chosen, a President elected, and the Constitution amended. The men who work the machinery are criminal, but not the machinery; they incur forfeitures and punishment, but not it. This admirable constitutional mechanism survives in its legal existence to preserve the harmony and completeness of our complicated system; and when loyal men regain possession of it, or those who betrayed it return to their fidelity, it resumes its functions by the conserving, restoring principle of post limine, as though it had never been disturbed.

This position can be enforced by other arguments. A President of the United States may be a traitor and commit treason against them; but not the Presidency, the office. The incumbent may make war against them and be vanquished, impeached, and removed from office, be killed in battle, or hung as a traitor; but however he may be ousted from office or perish, the office still remains. He may hold possession of the capital, expel Congress and the courts from it, continue in the formal administration of the office, and direct the operations of the Army and Navy for the subversion of the Constitution and Government and the liberty of the people, and all this does not annihilate or forfeit or affect the constitutional and legal existence of the office of the Presidency; that still exists, though suspended in its legitimate operation by the criminal conduct and usurpations of the incumbent. But so soon as he is driven from it and another is properly chosen, he goes into the office with all its constitutional powers, no more, no less, by the effect of the principle of post limine. So a part or all the members of the two Houses of Congress may make war against the United States; and if all were to make such a war, even as Congress, that would not abolish or forfeit or affect the legal existence of Congress, or of either House, or the office which any Senator or Representative filled, although every incumbent would have forfeited his office and his life and should have lost both for their crimes. The offices would abide all the storms of treason and civil war as component parts of our system of Government, and be permanent as it to prevent the greater evils of anarchy and chaos, and would be ready, unshorn of a single power, to receive other incumbents regularly chosen.

When the insurgents or rebels, as in the late civil war, are so strong as to take possession by force of arms of one or many States, to expel the authority, laws, and officers of the United States from them, and set up hostile governments, their position as States of the Union and the citizenship of their people become suspended, and so continue until the hostile power in them is suppressed or voluntarily submits; and then by the principle of post limine the States and the people are remitted to their former position and relations with the United States. Until that is effected they occupy no other character than that of insurgents making war against the United States, and are to be suppressed by force of arms. The hostilities are to be conducted on both sides according to the humane usages of modern warfare. The parties are belligerents sub modo, and their belligerent rights are to be determined, not by the laws of nations, but by our laws, Constitution, and form of government. Beyond the modes in which the war is to be conducted the insurgents have no rights but what their success may wrest from the United States. The latter may press hostilities against them as against other enemies, but not for the ends of conquest and subjugation, of overthrow and reconstruction, but to reduce them to obedience to the Constitution, laws, and authority of the United States; to defeat their attempt to get away from their proper position and the performance of their duties in the Government, and if necessary by force of arms to compel their return. The whole power of the Government is to prevent destruction and revolution, both of the United States and the States; not to make or assist in making such destruction and revolution. When the war is over or during its pendency the United States may bring to trial and punishment, according to the forms of the common law, any insurgent for treason or other crimes committed by him.

This great healing and conserving principle of post limine is set forth in every treatise on national law, and is recognized, allowed, and enforced in all civilized nations. It is defined to be—

"The principle in the modern law of nations by virtue of which persons and things, taken by an enemy in war, are restored to their former state when coming again under the power of the nation to which they belonged."

This principle has been recognized and applied by our courts. In the war of 1812 a part of the district, now the State, of Maine, including Castine, was invaded and taken possession of by the military forces of Great Britain, and her authority and laws were made to supersede those of the United States and Massachusetts. A British collection port was established at Castine, within the conquered territory. A ship landed her cargo and paid duties upon it at Castine under the laws and regulations of England, and to her authorities. After peace was made, and the British forces had been withdrawn from the conquered country, the United States brought suit for the goods, because they had been imported into Castine, a port of the United States, in violation of their laws, and were thereby forfeited. Judge Story pronounced the opinion of the court, in which there are these passages:

"By the conquest and occupation of Castine, that territory passed under the allegiance and sovereignty of the British. The sovereignty of the United States over the territory was of course suspended, and the laws of the United States could no longer be rightfully enforced or be obligatory upon the inhabitants who remained and submitted to the conqueror. Castine could not therefore be deemed a port of the United States, for its sovereignty no longer extended over the place. Nor, on the other hand, could it be deemed a port within the dominions of Great Britain, for it had not permanently passed under her sovereignty."

"A territory conquered by an enemy is not to be considered as incorporated into the dominions of that enemy without a renunciation in a treaty of peace, or until a long and permanent possession. Until such incorporation it is entitled to the full benefit of the law of post limine."—2 Gall., C. C. R., 485.

The United States and Great Britain being independent Powers, the laws of nations and the rights of conquest applied, without being restricted by the Constitution, in a war between them; and a portion of the territory of Maine, being conquered and taken possession of by the British forces, when that possession returned to the United States and Massachusetts, all men and things in the country that had been conquered, without any legislation of Congress or the State, but simply by effect of that law of post limine, were restored to their former state, and the rights of the people, civil and political, and the laws and jurisdiction of the United States and Massachusetts, were resumed and operated as though they had never been suspended or disturbed. The principles of the Constitution are not in conflict with this universal rule in the code of nations, and both operate for restoration in the same way. So soon as the rebellion was suppressed and the people and governments of the insurgent States in good faith submitted themselves to the authorities, Constitution, and laws of the United States, they were both by the Constitution and post limine law, as to all persons and things, restored to their former condition in the United States and governments of the States, and they to each other. These were the legal results, the status produced by the intrinsic force of the Constitution and the law of nations; and no other reconstruction was needful than for the Governments of the United States and the States, by all their departments and officers, to conform to the reconstruction which events and the operation of that Constitution and law had produced.

These principles and consequences were never controverted by any respectable intellect until after the war of the rebellion had terminated. Up to and after that time all the legislation of Congress was upon the recognition of the fact that the States in which the revolt had been made were, notwithstanding, States in the Union; and that the war waged against them by the United States was not for any purpose of conquest or subjugation, but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution and to preserve the Union with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired; and as soon as those ends were accomplished the war was to cease.

While the rebellion was raging, Congress passed acts to apportion representation among all the States by name, including those in revolt; to lay a direct tax upon each of the States, naming each one that was in rebellion as a State, and by its name; to admit West Virginia into the Union as a State, reciting—

"That the Legislature of Virginia, by an act passed on the 13th day of May, 1862, did give its consent to the formation of a new State within the jurisdiction of the State of Virginia, to be known by the name of West Virginia."

By the act establishing the Freedmen's Bureau, passed after the rebellion had been suppressed, the States engaged in it were divided into districts, and put under its authority; and the "civil rights" bill, passed by Congress 9th April, 1866, expressly authorized any person, sued in a State court for an act done under the Freedmen's Bureau law, to remove the case from the State court into the circuit or district courts of the United States for the State in which such suit may have been instituted; and also gave to the United States district courts in those States, exclusively of the courts of the several States, cognizance of all crimes and offenses committed against the provisions of this act.

Congress passed an act reorganizing the circuit courts of the United States, in which it embraced by name all the States which had been engaged in the recent rebellion; and in different sessions Congress passed two distinct propositions to amend the Constitution of the United States, and submitted them to all the States; and in the second one referred specially to those that had been in the rebellion.

When Tennessee passed her ordinance of secession she was represented in both Houses of Congress; and one of her Senators, Andrew Johnson, remained in his seat until he was appointed by President Lincoln provisional governor of Tennessee. Maynard and Clemens were elected Representatives from that State after it had seceded, and were permitted to take their seats. There was no objection then that Tennessee had ceased to be a State in the Union, and was therefore not entitled to be represented in the House and the Senate. On the contrary, this Senator and those Representatives of Tennessee received the "All hail" of every Republican and of every true friend of the Union and the Constitution. The Senator particularly for his immovable firmness in holding to his position of Senator from Tennessee, unawed by threats, unseduced by promises, became the civil hero of the Republicans, and their admiration and gratitude impelled them to nominate and elect him to the Vice Presidency, from which by the act of Providence and the operation of the Constitution he was transferred to the Presidency; and now the leaders of the party that gave him this great promotion say that he was not constitutionally eligible to either office.

After Virginia had seceded, less than one third of her counties and her people elected a Governor and a Legislature, who were inducted into office, and this Legislature proceeded to elect two Senators to Congress from that State. Messrs. Willey and Carlile presented themselves at the bar of the Senate in the extra session of July, 1861, with commissions as Senators from the State of Virginia, signed by the now Governor Peirpoint, and a motion was made that they be permitted to take their seats. Objection was made by Senator Bayard, on the grounds that they were not elected by the legitimate Legislature, nor commissioned by the legal Governor of Virginia. Those objections were overruled, and Messrs. Willey and Carlile admitted as Senators from the State of Virginia, every Republican present voting in the affirmative. Then there was no thought that Virginia was not entitled to have Senators because she had seceded and rebelled, and was not a State in the Union; or if there was such a thought no person gave it a voice.

At the ensuing session of Congress, December, 1861, Messrs. Willey and Carlile appeared and resumed their seats as Senators from the State of Virginia without any question, and Upton, Blair, Segar, Brown, and Whaley then took their seats in the House as Representatives from the State of Virginia, and not a doubt was uttered as to Virginia being a State and in the Union, and entitled to be represented in the House. Soon afterward West Virginia was admitted into the Union as a State; and Senator Willey living within and being a citizen of that State, and having been chosen one of its Senators, a senatorial vacancy was thereby created in Virginia. Her government had been continued by Governor Peirpoint remaining in the executive chair, and a portion of the people of about a dozen counties electing some ten members of the Senate and about twenty of the House of Representatives. These gentlemen convened as the Legislature of Virginia and chose Lemuel J. Bowden to be a Senator from that State as the successor of Senator Willey, and he took his seat without objection.

There is no message, proclamation, or authentic speech or conversation of President Lincoln or President Johnson, in which the question is touched, that does not declare the continued existence of the States in rebellion; and all of them admitted the competency of the people of those States to lay down their arms, to submit themselves to the Constitution and laws of the United States, and they and their States to resume their proper position and relations in the Union; and many of them earnestly importuned that course to be taken.

On the cessation of hostilities in the southern States, President Johnson proceeded to nominate from all over them judges, district attorneys, marshals, postmasters, assessors and collectors of internal revenue, and custom-house officers, in the aggregate amounting to hundreds and thousands, and many of them were confirmed by the Senate without any objection that they were for certain States when there were no such States in existence. The President conceded the great principle established by both the Constitution and national law, that the power in the rebel States which expelled the Constitution, laws, officers, and authority of the United States from them having been suppressed and no longer forming any obstruction, they all resumed legally their former state, and his duty was to acknowledge and act upon this restored condition of things. This has been called the President's policy. I have before shown what had been the policy of Congress up to the commencement of its last session. There is no discrepancy between those policies. Each department of the Government, in the performance of its official acts touching the revolted States, maintained these great truths springing from the whole Constitution, that though the people of one or more States, including those who held possession of their governments and offices, may be in active rebellion against the United States, they are nevertheless de jure States in the Union, and on the rebellion being suppressed they resume their former position, and are to be treated by the Government as all the other States as on proper and friendly relations with it.

SENATE.

This has been the policy of the judicial department of the Government also. The judges of the Supreme Court proceeded, after the termination of the war, to apportion among themselves the circuits as organized by Congress, including those that have rebelled; to set down for trial both the old and new cases from the States that had been in revolt, and to certify their judgments and orders to the inferior courts in those States, to admit attorneys from them previously practicing at its bar without requiring anew any oaths; to issue writs of habeas corpus and orders upon them running into those States; and as to all matters, making the same application of the laws and the powers and functions of the court and judges to the States and people that entered into the rebellion, as to the other States and their people.

Two of the judges of that court were citizens of and commissioned from States that were in the rebellion, and the circuit of one was wholly and of the other mostly within those States. According to this new-fangled theory of Congress, those two judges, on the secession and rebellion of their States, became alien enemies to the United States. If so, they then immediately ceased to be judges of the Supreme Court, and could not longer hold their offices; and yet they met and sat and deliberated and pronounced judgments as members of the court like the other judges, as they had done previously, without any question or doubt ever being suggested.

Mr. President, in this whole affair there has been no conqueror, no conquest, but a simple suppression of unlawful force, a suppression of an insurrection, a reduction of rebels arrayed in armed resistance to the law to obey it by force of arms. If there be a seeming conqueror it is the President, not Congress.

Congress raises and supports armies, provides and maintains a Navy, and provides for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrection, and repel invasion. But the President is a coördinate department of the Government, and in the performance of his constitutional and legal duties is as independent of Congress in the performance of its duties as it is of him. The executive power of the Government is vested in the President, and Congress shares no part of it. He is sworn to execute faithfully the office of President, and to the best of his ability to preserve, protect, and to defend the Constitution of the United States, and shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed. He is Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States and of the militia of the several States when called into the service of the United States; and he has the sole and exclusive power, so long as they exist, to direct all their operations according to his own will, in furtherance of the ends pointed out by the Constitution and the laws.

By the Constitution and the laws he is the only authority to decide when and where the execution of the laws are resisted, when a State or the United States are invaded, when and where there is an insurrection or rebellion, and when there is such domestic violence in a State as to require the intervention of the military force of the United States for its protection. He is to judge according to his sole discretion when and where all or any of these conditions of things exist, to move and direct the necessary military forces to meet and correct them; and it is the duty of Congress and the courts and every officer of the Government to be informed and to be governed by the official information of the President upon these points.

Congress may make war, but cannot make peace; may raise and disband armies, and may provide for calling out the militia to enforce the execution of the laws and suppress insurrection; but the enforcement and the suppression is to be done by the President in virtue of his obligation, power, and duty faithfully to execute the office of President, to the best of his ability to preserve and defend the Constitution of the United States, to take care that the laws be faithfully executed, and as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States and of the militia of the several States when in their service.

All these points have been considered, adjudged, and sustained by the Supreme Court. In the case of Martin vs. Mott, before referred to, that court says, "if we look to the language of the act of 1795, every conclusion drawn from the nature of the power itself is strongly fortified." The words are whenever the United States shall be invaded, or in imminent danger of invasion, it shall be lawful for the President to call forth such number of the militia as he may judge necessary to repel such invasion, to suppress such insurrection, and suppress such unlawful combinations to obstruct the execution of the laws, when too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings or the powers vested in the marshals:

"The power itself is confided to the Executive of the Union, to him who is by the Constitution the Commander-in-Chief of the militia when called into the actual service of the United States, whose duty it is to take care that the laws be faithfully executed; and whose responsibility for an honest discharge of his official obligations is secured by the highest sanction. He is necessarily constituted the judge of the existence of the exigency in the first instance, and is bound to act according to his belief of the facts. If he does so act, and decides to call forth the militia, his orders are in strict conformity with the provisions of the law; and it would seem to follow, as a necessary consequence, that every act done by a subordinate officer, in obedience to such orders, is equally justifiable. The law contemplates that, under such circumstances, orders shall be given to carry the power into effect, and it cannot, therefore, be a correct inference that any other person has a just right to disobey them. The law does not provide for any appeal from the judgment of the President, or for any right in subordinate officers to review his decision and in effect defeat it. Whenever a statute gives a discretionary power to any person, to be exercised by his own opinion of certain facts, it is a sound rule of construction that the statute constitutes him the sole and exclusive judge of the existence of those facts. And in the present case we are all of opinion that such is the true construction of the act of 1795. It is no answer that such a power may be abused, for there is no power which is not susceptible of abuse."

In the case of Luther vs. Borden, the court sustained the principles stated in the preceding extract; in reference to the act of 1795, it says:

"By this act the power of deciding whether the exigency had arisen upon which the Government of the United States is bound to interpose is given to the President. He is to act upon the application of the Legislature, or of the Executive."

This referred to an application by the Governor of Rhode Island to the President to interpose with military force to protect the State against domestic violence. That opinion further says:

"In the case of foreign nations the Government acknowledged by the President is always recognized in the courts of justice. And this principle has been applied by the act of Congress to the sovereign States of the Union."

And again:

"It is a sound rule of construction that the statute constitutes him the sole and exclusive judge of those facts, (whether there be an insurrection.) The facts upon which he is to act by moving the armed forces of the United States."

This portion of the act of Congress of 1795 was reenacted in 1861.

The principles sustained in these decisions by the Supreme Court were recognized and relied upon by that distinguished jurist and statesman, the late Senator Collamer, in the argument he made in the Senate in favor of the admission of Senators Willey and Carlile from the State of Virginia. He says:

For instance, whether a foreign Government recently commenced has become an independent people, whether in court it is to be treated and considered as a nation, is not a point on which a court can decide. That is a political question, and if the executive head of the Government has received ministers from that Power, recognized it as a Power on earth, the courts cannot go into the question whether he did it right or did it wrong."

"In analogy to that, in this judicial proceeding must we be governed by the fact that the government of Virginia that has executed these papers and sent them to us is recognized by our Executive. They have called on him for militia. He recognizes them as the government of Virginia. It is a political question; it is settled."

Every Republican Senator assented to this proposition and sustained it by his vote.

Now, in the face of the Constitution, the laws of nations, of so many precedents made by Congress and both of its Houses, by Presidents Lincoln and Johnson, and the decisions of the Supreme Court, is it not passing strange that at this late day, after the war is all over, and the entire rebel host that was in arms has made the most complete and bona fide submission which the world ever saw, that Congress should set up the stupendously false and absurd pretension of being the conqueror of all the States and people that were engaged in the revolt; and that their country, governments, laws, men, women and children, liberties and property all lie prostrate at the feet of Congress, the conqueror. That as Cromwell held his iron heel upon the necks of the Irish when he decided by the councils of his own will to transport the whole of its Catholic people from the Green Isle, where they were born; as the tyrant of Austria shivered both the iron crown and the chartered liberties of the Hungarians; as the frozen Czar of the north, by his ponderous military power, crushed Poland to the earth and applied the dreaded knout, or banished so many of her heroic people to the snowy wilds of Siberia, and his military satrap proclaimed, "Order reigns in Warsaw;" so the conqueror, Congress, stands in terrible strength and majesty over the conquered, prostrate, and hapless States and people of the South. Was there ever so unfounded, so baseless, and yet so frightful a pretension? The people of the United States and of the world might deride and laugh to scorn this most extravagant, ridiculous, and grotesque claim but for the fearful energy with which it is sustained by those who make it, and the large masses of factious, debauched, and frenzied people who recklessly support them.

The power claimed by Congress not only to exclude ten States from representation in the Senate and the House, but to obliterate these States and their governments, to absorb them wholly; is it anything short of madness to claim such a power? The United States is an association, a bundle of thirty-five States. Twenty-five have assumed the power to blot out ten, and if they can do that they may continue the work among themselves, and where will it stop? The case most nearly parallel, that I remember, is that of a man who had a dozen ducks, one of which he cut up into small pieces and fed to the others; the next day he cut up another and fed it to the remainder, and so he proceeded until he had but one left, and that one in this mode had eaten up all the others.

The Radicals of Congress claim to have had thirty-five ducks. They have cut up and fed to the others for a single meal not one, but ten. Whether the process is to continue, or how, is to depend upon the exigencies of the party. One of the great purposes was to get a majority of two thirds in both Houses to pass constitutional amendments and bills over the veto of the President. This operation was made to subvert not only the executive department but the Constitution as the interests and will of the Radical leaders might require. Of one thing I feel assured: that if the sacrifice of Kentucky had been needed to have given the Radicals a majority of two thirds in both Houses that State would ere this have been absorbed, eaten up; but I think the political whale would have taken a Jonah into its belly. Such fantastic freaks of usurped power are performed by a party that arrogates to itself the name of the Union party.

The bill under consideration, and the kindred measures passed and pending, are charged with the insolence, oppressions, cruelty, and vengeful spirit of the fiercest conquerors, and such is the only legitimate affinity between its authors and conquest. To give over the constitutional and legal rights and liberties of any people into the protection of a standing army is to give the lamb into the keeping of the wolf. But this atrocious bill not only annihilates their State constitutions and laws, but also the Constitution and laws of the United States in the ten southern States, and imports a power in Congress to remodel their maps. It makes the entire population prisoners of war, and their country and everything in it captured property, and to belong to Congress, the conqueror. It sweeps away all law and courts, establishes five military satraps and satrapies, and makes their unwritten, unexpressed, unknown, and arbitrary will the substitute for all law, and these satraps to apply that will to the property, liberty, and lives, to the consciences and religion, of that whole people, as lawgivers, judges, and executioners. This diabolical bill disfranchises the white man and enfranchises the negro, creates an absolute and unmitigated military despotism, wholly in the interests of the negro, to effectually degrade and enslave the white population; and to transfer the country, its government, and political power over to the negro, under the trusteeship of some white northern adventurers and native white political vagabonds. The barbarism and cruelty of the whole scheme would not be unsuited to an Attila or Ghengis Khan, or a Timour Beg.

The honorable Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENDERSON] tells us that the disease of the country is aristocracy, engendered by slavery in the South. There is a more general, virulent, and fatal disease than that—faction, political debauchery. The demon of political faction now rules the Government and the country, and he ministers to and inflames every bad passion—religious fanaticism and hypocrisy, sectional interest and hate, ambition and love of place and power, vanity and false philanthropy, the lust of intermeddling with other people's business, avarice, envy, and revenge, a blind devotion to party, an utter abnegation of all scrutiny of its measures, ends, and morals, and of their consequences to the country, a senseless exultation for all its triumphs, a depraved sense of pleasure, a meretricious sentiment of personal glory in contemplating its power and domination, the usurpation by party of the place in mind and heart that ought to be held by country: these are the passions that can be ministered to only by holding on to power. They are the links that form the chain which binds the Radical party together. They are the combined forces that have so desperately hurled it against the Constitution and the liberties of the people, and brought it to the desperate purpose, "to rule or ruin." They feel that the vote of the southern States in the next presidential election might jeopardize their hold, if not displace them from power. The southern States can make no concessions, can make no self-abasement, that will purchase from the Radicals the exercise of their great constitutional right to vote in the next presidential election. The Radicals will hold them in vassalage, and prevent them from voting and as long afterward as they can.

Mr. President, I have acted an humble, but I believe a consistent, political part. The platform on which I have always stood was embodied in words of that peerless patriot and statesman, Mr. Clay: "The Union, the Constitution, and the enforcement of the laws;" and to that I will adhere while I have life. Any party, any leader that will strike, with a reasonable prospect of success, for the vindication of that wise and patriotic aphorism, whether Whig, Democrat, or Republican, I will become a follower, and be a true one.

Tariff.

SPEECH OF HON. M. C. KERR, OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 27, 1867,

On the bill (H. R. No. 718) to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Speaker, in the zeal and real or fancied strength of triumphant majorities the arguments and appeals of minorities against their measures are seldom heeded. In the midst of the angry and bitter passions of the present hour they are sometimes received with derision. But, since the minority as well as the majority are the chosen guardians of the people's interests and liberties, their silence when they should proclaim the people's danger would make them parties to the crimes of the majority.

It is not without a consciousness of a great responsibility that I arise for the purpose of uttering my solemn protest against the infamous and irreparable crime which, without a due realization of its enormity, this House threatens to perpetrate against the liberties of the people of this country by the passage of this bill. I will not attempt to show that the country will not survive the enactment of such a law, because, thank Heaven, there are always unseen, but potent, agencies at work to counteract the effect of

to close up the gaping wounds of war; to heal the ravages of disease; to defeat the triumph of the cunning, and repair the misfortunes of the weak; to urge on wicked and selfish rulers to their own undoing; and, indeed, to fill up the breach of all catastrophes. For every action there is concomitant reaction; and we have only to wait and work long enough to see every social or political injustice set right.

But the generations of mankind have each but a few short years allotted to them, while the operation of natural remedies frequently extends over long periods of time. I shall prove, and I believe beyond the power of refutation, that if this bill becomes a law that link will have been riveted which, for at least a generation to come, will fetter the liberties, commercial and personal, of this people beyond unfastening, and reduce the people, still further than they are already reduced, from the proud positions of free and prosperous men to the abject one of cringing dependents, destined to pace the weary round of life within just such bounds as their masters may choose to prescribe for them.

Republics are never overthrown by tyranny, open and undisguised; they only succumb to fraud and cunning. In the scramble for individual wealth and power, in all ages and countries, a small part of mankind, by a system of delusion and false pretenses, have been trying to persuade the balance that they could best promote their own welfare by paying them tribute in some form. They have insisted that their cause, their interests, were in some mysterious way, more than other men's, identified with the interests and safety of the State. They have claimed that patriotism, and even religion, demanded that other people should pay them twice as much for a given article as the citizen of a neighboring nation would sell it for. They have appealed to all kinds of prejudices and national animosities in order to enlist the sympathies and passions and obscure the judgments of the people, the better to enable them to control their actions in their own interests. They have applied, and not in vain, to Government to compel the people to trade with them, and to pay them twice or thrice as much for their merchandise as it was intrinsically worth. The system which has developed so much delusion and fraud is falsely called the "tariff for protection." It is the offspring of selfishness and sectionalism. It is the most insidious and dangerous form ever assumed by cupidity and capital in their struggle against the people.

The real object of any tariff is to make the people who use the article upon which the duty is imposed pay more for it in the country than it can be purchased for out of the country; to make them pay more for it than it is really worth; and all that they pay for it over its cost without the duty is so much paid as a bounty or gratuity for the temporary advantage of the home producer or manufacturer of such articles. The tariff does not merely compel the people to pay the additional price for the imported article, for if that were the case the home manufacturer, the home monopolist would suddenly become the enemy of all tariffs; but the very purpose of the tariff is to raise the price of the article produced at home just as much as the duty raises the price of the imported article. If a coat manufactured in Canada costs there ten dollars, and its manufacturer is compelled to pay a duty of ten dollars on it before he is allowed to bring it over the line and sell it in the United States, then he will charge twenty dollars for the coat when sold in this country, and immediately the people in this country engaged in manufacturing the same kind of coats will discover that they cannot afford to sell them for less than the Canadian does, and they will demand the same price. So that while the wearers of coats made in Canada are paying a tax of ten dollars on each one to the Federal Government, the wearers of coats made in this country are paying a tax of ten dollars on each coat to the manufacturer instead of the Government. So that the people, the consumers, pay millions of dollars more to the monopolists than the Government collects on the imported goods as duties. The first effect of such a tariff is to impose an unjust and onerous tax upon the whole people for the benefit of the few, and for a time to stimulate excessively the production of the taxed articles in the country, and make the profits of their manufacturers enormous, and build up great monopolies to control the legislation of the country.

But the manufacturers of "protected" merchandise cannot perpetuate the enormous profits which they enjoy at first under any given tariff. It is a law of trade, of prices, of commerce, as it is of liquids, to seek a common level. The high prices created by the tariff soon attract capital and industry and competition to the production of the favored articles. The supply from abroad, which is excluded by the tariff, is at length in whole or in part made up by a premature and unnatural stimulant and effort at home. But if you increase in any way the cost of coals, flour, salt, or other necessities of life, you increase in a greater proportion the cost of living. The increased cost of living compels the great mass of mankind who eat their bread in the sweat of their brows to increase also the price of labor or starve. Thus the benefit of a tariff, imposed at first in the interest of a few establishments or monopolists, are soon dissipated and turned into curses upon a whole people. Honest and needed pursuits and industries are discouraged, and feverish speculation and gambling are encouraged. Unjust and dishonest profits are realized for awhile; high prices and inflation follow, and the cost of production is so much increased that the profits fail. Then the favored manufacturers and monopolists cry aloud for higher duties, and protest that if they are not soon granted they will be ruined. And it is often true, and always the result of their own folly or dishonest cupidity. They crowd the lobbies of Congress with their hired agents and burden the desks of members with their multiform appeals for a higher tariff. They generally succeed. The same process of unhealthy stimulation and production is seen with the same ultimate increase of prices and of the cost of living and labor. Profits fail again, of course, and the protectionists and monopolists demand more tariff. Thus each attempt to build up the material interests of the country by such swindling systems of government-nursing and hot-house protection only prepares the way for another.

HO. OF REPS.

Tariff—Mr. Kerr.

39TH CONG....2D SESS.

The overwhelming truth of this principle is demonstrated by the legislation of Congress on the tariff during the last six years. During that brief period there have been enacted ten tariff laws, and every one has given an increase of duties over its predecessor. Now, another advance is demanded, and if granted it will make a tariff so high, grinding, and prohibitory, as to impair the revenue from imposts, still further encourage reckless speculation, gambling, and stimulation of prices, and take millions out of the pockets of the consumers as the mere advance on the prices of merchandise now on the shelves of our manufacturers and importers. If this bill were passed, how long would it satisfy the protectionists and speculators? It imposes rates of duties that are high and extravagant beyond any precedent in the history of our country. On many articles it is absolutely prohibitory, and on others it is so high as to destroy entirely its value as a source of revenue. It embraces nearly or over three thousand dutiable or taxed articles. It affects directly almost every value and every material interest of the entire country, and cannot fail still further to inflate prices and to increase the cost of living, and hasten a crisis in our financial and commercial affairs which may prove disastrous to our prosperity for years.

I hold that the true principles of personal liberty entitle every man to purchase what he wants where he can do so on the best terms, and to sell where he can obtain the best prices. The conduct of men everywhere in the business of buying and selling is always most wisely regulated by the law of intelligent self-interest. They need no tariff laws nor tinkering aid of any kind from legislators to instruct them where or on what terms to buy or sell. The laws which control all intelligent trade and commerce must be free and unwritten. They are always best regulated when they are self-regulated.

But the support of civil government requires revenue; and the country is not yet prepared to assess and collect it directly from the people, according to their individual ability to pay it. It rather prefers to assess and collect it by processes of indirection and by rules of inequality. It therefore justifies tariffs for revenue, not for protection for protection's sake. Some degree of protection will result from any well-adjusted tariff for revenue. But the protection should be incidental; it should be the secondary, not the primary object of the tariff; its primary purpose should be revenue. It should be so arranged as to make its burdens rest as lightly as possible on and to trammel as little as possible the commerce, the labor, and the industry of the country. The greatest possible freedom consistent with the collection of sufficient revenue to support the Government, economically administered, should be accorded and guaranteed to all the ordinary and honest pursuits and industries of the people.

Such a system of revenue and tax laws would vastly facilitate the collection of revenue and diminish the temptations to fraud. The country would not then have to make the humiliating confession that by reason of frauds invited and provoked by the very excess of its impositions, some of the best sources of revenue have produced the least results. For example: the present tax on spirits is two dollars per gallon;

Mr. Wells estimates the annual consumption of domestic spirits at forty million gallons; the annual revenue arising from this, if honestly paid, would be $80,000,000; but in fact it is only about twenty-nine million dollars. It cannot be doubted that if the tax were reduced to fifty cents per gallon on domestic spirits, and the duty to fifty or seventy-five cents per gallon on foreign spirits, the aggregate revenue would be greatly increased. The high premium which excessive duties or taxes always offer to successful fraud or evasion would be thus removed. Honest men would be encouraged to embark in business with a fair prospect of being able to sustain themselves in competition with their less scrupulous neighbors engaged in the same business.

Our systems of import and excise duties are extremely vicious, expensive, and complicated by reason of their attempt to embrace every article of production, either domestic or foreign, which finds a market in our country. It is by such agencies, in connection with an irredeemable and redundant national currency, that all prices are inflated to the starving point, the industries of the country are made to tremble upon the verge of ruin, and agriculture, the greatest and most unfailing source of our national prosperity, is made to languish. It is thus that our commercial marine has been expelled from the ocean, our foreign trade destroyed, and our people compelled to pay tribute into the coffers of other nations.

In suggestive contrast with these systems is the policy of England. In 1865 her whole customs revenue was levied upon less than fifty articles, and of $115,000,000 from customs duties $112,000,000 were raised from twelve articles alone. Her internal revenue in the same year amounted to $239,000,000, and was levied upon a very small number of articles in comparison with ours. Thus most of her industries are left free, and even her manufactures are not depressed, but are still enabled to enter with vigor and success into competition with the whole world. Let us profit by her example. The volume of tax imposed upon our people is excessive and oppressive, and then it is made doubly so by the unwise and reckless manner in which it is distributed.

One of the results of this vicious policy is that there are now living in Europe one hundred thousand Americans, either with or without families to support. Their expenditures, even at the lowest estimate, cannot be less than $2,000 each per annum on an average, for many of them belong to "shoddy." They have grown rich by practicing on the credulity of the people and the weakness or wickedness of legislators, through protective tariff swindles and otherwise, and prefer, very naturally, too, to spend their money where they can get the most for it. Owing to our most unwise, dishonest, and vicious systems of tariffs and currency in this country, living in Europe costs less than half what it does here. Over two hundred million dollars, nearly one third of the entire earnings of our thirty-odd million people, are yearly sent to Europe for the support of an aristocracy of American absentees. Thus those who are fattened upon the advantages of our infamous system of "protection," and of other unjust and unequal laws, are enabled to fly from their evil results and enjoy life and ill-gotten wealth under the wiser and cheaper systems in other nations. These statements are not mere assumptions, but are suggested by a very able speech on the currency lately made by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] and were originally contained, as I am informed, in an official letter from one of our consuls abroad, who made the estimates with great care. Mr. Speaker, it is as clear as any truth in mathematics that no wise, just, and impartial domestic policy can lead to such injurious results.

There is a limit to the capacity of any people to pay taxes, and it seems to me to be very clear that we have passed that limit in this country now. The unequalled and wonderful ingenuity and skill and recuperative power of our people have carried them thus far without a great crisis. But the increasing burdens and gathering discontent of the people portend the approaching storm. I propose to consider somewhat in detail the extent of these burdens and the ability of the people to bear them.

An honorable Senator stated upon authority, in a speech in defense of this abominable tariff bill the other day, that in the year 1860 the entire yearly earnings of our people amounted in value to the sum of $755,000,000 in gold. I have taken the trouble to examine this important statement with the view of ascertaining its truth, and I believe it to be as nearly correct as so vast a calculation is capable of being made.

The market rate of interest in the largest commercial city of this country is usually about five per cent. per annum. This is the rate at which capital is loaned when the transaction is as far as possible free from risk—such transactions being known as "call loans." This rate indicates with unerring accuracy the average net profit which is capable of being made upon the investment of capital of every kind within the country: capital in money, in lands, in merchandise, in ships, in railroads, or other investments; and the reason why the rate of interest and the rate of net profit are necessarily the same, Mr. Speaker, is this: that in the long run, were it more profitable to lend or sell goods, lands, ships, or other like thing of value, than to lend or sell money, no person could be found to pursue the latter calling. Individual cases may occur, and do frequently occur, where a larger yearly profit is made on the capital employed in negotiating merchandise, land, or shipping transactions, than by negotiating transactions in money; but allowance must be made in such cases for the value of the personal services of the individual engaged in these transactions. Beyond this, such cases of larger percentage of profit than is indicated by the prevailing rate of interest are exceptions, resulting from peculiar circumstances, or unjust laws, and to counterbalance them many failures occur in all these dealings, which not only involve the loss of the profit, but of the principal besides. I venture to say that any large capitalists at our commercial centers, like Mr. Claffin, the great dry-goods merchant of New York, Mr. Astor, the great real estate owner, or Mr. Jay Cooke, the great banker, would be fully satisfied with a sure gain of five per cent. per annum on their capital. If more proof were needed, I would point you to the avidity with which the bonds of the Government, bearing interest at the rate of seven and three tenths per cent. are held at over par. For why would a man lend his capital to the Government at this rate amidst all the uncertainty of lingering civil disorder if he could obtain with certainty an equal or greater return for it in banking, in commerce, or in real estate operations?

This fact being established, it follows that whatever the aggregate capital wealth of the entire people is, their aggregate yearly profits must be five per cent., or one twentieth part of that capital wealth, that being the rate at which individual wealth grows, and being, therefore, the rate at which our combined individual or national wealth grows also. Now, as the capital wealth of the people in 1860 was $16,000,000,000, valued in gold, the yearly increase amounted to $800,000,000, gold, or substantially about the same sum estimated by the authority quoted in the honorable Senator's speech. We shall presently see the significance of this result.

Were it necessary to still further vindicate these calculations, it might be done in several ways. They can be corroborated by calculating the productive power of the eight million people (including the late slaves) who, according to the census of 1860, formed the working portion of the entire thirty-one millions of population, and subtracting from it their necessary consumption. The same result might be shown from the statistics of the income tax, and it could be shown from the rate at which the entire capital wealth of the people increased from each decade to another.

Thus our entire capital wealth—

In 1850, omitting the valuation of the slaves, was about.....	$6,000,000,000
In 1860, omitting the slaves, it was about.....	16,000,000,000
Annual rate of increase.....	10.3 per cent.
Of this there was brought hither by immigrants and otherwise from other countries per annum, about.....	5.3 per cent.
Leaving the natural rate of increase of capital wealth about.....	5 per cent.

To the truth of this theory I might further quote the express indorsement of it by such political economists as Mill, Faucett, Tooke, McCollough, and others; but I will not consume time to do so now.

Taking all things into consideration, this annual amount of surplus earnings has not been greater than it was in 1860; and the sum then annually saved, therefore, substantially represents the sum now annually saved. Reduced to currency at the prevailing rate, say 140, this sum would amount to $1,120,000,000 in currency. Our increased individual capacity for production since 1860, has been fully counterbalanced, if not more than counterbalanced, by our diminished collective capacity. A man can produce more surplus from a day's work now than in 1860, by reason of the many mechanical improvements which have been adopted since that time; but many thousands, perhaps millions of persons, are now merely consumers who were then producers as well. Southern industry is almost annihilated, and northern industry is demoralized by speculation and gambling.

Assuming, therefore, that $1,120,000,000 currency represents the entire surplus product of American industry for the past year, and I think the substantial truth of this position cannot be gainsaid, let us see what becomes of this colossal sum. Six hundred and thirty-one millions of it last year found its way into the Government coffers in the shape of taxes, excise, and customs.

Statement of the revenue of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866.

Customs, $179,046,651, gold, reduced to currency at 141, the average rate for the fiscal year.....	$252,515,777
Direct tax.....	1,974,754
Internal revenue.....	309,226,813
Miscellaneous sources.....	67,119,369

More than half of the entire earnings of a population of over thirty million people are thus seen to have been paid for the support of Government in one year. Were this sum entirely consumed for the purposes of Government I do not hesitate to say that the Government could not exist one year. The people would rise as with a single, resistless impulse, and by one convulsive wave of popular indignation destroy the whole fabric. What alone saves it from this fate is the fact that the most of this tribute is directly paid out again, not for full value received, for this would be consuming it for the purposes of Government, but it is paid out for debts owing, debts, for instance, to shoddy contractors, Government loan agents, and others, for which no adequate value was received by the people. A good deal of it also was paid out for interest on the public debt, and for current supplies and services at enormous rates. So that what the Government really consumes in value for its support is but a part of what it collects in the form of taxes, and pays out again in the form of expenditures, most of which are conducted without the slightest regard to economy. If all that was overpaid for supplies and services to the Government found its way back to the same people who contributed it no loss would accrue. The greater part of the $631,000,000 contributed would be reimbursed to the original contributors, and only the actual cost of the Government would be missed, which would not exceed one-half of the whole revenue. This the people might afford to pay for the luxury of being governed too much and yet prosper.

But this unhappily is not the case. And that it is not, but on the contrary, that through the agency of this accursed system of "protection" several hundred millions should be annually squeezed out of the earnings of the eight million working-men of this country, not in proportion as they are well to do and able to pay, but rather in proportion as they are poor and helpless, furnishes the ground of my hatred to the pernicious system in the interest of which this wholesale tariff robbery is being perpetrated. For while tariffs do not diminish the taxes paid by the people to support the Government by one dollar, they do take from the people's pockets tenfold more millions than the Government exacts, to support the special interests of the "protected" classes and build up monopolies, and make the rich richer and the poor poorer. This question is not so much one of sectional rivalry as it has been heretofore, but it is one of solemn import to the whole people, for upon it hangs, not the subordinate question of individual wealth or poverty, but the momentous one of the people's liberties, liberties which wealth, if forced into the hands of the few can buy, and which poverty, if forced upon the many, must surrender without complaint, or appeal to God and their strong right arms to maintain.

The following table shows the amount per capita of taxation and public debt respectively in various countries as furnished in Commissioner Wells's report, page 27:

	Debt per capita. Gold.	Taxation per capita. Gold.
United States.....	$74 28	$11 46
Great Britain.....	125 00	10 92
France.....	63 00	7 97
Belgium.....	26 00	5 59
Prussia.....	12 00	5 43
Austria.....	45 00	5 27
Holland.....	121 00	67

So that with a debt only about three fifths as much as that of Great Britain we are paying more taxes per head. Bad as this is, ruinous as it must prove to all permanent interests, were it not for protection we could stand it. But protection cramps and restrains or misdirects and demoralizes the energies of the people, and a day must come when, rendered desperate by oppression, they will rise up and put an end to it forever. I said that were it not for protection we could stand, perhaps with ease, even the inordinate taxes that oppress us. It is said that "for all social afflictions there are always restorative tendencies at work." Protection represses these tendencies as a dam keeps back the waters which otherwise would find their level, not effectually it is true, for it has not even that virtue, but until the rising mass attains such an artificial and unnatural level that it overleaps the highest barriers man can build, and then sweeps onward and destroys everything in its way.

Let it be remembered, also, that this mighty burden annually contributed out of the hard earnings of the people to support the General Government does not include the other vast amounts which are annually exacted by the States and local governments from their own people to support them. These exactions have been estimated at $200,000,000 more. These immense burdens are in great measure peculiar to our own country, because no other nation in the world possesses such an expensive system of local governments as our system of States, counties, and cities. In other countries the central power absorbs nearly all the functions of government and leaves very little to be done by the local communities. I assert, therefore, that the aggregate burdens of the people, the labor, the industry of this country, have no parallel among the nations of the earth. How long can it be endured without a reaction that shall overthrow our institutions? Economy and republican government should go hand in hand; in principle and practice they should be inseparable; because the slavery which results from oppressive taxes and burdens upon the industry of the people is the forerunner of despotism in laws and institutions. The latter result we are rapidly approaching.

If the people of our country were to-day free to trade with other countries, restrained only by a wisely-adjusted tariff for revenue, with incidental protection, the taxes imposed upon them, no matter what its amount may be, would be shared by the whole commercial world instead of by merely the eight million productive population residing in this country. This is the sound and rational policy which the narrow spirit of protection is either ignorant of or hypocritically and selfishly hides from public view. As it is, we are annually paying millions of tribute to other nations by reason of our restrictive and prohibitory policy, for which we receive no reciprocal return from them.

It is evident to whatever extent we trade with foreign nations that the products they buy of us carry with them the taxes they bear; therefore the more of our products we sell abroad the larger the number of persons to share our burden of taxation; and of course the freer our trade the more we sell, because the more we buy. And as we augment the volume of our trade and commerce, whether domestic or foreign, the more desires we gratify and the more profits we make; because trade and commerce, either at home or abroad, being always controlled by the law of intelligent self-interest, will inevitably cease the moment they cease to yield the desired results.

If the Emperor of China should double his demands for taxes from his subjects the tea grown in that country would bear a higher price than now, and we, and all the people on earth who drink tea, would to a certain extent, as we do now to a lesser extent, have to pay the tax. In this way our productions, which, with free trade only limited as I have stated, would be exported abroad in fourfold quantities, would bear with them, to distribute it upon the shoulders of all the world, that burden which, confined as it is now to our own backs, bears us down toward beggary and subserviency.

The beneficent results of the policy for which I plead are most favorably illustrated by the history of the Zollverein or customs-league between the different States of Germany. Previous to the establishment of this great free-trade policy, the various German States had independent protective systems, and, as a consequence, a multiplicity of custom-houses, customs officers, and very limited trade and production. But after its adoption all interior custom-houses and barriers were swept away within the territory embraced in the Zollverein, and a series of duties, not to exceed in any case ten per cent. ad valorem, were laid on foreign manufactures, but nothing was prohibited. The rate of import on foreign goods was often greatly below, but never above ten per cent. ad valorem. Under these very inconsiderable restrictions, which, as compared with our enormous and prohibitory duties, might justly be called absolute free trade, over thirty-four million people were allowed to trade with absolute freedom among themselves, and with all the world outside, at rates never exceeding ten per cent. Under this wise policy Germany became prosperous beyond all precedent. The stimulating influence of free exchange did not diminish, but at once, and from year to year, greatly increased the revenue of each State in the Zollverein, and the production of all their great staples of industry.

The following table well illustrates the effect of that freedom in trade which the Zollverein inaugurated:

It is a significant fact, that among the articles whose production was greatly increased under the healthful influences of the Zollverein, iron was perhaps the most remarkable. Under protection it was a home monopoly, as it is now in great measure in the United States. Under the Zollverein's free trade it became a large item of export.

Through the policy of protection the garnerings of our people find their way into the pockets of a class; the poor are being impoverished and the rich made disproportionately richer. It is in the building up of this class at the expense of the whole, and in the injurious and artificial stimulation of prices and of the cost of living, without anything approaching an equivalent increase in the capacity for production, that protection is dealing deadly blows at the prosperity and liberties of our people. And the longer this corrupt and swindling system is continued the more difficult it will become to return to rational and honest policy, and, indeed, the time is rapidly passing away when any recovery from this state of affairs by the present generation will be practicable. Under the present and proposed system of tariffs every farmer who brawns his hands with honest toil, every mechanic who swells the industry of the country in his shop, every common carrier who contributes his efforts to the unwearying commerce which from evermore has formed the principal bond of sympathy between distant communities, must expend an extra quantity of the energies of his precious life with which to enrich the insatiable coffers of coddling and intriguing monopolists, and build up and support an aristocracy of American absentees who find cheaper living under the more rational systems of trade and commerce abroad than at home. By perpetuating such a system as this proposed bill will create Congress can effectually impoverish and enslave the people, and the country, and establish a universal monopoly; in the language of one of the greatest thinkers of this century—

"A monopoly which comes home to the business and bosoms of men, follows them in their daily avocations, troubles them with its petty, meddling spirit, and, what is worse than all, diminishes their responsibility to themselves, thus depriving them of what is the only real education that most minds receive—the constant necessity of providing for future contingencies, and the habit of grappling with the difficulties of life."—Buckle's History of Civilization, vol. i, p. 453.

Mr. Speaker, there can be no republicanism, no democracy, which has naught to live upon but the dead and despised letter of the organic law. It must be a Republic in spirit as well as in letter. It must have freedom, not alone on the written pages of its constitution, but real, living freedom—freedom for its people to go where they please and to do what they please, provided they do not infringe the like privilege in others; freedom to buy what they please and sell what they please, and where they think best, not compulsion to buy wood-screws at eight times their value, to pay fifty dollars for sewing-machines which the same manufacturers advertise for sale in Paris at nine dollars, to pay ten dollars a ton for coal when they can get it in Nova Scotia for three. The wise and always sagacious Dr. Franklin well said:

"It were to be wished that commerce were as free between all the nations of the world as it is between the several counties of England."

The practical results of the present and of the proposed tariff, as most oppressive burdens upon the industry of all consumers, may be best indicated by some comparative tables, embracing representative articles of general or universal consumption. Look at the following table showing the excessive duties now exacted and those proposed in the pending bill:

Every intelligent man or woman in the country knows that there is no article known to commerce or used among men that assumes such an infinite variety of forms or answers such an innumerable diversity of uses as steel and iron. It would be very difficult to find a single industrial pursuit in the prosecution of which some of the products of steel or iron were not indispensable. They enter alike into the formation of the simplest utensil of husbandry and the mightiest engine of mechanical power. They are alike essential in the construction of a watch and of a railroad with its vast rolling stock. In one or another of their various forms of usefulness they greet the infant in its cradle and follow it at every step of its progress through life. They minister in numberless ways to the comfort, improvement, and civilization of mankind. But they are more important to and more used by the poor than the rich. They both diminish and mitigate the toil of the poor man and of the mechanic, and enable them to rescue a part of their time from the service of their physical wants to the needed improvement of their minds. Now, how are these articles taxed and proposed to be taxed? Remember that any tax on them is a direct tax on every industrial pursuit in the country.

It is the policy of most modern nations to leave the products of iron and steel as free as possible. It is the experience of all nations that when they are left most free the productive capacities and general earnings of the people are most rapidly augmented. Their ability to pay the necessary revenue for the support of Government, and to develop successfully all the material interests of the country are correspondingly increased. Now, Mr. Speaker, let us see how these principles are regarded in the adjustment of our tariff. The duties imposed by existing laws on the leading descriptions of iron and steel, such as pig iron, bar iron, small, round and square iron, hoop iron, refined iron, best Yorkshire iron, best English boiler-plates, steel tires for locomotives, and other descriptions average fully fifty cents per hundred weight.

Now, to make more clear the provisions and policy of the proposed tariff, and the extent to which it will increase the cost of all the products of steel and iron, and burden every industry in the country, except the monopolies, in whose interests all such laws are framed, I invite attention to the following table, which has been prepared with great care and is no doubt entirely correct:

It will thus appear that the rates of duties under the new law would average over one hundred per cent. on the original cost of the iron on ship-board in the foreign port. Is it possible that the people of this country must pay such tribute to our domestic manufacturers of steel and iron to enable them to live and make reasonable profits? Do you reply that this enormous duty on the imported iron and steel will be paid into the public Treasury to reduce our taxes at home? I answer that these excessive duties will very greatly reduce, if they do not destroy, the importation of the foreign product. But the home manufacturers will increase their prices by adding the amount of the duty thereto, and the consumers will still have the same duty to pay, not into the Treasury to reduce our taxes, but into the private coffers of the manufacturers to swell ernment. Hence results an eternal tampering with legislation and legislators to advance the purely selfish interests of individuals, to corrupt the most vital currents of national life and vigor. In no respect whatever is the truth so damning that "the world is governed too much" as in the incessant tinkering by lawmakers with the natural laws of trade and commerce.

Such mischievous legislation is never as wise as the simple common sense of the people. The intelligent self-interest and business instincts of the people constitute an infinitely safer code of laws for the management of all the industrial pursuits of life than ever was or ever will be formed by any Congress or Parliament on earth. Your tariffs are always exciting false hopes and falsely pretending to point out royal roads to success, which never fail to prove to be disastrous delusions sooner or later, except to the favored few to whom all pay tribute. All the great revulsions in the business, the trade, the finances of the country have been produced, directly or remotely, by the unwise and selfish meddling of legislators with the private affairs of men by tariffs and other like measures. The people have lost millions multiplied by millions of money as the price and penalty for such crotchety and impertinent legislation. Will it never cease? Will it never be admitted by lawmakers that the people have sense enough to manage their own business better than anybody can do it for them?

Our restless habits of yielding at short intervals to the ever-increasing importunities of protectionists, speculators, and monopolists to raise our rates of imports tends directly and most effectively to keep the business of the country forever unsettled and excited, and thus to invite periodical reactions and crises, and to sacrifice millions both to the people and to the Government. What the industry, enterprise, and intelligence of our people want is to be let alone as nearly as practicable, by Government; or, if they must be guided somewhat, then they demand settled and unchanging laws. They want rest, from all external interference, and security. Even a bad and cruelly unjust tariff will hurt the people less, infinitely less, if executed steadily and without change, than any system that is subject to frequent changes. The most the people ask of Government is ample security for life, liberty, and property, and they will take care of the balance themselves.

Now, the interests that "protection" is even designed to benefit, as compared with the interests and industries that are not benefited or are greatly injured by it, are really limited and inconsiderable. The whole iron and coal industry of Pennsylvania, in whose interest our tariffs are framed in great part, amounted in 1860 in value to less than the present yearly sales of a single dry goods house in New York. In 1860 the value of the pig iron produced in that State was $11,427,380, and of the coal $14,703,433, and added together they made an aggregate value of $26,130,813 gold, which at 140 would amount in currency to $36,583,138. It will be remembered that the conversion of this pig iron into its numberless products of bar and rolled iron, castings, watches, and so on, does not belong to the coal and iron business proper. The additional values thus conferred upon these products represent the mechanical labor and skill put upon them; and this would have been the same whether the iron was obtained in Pennsylvania or imported from abroad. I take the iron and coal as they are prepared for market, before commerce transports them or the arts and sciences prepare them for their final uses. Now, the sales of the house referred to were this year $56,000,000, as I am informed. In 1860 the products of the United States in pig iron, bar and rolled iron, iron castings, coal, salt, copper, and lead, were (I quote from the census) less than $100,000,000. And the sales of another house in New York in 1866 are reported to have been upward of $80,000,000.

I might extend these comparisons much further, but I have said enough to show how relatively small those interests are which direct and control the legislation which of right belongs to the greatest number, to the largest interests, to agriculture, to commerce, and to the multiform and innumerable products of the inventive genius and enterprise of our people. As a Representative of the people of Indiana I have a deep solicitude for the welfare of her agricultural interests, and by this I mean farming and all the manufacturing processes depending upon it. I am therefore unalterably opposed to any system of laws which shall stimulate other interests at the expense of them, as all high tariffs unquestionably do. It is no part of the policy of protectionists to foster agriculture.

There are thousands of occupations, not at all dependent upon protection, but, on the contrary, suffering from it, in which, with a decent and fair system of trade, the people would employ themselves profitably. There is an almost infinite variety of commodities which would be produced in this country cheaper than they could be brought from foreign countries, and a vast number of industries now stifled by protection would revive and flourish once more if this incubus were removed.

What has killed our ship-building? It was not the Alabamas or Floridas; it was protection; for it prohibits us from buying Canadian lumber, English tools, and hardware, cordage, and the thousand articles that enter into the construction and equipment of vessels for sea, except at such prices that the foreign-built vessel will not cost over half as much as the domestic one. We formerly built hundreds of ships a year, and at present there is scarcely one large vessel on our stocks. Yet our skill in ship-building is not equaled in the world.

What has robbed us of our carrying trade on the high seas? It was not the civil war, for that only destroyed it in small part and has long since ceased, but the trade does not revive. Protection is the thief; for it forbids our purchasing foreign-built vessels with our farm and dairy produce, and our factory textiles and other productions. We once had the carrying trade of the world; now our ports are filled with foreign flags. Twelve years ago our tonnage exceeded that of Great Britain; now it is not over a third as great. Even the little town of Bremen excels us, for it has two and a half tons of shipping to each inhabitant, while we have scarcely one tenth of a ton. Why, Mr. Speaker, this very day the cost of placing flour and breadstuffs in the markets of the sea-board States from the granaries of the mighty West is very largely enhanced by our being compelled to employ our own vessels on the lakes in their transportation, which cost twice as much as Canadian-built vessels, and are therefore compelled to charge much higher freights. The result is that for a bushel of grain or a barrel of flour we only obtain a little over half as much dry goods or other merchandise as we should and would under a system of freedom, by which I mean a tariff for revenue. Free trade does not mean no taxes at all. It simply means taxes for the sake of revenue to support the Government, not taxes for the sake of protection to support monopolists. Government is an economical institution, or at least should be, while monopoly is a wasteful one, and soon dries up the very sap of national life.

What has driven from the markets of the world American shirtings, drillings, and other cotton manufactures and American locomotives, steam-vessels, and other machinery? It was the same "friend of American industry." A few years ago these things were greatly sought after, but now it is not so, because they are made to cost so much under our rotten systems of tariffs and currency that every other nation can make them cheaper than they can purchase them of us. Why, sir, the price of American flour in Rio Janeiro is higher than the flour of France and Spain; and those countries, though twice as remote as ours, supply the South American markets with breadstuffs. When Commodore Perry first visited Japan he found the relation between gold and all other commodities so different from what it was in civilized countries that he could purchase nothing of them. Everything was excessively dear. This is just our own case, and the same insane policy produced the result in each country.

There is no enterprise known to the history of civilization that has required the investment of such vast capital or given employment to so many persons or contributed so much to develop the latent resources of our country, or to increase its intrinsic and permanent values, or to give abundant and healthful prosperity to all our people, or to overcome distance in favor of commerce, so as to secure to each section the peculiar advantages of all the others, as our wonderful system of railroads. Yet, perhaps, there never was so much capital invested that yielded so little in dividends or interest to the investors. There have been invested in railroads in this country over sixteen hundred million dollars. One half of this consists of share capital, which has never paid on an average two per cent. per annum. Of one hundred and forty lines of railroads in the ten northwestern States only twenty pay dividends, and some of them very trifling. In Indiana $72,377,489 have been invested in railroads, but moderate average dividends only are paid by lines that cost $17,897,706, and the balance pay nothing.

This is the very opposite of the tariff-fattened record of the manufacturing monopolies. Their dividends range from twenty to one hundred per cent. annually. But railroads are "protected" by requiring them to pay from seventy-five to one hundred dollars per ton for rails, which formerly cost them from forty to fifty dollars; and to pay $20,000 for locomotive engines instead of $8,500 before; and to pay twice the old prices for labor and for cars and supplies of all kinds. Yet, the railroads give employment to hundreds of thousands of men, and furnish the necessities of life to millions of men, women, and children. By reason of the unwise legislation referred to, the cost of the construction and operation of railroads has been almost doubled. In order to pay expenses and keep up the roads the companies have been compelled to charge higher freights and fares. Thus everybody who travels or uses railroads is made to pay more therefor than he used to pay. Thus "protection," not of railroads, but of a few much less important interests, operates so as to take money out of the pockets of the people on every hand. Thus, our internal trade and commerce, whether carried on by the aid of the primitive wagon, or by steamboats or railroads, is taxed at every step of its way toward market. If the losses of the people occasioned by the swindling tariff systems of the last few years could be estimated the amount would inspire the people with astonishment and wrath against their deceivers.

Contrast this narrow policy of protection with the free-trade treaty between England and France, through which the trade of both countries has doubled in a short time; and with the recent proclamation of the Emperor of Brazil throwing open the coast and rivers of that vast country to vessels of all nations; and even with the late Portuguese order in council, admitting foreign-built vessels under the Portuguese flag upon payment of a small revenue duty. The great nations of the world are leading us on the road to commercial freedom.

It is one of the stale tricks of the protectionists to represent that our people are better off commercially than any others, and that the laborers of Europe are mere paupers, who, if we artificially keep up prices here, will be sure to desert their native countries and immigrate to ours. This is sufficiently refuted by the fact that parties of English workmen purposely imported for the iron-works of Pittsburgh refused the high wages offered to them and returned to their native country, where the cost of living is so much less than here. I submit a table of wages in Liverpool, England, and Reading, Pennsylvania, reducing the English wages from sterling at $4 84 to the pound. The tables were furnished by the editors of the newspapers in the cities respectively.

Why, sir, taking into consideration the very much cheaper rate of living in England it is our laborers who are getting to be the paupers and not theirs. A silk hat that costs in this country eight dollars can be bought in England for three dollars. A black coat that costs here thirty dollars can be bought there for seven dollars. A house that rents in Reading for $500 will only fetch in Liverpool $100. The hack which costs two dollars here costs but sixpence sterling or eleven cents gold there, equal to fifteen cents currency, for one or two passengers to go a mile. I have purposely selected Reading as the American town of comparison, because that is the heart of the region which is said to confer so many blessings upon its inhabitants through this monopoly policy.

Perhaps nothing more forcibly illustrates the folly of attempting to maintain an artificially high level of prices than does this very table of wages; for the remarkable rise in English wages of late years has doubtless been due in some degree to the efforts of the protectionists to attract them here by high wages. They professed a desire to encourage immigration by raising wages here; but they commenced by raising the prices of commodities and the cost of living. Now, the effect here and in England has been this: here it has raised commodities and the cost of living nearly two hundred per cent., and wages but about one hundred per cent. In England commodities have risen not over twenty-five per cent., but wages have gone up fifty per cent. So that the effect has been the very reverse of the one predicted.

I say the late advance in the rate of English wages is due in some degree to the delusive policy of our protectionists, but it is chiefly the result, alike natural and fortunate, of the rapid progress of England for many years past toward free trade; and it is a truth established by experience that, everything considered, labor is always best rewarded where all the industrial pursuits are least restricted and trade and commerce are most free.

Mr. Speaker, I venture to assert that the most effective and powerful bond of Union devised by the wisdom of our fathers to keep the States of this Union united, prosperous, and happy, was the provision in the Constitution by which it is declared that—

"No tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State. No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another; nor shall vessels bound to, or from, one State be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another."

By this wise and beneficent guarantee absolute free trade was established forever between the States.

The vast extent of our territory, the very great diversity of our natural advantages of soil, climate, and production, and the different habits and pursuits of our people, have made our country by itself almost equivalent to a world in its facilities for internal commerce. The freedom of trade between the States has enabled the people to exchange western for eastern, and both for southern, productions, and the country has grown and prospered with a rapidity alike surprising to ourselves and to the other nations of the earth. But does any man suppose that, without this free-trade condition of union, our country would not have been broken into fragments long years ago? Any system of inter-State tariffs, under the control of the States or of Congress, would have certainly proven to be a very Pandora's box of national discord and misery. In my judgment, this inhibition against any discriminations by Congress against any of the States in the arrangement of taxes and tariffs of late has been in many instances very grossly violated. But it is not my purpose to discuss them now.

It is said by the protectionists that if we reduce our tariff the people will buy too much, and thus be ruined. They mean that the people would not then buy enough of them. Under any system approximating free trade the people certainly would buy more, and therefore be happier, because they would be able to buy much cheaper and would have more to buy with. But it is a mere assumption to say that they would buy more than they could pay for; because, first, it takes two to make a bargain, and the seller is not apt to sell more than he can get an equivalent for; and secondly, the buyer will be more or less careful of his good name and credit. But this is a very inconsistent argument against reasonable freedom of trade for gentlemen to make who are ready to put the ballot into the hands of millions of untutored negroes. It is consistent with their policy to hold that white men are not intelligent enough to drive their own bargains without the intervention of a protective law to stay and control them, to teach them how much to buy and of whom to buy it, how much to sell and to whom to sell it, and what particular companies or corporations they shall patronize.

If our country is ever to become prosperous and happy again it will be after a return to the sound currency and rational revenue systems of her better days. The present systems lead only to national distress and ruin.

REMARKS OF HON. J. W. LEFTWICH, OF TENNESSEE,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 15, 1867,

On the bill (H. R. No. 1143) to provide for the more efficient government of the lately rebellious States.

Mr. LEFTWICH. Mr. Speaker, in compliance with a settled purpose I determined not to trespass on the valuable time of this House, but when a proposition is presented so unnecessary and unwarrantable, and probably fraught with such damaging results as I consider this to be, I cannot, in justice to my sense of duty, refrain from uttering a few words of earnest protest against its adoption.

The constitutional and legal objections to this measure are so clearly written in letters of living, burning light in the Constitution itself that there has seemed to me no necessity for their presentation; but others more able and competent than myself have thought otherwise, and have accordingly given that branch of the subject due attention; hence my remarks shall be confined to a few practical suggestions; and coming as I do from what was once an insurrectionary district, yet allowing no one in this Hall or elsewhere to rank me in loyal devotion to the Government of our fathers, I feel that my remarks ought, and I hope they will receive, the attention of the House; and if so, I will promise that whether they are heeded now or not, some things I say shall be remembered hereafter.

I agree fully with those who say a crisis is upon us, and that what is done must be done speedily and effectively. I see as clearly as they do that indications of a satisfactory adjustment of our difficulties are so threatening as to excite the serious alarm of those whose occupations will be forever gone when peace and harmony are again restored. I believe that the American people are equal to all emergencies, and that the same moral courage and forbearance that sustained them through the ordeal of a protracted civil war will still sustain them through the triumphs of a permanent and enduring peace. It is true, no doubt to many sadly true, that parties might be made to crumble and pass away; but still the nation would survive, which after all would more than compensate the people and posterity for this wreck of parties. It produced evident consternation among those who love party more than country to hear the able and eloquent gentleman from New York [Mr. RAYMOND] say there was but a shade of difference between the proposition of adjustment as presented in the proposed constitutional amendment, and the proposition of later date that comes from representative men of the southern States. This slight difference I think can and will be satisfactorily adjusted by the erasure or modification of the disqualifying section of the proposed constitutional amendment, so as to enable the South to accept it without dishonor. And here I desire to say, in my conversations with those whom it would disqualify, I have found a greater willingness to accept it than among those whom it would not. The representative men of those who would not be affected by this disqualifying clause, and would virtually be left with no obstructions in their road to political preferment, prompted by an honorable feeling of regard for their misguided friends and neighbors, as well as due self-respect, will never approve such conditions; yet it can readily be perceived that this disqualifying section is the commanding clause to that other class of southern aspirants who never can rise above their merited oblivion till all competing obstacles are removed.

I have no apologies to make for those who inaugurated or supported rebellion; but I have a right to demand, and I do demand, that the pledges that sustained my loyalty, and thousands of others similarly situated, shall be redeemed. The legislation proposed by this bill verifies every argument used in support of rebellion to induce the loyal to join them, and falsifies every argument the loyal made in reply.

Secessionists said: "When the dominant party in the North get into undisputed power they will deprive us of all our just rights, and placing the heel of oppression on our necks, will make of us literally 'hewers of wood and drawers of water.'"

The loyal said in reply: "You misunderstand or misrepresent them; they only desire to restore and preserve the Union;" and with pride quoted the concurrent resolutions declaring with only two dissenting voices in this House—

"That this war is not waged in any spirit of oppression, or for any purpose of conquest, subjugation, or for purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or established institutions of those States, but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution and to preserve the Union, with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired."

Now, I assume the responsibility of saying that without these and similar pledges no loyalty could have been found in any of the slaveholding States; and further, that without this loyalty, the war would not have terminated as it has. This may, at first, seem a strong assertion to those far from the scenes of strife; but when it is remembered that these States furnished near three hundred thousand national soldiers, and that even with these there were long, weary years in which the destiny of the nation hung trembling in uncertain balance. Besides these three hundred thousand soldiers there was in all the southern country a dormant loyal element which added a powerful moral influence against the success of rebellion. At that dark period in our history, when gold was near two hundred per cent. premium, when the draft was being resisted and riots were raging in New York and threatened elsewhere, when the entire strength of the Army was necessary to drive the enemy from the soil of Maryland and Pennsylvania, any business mind will perceive what would have been the result of subtracting three hundred thousand soldiers, and the moral influence that sustained them, from one side and adding them to the other. Not only do I have the right, in vindication of the plighted honor of my Government, to demand that these pledges be redeemed, but it is my duty to warn the nation of the dangers of disregarding them. No great moral wrong was ever perpetrated by individuals or nations without sooner or later meeting with retributive punishment; and if it required four long and doubtful years of bloody war to conquer the South, when we were right and they were wrong, how long would it require if they were right and we were wrong? as we will be whenever in violation of our pledges made during the war, and in violation of the conditions of their surrender, we oppress them with this degrading legislation.

These remarks are intended for those in this House, and the masses of the North who, though misguided, really desire a restoration of peace and consequent prosperity, and not for those who, with fell purpose to keep up strife, first falsely charged that the South was still in rebellion, and in order to seemingly verify these charges offer insult and injury, as in this and similar enactments, with a hope to inaugurate the condition of affairs they had said already existed.

It has been truthfully said in the progress of this debate that the result of the past elections was brought about by the appeals of "southern loyalists" for protection against their enemies; and to those who know the hopes that inspired these men it is a source of wonder that the northern people, so deservedly proverbial for sagacity, should have been so easily duped as to credit such statements. Fortunately, there is nothing so bad that some good may not come of it, and so with this proposed law which has already unmasked the purposes of these super-loyalists; as it is becoming apparent to all that they have neither needed nor desired protection for themselves, but are extremely anxious to be clothed with authority to protect other imaginary sufferers. This putting the protection in the hands of the regular Army does not meet with their approval, because they see in that no rich pickings for themselves. These men, as a class, never liked regular Army officers, and now that they are about to be deprived through them of what they deemed a rich harvest of spoils they like them less than ever. It is this same class who have cried most loudly and persistently for protection for the poor freedmen; but is not it a little strange that no such appeals have come up from the freedmen themselves?

I can tell you, sir, and I know whereof I speak, the freedmen want no such protection as they would give, which is such as the lion gives the lamb. When they ask for bread they do not want to be given a stone, as is done by those who offer them suffrage instead of release from burdensome taxation on the products of their labor. I will venture the assertion that if a vote was taken among the freedmen in my district to determine whether they prefer the right of suffrage or the removal of the cotton tax, nine out of ten would vote for the latter. No respectable number of them have desired or asked to be allowed this privilege; and when it is, as it may be, thrust upon them, and they vote, as they are sure to do, with the conservatives, they will then be as bitterly abused as conservatives now are.

This appeal for protection for the freedmen is refuted by the simple business fact that there is a demand in the South for much more labor than the freedmen can supply. Our rich lands remain uncultivated for want of labor, and the rivalry in procuring and retaining it is not only between individuals and communities, but between States; hence, as a matter of policy, if from no higher motive, the freedmen in the South receive better treatment and higher wages than any similar number of laborers in the world. If they were abused, as we hear they are, is it reasonable to suppose they would remain away from their friends in the North while the Freedmen's Bureau can give them transportation?

The eloquent gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] has truly said the fifteen southern States are a unit; and he might as truthfully have added, the course of the majority in this House has made them so. They were not a unit at any time prior to the war, when Whigs and Democrats contested with varying success every political battle-field in those States; and though the old Whig conservatism was borne under during the war, at its close such was the desire to place the men of that purely conservative party in positions of trust that Tennessee selected every member to this Congress from that party; Mississippi did the same, including her Senators; Arkansas I believe did likewise, and most of the other southern States I am told at least imitated these examples.

These representatives came here not to act as a unit with or against either party, but to cooperate with good men from the North of all parties for the purpose of repairing the damages of the war. Were they allowed to do so? The sad history of this hour answers sternly in the negative. One party met them on the threshold and with glad hearts and extended arms exclaimed: Welcome, brothers; the other, with cold, cruel, unforgiving, puritanical disdain, shut the door in their very faces. Hence, who is astonished that the fifteen southern States are a unit, and who dare say they ought not so to be? In this, too, I speak whereof I know. I and others came here expecting to cooperate with the Republican, which we believed was the Union party; but when we saw that it only aspired to be a sectional party, and learned the treatment that our constituents were to receive at their hands, our self-respect and love of country forced us to seek affiliation elsewhere.

To illustrate more clearly that the South sought in good faith to put forward her conservative men, and not those who had urged them into rebellion, I may also add this fact: the Mississippi convention that passed the ordinance of secession was composed of seventy-nine Democrats out of ninety members, while the convention called to reestablish Federal relations had these numbers reversed.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire distinctly to repeat there is no necessity for this or any other protection for loyal white or black people in the southern States beyond the laws already in practical operation there. These raw-head-and-bloody-bone stories that have imposed on the credulity of northern minds till they have become ridiculous in the estimation of the unprejudiced are in the main false, made of whole-cloth, and are concocted and promulgated for base and designing purposes. There is not one of these self-exiled loyalists who professes to be afraid because of his loyalty to return to his home, who would not take the first train for home with the bare protection of a commission to collect the internal revenue in his district, or any other commission that would pay better than hanging round here and fabricating these stories.

True, there is more lawlessness there now than prior to the war, as there was when the comparatively few soldiers returned from Mexico, and as there is now in Maine, where the prison statistics show an increase in crime of one hundred per cent., and that three fourths of all the criminals are returned soldiers. Gentlemen should remember that war is not refining nor Christianizing in its influence; and the southern States are no exception to the rule. In my own loved State I regret that we are less contented and hopeful than elsewhere in the South, because there, as in 1861, a minority accidentally hold the reins of power, and are attempting to perpetuate their rule over the majority in violation of the fundamental principles of republican government. What was usurpation then is usurpation now, and the same disgraceful overthrow that overtook the usurpers in 1861 will overtake those of 1867.

Now, Mr. Speaker, even if protection was needed, this proposition does not and cannot afford it. And having protested in behalf of our national honor against this impolitic and impracticable course, I also desire to protest in behalf of the officers of the Army who would be designated to fill these positions, not that they would be uncourteously received and treated by the southern people, who have a high regard for the officers of the regular Army, much preferring them to the self-styled southern loyalists, but these officers would there make and cultivate acquaintances and probably form attachments which would soon result in the same disgraceful accusations being made against them as have on this floor been made against the Naval Academy at Annapolis. I hesitate not to say that the General of the Army is to-day more highly appreciated by the former soldiers of the South than he is by the politicians of the North.

These soldiers know the almost superhuman efforts that have been made to induce him to join the politicians in their utter disregard and violation of the conditions on which they surrendered, and they know that he has been supported in his refusal to join them by that highest of human attributes, a soldier's honor. With this knowledge of their regard for him I listened with peculiar interest to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] while expressing the probability that he was the only man who could satisfactorily carry out the wishes of the nation. The world's history presents no spectacle so sublime as for these southern States to consent as a unit to place their destiny in the hands of this man, now called their conqueror. Nor is this among the impossibilities, as evidenced by their present respect for and confidence in the President, who two short years ago was more objectionable to them and more dreaded by them than any man in the northern States; but who, without undoing or unsaying one act or word, and only by evidencing a willingness to forgive and forget the past, with its errors and consequent sorrows, has made for himself an abiding place in their hearts that would cause them, if necessary, to lay down their lives in his support.

In behalf of the southern people I desire in conclusion to say: as a community, with rare exceptions, they entertain no feelings of animosity toward the officers or soldiers of the national Army, who, while the South was in armed rebellion, discharged their duty even to the laying waste of the land of their pride and affection; but toward those who did not have the courage to fight them while in arms, but who since their surrender continue to offer insult and injury, and who, judging from their own corrupt hearts, construe their demonstrations of present loyalty into perfidy, they do justly entertain the profoundest feelings of indignation and contempt.

SPEECH OF HON. JEHU BAKER,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 18, 1867.

The House having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1143) to provide for the more efficient government of the insurrectionary States—

Mr. BAKER said:

Mr. SPEAKER: In our transition period from civil war to permanent peace, I think I perceive that American statesmanship has the following grand objects to accomplish, and that our future will be better or worse in proportion as all these objects are comprehended and realized, or misunderstood and ignored. Let us look at them, sir, and see what they are when reduced to the forms of exact statement:

1. The loyal people of the South should be protected;

2. After the terrible struggle for existence through which the nation has passed every truly reasonable man must admit that measures ought to be adopted which will make the Republic secure for the future;

3. Care should be taken that the late treason against our Government and against humanity should be stamped with the stigma of unmistakable dishonor;

4. The liberties of the people of the South should be provided for on the largest attainable scale, and established upon the firmest possible foundation—that of the ballot in the hands of the voter;

5. In so far as practicable the defeated population should be subjected to a course of treatment which will put them in a train toward ultimate harmony with the Republic;

6. All our measures should look to a time, the earliest time compatible with the public safety, when the revolted States may resume their full and equal participation in the government of the country.

Protection for the loyal, security for the Republic, dishonor to treason, revival of patriotism in the South, liberty in the largest democratic sense, guarded and made secure by the ballot, and after that, restoration of the revolted States to complete equality of political rights in the Union. Such, in my judgment, are the cardinal ends to which all our efforts should tend. Like the devotees of Cybele, who could hear nothing but her flutes, I am deaf to every voice which would seduce me from fidelity to any of these vitally important objects. So profoundly convinced am I that they should all be taken into the account, and none of them overlooked in the scheme we may adopt, that no excitement, no clamor, no authority here or elsewhere, no liability to temporary misinterpretation of my action, has weighed or shall weigh one feather in swerving me from my entire sense of duty in relation to the momentous matter we have in hand.

This bill, as amended by the Senate, incomplete as it may be, is yet incomparably superior to any measure which has heretofore been proposed. It is altogether broader, and better embraces all the great elements of the situation than any of its predecessors. It is a projection from the whole case, imperfect, doubtless, but yet having the indispensable merit of breadth of view. All other measures which have been presented have been signally defective in this essential quality. As a sound judgment in a cause at law must result from proper attention to all the material parts of the controversy, so a sound measure of legislation, especially one designed to remedy the mischief with which this nation is afflicted, must proceed from a due consideration of the entire complex of public affairs to which it is intended to apply.

Four leading ideas of procedure have heretofore been suggested or proposed, all utterly inadmissible in my opinion, because narrow, untenable, one-sided, and proceeding from special aspects of the situation.

1. The territorial plan; the theory which regards the ten rebel States simply as Territories of the Union. This plan, though suggested, has found very little favor, and calls for no comment.

2. The proposition to treat the defeated rebels as foreigners; become such by their own action. This was a favorite idea of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] and was made the pivotal center upon which his reconstruction bill turned. The one sufficiently fatal objection to this theory was, that it was impossible in law; inconsistent with the sovereignty of the Republic. It was also in palpable conflict with the civil rights bill and the proposed constitutional amendment. And, in addition to all this, its direct tendency was to reconstruct political order in the South upon a basis altogether too exclusively colored and too little republican. This scheme, wretchedly bad in law, would have been worse in practice; so I felt it my duty to do what I could to get it out of our way.

3. The plan of excluding on a large scale the whites from the ballot while giving it to the colored people. This idea was embodied in the Louisiana bill. I thought it inadmissible to exclude so many white people while voting all the blacks; I thought such a course would tend to still further inflame the hostility of race; to still further intensify, if possible, the hatred that is felt toward this Government; I thought it would be found impracticable in its execution; I doubted whether it would satisfy the great sense of liberty in the northern mind; and I was certain it was an invasion of that grand idea of republicanism which is the fountain-head of all our strength.

I voted against the Louisiana bill, and would have so voted had I stood alone upon this floor. The Senate have acted wisely, I think, in laying that bill aside. I wanted a principle more republican, a foundation broader and more truly radical than it supplied. The rebellion came of the fact that political polity in the southern States was too narrow in its foundation. In the work of reconstruction I did not wish to copy the exploded blunder. An oligarchy of white caste had corrupted southern society to its core. Then came the explosion—scourging the offending States with fire, sword, and famine, and carrying mourning to well-nigh every hearthstone of the North—all for want of breadth of base in the polity of the revolting States. In the presence of this awful experience, so recent and so terrible, I was appalled at the thought of building anew upon narrow foundations—of giving my support to a measure which tended to create an oligarchy of black caste in place of the overthrown one of white caste. It appeared to me, not like the steady, right-onward march of our great party of liberty and progress, but rather like a retrograde movement—like a return to the same lame and impotent conclusion against which we had so vehemently protested from the beginning.

4. The plan of governing the rebel States by the sword alone; of turning the whole subject over to the Army. This proposition came to us from the joint Committee on Reconstruction. The bill as originally presented placed the entire population of the revolted States under martial law, pure and simple; turned over the government of ten States to the regular Army; placing all their people, loyal and disloyal, white and black—all their rights of life, liberty and prosperity—under the control of military commissions which might be multiplied indefinitely over this vast area, unaccompanied by any civil policy whatever, or any provision looking to the termination of the system. At the head of this military government stood the President, notwithstanding any devices of the bill to the contrary. So that the upshot of the business was—military protection to the loyal people of the South, administered under the authority and control of Andrew Johnson as Commander-in-Chief of the Army! To my mind such legislation was glaringly inadequate and faulty. It is even questionable whether it added anything to the military protection already provided for by the Freedmen's Bureau bill; while it was, on the face of the bill, an open surrender of the civil to the military power, on the great subject of reconstruction in the rebel States. This I found it impossible to sanction, and I therefore voted against the bill so long as it tendered nothing but the naked sword, wielded by Andrew Johnson. It was easy to see that the great need of the case was to place the loyal people of the South in such a situation that they could protect themselves by the formation of loyal State governments on the basis of universal suffrage, meantime extending military protection while this process was going on, and withdrawing the military whenever it should be completed. Accordingly strenuous efforts, in which I assisted, were made in this House to amend the bill by attaching to it a civil policy—some provisions looking to the establishment of loyal State governments, contemplating the ultimate withdrawal of the military, and the ultimate resumption by such States of their normal relations with the Union.

All such efforts were defeated by a combination of a portion of the members on this side the Hall with the whole of the Democrats, and thus we were brought to a direct vote upon the unimixed military scheme presented by the bill. In that shape it passed in opposition to my vote; for I was satisfied it involved a profound and mischievous oversight, in the omission of all civil policy looking to universal suffrage or the nearest possible approach thereto; looking to the establishment of loyal republican governments; looking to the adoption of the constitutional amendment with its great and invaluable guarantees of security to the nation; and looking to a final restoration of the rebel States to their appropriate and equal place in the Union, on terms at once satisfactory to Congress and safe to the Republic. The entire omission of all these great matters in a bill which was to embody the final action of the Thirty-Ninth Congress in relation to the revolted States appeared to me too much like an outright confession of incompetence, or else of a purpose to indefinitely postpone the work of reconstruction. In either case, I greatly apprehended that a blunder scarcely less than fatal would be committed.

Thanks to the Senate it has relieved us from this peril also. It has not only laid aside the Louisiana bill, which smacked so strongly of an oligarchy of black caste, but it has taken up our military bill, improved it by sundry lesser amendments, and added to it the vitally important feature of a civil policy, much the same as that which a majority of the Republican members vainly struggled to attach to the bill in the House.

It was necessary, I suppose, that the crudities which I have now alluded to should be sloughed off, before a competent measure, commensurate with all the great parts of the case, could be agreed upon. I think we have the essential elements of such a measure in this bill, as it comes back to us from the Senate. Besides the declaration of the illegality of the Johnson governments, and the assumption of plenary control over them by Congress, the bill as it now stands, no longer limited to the one solitary idea of the sword wielded by a recalcitrant President, stands forth in something like the large and symmetrical proportions of a policy worthy of this Congress, and appropriate to the very important subject to which it applies.

1. It provides for military protection of the loyal people of the South until proper civil governments shall be established.

HO. OF REPS.

Tariff—Mr. Wentworth.

39TH CONG.... 2D SESS.

2. It makes secure the great guarantees of national safety which are contained in the proposed constitutional amendment, by providing that this amendment shall have become part of the Constitution and shall also have been adopted by each one of the rebel States before it shall be entitled to representation in Congress.

3. It fixes dishonor upon treason by saving as a condition precedent the ratification of this amendment—which excludes the leading rebels from holding any office under the United States or any State.

4. It makes the largest and most stable provision for liberty, by asserting practically the principle of universal suffrage in the ten rebel States as a basis upon which constitutional, loyal governments shall be erected.

5. It places the great body of the disaffected people of the South in such a new position, and under the influence of such new ideas and motives, that the democratic feeling, as distinguished from the feeling of caste, will gradually resume control over popular thought, and thus progressively mold southern society into harmony with the General Government.

6. It presents an ultimatum, which, when complied with, will entitle these States to an equal participation in the Government, on terms safe to the nation, promotive of freedom, and merciful to the defeated insurgents.

It may turn out that the bill is defective in not providing a more direct machinery for its own execution. As it is, it must be put in operation either by the provisional governments which the President has set up in the rebel States, or else by spontaneous movements of the people under the protection of the military. I expect no action, and certainly no desirable results, from the first method. The other—spontaneous movements of the people—is in my judgment the very best way in which new and loyal State governments can be established out of the wreck of the rebellion—if, indeed, under the conditions of the case that process shall be found practicable. If not, then a supplemental act can hereafter be passed, providing a direct and specific machinery for the practical execution of the principles of the bill.

Sir, the great principles which belong essentially to the life of a nation will struggle unceasingly to get themselves more perfectly expressed as its history advances. Causes favoring and causes adverse alike unite to bring about their more complete development. Controlled by that infinite reason which shapes human history, "rough hew it how we will," Jefferson Davis and the stars and bars did as much for the destruction of slavery as Abraham Lincoln and the stars and stripes. Obstinate resolve on the part of slaveholders to overthrow the Government finally begot the resolve on the part of the Government to overthrow slavery—and down went the corrupt and iniquitous system before the sword of the Republic—not because it was corrupt and iniquitous, but because it was the feeding machine of the rebellion.

And now another chapter of our history is being unrolled in a similar sense. The obstinate determination of the defeated insurgents to control the destinies of ten States, to reject all guarantees of national safety, to select unrepentant rebels as their representative men, to crush out the lives, the sentiments, and the liberties of men loyal and true to the country, to make loyalty infamous and treason honorable all over the wide region swept by the rebellion, thus laying anew, broad and deep, the foundations of future and bloody discord in the Republic, has, in the march of time, and by the inexorable logic of necessity, made it the imperative duty of the Government to appeal to the great democratic principle of universal suffrage, by extending the ballot to every disfranchised loyalist in the rebel States. Other than this, there is now nothing for it but to govern by the sword, or to abandon these States to the control of the rebel class, in which event they would certainly become segregated and fixed as a foreign and hostile element in the bosom of the country. Woe to the Republic if we should be so blind, so foolish, so imbecile, as to accept a fate so certain and so destructive of the safety and happiness of the nation. The blood of the five hundred thousand who died that the nation might live was of more worth than this!

We are shut up unto the faith. Every door of escape is closed in our faces. The guarantees of the proposed constitutional amendment—so reasonable and so necessary to national safety—have been rejected with scorn and contempt. Union men and Union principles are being crushed out in the South. The illegal, usurped Johnson governments, controlled by rebels, and disfranchising the great body of Union citizens, are being wielded to the end of reinstating the defeated rebellion. Vote your friends! Vote the friends of your country! Vote every man whose ballot will neutralize the ballot of a rebel! This, sir, is the talisman which commands the situation; and I had a prescience of its impending necessity, and consequently of its coming practicability, when on the 18th of December, 1865, fourteen days after the meeting of this Congress, I vainly endeavored to get the following preamble and resolution adopted:

"Whereas class rule and aristocratic principles of government have burdened well nigh all Europe with enormous public debts and standing armies, which press as a grievous incubus on the people, absorbing their substance, impeding their culture, and impairing their happiness; and whereas the class rule and aristocratic principle of slaveholding, which found a place in our Republic, has proved itself in like manner hurtful to our people, by degrading labor and prohibiting popular education in a large section of the country, by striving to rend our Union in fragments, by causing the blood of hundreds of thousands of patriots to flow, and by compelling the people to impose on themselves a debt of European magnitude in defense of liberty, nationality, and civilization on this continent: Therefore,

"Resolved, (as the sense of this House,) That once for all we should have done with class rule and aristocracy, as a privileged power before the law in this nation, no matter where or in what form they may appear; and that in restoring the normal relations of the States lately in rebellion it is the high and sacred duty of the representatives of the people to proceed upon the true, as distinguished from the false, democratic principle, and to realize and secure the largest attainable liberty to the whole people of the Republic, irrespective of class or race."

There, sir, was a declaration which involved the true idea of the origin of the rebellion, and the true idea of the line of policy which would best eradicate its principles from the country and restore peace, harmony, and patriotism in all our borders. It came of slavery and class rule: it came of an immense departure from the true democratic principle. National health and national safety—to say nothing of what is incomparably higher, national glory and honor—are to be sought in a return to that principle. The larger your idea the nearer it is to the truth. The more completely you trust the true democratic principle, by giving every citizen an equal chance in the State and before the law, the more completely do you stimulate into active use the locked-up powers of every human heart and brain; the abler, richer, more intelligent and country-loving do you make your citizens; the larger is your stock of liberty in the aggregate; the more complete is its enjoyment by every individual; the firmer-grounded and more ideally perfect is your Government. To such ends Providence leads us whether we will or not. That which this Congress, on its first assembling, was not ready to adopt even as an abstract declaration of principle, it is now compelled by the march of events and the very necessity of the case to promulgate as a concrete statute of the Republic. And thus the moral of our whole enormous tragedy is to be, that they who have striven so madly to subvert this grand edifice of liberty have left it upon foundations more secure, more liberal, and made, not only others, but themselves more free.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN WENTWORTH, OF ILLINOIS,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 26, 1867.

The House having resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. WENTWORTH said: I and some of my colleagues on the Committee of Ways and Means have prepared some remarks with reference to this bill, but we cannot well make speeches ourselves and then ask the House to deny the privilege to others. And there is no time for discussion except under the five-minutes' rule; and when discussion is thus limited it is generally the case that members write out their remarks so as to include what they would have said in a single speech, and therefore I ask that members be allowed to publish their views in a single speech. [Leave was granted.]

Mr. Chairman, it is time the Government had a reliable financial policy. We ought to be able to make approximate calculations of our annual expenditures and our means of meeting them; we ought to be able to determine what amount of money we should raise from imposts and what from excises; we ought to determine what amount of our public debt we should liquidate annually; we ought to consolidate our indebtedness, now embracing near forty different forms of securities, and simplify our legislation touching it, now scattered through near thirty different laws. All admit this; but they raise the question, where shall we begin? I would begin with a fixed determination to add not another dollar to the already authorized public indebtedness. This would settle the amount of the public debt and the annual interest. I would return to specie payments as rapidly as the interests of the Government would permit, and then reduce all salaries and other expenses which have been increased in consequence of the currency expansion to what they were before the war. Having placed the ordinary expenses of the Government upon an economical basis and upon approximate stability, I would adjust our impost duties so as to meet them. Our system of excise duties is very unpopular, and should not be resorted to except to liquidate the expenses of the war. From the foundation of the Government the tariff, with its miscellaneous resources, embracing the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, has been relied upon to defray all the expenses in times of peace. Such should be the case now. Indeed, the most of the debts of our three foreign wars have been paid in the same way. Only during seven years prior to the rebellion had we raised over one hundred thousand dollars per annum by a direct tax, and only during four of these did it exceed one million. Only $12,700,000 had we raised in all in this way. The last general tariff bill, that known as the Morrill bill, was passed during the last session of President Buchanan's administration. The slight alterations of the tariff since that time may all be classed under the head of "war expedients." The changed condition of our country requires an entire revision of our tariff laws.

And those who were originally satisfied with the Morrill bill, so called, manifest great confidence in the ability of the same man to supervise the preparation of a substitute for it. The bill that passed the House at the last session was a great improvement upon the present tariff law. Yet it was not in all things as I would have had it. I voted against it with reluctance, after looking carefully at all its provisions, hoping that it might be reconsidered in the House or modified in the Senate. But, looking at the inadequacy of the present law, I regret that it did not pass, because we had no other pending, and because by this time all might have seen its practical workings and could have remedied any of its defects; and hereafter my vote will depend more upon my preference for any pending bill over the existing law than upon my opinion of its abstract merits. The duties of the pending bill are said to be very high; but we must remember that the duties under the present inadequate laws average forty-eight and fifty-eight hundredths per cent. upon all dutiable imports, and forty-three and nineteen hundredths per cent. upon our total imports. At the time the Morrill tariff bill, so called, was passed, much was said against it. Yet, from that day to this, its opponents have never offered a general substitute for it. The war being over, the condition of the country being changed, Mr. MORRILL, as chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, assists in preparing another bill as a substitute for his own bill (so called) of 1861. His last bill is opposed by the same interest, and in many instances by the identical men and newspapers, that opposed his bill of 1861, and have ever since opposed it. What would these men and newspapers have? Where is their bill? Have they not a single friend on this floor to introduce it? I am committed to a tariff that will produce revenue enough to defray all the ordinary expenses of the Government. I want no internal revenue taxation except to pay our war debt, and I want to pay that debt as soon as practicable in order to get rid of that odious and oppressive taxation. I can disinterestedly examine the provisions of any tariff bill that will produce the requisite revenue. There is but one bill pending. Those opposing this bill dare not trust themselves to propose a substitute. We must enact the pending bill, drawn to meet present exigencies, or fall back upon the inadequate law of 1861 with its temporary amendments, which law has always been denounced, be it remembered, by the same interest that denounces the pending bill. The present laws being inadequate to the present condition of the country, I am for revising them. There is, I regret to say, but one pending substitute for them. I am narrowed down to a choice between MORRILL of 1861, before the war, and MORRILL of 1867, after the war; for he who opposes the pending bill must either defend the existing laws as adequate to present Government necessities, or propose a substitute, which no one has yet done. As a means of revenue it is pronounced greatly superior to the existing law; and if in the end its revenues do not prove adequate, we must revise it so that they will. It is possible that this House may so amend this bill as to improve it both for revenue and protection. But if it does not suit everybody, the course of Senator Wright, of New York, in 1842 furnishes a good example. He was decidedly opposed to the bill, and so were all his political friends. Yet he deemed the existing law entirely inadequate. His vote could pass or defeat the bill. And I commend his remarks, taken from the Globe of that day, upon giving his vote for it, to the members of this House:

Tariff—Mr. Wentworth.

HO. OF REPS.

"After the most mature and anxious reflection he had come to the conclusion that it was his duty to vote for this measure, because he assumed that this bill must pass in the form it now bears or that no revenue law can pass at the present session. If he was correct in this assumption, then he could not avoid the conclusion he had announced; and he did not suppose there was a single member of either House of Congress who supposed for a moment that if this bill be rejected upon this vote, any further attempt is to be made at this session to pass a revenue bill. The alternative presented, then, is this bill or none; and the deep and deliberate conviction of his mind was that this bill should pass, bad and loaded with defects as he believed it to be, rather than that none should pass."

Having determined to raise through the tariff and miscellaneous resources of the Government revenue enough to defray its ordinary expenses, there certainly can be no difference of opinion as to the manner of raising it upon articles that have no competition in this country. We must tax heavily luxuries, and lightly necessities. It is only upon articles competing with our domestic products upon which much difference can arise in apportioning our tariff duties. Now, it must be kept in mind that the contest is between the pending bill and a law enacted before the war, when we had no war taxes. Assuming that the discrimination between foreign and domestic labor was right in 1861, is it not right that that discrimination should now be increased by the amount of the war tax? If I live upon the Canadian frontier I cannot pay my war taxes and compete upon equal terms in the markets of the United States with a farmer who lives across the line and therefore pays no war taxes. The pending bill makes the foreigner dealing in the United States markets pay the war taxes of the citizen whose products he crowds out. You may call this home protection if you please, but it is really nothing more nor less than equalizing taxation upon all men sending their products to the United States markets. It is simply telling men residing abroad who manufacture for the United States markets that their goods cannot escape taxation by their own non-residence. Under the reciprocity treaty, for instance, the Canadians had all the advantages of our markets and escaped all our taxation. This held out inducements to our farmers to move across the line. Looking at the imports of last year our farmers will see that animals to the amount of $1,600,000 were imported. The owners of them may have been rebels, or rebel sympathizers, or fugitives from the draft. Yet they had our markets on more favorable terms than our own citizens, burdened with the war tax.

Much prejudice existed before the war with agriculturists, and with none more than myself, against the whole policy of discriminating in favor of resident manufacturers, because while all duties fall very disproportionately upon themselves they never realize any of that incidental protection which manufacturers labor to secure in every tariff bill. But agriculturists have no one so much as themselves to blame for this, since they were so zealous in opposition to all the discriminating tariff bills that they took no trouble to see that their own interests were as well protected as those of others in those that did pass. Thus, while the ever vigilant manufacturer did his best to keep foreign fabrics from our market, it was the wool-grower's fault that the manufacturer was allowed the whole world in which to purchase his wool. The manufacturer raised the cry that Americans must patronize American manufacturers; but it had never occurred to the wool-grower then to raise the cry that American manufacturers should only manufacture from American wool. It was the business of wool-manufacturers to take care that they had no foreign competition, while the wool-growers were writing, talking, and dreaming of the glories of free trade at the same time that they were paying highly-protective prices for their cloths and losing money from the competition of foreign wools. So the men who raised flaxseed were, in their indifference, encouraging free ports to the seed, while the manufacturers of the oil from the seed were closing our ports to the foreign oil.

The alternative of free trade is direct taxation; but it took the late war to make the agriculturists really feel the alternative. Our internal revenue system has learned them that free trade is one thing to the ear and another to the pocket. They now understand that the easiest way of raising a revenue is through the tariff; and they are organizing to take the same advantage of its incidents that the manufacturers have always done. The woolen manufacturers have an organization, every member of which pays twenty-five dollars for initiation and heavy contributions from time to time besides. They also pay an agent about five thousand dollars per annum to watch the legislation of the country and to gather up statistics to influence it. The wool-growers of Illinois, numbering thousands, have less than one hundred in their organization, and each member pays but one dollar. I presume they have been, perhaps are now, equally indifferent to organization in other States. To show the untiring vigilance of the manufacturing interest, it will be remembered that after this House had passed the general tariff bill, with both wool and woollens exactly as the manufacturers consented to have them, and after the bill had been postponed by the aid of Senators from manufacturing districts, this House, in sympathy with the wool-growers, passed a bill for the protection of wool alone. This bill the manufacturing interest in the Senate prevented from passing. This House, in despair of any tariff bill getting through the Senate, finally passed one giving American products the advantages of what is known as a home valuation. Here the wool manufacturer turned up again and took advantage of the greater proportion of Senators from manufacturing States to deprive the growers of the coarse wools of even this small advantage, as the third proviso of the ninth section of the act of last session will prove. The Senate amended the bill, and the manufacturers thus surrendered the coarse wool-growers in fear of losing it. This bill makes that matter all right, however. By making a discrimination in the classes of wool, manufacturers have a great advantage through the ignorance and venality of custom-house inspectors. For it is a general rule that where there are different duties upon different qualities of the same article the lowest duty is the one that is invariably collected. Thus, out of the $10,000,000 of wool importations last year $3,500,000 were valued at twelve cents or less; and over five and one half millions at twenty-four cents or less; while only $153,000 were valued at over twenty-four cents. I do not believe in the honesty of such a valuation. Farmers should imitate the persistent energy of the manufacturers, and allow but one duty upon all classes of wool. A uniform duty would not only break up the fraud at the custom-house, but is just in itself; for the very coarsest of carpet-wools abound in the regions of New Mexico, and need only the encouragement given to finer wools to come into general use. If we are to discriminate at all in our tariff, it should be to encourage infant and struggling industries and to develop dormant resources. It is agreed on all sides that this country raises only about half the wool used in it, and yet in New Mexico it is hardly worth saving, so great is the foreign competition. It is untrue that there is any kind of wool used in the United States that cannot, if properly protected, be profitably grown therein.

I have alluded to this matter of wool more particularly because the opponents of all discriminating tariffs argue that they invariably protect the manufacturer at the expense of the farmer. I want to satisfy the farmer that it has been his own fault that such has been the case. Instead of opposing all tariffs, he should help make them. The manufacturers are wealthier, more compact, and better organized, and employ the very shrewdest of lobby agents, who can in the social circle raise the most effective cry of distress, and in committee dictate a specific duty or an ad valorem, a classification, a proviso, an inclusion or exclusion of cost and charges, &c., as may best suit the interests of their employers. And this is the reason that in framing our tariffs the manufacturers have so often gained an undue advantage over the farmers. But the farmers are the most numerous and can always take care of themselves when they resolve upon it. Their hope is in educating themselves in the technical language of tariff laws, and in the efforts of their representatives to see that no one is protected at their expense. I repudiate the whole theory of protecting manufactures by furnishing cheaply the raw material, unless we mean to cheapen it by taking off all the Government taxes from our farmers. If the American farmer is to be taxed upon his crops of all kind, then the tax should be added to the price at which he sells.

Foreign farmers have no such tax to add to their price, and consequently they can undersell the American farmer to the extent of the tax, and thereby furnish the raw material cheaper to the American manufacturer than the American citizen can. This policy, although adopted in some instances before the war without much complaint, because never seriously felt, can never be consented to so long as war taxes are levied. I believe in adjusting this tariff matter equitably between the manufacturing and agricultural interests upon the principle that the welfare of either is dependent upon the home market furnished by the other. A prosperous agriculture, furnishing a reliable home market, is a better encouragement to manufactures than cheap foreign raw material. And prosperous home manufactures are a better protection to agriculture than cheap foreign fabrics. Unless the protection is extended to agriculture, in the end it will have to be abandoned, and our tariff laws be made to consist of a single section, fixing but one rate of duty.

If we open a debt and credit system between our ordinary expenditures and our receipts from the tariff, the much-needed stability in our tariff laws will require us to scan well all our appropriations in order to render uniform our expenditures through a series of years; and when this uniformity is once attained we shall have nothing to quarrel about except the amount of discrimination inside the revenue point to be apportioned upon domestic articles coming in competition with foreign. If we provide for ordinary expenses through duties upon imports we shall require excise duties only for our extraordinary expenses. I refer to those growing out of the war. Now, our interest requires $183,000,000; and this sum for annual interest alone exceeds by $6,000,000 the whole amount of our public debt in 1816, when it was greater than at any time before the rebellion. It also exceeds by $48,000,000 the whole amount of the revenue raised in the highest year before the rebellion. To such an enormous amount, reduced only as we reduce our debt, is the industry of the country to be annually taxed for interest alone. But no one proposes to limit our annual payments to interest. Every one urges that we must pay something annually to the liquidation of our public debt; and no one has suggested less than $50,000,000. Even this slow process of liquidating our public debt would require an annual taxation of $183,000,000 even if the ordinary expenses were paid, as before suggested. I prefer an earlier liquidation of the public debt; but I do not see where the money is to come from. For the fiscal year ending the 30th of June last we raised $309,000,000 from excises alone. But there was great complaint of excessive taxation from all quarters. Petitions and delegations came for relief with the opening of Congress; and the Committee of Ways and Means were busy, not only mornings and evenings, but during the sessions of the House, as our absence when the ayes and noes were called will show, for six months in trying to make every reduction compatible with the necessities of the Government. But great as those reductions were they failed to satisfy the public, and we have had to travel the ground all over again at this session. The committee have had to listen to even louder complaints from unsuccessful industries than at the last session. While our people were very patient under all the burdens of the war, it is useless to try to disguise the fact that they are becoming very restive under their present excessive taxation.

Besides the reductions under new legislation, the fall in prices, decrease of business, and lessening of incomes since the war, will greatly reduce the internal revenue receipts. And our people will not consent in peace to an increase of a war tax that has once been lessened nor to its reëstablishment after it has once been repealed. The revised estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury give us but $240,000,000, where we got $309,000,000 last year. I have examined the official returns for seven months ending 1st February, and we get $184,000,000 against $200,000,000 last year; and the incomes are nearly all included, and embrace $47,700,000 of this sum. They were estimated at $50,500,000. And the people are still crying for reduction; and the difficulty consists not only in determining the amount of reduction, but also the articles upon which the reduction shall take place. We have had more speeches in the rooms of the Committee of Ways and Means than there have been made in this House; we have had earlier and later sessions; and we have labored under the disadvantage of having no hour rule and no previous question. And while this immense lobby have been urgent to take off taxation from their particular interest, not one of them, although frequently asked, has been able to name any articles upon which he could make good the amount of revenue from which they wished us to relieve them. Appearances indicate that the internal revenue will be nearer $233,000,000 than $240,000,000. This would pay our interest and leave $100,000,000 to apply upon our debt. Calling that debt $2,500,000,000, this would extinguish it in twenty-five years. If we reduce our internal revenue to $183,000,000, we shall have but $50,000,000 to apply upon our debt, and then it will take fifty years to extinguish it. Although I would prefer the shortest period, yet I would not be captious upon that point, as I do not regard the exact amount of so much importance as I do that a definite amount should be agreed upon. The Secretary of the Treasury says, in his last report, "With proper economy in all the Departments of the Government, the debt can be paid by the generation that created it." I believe this, and am for economy everywhere as the best means of bringing it about. But whether the debt is to be paid in this generation or the next, I deem of minor importance compared with having a fixed financial policy. Let us agree upon the amount we shall raise annually, and then let us only discuss the means of raising it in a way that will be the least oppressive to the people. We cannot do this understandingly until the amount has been agreed upon. Let the tariff revenues support the Government. Let the internal revenue pay the public interest and a fixed amount upon the public debt. This being done, we are confined in our discussion to the same thing in both cases, namely: what articles can best bear taxation, and what can best be exempted from it. I think in time we can settle upon some twenty or thirty articles that will give us all the internal revenue we want; for if we do not add to our debt, but go on extinguishing a definite amount of our onerous debt yearly, the falling off of our interest will be perceptibly felt. When we get our whisky laws so framed that the tax cannot be evaded, we shall nearly double our revenue from that source. If the bill of the present session will not do the work, we must make one still stronger. A nation that suffered so much to enforce its laws against the rebels cannot afford to have them defied by distillers. In this way, if you increased your ordinary expenses you would have to revise the tariff; and if you increased your debt you would have to revise your internal revenue system. Thus would our present obscure financial system be brought to the comprehension of the great mass of the tax-payers, and they could the better bring to deserved accountability every one of their servants for their votes upon bills increasing public expenditures.

On one account I should prefer $100,000,000 as the annual sinking fund to $50,000,000, and even a greater sum if our people could endure it. From the commencement of the public debt I have had great fears from the consequences of the constitutional inability of our

State and municipal authorities to tax United States bonds. I cannot say how large a portion of our bonds are held abroad. The Secretary of the Treasury, however, estimates the amount at $350,000,000. I often hear complaints that this country is drained to so large an extent of its specie to pay its foreign interest. State and other bonds, however, to the amount of $250,000,000 have also to be paid in specie abroad. Yet when I reflect how much can so justly be said against a privileged class at home, I regret that our bonds cannot to better advantage all be held abroad. Already do the real-estate holders begin to feel the effects of increased taxation in consequence of the withdrawal of so large an amount of personal property from taxation by its investment in United States bonds. There are men and corporations that have United States bonds ranging all the way from one thousand to one million dollars, and perhaps more, who pay not one cent to the support of their State, county, or city government, whilst merchants, mechanics, operatives, and even decrepit soldiers are oppressively taxed for the same purpose. Productive property, more productive than the mass of real estate in the country, to the amount of over two billions thus escapes State and local taxation. During the war and since, taking advantage of times seemingly prosperous from the exuberance of our irredeemable currency, many of our States, counties, and cities have been extremely prodigal in their expenditures and have burdened their citizens with a taxation that is equaling that of the most oppressive of any portion of the Old World. Many of them now are paying no regard to the times, and are running in debt as recklessly as ever. People thus taxed see no just reason why their wealthier next-door neighbor should be exempted from taxation merely because he has converted his property into exempted United States bonds. For this creation of a privileged class in this country, neither our laws nor our courts furnish a remedy. And the people are already raising such a cry of indignation against it that I think nothing will appease them but the satisfaction that our debt is fast being extinguished. In view of this fact, I would favor the largest sum for annual payment that might be proposed if within reach of the ability of our people. But I should want it expressly understood that not another bond should be legalized. I would make the tariff pay for our entire Government expenses, and the internal revenues pay for our interest and sinking fund; and I would levy my imposts and excises in such a way as would best resuscitate the energies of the country and give all our industries a better home market.

This policy fairly discussed before the people would be almost unanimously approved. But from causes well known, it is difficult to turn the attention of the people in that direction except at that particular time when the tax-gatherer comes around; and then the advocates of an increased national debt, the profigates, the corruptionists, the claim agents, the lobbyists, the gamblers, the jobbers, the speculators, the advocates of high salaries, fees, and perquisites, the drones, &c., try to reconcile the tax-payer to his unnecessary oppression by recommending an expansion of the currency to the extent of his increased taxation.

So far as providing for the past is concerned, I can have no difficulty with any paper-money advocate; but I ask reliable guarantees for the future. Any way through our present volume of paper money to relieve our people from the burdens of their annual interest and their sinking fund would be gratifying to me. But I want a guarantee in advance from such men that not only shall our expenditures and our public debt not be increased, but that every laudable effort shall be made to decrease them. I want to get this subject before our people before they become as much oppressed by taxation as the negro ever was by servitude. And when I see some of my political friends so reckless in voting away public money, and thereby binding burdens grievous to be borne upon the backs of our tax-payers, I wonder if they can be honest in their pretensions concerning our colored brethren, and then I work the harder for the colored man's deliverance, so as to hasten the day when his wrongs shall not stand in the way of retributive justice to the promoters of governmental extravagance and corruption.

There are those who wish to arrest the profligate system of both public and private expenditures that has been engendered by the war; there are those opposed to a further increase of our public debt; there are those who favor the abolition of the whole system of excise duties at the earliest possible day, and who wish to pay the expenses of the Government through the tariff as in former times. With all such I wish to act; but some of them in voting for an expansion of the currency I fear are contributing to the defeat of these very objects. I never knew of any measure of retrenchment or reform to originate under the auspices of a redundant currency. In the world's history an irredeemable currency has left but one trail. Wherever the country, whatever the age, whoever the historian, the chapter is the same. It has warred alike upon labor and capital. It is alike the enemy of the poor and the rich; but it is the sport of the speculator and the desperado. The man with a falling stock on hand unpaid for, the man who has everything to gain and nothing to lose, is as much at home under a suspension of specie payments as a blackleg in a gambling-house. Suspension is sometimes unavoidable; but it is a disease that requires every one to take preventive medicine as soon as it gets into the neighborhood. The great Webster, who was never even suspected of hostility to a sound paper currency, once declared that—

"Of all contrivances for cheating the laboring classes of mankind, none has been found more effectual than that which deludes them with an irredeemable paper currency."

If history and early parliamentary and congressional debates had taught me nothing, my own experience in what was once the frontier would have learned me a never-to-be-forgotten lesson. I arrived at the West when President Jackson's celebrated specie circular of the 11th of July, 1836, had just begun to be effective. A redundant circulation had seduced men into the wildest of land speculation, the inevitable consequences of which the keen foresight of Old Hickory penetrated. He pricked the bubble ere indefinite expansion had exploded it to indescribable ruin in wider fields. That circular recited that one of its objects was to discourage the ruinous extension of bank issues and bank credits. Those who denounced this act the loudest were afterward compelled to admit that its only fault was that it did not come soon enough; and one of the loudest of the loud, when taking the bankrupt act for \$250,000, being asked what he thought would have been his situation if no such circular had been issued, replied that he thought he might have failed for double the amount. From that day to this every scheme that human ingenuity could devise has been resorted to for the purpose of discovering a reliable standard of values from paper money. Stocks of all kinds, and bonds of cities, counties, and States, have been tried in vain. Even the solid earth, underlined with granite ledges, has expanded with irredeemable paper stretched over it. If the evil effects of paper money expansions would only reach their originators and advocates I would say let retributive justice take its course. But such men invariably come out the wealthier, while those the least responsible for and the least able to bear the losses are the sufferers. Stability in prices is the most reliable guarantee of the fullest development of capital and labor; and this can never be had when the dollar, our adopted measure of all values, varies from day to day. See how it has varied in comparison with paper since the war begun. It was 103 January 15, 1862; it was 285 July 11, 1864, its highest point; it was 124 $\frac{1}{2}$  March 24, 1866, its lowest point. During the past year it has ranged from 124 $\frac{1}{2}$  March 24, to 167 $\frac{1}{2}$  June 18.\* Who could safely give or take a contract for labor or material under such a fluctuation.

These remarks upon irredeemable paper I have deemed it necessary to make as a part of my argument to show that we can never hope to reduce our expenditures and our debt, and consequently our oppressive taxes, by increasing the volume of irredeemable paper. There are some who do not wish to reduce them. Besides men who have large stocks on hand, bought under inflated war prices, there are those who have schemes upon the public Treasury, national, State, and corporate. They have schemes against the tax-payers, and they want to hide them under the redundancy of the currency. Such are all true to their cause in advocating expansion; for we need only look back to the commencement of our speculative prices to learn their cause; as the very first year of our bank suspension the circulation in the loyal States jumped from one hundred and forty-four to two hundred millions. I need not go out of this very Congress to illustrate my position that expansion of the currency means an increase of Government expenditures and indebtedness, and consequently of our present taxation. I mean no personal reflection, and I acknowledge there are exceptions to all rules. But I make the assertion that if you would select those who have invariably voted for an increase of salaries and other expenditures, and who advocate schemes now pending that will involve an enormous increase of our public debt, you will find them mostly among those known as expansionists. And further, I say if you would select those who have opposed all increase of salaries and other expenditures, and oppose schemes now pending that will involve an enormous increase of our public debt, you will find them mostly among those known as contractionists. And further yet, I venture the assertion that you will find the same to be the case in all legislative bodies. There are schemes enough upon our Treasury being advocated to more than double our public debt, and consequently our taxation, not one of which can succeed if it is understood that we are not only not to expand our currency, but are to go on with our gradual contraction.

Under our present contraction system the indorsement of Mexican war bonds must fail. The bill now pending provides for the indorsement of $50,000,000. This, of course, means but one installment, which would be very seriously broken in upon by claims of the lobby. But little of it would ever see Mexico.

The enlargement of the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims must also fail. Claims to the amount of hundreds of millions are now awaiting the conferring of a sort of equity jurisdiction upon that body. Reckless men will swear to their justice and no attorney for the Government, nor hundreds of attorneys, will be sufficient to hunt up the adverse testimony. In my own city of Chicago I learn there are many persons interested in the "ring" to extend the jurisdiction of the court to certain claims of a very large amount which they have bought and are now buying for merely nominal sums. I hear of such transactions all over the country. As Congress will never directly pay such claims, the only hope of this formidable "ring" of corruptionists is to get their pay indirectly through the courts.

So must also fail the many schemes for additional appropriations for Pacific railroads. We have already granted land for the construction of a large number of Pacific railroads; but we have loaned our bonds and pay semi-annual interest only to the central route, with its four branches. We are thus aiding to build a road over a distance of two thousand three hundred and fifty-eight miles, at an expense of $60,870,000. I know that it is said that this money is to be refunded, but it will be remembered that after this financial aid was extended, a law was passed authorizing the issue of first-mortgage bonds equal in amount to that authorized to be issued by the Government to the companies building said road and branches, and the same law provided that "the lien of the United States bonds shall be subordinate to that of the bonds of any or either of said companies." It is generally understood that the most of the stockholders are the contractors, and that they also are and will be the largest bondholders. When the road is completed, or nearly so, a default in the payment of the interest of the first-mortgage bonds may arise; and if so, the road will, in all probability, be sold, and the lien of the Government be cut off, and the original companies will own the entire road and branches, built almost entirely with Government bonds. But there are those who will say that we must have a railroad to the Pacific, and that no price is too high to pay for it. I do not propose at this time to combat that idea. But I contend that one Pacific railroad is enough in our present Government financial embarrassments. There are several companies to whom Government has granted land, and all interested in them are now combining to get money, and they rely upon an expanded currency to add over three hundred million dollars to our national debt.

But it is needless to enumerate the many schemes tending to greatly increase our public debt, which can only be frustrated by bringing the people to a realizing sense of their actual situation through legislation looking to a return to specie payments. They have but to feel the magnitude of their present burdens to be protected against their increase.

While I believe that the main object of the mass of expansionists is the increase of governmental expenses, the disposal of stocks on hand and speculation in general, I must notice one of the plausible pretexts for their course with reference to expansion. They complain that the amount of bank circulation is not sufficient for the business necessities of the country. Before the war the largest amount of bank circulation was in 1857. It then reached $214,000,000. Now, when our business relations are interrupted with at least one quarter of the Union, we have $300,000,000 of bank issues. But this amount may be too small or it may be too large. There is but one general rule to apply in such cases and that may be said to be inappropriate at this time; and that rule is, where one has more paper out than he can redeem, he should contract rather than expand. If our banks were paying specie and could continue to pay upon a larger volume of circulation without disturbing the stability of prices, no great evil could result from an increase. It is the redemption point that should limit our currency issues; and where there is no redemption you might as well undertake to limit the speculative propensities of "poor fallen man" as the amount of the currency inside universal bankruptcy.

When the Government fixed the amount of bank circulation at $300,000,000 the understanding was that there should be no other paper money; and there was a sort of moral understanding that if more currency was ever required it should be supplied by additional currency given to institutions in States that now have less than their share; for the amount was disproportionate in consequence of the Government's obligation to supply the banks then existing under State authority with national currency if they would take in their own circulation. Nothing was better understood than that there should be but one kind of paper currency, and that should be the currency of the banks. The Government had then outstanding a heterogeneous mass of indebtedness, some of which bore interest and some of which did not. This was used as a circulating medium, and when added to the bank circulation made near nine hundred million dollars, or three times the amount fixed upon as the amount necessary for the business wants of the country. The people were to look to the banks and not to the Government for circulation. The idea of a mixed circulation, part bank and part Government, was never dreamed of. This would not only be unfair, but unprofitable. It would be unfair, because some States have not got their share of circulation, which Government could not excuse itself for withholding if it intended to supply any of the circulation itself. It would be unprofitable, because if Government could rightfully supply any portion of the circulation it could as well supply it all, and thereby save $18,000,000 in gold interest which it pays to the banks for their bonds which secures their $300,000,000 of circulation. The editor of Littell's Living Age conclusively proves that our annual interest saved by substituting greenbacks for the bills of our banks, when reinvested and compounded, would pay our entire national debt in forty years. The people are already asking if that is not the best way in which to pay it. It would certainly be for the interest of the Government to get rid of the banks altogether, and cancel the gold interest-bearing bonds that they own with non-interest-bearing legal tenders. But the good faith of the Government is involved, and repudiation is a crime. The arrangement with the national banks was at one time a matter of vital importance to the Government, and should not be repudiated as long as they maintain their faith with the Government. They now have on deposit in the Treasury as security for circulation $340,000,000 and as security for deposits $39,000,000. I have not the amount of bonds owned by the banks at the close of the war, but it was somewhat less, of course.

It was of great advantage for the Government to thus find a market for its bonds and also to get rid of the State circulation. It was a great benefit to the people to get not only a uniform circulation, and that one secured against any possibility of loss. But three banks have failed to this date, and these failed from a willful violation of the law. There is money in the United States Treasury to redeem every one of their bills, and the most of them are yet in as good circulation as those of solvent banks. I am for but one kind of currency, and good faith requires that it should all be given to the banks; and when we return to specie, so that we can get a measure of our currency necessities, and we find that more circulation is needed, equal good faith requires that we should favor those States that have not their proportionate share, and this will popularize the system.

But it is contended that the banks have violated their faith, and that therefore the Government is under no obligation to support them in consequence of their universally acknowledged past services. I have not examined the subject sufficiently to make up my mind; but the charge looks unreasonable, from the fact that their officers are generally very shrewd men. And such men must know that when the Government can save $18,000,000 in gold per annum by substituting greenbacks which bear no interest, and also create a sinking fund by reinvesting the interest saved, there are men enough to find a pretext for a quarrel between them and the Government. There is no instance in which the politicians of any party have organized against any banking system that it has not been overthrown. Sometimes the contest has been a prolonged one, but it has always been expensive and eventually disastrous to the banks. Not only are newspapers and candidates for office declaring against the present system, but a bill has been introduced into this House against it, and has a support so formidable that a very large number of bankers have visited Congress to resist its passage; and it is asserted in the public prints that bankers are now opposing the very legislation they themselves once asked for, in fear of adverse instead of favorable legislation—in fear that the bill of Mr. RANDALL will be substituted for that of Mr. HOOPER.

It is charged against the bankers that they are trying to control the legislation of the country and hold conventions for that purpose; that they are opposing in every possible way the return of the Government to a specie basis; that they owe for their capital in many cases, and therefore are obliged to accommodate themselves in their loans instead of business men who would establish banks of their own, were they not prevented by the limitations of the banking law; that they use their influence to elect their officers and retainers to Congress in order to manipulate its legislation; that they compel the Government to pay them its dues in specie, while they sell their coin at a premium and pay their dues to the Government in depreciated paper, &c. In substantiation of the last charge I am pointed to the last bank report sent to the House, in which they are reported as having but $8,000,000 of specie on hand. This would be eight dollars in specie for every three hundred in paper, or three and three quarters per cent., while Government pays them six per cent. in specie every year. The returns for the 7th of January last show $16,600,000 in specie. This merely adds, however, the January three per cent. interest from the Government, which perhaps they have sold by this time. If you tell these opponents of the banking system that the banks always have a sufficient supply of legal tenders, which under the governmental policy will soon be equal to specie, they have a ready answer. It is this: there are near four hundred million of greenbacks. Government is prevented from withdrawing but $4,000,000 per month, and there is no knowing that its necessities will allow it to do this, and hence it will be impossible under any circumstances to get rid of them so as to bring the banks to the payment of specie in this way in less than seven years. And then they say that every banker in Congress and every man in the bank interest wants to repeal the four million clause and thereby make Government keep out $400,000,000 to redeem their $300,000,000 with. My attention has been called to the fact that such is not the case with the New England bankers. I think the records will prove it true of most of the others.

I have said this much concerning the expansion of the currency out of deference to some who profess to favor a reduction of expenditures, and yet do not appreciate the fatality of an expansion of the currency to their object. I have shown that the volume of the currency was fixed at $300,000,000, and that the privilege of issuing it was given to the banks, now numbering sixteen hundred and sixty-six. I have shown that when this privilege was given to the banks to issue this currency it was with the understanding that all the floating indebtedness of the Government, which competed with the bank currency, should be removed at the convenience of the Government, and that the financial officer of the Government, the man responsible for its credit, should be the judge of such convenience, and that the national banks should labor to aid such officer. They are paid well to do this. They get all their exclusive privileges in consequence of the understanding that they will do this. For this they are allowed the exclusive right to duplicate their bonds. Government pays them six per cent. interest in gold on their original bonds, and then they are allowed to make what they can besides upon their duplicates, enabling them to declare dividends ranging from ten to twenty per cent. Of what use can these banks be to Government if it is compelled to furnish them more than greenbacks enough to redeem their bills with, and thereby make the volume of the currency $700,000,000 instead of $300,000,000, as fixed by law? It is but a pretext to cover up an unwarrantable expansion, and thereby encourage individual speculation and governmental profligacy.

But there are those who pretend to be opposed to an increase of our national debt and expenditures, who express fears that we may be precipitated into specie payments so soon that we may not be able to maintain them. But we do not propose to resume specie payments until we have so shaped our legislation that we can maintain them; and it is on shaping that legislation that the battle is to be fought. It will be very difficult to resume specie payments under the present tariff; and this is the opinion of the mass of expansionists, nearly all of whom are opposing its modification. Look at the Canadian and other foreign papers; look at our own that oppose a contraction of the currency, and you see articles often in the same column opposing contraction even at the moderate rate of $4,000,000 per month, and also opposing a change in the tariff. I know of no paper at the West that opposes the adoption of a tariff that will produce a greater revenue than the present one that does not favor an expansion of the currency. Look upon the other side! Take the New York Tribune for instance, a paper noted for its ultraism in favor of a revenue tariff that will discriminate in favor of American industry, and there you see a change in the tariff and a contraction of the currency advocated in the same column. When papers devoted to opposite views upon the tariff advocate opposite views in relation to the currency is there no meaning in it? Where is there a man better known as a high tariff man than the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. MORRILL,] and would he have made the speech in favor of contraction he did a few days ago unless he believed that a return to specie payments would favor American industry? The same question might be asked concerning Mr. Greeley, of the New York Tribune. The bearing of a change in the tariff upon specie payments seems to be correctly understood by both sides. No legislation can force banks to pay specie when it commands much more than five per cent. premium. Specie has become a commodity and is regulated by the great law of supply and demand. It is scarce in this country because of the necessity of sending it abroad. The Secretary of the Treasury estimates our indebtedness to England as follows:

United States bonds.....	$350,000,000
State and municipal bonds.....	150,000,000
Railroad and other bonds.....	100,000,000
	$600,000,000

39TH CONG....2D SESS.

Tariff—Mr. Wentworth.

HO. OF REPS.

Thus we send out of the country $18,000,000 every six months in specie to pay for interest alone.

Our imports for the year ending June 30, 1866, were by specie valuation $145,512,158. To this amount experts in such matters say we should add about one fifth or twenty per cent. for smuggling, frauds, and undervaluations, increasing the amount to say $534,000,000. Our exports in currency were $565,426 39. Deducting at least one third for specie, and we have about $377,000,000, leaving about $157,000,000 of balance of trade against us, besides the interest before alluded to. Take six months of the present fiscal year. Our imports are $191,416,181. Add for smuggling, frauds, and undervaluations one fifth, or twenty per cent., and we have about $230,000,000. Our exports for the same time were (reduced to specie by Mr. Delmar) $120,136,487, leaving a balance against us again of about $110,000,000, besides the six months interest of $9,000,000. This draft of specie is still further increased by the large amount expended by numerous Americans traveling abroad. In this matter of difference between reckoning the value of our imports and exports the expansionists again have a common interest with the opponents of American industry. Our exports being valued in paper, they always appear between thirty and forty per cent. greater than they really are, and thus irredeemable paper money repeats its history again by deluding the public with fictitious prosperity, oftentimes showing a balance of trade in favor of this country when it is largely against it. When specie is at five per cent. premium it is very difficult to pay specie, and when above ten per cent. it is absolutely impossible. Now, with such a foreign drain of specie to pay interest and trade balances, how can we ever hope to resume specie payments? The whole coinage at our Mint last year was but $31,900,000. Of what use to our national wealth are our inexhaustible mines if their products are exported from the country faster than we can dig them out? Only think what an enormous sum our gold fields have produced, and then answer the question, what has become of it? And yet men profess to fear that the Secretary of the Treasury, by paying off the floating debt of the country, may precipitate a crisis by bringing about a too sudden resumption of specie payments.

He has paid off $50,000,000 of the temporary loan, which could never be rightfully considered a part of the circulating medium of the country. From July 1 to date he has taken up $15,030,500 of compound-interest notes. These had too much interest due upon them to circulate. From April last to date, he has withdrawn only $22,000,000 of greenbacks, (so called,) leaving $378,000,000 still out to add to our $300,000,000 of bank bills, making a circulation of $678,000,000, against $184,000,000 in 1862, or over three and a half times the amount then existing. And be it remembered that the largest amount of circulation ever known before the war was $214,000,000. Besides, there are $143,000,000 of compound-interest notes still out. Those who contend that the currency was contracted by the withdrawal of the $15,030,500 of compound-interest notes before alluded to, must for the same reason admit that this $143,000,000 constitutes a part of the currency. Add this to the circulation before mentioned and we have $821,000,000 against $184,000,000 in 1862, or against $214,000,000 in 1857, when it was at its highest point ever known, and when there was a financial crash in consequence, as every one will remember; and against $16,600,000 of specie in our banks in January last.

The withdrawal of the miscellaneous indebtedness of the Government may prevent speculation and the better prepare the people and the banks for a resumption, but it can never bring about permanent specie payments until a new tariff shall stop the demand for gold abroad. And I contend that under the existing tariff it is not for the Government's interest to resume immediately if it had the power; and yet it should make every effort to turn the attention of the people in that direction in order to discourage speculative prices, which are so much disturbing our laboring classes. The Commissioner of the Revenue tells us in his report that skilled laborers, induced to emigrate here for the purpose of bringing some of our mechanical industries to the high development that they are in the Old World, have returned because of the higher price of living being more than commensurate with our higher wages. And it is the general complaint of our American wages-classes that present prices keep them at a greater distance from their actual necessities than the prices before the war.

Besides a debt now past due of over fifteen millions, the Secretary of the Treasury has $312,000,000 falling due this year, and so wants an easy market. Of this amount $204,000,000 are in notes bearing seven and three tenths per cent. interest, and he has no means of paying them except in six per cent gold-bearing bonds at par; and he has over twice as many to pay next year. Now, a six per cent. bond in gold at twenty and one half per cent., is equivalent to $7 30 in paper. At twenty-five per cent. six dollars in gold is equivalent to $7 50 in paper. Until all the seven-thirty notes, exceeding six millions, are converted, it is not for the interest of the Government to have specie below twenty-five per cent. And in view of this fact, Congress wisely refuses to put any additional restrictions upon the Secretary of the Treasury, although speculators would like to have him so restrained that they could always know his policy in advance and thereby take advantage of it. I wish I could be sure that specie would be as low as 125 for the next two years. I have but little expectation of its going below that sum until all our seven-thirty notes are converted.

There is a class of men who have been made to believe by speculators that there is danger, that the Secretary of the Treasury may stand in his own light by a too sudden contraction of the currency. Over a year ago this matter was fully discussed. One party contended that the Government was the largest party in interest and should not be limited in its power over the currency. The speculators, with headquarters in Wall street, New York, contended for complete restriction. They would leave nothing to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, as they wanted to get their Government into a corner. They have unsuccessfully tried to regulate his sales of gold this winter. A compromise was finally effected by which the Secretary was restricted in his contraction of the $400,000,000 of greenbacks to $4,000,000 per month. He was not obliged to thus contract; he could do it or not, exactly as he thought the interests of the Government required. He has not been able to do it latterly. From April last to the present day he has taken up $22,000,000, which would never have been missed under ordinary circumstances. Had he quietly tied this sum up and laid it away, no one could have felt its effects upon the business transactions of the country. Oftentimes a much larger sum laid idle for a longer time and no notice was taken of the fact; it was never felt in the money market. And as an offset to this amount of contraction it should be remembered that the whole amount of the $300,000,000 of bank circulation was not issued when the contraction commenced. Since 1st of July last $17,000,000 in new bank notes have been issued, which, deducted from the $22,000,000 of contraction, leaves but $5,000,000 of contraction after all. Then we are to take into account the fact that all through the East we find many bills of the old State and local banks still in circulation. By the February report of the Secretary of the Treasury it appears that he has $45,000,000 in currency locked up in the Treasury. Now, supposing he keeps that sum there for six months, is it probable that legitimate business would be affected by it? It is Government money in the Government Treasury, where it ought to be. Yet unsuccessful speculators, wishing to hide the real cause of their failures, might say that if Government had not locked up its money they might have got some of it and so have been saved. Last fall the Merchant's Bank of the District of Columbia failed. It had Government funds on deposit to the amount of $763,000, and how much will be realized from it is yet doubtful. The result showed that the bank had been speculating in them; and an examination showed that other banks had been doing, and were doing, the same. This caused more stringent regulations to be adopted. It caused Government money to be put where it belonged, in the Treasury of the Government. It caused a large surplus to be invested in the extinguishment of the public debt. This was the real cause of the temporary panic last fall. Bankers had loaned out the people's money. They had placed the proceeds of our cruel taxation in the hands of the middle-men, unprincipled speculators, who combine to get the crops of the producers at a low rate, and then combine again to sell them to the consumers at a high rate. Thus were the people's hard-earned taxes used to their own injury.

The Washington bank failure called the attention of the Government to what was going on. The mischief was stopped. Men who were robbing both consumers and producers by their extensive combination in some instances failed, because the bankers no longer had the people's money to loan them. Not daring to assign the real cause of their further inability to accommodate such customers, they falsely charged it upon the Secretary of the Treasury's contraction of the currency. And so these men clubbed together and employed the sub-agency of one John Livingston, of New York city, to manufacture an erroneous public opinion upon the subject. He sent circulars all over the country urging people to write to their members of Congress, and also to circulate petitions which he sent them praying Congress to favor expansion. I sent one of his lithographic circulars to the Clerk's desk and had it read. I have one in my possession now. It is, however, in Mr. Buxton's speech in the Globe. And when a gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] presented a petition in favor of expansion one day, myself and others from all parts of the Union took dozens from our desks that read in the same way and were printed in the same place. The effect of all this pressure was to force a bare majority of this House against its better sense to support an unmeaning resolution against the withdrawal of the $4,000,000 per month, which it is doubtful whether the Secretary of the Treasury can continue unless we provide him some assistance in taking care of the Government indebtedness maturing this year. Such a resolution, however, had the effect to raise the relative price of gold, or rather depreciate the value of currency about four per cent., thereby taking just so much from the laborer's wages and adding just so much to the price of his food and clothing. But gold will fall back and paper advance when it is ascertained that the resolution means nothing. Out of the nine members of the Committee of Ways and Means, but one, the gentleman of Iowa, voted for that resolution; and the Finance Committee of the Senate, which is the name of the committee in that body corresponding to the Ways and Means Committee of the House, with the late Secretary of the Treasury [Mr. FESSENDEN] at its head, appears unanimous with the great majority of the committee of the House upon the subject of gradual contraction.

There is not the least danger of a too precipitate return of this nation to specie payments. But there is danger of our too long postponing legislation in that direction. We have no time to lose in legislating for the revival of our decrepit industries, for the development of our hidden resources, for the curtailment of personal and national extravagances, and for the lessening of our importations. We must all go to work. Production is the magic word. More production and less imports will put us on the direct road to specie payments, and legislation in favor of economy, with the $4,000,000 monthly withdrawal, will gradually and safely deliver us there. Less production and more imports, with their twin sisters, extravagance and paper expansion, will drive us to bankruptcy and ruin. Legislate for production, rely more upon ourselves, make the tariff, as in former times, support the Government, reduce the internal revenue tax as our interest and debt decrease, and we shall find that our present $300,000,000 of bank circulation will be ample for all business purposes, and that every dollar will be equivalent to specie. Such is the policy that I recommend, and I believe it will carry us safely through all our troubles; and if it does not extinguish our debt with the generation that created it, as the Secretary of the Treasury predicts, it will be because the credit of our Government will be so good that the holders of our forty-year five per cent. bonds will prefer holding them until they mature.

Reconstruction.

SPEECH OF HON. H. MAYNARD, OF TENNESSEE, IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, February 12, 1867.

The House having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1143) to provide for the more efficient government of the insurrectionary States, Mr. ALLISON, being entitled to the floor, gave way to—

Mr. MAYNARD, who said:

Mr. SPEAKER: My thanks are due to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] for this brief opportunity of stating to the House that, in my opinion, the time requires positive affirmative action at our hands. In the ordinary course of affairs we might let things pass on until we could devise something better than the existing condition. The present time, however, will not permit us to do that. It requires us to move forward or to be thrust irrevocably and irretrievably backward.

The few minutes that I have will not permit me to array proofs. I but state proven facts when I assert that throughout the region of the unreconstructed States the animating, life-giving principle of the rebellion is as thoroughly in possession of the country and of all the political power there to-day as it ever has been since the first gun was fired upon Fort Sumter. Individual wrongs, enormities, and atrocities mark certain portions and make them blacker than the rest. There are still wide regions of country in which nowhere is loyalty to this Government, love to the old flag, the prevailing or even the tolerated sentiment. The rebellion is alive. It is strong—strong in the number of its votaries, strong in the wealth and culture of its leading and controlling spirits, strong in its social influences, strong in its political power, having in its ranks the leaders of political affairs in the South during the past few years, I might almost say without exception and on either side—strong in the belief that the minorities in the northern States are in sentiment with them; strong in the belief that the existing governments in all the southern States, except in Missouri and Tennessee, are in league with them; strong in the endeavor to secure the control of the governments in these two States, especially the latter; strong in the belief that the executive department of this Government is in sympathy and community of purpose with them; strong in the belief that the controlling majority of the supreme judiciary of the land is with them in legal opinion; strong in the belief that the controversy in this body between impracticable zeal and incorrigible timidity will prevent anything of importance being accomplished or any legislation matured. The vote that we gave the other day, sending a bill then under discussion to the Committee on Reconstruction—to the tomb of the Capulets, as it was fondly believed—was an incident that gave the rebel leaders infinite hope, animating their courage, and making them more confident than ever that their cause was in the ascendant and their ultimate triumph assured. The moral effect of what we have done to-day in the passage of the Louisiana bill, when it comes to be known through the country, as in a few hours it will be, will I trust neutralize the effect of that vote, at least prevent it from being misunderstood.

The present bill is opposed as inapplicable to the condition of restored peace. It is not quite accurate to say that we are at peace; that there is no war. What peace is it? The peace of Vesuvius at rest, the peace of the slumbering volcano; the fires banked up, not extinguished; the strength of the combatants exhausted, but their wrath unappeased; no longer able to continue the conflict, but awaiting a more favorable opportunity to renew it. It is the cessation of hostilities rather than peace. This condition of things surprises and disappoints many. Many are incredulous of it as an existing fact. It is frequently spoken of as indicating a spirit very much intensified in bitterness and far different from what prevailed at the close of the war, or rather at the close of active military operations.

Sir, that is a great misapprehension. The spirit there now is the spirit that was there then. It is not the rebellion that has changed; it is you who have changed in your estimate of it. We all of us hoped—it was, I suppose, the universal belief—that the war having been waged until the arms of the rebellion were actually wrested from the hands that held them, when it must have been seen, when it was seen that the physical power of this Union was irresistible, it was hoped and believed by everybody that the spirit of the rebellion would subside and the result be accepted as conclusive. The country largely acted in that belief; measures were suggested and adopted by the official authorities in that belief: with what result has been too often and too vividly portrayed in this House to need repetition.

I have no word of censure for any man or any community of men not personally conversant with the rebellion who failed to understand its deep, ineradicable wickedness. It was a manifestation of evil, an exemplification of depravity, which in its nature they could not have comprehended any more than an inhabitant of the tropics could comprehend the nature of snow or the solidity of ice. It was something of the like of which they had had no experience. Human nature attained here to a measure of perversity, new in kind as well as degree.

When the clash of arms ceased the whole country included within the limits of the ten now unrepresented States was supposed to be ripe for the immediate restoration of civil government, held as it then was by our armies under the sole authority of military commanders assigned to the several departments. There was great haste to supplant martial law by the civil law, and give back to the people republican self-government, which, according to our theory, the war had overthrown. The Government, represented by the Executive, went immediately to work for the purpose of reorganizing governments there. The various steps taken are familiar to us, and the result is unfortunately too patent and obvious. A generous confidence was extended to defeated rebels and shamefully betrayed, covering not only themselves with dishonor, but their benefactor with obloquy. The rebellion had cost one President his life; and it has cost another President, I am sorry to say, more than his life—his reputation. I say this not in reproach. I cannot believe, I will not believe, that he contemplated the results that have been reached. I do not believe, the country will not believe, that the gentlemen, the statesmen whom he selected, in some instances, at least, as his agents, Governor Holden of North Carolina, Governor Johnson of Georgia, and Governor Hamilton of Texas, would ever have consented for a single moment to be used as instrumentalities for the restoration in their respective States of the rebel power in its present hideous shape, defying the national authority, setting at naught the laws, and contemning the rights of all men but its own votaries. All that has been done by them under the Executive authority was done with far different wishes and purposes.

So far certainly as they are concerned, and I am content to accord the same liberal judgment to their principal, their whole provisional administration was a simple mistake and necessarily a failure. It was an attempt to provide civil government for a people not in a fit condition for civil government. They should have been kept under military rule until the passions excited by the war had time to subside and give place to a quiet submission to the national authority. How far this is from being the case now we can see by the official acts of their judiciary and Legislatures, by the language of their public men, especially by the tone of their press, (some passages from which, by permission of the House, I will append,) and negatively by the absence of every expression of fealty or true allegiance to the United States. We should address ourselves, then, seriously, earnestly, and without delay to the existing condition of things there. You proposed at the last session an amendment to our national Constitution as the basis upon which their governments should be reorganized and they should be restored to their previous relations with the Federal Government. But that has been unanimously, ostentatiously, contemptuously spurned and spit upon by them; rejected in every way by which a people without a recognized government could reject an offer of conciliation; rejected by them in private and in their public assemblages, representative and primary; in speech and by writing; by individual oaths of profanity and by solemn resolutions of congregated bodies. You have, therefore, no hope from that quarter. Something you are bound to do, bound by every consideration that can bind public men. Power undoubted and plenary is in your hands, I do not say against States as bodies-politic; I will not say against the South, whatever that may be; but power against the personal, individual, men, women, ay, and children if you will, who attempted the life of this nation and waged war to overthrow it; power that extends to the taking, if need be, of every life and every particle of their property; power constitutional, legal, just, possibly not unconnected with a duty; power as absolute and complete as the power to pass an ordinary appropriation bill for the payment of the salaries of the President or the supreme judges. When you declare war, you may do to your enemy all the things permissible by the bloody code of war. They who boastfully, defiantly, and with long prearrangement provoked the nation to a conflict of arms, empowered you to do your pleasure upon them and theirs to the extent of your physical force, restrained only by the precepts of Christian civilization. Conquered, there is no law for them, but the will of the conqueror. Vae victis, is the severe and compendious law of the sword.

I will not argue this proposition to show from what source the power, in my opinion, is derived; a proposition which has been studied carefully and long, and which I am willing, limited as is my ability, to maintain at all proper times against all comers. But in the few minutes now allotted to me of course I cannot do more than to state propositions of this kind, reserving their discussion for another time, possibly for another forum. Away with the cobwebs by which the schoolmen of the law, who lurk spider-wise among the husks of the letter without penetrating to the invigorating and germinating kernel; away with the film and gossamer by which sentimentalism, humanitarianism, and optimism would bind the giant arms and the stalwart limbs of this vigorous young nation. To understand the Constitution and our form of government we must read it in the light of those high principles which inspired the men who framed it—the giants of an earlier and altogether heroic age—Hamilton and Sherman and King and the Pinckneys and Madison and Franklin and Robert Morris, with Washington presiding over their grave deliberation, all of whose forms on canvass should like his be placed in these panels, and their statues of marble in the niches of these galleries, that by their symbolic presence they might remind us of those lofty sentiments of personal liberty and national grandeur by which they were inspired.

While I hold that we have the power, full, ample, unlimited, as I have already stated it, I would not use a particle of it beyond what was necessary to maintain the life of the nation and to put down and extinguish all hostility to it. I would do nothing in vengeance; nothing in hatred. My motto would be "Malice toward none, charity for all." But that is not charity which sheds tears over the fate of the guilty and leaves the innocent to suffer. That is not malice which restrains the enemies of the country, and by denying them the power removes from them the temptation to renew their hostilities. The safety of the nation and the protection of its friends I would make the measure of our action. I would attempt nothing more, I would rest satisfied with nothing less. While hitherto we have kept steadily before us the national safety, there has been manifested quite as much anxiety not to disturb our enemies as to protect from disturbance our friends.

The bill before us and now under consideration is simple in its character. Its simplicity consists in this: that it is merely retrograding a period of twenty months, turning back the finger upon the dial-plate to that extent and no more; placing that part of the country in the position it was in at the close of hostilities, disregarding the civil governments which they have attempted to set up, and placing them once more under military control, preliminary to reorganizing civil governments upon another and a different basis.

Gentleman say, and with a great deal of force, that a military government is not desirable or agreeable, hardly tolerable. Why, sir, we who have lived under military rule for years understand that perfectly well. But bad as it is, military government or any government that I can conceive of is better for loyal men, Union men, white or black, than rebel rule. Besides, we have allegations against our military commanders that they are liable to be seduced by rebel blandishments. That also is very true. The policy of the rebels during the war, and I suppose it will be the same again, seems to have been borrowed from the habits of the feline species, purring and rubbing gently and pleasantly while that would avail, and when that failed the sharp claws from behind the velvet.

Mr. ALLISON resumed the floor.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I hope the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] will yield still further to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD.]

Mr. ALLISON. I will yield to the gentleman from Tennessee a few minutes longer of my time.

Mr. MAYNARD. I think that five or ten minutes will be all that I will require.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. With the permission of the gentleman from Iowa, I will ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Tennessee be extended, without taking any more from the time of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope he will be allowed all the time he wants while he is speaking as he has been speaking.

No objection was made; and the time of Mr. MAYNARD was accordingly extended.

Mr. MAYNARD. I thank the House for this courtesy, and will endeavor not to trespass upon their good nature.

I understand very well the susceptibility of military commanders to rebel influence; too much of that has come under my own observation. Many a time have I seen the poor, humble Union man stand the livelong day at the headquarters of some petty military satrap, unable to obtain admittance to ask for the simplest favor, while rebel beauty would flaunt past him in and out, with silk and satin rustling and in bright array. That was a part of the annoyance attendant upon military rule. It was not always so, however; it is not necessarily so; it need not be so again. A neighbor of mine—I mean a neighbor in this House representing the metropolitan district of Indiana, [Mr. DUMONT]—while in command of the post at Nashville, never gave us any trouble in that way. Many other noble names, a great many others, might be specified against whom this charge never lay. Take the higher officers of the Army, the major generals, of whom is he who won imperishable renown in the capital of Tennessee, (General Thomas;) I have never heard that accusation against him; and I venture to say it never will be made against him.

But objections of this kind are no argument against a measure such as this, which looks to the general protection and the maintenance of the peace for the time in that whole country. If imperfect, even if not the best, yet it is a measure of protection. If not complete protection, it is at least a semblance of protection, which is more than some classes of the southern people now enjoy. If the military power of the Government cannot protect the citizen in the last resort, pray where shall he turn for protection? This is the last and highest expression of its guardian power: there is no security beyond. The citizen is unfortunate who requires such a safeguard; but when required it is a grave offense to withhold it.

I do not understand this measure to be permanent. I understand it to be temporary, merely proposing to hold the country by military authority and preserve the peace among the inhabitants until civil governments can be organized, such as will maintain the peace and protect the rights of all the people. We have already indicated by our action to-day on the Louisiana bill our views with reference to the establishment of civil governments in those States. If asked why not adopt the same course with reference to the remaining nine States, my answer is that our experience during the war shows us that we should make haste slowly; that we should be careful not to let the reins slip from our grasp. We can see by this time how important it may become to correct mistakes and to perfect our own work. Suppose the measure which was matured by the last Congress, but which was not approved at the other end of the avenue, had become a law, I ask where would we have been to-day? What would have been the condition of all that part of the country if they had been permitted to go on and reorganize under that bill? Committed, as we would have been, to accept the governments they might establish under it, our condition would have been worse, far worse, even than it is now. Because it is not a matter of details that we are discussing with these people. It is not a question of franchises white or black, rebel or loyal, or of courts, or of the rights of one or another class of men. The struggle goes deeper than that.

The more radical question to be considered, and the only one, in my judgment, worth considering, is, whether this Government in all its parts shall be carried on by the men who, by their blood and treasure, have preserved it, or by the men who in vain have tried to overthrow it. Shall the loyal men of the country administer the Government, or shall it be administered by the rebels who sought to destroy it? Until this point is definitely and finally settled all others must remain in abeyance. And it is one that from its very nature admits of no possible adjustment by compromise. One side or the other must go down. The loyal element of this country must completely triumph and have the control of the Government in its every department, or else it must stand aside and let it revert to the control of the element which sought its overthrow and destruction. There is no middle course; no half-way house. And furthermore, no concession will satisfy rebel demands if they are denied a renewal of their political power. Give them that and there is no concession they will not make to secure it and until it is secured.

It is unnecessary for me, perhaps, to state my own views on this subject. I hold that it is not only the duty, but it is the right of loyal men to take and retain control of this Government. By right, I do not mean right in the ordinary political sense of the term, that they happen to have the majority, always fluctuating, and which may or may not be a majority to-morrow; I mean the right growing out of the result of the conflict; the right by which General Grant commands the armies of the United States, and Robert E. Lee does not; the right by which a friend takes precedence over an enemy; right in the highest sense known to human affairs.

In that view of the case our duty in the reestablishment of civil governments for the rebel States seems plain enough. It is, as I conceive, to provide by effective legislation that they shall be established upon the basis of loyalty alone. Men who have attempted the overthrow of the nation have no rights as citizens, no franchises whatever, until they are restored to them by the proper legislative authority. It is maintained by labored argument that they are not criminally liable as rebels for treason, that they might at pleasure renounce their allegiance; but neither on this nor any other principle could they retain the rights while they repudiate the duties of the citizen. It follows, then, that whether the loyal men in any State be in a majority or in a minority, great or small, it is our duty to empower them, and them alone, to reorganize the State government; and then let them enlarge its privileges and limit its franchises just as fast as, and to the extent which, in their judgment it is prudent and safe. In this way the men who have maintained their loyalty take precedence in the great work of reconstruction, and by being made respectable they will be respected. This they have a right to demand, and do demand, at our hands. Less than this will be such a dereliction as will work scandal to our Government, and be cited in all coming time as another and most signal instance of the alleged ingratitude of republics toward their defenders and friends.

APPENDIX.

A few months ago it was proposed to publish in the city of Richmond a periodical to be called The Southern Opinion. The editor, Mr. H. Rives Pollard, like Messrs. Fitzhugh, Spratt & De Bow, may be taken as a fair representative of the ideas rather than of the political or military power of the rebellion. The following is taken from the prospectus, as published in the Richmond Daily Examiner of November 30, 1866:

"Prompted by a love for a free and independent press—a press which shall fearlessly expose corruption wherever found, and characterize men and measures as they deserve—and encouraged by the earnest solicitations of many kind friends, I have concluded to establish at once, in Richmond, a southern paper. I propose to make this paper a true exponent of southern thought and sentiment, and shall give to it, as its most appropriate title, the name of The Southern Opinion. Committing it to the support of no particular set of men or measures, I pledge it unreservedly to the South, in all her manifold interests, traditions, customs, and affections. While The Southern Opinion shall advocate such obedience to the Constitution and the laws as has been promised by the people of the South, and shall support the reconstruction policy of President Johnson as the only means by which the country can be saved from the savage and bloody rule of radicalism, it will accept the Yankee as a fact, and logically and forever as a foe—whether in war or peace, or in the field or the forum, or the Legislature—always an enemy. There is a mutual and inextinguishable hate between the Yankee and the Southerner. Whenever and wherever they meet they will meet as foes at heart; and this feeling will live as long as there are two men on earth to bear it toward each other. Politicians and hypocrites and knaves for this or that temporary purpose may attempt to glaze and conceal this fact, but what stronger evidence does one want that this hatred of the South does exist in the North, and with increased intensity, than what is furnished in the spirit of the legislation and debates of the last Congress, in the temper and results of the recent political contests in the North, and still more so in the ruffianly assaults made upon the President of the United States in his late tour in the Northwest, only because he was suspected of a sympathy with the South, and of being in favor of giving to the people of the South their constitutional rights! This hatred between the North and South does exist and will exist for generations to come, despite all efforts at conciliation, all blandishments, mutations, and vicissitudes.

"I am for the South. I make no pretensions to an affection for a Union that is both false and hateful. The Union sought by our forefathers has perished, not only from reality, not only from hope, but from possibility. The South has submitted, without resistance or murmur, to military tyranny, outrage, robbery, and the emancipation of four millions of her slaves; she has accepted the new condition of affairs with a heroism and resignation unequalled in the history of the world; and yet the Yankee race, instead of exhibiting something of the generous spirit that should be born of victory, seek only fresh pretexts for the infliction of further injury and insult. The southern States are this day practically disfranchised, and deprived even of every political right and privilege won by our common ancestry. Yet this is not enough! We must hug the chains that bind us, and kiss the rod which smites us. We must complete our abasement by our own act. We must accept the negro as our equal and a brother; and to set us an example for imitation, Massachusetts has just elected two negroes to her Legislature! But rather than ever see this state of things in the South, rather than we should be degraded by such an abhorrent and unnatural equality with the negro, and have him admitted into our legislative halls and to our firesides, we would see our land again committed to the desolation and devastation of war, and our homes burned and ravaged by another Butler and Sheridan. The negro is free; I have no wish to see him reenslaved; his condition as a 'freedman' is a disagreeable reality that must be recognized by the South; but beyond his emancipation The Southern Opinion will not yield, and will resolutely resist all measures that pretend to the elevation of one whose status has been fixed by Heaven.

"The Southern Opinion shall be confederate in its devotion to the memory of our short-lived independence, and all who fought for it or sympathized with that proud though unsuccessful struggle, from Jefferson Davis to the humblest soldier, shall be cherished as a sacred memory. Biographies, narratives, descriptions, sketches, incidents and anecdotes illustrative of the late war shall form one of its most prominent features. A number of distinguished confederate officers have promised to contribute to its columns. The scenes consecrated by valor, the days hallowed by victory or by scarcely less glorious defeat, shall not be allowed to fall into oblivion. The holy ground which entombs our dead heroes shall often be revisited, and our readers shall accompany us in these sacred pilgrimages. A special reporter will be sent out immediately to visit the various cemeteries in Virginia and the South where our loved and lost are gathered, who will furnish graphic and interesting sketches of those sacred precincts. In the first number of the paper, in addition to other attractive original matter of the same character, there will be a full and accurate description of 'Stonewall' Jackson's tomb and its surroundings, together with a prize poem commemorative of the valor, sufferings, and sacrifices of the confederate soldiers. The first number will also contain a true account of the health and general condition of our beloved ex-president, Jefferson Davis, whose wrongs but the more endear him to the hearts of his people, and whose greatness of soul seems to expand under the infliction of the torture and cruelty visited upon him, while ironed and in a dungeon, by his brutal Yankee jailors, and whose dignity of behavior as a prisoner has entitled him to the perpetual sympathy and affection of his countrymen and the admiration of the world."

The leading editorial article of the New Orleans Times of Sunday, February 10, 1867, is as follows:

"THE WASHINGTON DOINGS.—We used to look with interest for the news from Washington. The best and most intellectual men used to be sent to Congress, and we were in the habit of reading their speeches with a kind of awe, and of regarding their acts with a species of veneration; indeed, with a homage which we shall never extend to mortal man again. Human nature we find is a mistake. It has grossly deceived us; at least the political branch of it in this country. We here and there see a man looming up on the arena who is governed not by passion, but by reason, and who performs his whole duty. Such a man is the present Executive of the United States, who has braved the storm of political fanaticism and partisan fury without blenching, and who, though threatened with impeachment for defending the Constitution of his country, maintains his equanimity and is indifferent to the persevering and malignant attempts of his political foes to destroy him.

"We see that the Senate has passed the Nebraska bill over his veto, and we suppose the House will do so likewise. There is no order, no stability in the Government. Congress has evidently set itself to work to undermine and overthrow both the other coordinate branches of it. What with their reconstruction plans, their riot committee projects, their military Government bills, and their tariff abomination—none of which come within the legitimate sphere of congressional legislation—they keep up a constant alarm in the country, and involve all its interests in confusion and uncertainty.

"It is high time that Congress should, in the first place, be made a legal body, as it was before the war, by the admission of the southern Representatives. Its acts may pass muster for the present but their constitutionality are liable to be questioned. It is time that respectable men, who control their passions, who use decent speech in their intercourse, and who abstain from calling each other abusive names, like low ruffians, should be sent to the congressional Halls of the country. If there is any decorum left in northern regions it is time that the Representatives of the people there should abandon their present manners and begin to practice it. But above all things else, if we are to have a country that we can love, a Constitution that we can maintain, and laws that we can obey, it is absolutely necessary that the present Radical party, whose leaders and whose posse comitatus have been miserably wasting their time and the people's money, and making arrant fools of themselves before high Heaven and the face of the whole world for two full years, should be summarily, or as summarily as may be, thrust from the seats they now occupy and disgrace, and their places be occupied with decent, honorable, and respectable men.

"Their presence at Washington is no longer tolerable. Let them resign their seats, go home, repent, pray, and hope to be forgiven. If they will do this without an instant's delay, the South, much cause as she has to complain of them, will forgive their various sins of omission and commission, of bold aggression and subtle plotting, and will say no more about them. But if they will not vacate the premises of their own accord, and do it immediately, the people of this country, of all sections, will set themselves to work with a will in order to oust them effectually, and will accomplish the object before they begin to dream of such a result. We advise them to listen to counsel and depart from the congressional vicinage, horse, foot, and dragoons, before a worse thing happens to them."

REMARKS OF HON. H. WARD,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 26, 1867,

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the tariff bill.

Mr. WARD, of New York. Mr. Chairman, I trust I may be indulged in a few remarks upon a subject of such vast importance to the country. We are in the last hours of the Thirty-Ninth Congress. That memorable body will soon cease to exist, and its acts for good or evil will go into history. Yet up to this time we have failed to do our duty in a very important respect, to wit, in so amending or revising our tariff system as to meet the exigencies caused by a protracted and exhaustive war, and to extend that protection to certain branches of our deranged and languishing industry which they so greatly need. I am free to say that unless this is done the people will have just cause to complain, and will hold to a strict accountability those who are instrumental in preventing it.

What is the situation? Our imports largely exceed our exports. Our markets are flooded with the pauper manufactures of the Old World; business is deranged, capital retiring and timid; thousands of honest laborers are out of employment in our cities and large towns; the currency is inflated and values are fluctuating. It would seem, in this condition of things, that it is the plainest duty of Congress to take such action as will remedy these evils, and secure the final return to a normal condition of financial affairs, and to specie payments.

This is not the ordinary question of tariff and free trade which we discussed, and concerning which we naturally differed in times gone by, when the nation was peaceful, prosperous, and free from debt; but the question is, what expedient, temporary or otherwise, must be resorted to now to turn the balance of trade, which is now against us, in our favor, to protect our industry and to furnish the Treasury with the $140,000,000 of gold that it needs to answer the yearly gold liabilities of the Government. The answer is plain: we must increase the duty on imports, such as will check importations, secure the needed supply in gold, revive the manufacturing interests of the country, and improve the markets for agricultural products.

But it is said that these high duties will increase the price of everything to the consumer; that may be in some instances true; but the interest of production and consumption are so intimately blended that whatever injures the producer affects the consumer, for each consumer is, or ought to be, a producer, and it is what the consumer produces that pays for that which he consumes. If industry does not find a ready market; if it is crippled or brings low wages; if the home markets are poor and glutted with the products of foreign climes, the consumer inevitably suffers.

We are also told that the farmer does not want the tariff, it is only the manufacturer and the iron and coal interests that demand it. I am surprised, Mr. Chairman, at this assumption; of what avail are the products of the farm unless a ready market is found for them at home? The agricultural interest of this country does not stand alone, it is only a part of the whole business system of the country, and enters into and sympathizes with all other branches of business. Its prosperity depends upon the prosperity of other branches of business.

All the various pursuits of industry in this land have an interest in common; each more or less depends upon the success of the other; strike down one interest and you injure the whole. But the farmer does need specific protection for many of his own products. Take, for example, wool: this production is not confined to any section of the country; it is produced by nearly every farmer in the land. The district I have the high honor to represent is largely engaged in wool growing. The production of this article has been greatly increased in the last few years, and it is now brought by want of sufficient protection in ruinous competition with all parts of the world.

The yearly clip in this country is now about one hundred million pounds, while the amount manufactured here under the impetus of low duties is about one hundred and eighty million pounds, so that we import yearly about eighty million pounds of wool. Much of this importation comes from South America, where perpetual summer reigns, where the flocks of sheep roam over vast tracts of fertile land, worth but little per acre, subsisting upon the natural products of the soil, and requiring no particular care, so that it does not cost one fourth as much to produce a pound of wool in South America as in New York. The wool thus easily and cheaply produced is thrown upon our market, and the price of the article is brought down so low that unless this interest can be protected it must certainly be crushed out, and we must surrender the business of sheep and wool growing to foreign nations.

What kind of a policy is this to adopt? Would this be taking care of the agricultural interests of the country? I tell gentlemen that they must look their honest and intelligent farmer constituency in the face and answer this question. Whatever else may be left undone in the jar of contending views and factions, I beseech the House not to neglect this vast interest longer. Let gentlemen come up squarely to work, and give us a vote upon this bill. Why try to kill the bill indirectly by talking away and otherwise consuming our precious time and resorting to dilatory motions and amendments? Let them meet the issue squarely.

Last session we passed a tariff bill giving fair protection to wool. It went to the Senate; that distinguished body refused to take any action upon the bill at all last session and only acted upon it this session a short time ago, so that we did not get the bill back to us until the 5th of the present month, twenty-seven days before the time for the final adjournment of this Congress. The Senate has amended our bill in many important particulars, rendering the action of the House upon the amendments necessary; but the Senate bill gives us substantially the protection on wool that the House bill did; and now I hope the House will concur at once in the Senate amendment and let the bill become a law. It is not in all respects what we desire, but it is the best we can obtain. It must be this or nothing. Unless we give this interest protection, some measure of justice, the glorious record of the Thirty-Ninth Congress will not be complete; it will be unfaithful to a large and patriotic portion of our people, who demand, and have the right to demand, this at our hands. If this is denied them, I say to gentlemen they who do it must take the responsibility: I will not share it with them.

SPEECH OF HON. J. B. GRINNELL, OF IOWA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 26, 1867,

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the tariff bill.

Mr. GRINNELL. Mr. Speaker, we have again before us the bill which an eastern Senator has said originated with the western wool-growers. I think there is no proof of this statement. The close of the war and a change in our industries demanded a revision of the tariff, and the farmers, like others, sought to have their interests represented in this bill, and the cry of the "wool lobby" has been heard from one end of the country to the other for a few months past. But where is the lobby? Of whom is it composed? I have not made their acquaintance; they are not here, but giving attention to their flocks in this inclement season, and hoping for such legislation as Congress may justly afford to save this branch of industry from threatened destruction. An unfriendly press has facetiously asked the wool-grower to accept a bounty from the Government of a few millions after the manner of its acceptance by the producer of wolf scalps, and retire from the field, giving up his industry to the foreigner.

The special commissioner of internal revenue, by what I deem errors in statement of facts, not intentional, and most unwarranted conclusions, has brought out so intemperate a discussion by his followers that members of this House are charged with being parties to "bagging plunder," &c. I feel it my duty to counteract the evil produced by one branch of the commissioner's report, but may be pardoned if I first make a statement as to my relations to this tariff question. One year ago my matured convictions were given in this Chamber on the question. I had read that the first of economists and philosophers of Europe had regarded wool as "the flower, the revenue, and the blood of England," and that he was held as an enemy to his country who sought to degrade or debase it.

The past ten years of my life having been in association with the farmers of my State, and in efforts to elevate and enlarge this branch of industry, I desired it to be raised from a condition of depression to that of prosperity, if it might be by such appropriate legislation as was to be extended to other interests. The mass of the agriculturists in the prairie States of the Northwest were distant from cities and railroads and were exhausting themselves by monotonous toil and their lands by grain-raising, while expending from fifty to one hundred per cent. of the home price of their crops to find a market, the value of which was dependent upon the blighting of crops abroad, the vicissitudes of war, or unstable legislation. The production of a concentrated product, readily stored for years without waste, and costing less by a large per cent. than any other of our staples to be taken to market, seemed like sound economy for the western agriculturist. Yet from 1850 to 1860, while we imported an almost fabulous amount of wool and woolsens, our flocks increased only about one per cent. per annum, not at all in economic ratio with other industries and our population.

On its revival our flocks were imported from the older States at great expense, and were decimated by acclimation, destruction by wolves and dogs, and the inexperience of their owners. The rebellion found us importing the equal of one hundred million pounds of wool in cloth and wool. The cotton crop was greatly lessened and our national cause imperiled by unfriendly Governments, on whom we were depending for supplies of clothing, which, though in part a fraud upon the soldier and the Government, might any day be cut off. Shoddy contracts became a by-word; and the Quartermaster General certified to the great superiority of American wool, and there was one voice by the people in encouragement of the wool-grower, declared to be rendering as important service to the nation as in enlisting soldiers or entering the ranks. The Department of Agriculture, State and local societies, political economists, and Governors of States took up the question as one of national importance. Governor Kirkwood, of the State of Iowa, now a Senator, said in his annual message in 1861—

"Hitherto our great staples for export have been wheat, corn, cattle, and hogs. The prices paid for their transportation to New York form a large portion of their value to that point. The value of wool in proportion to its bulk and weight is much greater, and the price of its transportation to New York in proportion to its value much less, than that of our present staples. The great interest of agriculture may, in my judgment, be aided by legislation in a new direction. I would exempt from taxation for a period of five years all sheep, not exceeding fifty, owned by any resident of the State; and would also exempt from taxation for the same time all capital invested in the State in the manufacture of woollen goods."

With little more than the encouragement of words our flocks increased. The young men and those not able to endure camp life found employment. Our soldiers were better clothed, and the manufacturing interest was so far stimulated throughout the country that the capacity of the mills in our new States was doubled in six years, and the clip of wool in the Northwest increased near four hundred per cent. in that period; while in the State of Iowa the increase has annually since the war been one hundred per cent.

Not one acre in ten of our sheep-walks was occupied, and our annual importation of cloth and wool during the war was equal to two hundred million pounds, estimated in wool. The tariff was to be adjusted to raise a revenue and on the principle of protecting our various industries. It was not claimed that, with the great increase of the cost of labor and all that related to sheep husbandry, the shepherd was as well paid as before the war, while all other agricultural staples were relatively much higher than wool. Indeed, it was admitted that the local and national taxation borne by the wool-growers in the older States was more than the protection he received by the tariff by fifty per cent. This discrimination in favor of the producers of a poor and foreign article in South America and Africa was partially remedied in this House last June by a new classification and an increase of duty—no member opposing this provision, and the bill was adopted by a vote of two to one in this House. It was postponed in the Senate until this session, in the mean time being revised by Mr. Wells, the special commissioner of internal revenue, who made an elaborate argument against that feature of the bill which protected wool, and a commendation against an increase of duty, which has not been concurred in either by the Committee of Finance or the Senate. That feature which the commissioner condemned being regarded as still in peril, I feel it my duty to defend, without any general discussion of the tariff policy or the details of the bill.

The commissioner is the first officer of the Government during this century, so far as I know, who discourages sheep husbandry; who would have the older States regard "what can be obtained for wool as a mere make-weight in their calculation of profits." He invites the destruction of more than one hundred million dollars invested in the flocks which have hitherto by every civilized country been regarded of national importance, and leaves the intelligent flock-master of the West just returned from the Army, and the citizen who cheerfully meets his responsibilities under the Government, to give up a good staple for a poor one, surrender our market to the foreigner, and if wedded to the flock take the chances of life in Texas or New Mexico, or emigrate to South America or Africa.

Let me examine his statements and theories that we may learn the basis which they furnish for intelligent legislation. In the argument for a foreign product he says: "No one country produces all the varieties of wool." That is denied. We have imported every variety, and our climate, with the extremes of moist and dry, hot and cold, has an adaptation to all the known ovine races. I pause that any member of the House may show what varieties this country does not produce; since New Mexico has a staple as coarse as the Russian and both the fine wool which has every good quality of the Mestizo, and the domestic combing-wool is equal to the best imported.

The commissioner asks why the broadcloth manufacture has dwindled from fifty to sixty per cent. of our whole production to five per cent., and answers, "because American legislation has not permitted the importation of broadcloth wools, and American agriculturists have produced nothing to take their place." If the duty of five cents a pound is a prohibition, which can hardly be contended, a partial reason for this falling off is given; but no well-informed shepherd or manufacturer will concur in this statement that we have not produced broadcloth wools; and I submit the testimony of Mr. Slater, of Massachusetts, who annually manufactures two million pounds of wool, who declares that it was the tariff which overthrew our broadcloth manufacture, and not the want of wool which were of the fineness of German "picklock;" that he had fully tested these wools, and that they were as good in every particular, worked into as perfect and finished cloth as wools of the same fineness grown in any other country. The National Wool Manufacturers' Association, represented by Erastus B. Bigelow, J. Wyley Edmonds, and other well-known gentlemen, assert that "the peculiar excellencies of American wools have given origin to our flannels, our cassimeres, our shawls, and our delaines, and they give strength and soundness to all the fabrics into which they enter," a refutation of another position of the commissioner.

This is the advice. "If the older States are wise, they will seek to hold their own by raising choice sheep to recruit and revivify the flocks of the more favored States, and in turning their attention more fully to supplying the markets with mutton." Raise choice sheep for stock in Vermont or Ohio, for Iowa or Kansas, is your destiny, and they may want one per cent. of your "bloods" if not competent to raise their own, and able to pay from five dollars to twenty-five dollars for each animal, as is often done for express or freight charges. And then it seems to be forgotten that the mutton market is supplied and an increased demand could be met by five per cent. of the natural increase of the flock, and by a single county in each of the wool-growing States. The unfortunate suggestion implies a destruction of untold millions invested in sheep husbandry, and the surrender of an occupation hitherto highly regarded by all intelligent Governments in ancient or modern times.

Continues Mr. Wells: "Higher rates will seriously impair the gold revenue." How much? Annually $2,000,000. But what of the ability of the people to pay for the product and the duty a thousand miles from our sea-board and three thousand from the people whose labor we must reward by Government bonds at sixty-five cents on the dollar, or by the gross and heavy products, two and a half per cent. of which they have only found it for their interest to buy for a few years past? Western farmers who have heard of the troops of middle-men, and who know of waste, insurance, high freights, and commissions, will not be enamored with this philosophy.

But protection to wool "will tend to destroy a not inconsiderable part of the foreign commerce that yet remains to the United States." It is stated that "the South American trade, which before the war was maintained with that country, is nearly annihilated." This is not the fact. It has had more commerce with this country for three years past than for ten years previous. But the Cape of Good Hope trade is sustained by a return cargo of wool we are told, and a sample of the manufactured goods taken out is given to show of how much more value this foreign commerce is than our domestic trade and production. To sustain such a philosophy in trade you might suppose these vessels like Italian argosies; but near one half the amount is tobacco, and one fourth flour, not ten per cent. of its value being in the manufacturing. For a moment it cannot be contended that it is worth as much to the grower of wheat and tobacco to find a customer in Africa as in our own country.

The agriculturist is plainly told that he does not know his interest; that a high tariff makes low wool. What, then, becomes of the assertion that the consumer is to be burdened, which is the great argument against protection? Both assertions cannot be true, and neither may be independently; while temporary burdens will be distributed and the benefits of home production and fabrication will be felt under those economic methods which have given success in manufactures and commercial renown to these countries which now seek to destroy our infant manufactures and compel the producer of coarse and heavy products to be dependent upon a distant and uncertain market. And here I leave these fallacies to consider for the purposes of this argument what I fear the commissioner remembered to forget. The advance in prices, as given by the commissioner, of the great staple products from 1869 to 1862, compared to those of 1866, are thus stated: on breadstuffs, seventy per cent.; coal from sixty to seventy per cent.; salt fish from seventy to seventy-five per cent.; provisions, pork, and beef from one hundred and ten to one hundred and twenty per cent.; butter over one hundred per cent.; salt from one hundred and ten to one hundred and twenty per cent. On fifty articles, embracing those imported, the average advance is eighty-five per cent. in currency. Why was that product, wool, particularly marked for destruction, left out? Obviously for the reason that being no higher than before the war, and the cost of labor advanced sixty per cent., and that on which the shepherd subsisted advanced eighty-five per cent., he could reasonably ask for protection against a poor staple raised by barbarians abroad and not having the burden of our taxes.

Why was a just statement withheld as to the comparative value of our wools to the wearer and the imposition practiced upon the people by importations of extract, waste, shoddy, mungo, and flocks? Quartermasters, soldiers, and gentlemen testify as to this superiority, and a novice can with his fingers test our strong set fleeces, grown on animals well housed and fed, in contrast with the short staple grown in southern climes, which must be shorn semi-annually to be kept from falling off. It would have been an instructive announcement, securing a preference for our own fabrics, had the fact been given that one eminent manufacturer by a substitution of such foreign wool for domestic so far ruined his reputation as a manufacturer that it cost him on his own testimony $100,000 to regain it. And then the official statements are that the dirty shoddy and worthless flocks, though glued into cloth with about the consistency of ground tobacco, goes into garments which it costs as much to make as if good goods, and an amount equal to the wool product of two of our great States.

The most eminent breeders of the Old World are loud in the praise of our merinos, which are known to surpass those reared by nobles and princes in Europe, showing a marked advance in each decade in every valuable quality, and demonstrating that wool in our clime is no exotic. Was this withheld that the destruction of our flocks might seem sound political economy rather than vandalism? He is a bold destructionist who would run counter to the philosophy of England, France, and Germany. The former, while there was a necessity, forbidding the sale of sheep or wool for export, and cherishing the golden-hoofed animal on a territory of the size of three of our States which is now our equal in flocks.

It was proven by the Treasury statistics, and the commissioner did not approach the argument, that the present protection to competing wool was less than five cents per pound, and that the American shepherd in the great wool-growing States like Ohio and New York was taxed not less than nine cents on each pound, and further, that his protection was twenty per cent. less by frauds and false invoices than by the letter of the law; and though the older States must yield their occupation, Illinois, Iowa, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Missouri, and Kansas are not entitled to an impost duty which shall place the American citizen and tax-payer on terms of equality with the shepherd of Africa or South America. We accept neither his philosophy nor his figures, and I can fortunately refer to the statements of J. R. Dodge, Esq., the able statistician of the Department of the Interior, for a confirmation of my position, and a refutation of the position assumed by Mr. Wells, that the proposed increase of duty would impose an annual burden of $71,000,000 on the consumers. These are his errors: in assuming that it requires four pounds of wool for a yard of cloth, while of our own it requires but two and one sixteenth for a yard, which reduces his figures $12,000,000. And then the assumption that we produce but one fifth of the wool required, and a consequent blunder as to importation reduces his figures by $36,000,000. What can be done with the $24,000,000 remaining to destroy his whole argument?

Apply to it the philosophy of the commissioner sent to us last year for our guide, "that the payment at home in the products of domestic industry of $2,500,000,000 is far less difficult than the payment of $500,000,000 in foreign countries," and the whole sum is swept away to give room for that philosophy which asserts that the nearest road to good and cheap clothing for the masses is to stimulate competition, where we have room, rather than supplant or destroy a prime necessity and be left to the caprices of the foreigner, as has been done in three periods of our national history and in regard to many articles. Mr. Randall's book, the very highest authority, is quoted in proof that the wool-grower was amply remunerated, while the fact is withheld that this statement was made four years since, before we felt the great burden of taxes and when labor was lower by forty per cent. than now. The date was material, as also the fact suppressed that our wool has only a protection of twenty-six per cent., or less than half that which is accorded on an average to other articles on the tariff list.

Sir, it is not for me to answer the commissioner's question, what New England, New York, and Ohio expects to gain as against competing wools of other parts of the United States. They can defend their own interests. In their misfortunes we have good room for them all. But I answer, in my judgment, there is no class in the newer prairie States that will not be benefited by a protection of this interest. There is an actual investment greater than that represented in tobacco by $3,000,000,000, greater than that in manufactures of iron by $75,000,000, and surpassing the woollen manufacture by $100,000,000; all of which have their advocates. A change is proposed, and the practical question—shall that product, relatively lower than any other staple, be protected equally, or must the occupation be given up to foreigners, who produce an inferior article, and are our competitors, because freed from taxes and content to live on one half the compensation of the American laborer?

Thus abandoned, just began, how shall we pay for that which we do not produce for our clothing? The State of Iowa, for illustration, has reached the point of wool exportation, and by a surplus can pay for tea, coffee, and silks from abroad, cotton goods and farming tools from the eastern States, if not wise enough to manufacture her own, with a concentrated product which enriches the soil, gives an all the year round employment to the maimed soldier as well as to the young, and costs but four per cent. of its value for transportation. In want of this, if it be pork or beef, freight charges and commissions are from twenty to thirty per cent. of their value. If it be wheat, it is from eighty to one hundred per cent. of its usual value; an uncertain crop which wastes the land is attended with the severest toil, and of which by good farming methods not one bushel less need be raised on account of the flocks. If this industry declines, we shall import more and more of an inferior article from year to year, and give up our market to the foreigner, returning to the suicidal practice of paying our debts by raising heavy products, wasting to the soil.

If the growing flock of the Northwest is protected equally and no more than other industries, a territory as large as the original thirteen States, which is not now trod by a hoof, may have value. The straw of the wheat raiser will be consumed by the brute rather than by the fire. The corn raiser will have a better market; manufactures will spring up, and all clothes wearers will in the end have better and cheaper goods than if dependent on foreign goods, which seem to be cheap, but will be found to be dear when the means for payment are considered. If the employment is profitable no one set of men can reap the advantages, a monopoly being an impossibility, and it will only require two years according to the ratio of increase for a few years past to not only grow our own material, but to fabricate it. This reaches what the leading nations of Europe sought for a half century to attain, and what was the political philosophy of Benjamin Franklin, and has been down through the line of Presidents of whatever party including President Lincoln.

I will not be understood to say that it is either possible or profitable for the older middle States to maintain their sheep husbandry, and only assert that their flocks should be moved westward and spared rather than to give up wool-growing to foreigners; and that on a change of the tariff the just claims of the new States should not be overlooked. I want no law which will not encourage competition and give us early the best and cheapest clothing for the people. I advocate no policy but that which will save American labor from the low foreign standards, and bring from abroad consumers and artisans to make a permanent population, which in our new States is wealth; and if manufactures could be established in no other way would advocate as economy the necessary bounty to capital and the laborer, rather than lose the profits of fabrication and that independence which is within our reach.

Mr. Speaker, any measure involving so many interests and the supposed policies of sections, and the conflicting theories of economists, cannot be so perfect as to satisfy all; only time can secure a fairer adjustment; but even now we may test the fallacies of free traders, yet do not so regard all those who oppose provisions in this bill. It is their great cry that the tariff of 1864 was oppressive, that goods would go up beyond the reach of the farmer, who would not be benefited by it. What is the truth as to hardware, including horseshoes, shovels, cutlery, and twenty-eight articles tested by the commercial list of 1864 and 1867? Prices averaged forty per cent. higher before the tariff than now.

What is the condition of the producer? His staples, leaving out wool (relatively much lower) including breadstuffs, meat, butter, and cheese, are on an average thirty-five to forty per cent. higher. These facts dispose of the great perversions of the argument. What may we anticipate as to the future but this: that with the improved and greatly increased machinery our woollens will be lower by a healthy and brisk competition as with our flannels, which are not only the strongest, but are afforded at the cheapest rates, even when sent to foreign markets?

The fact that the wool-grower here has not a protection in his own market equal to the burdens imposed on him as a citizen is a denial of the right that the market of each nation belongs to its own laborers, and leaves us with an oppressive discrimination in favor of a poor article and him not of our household. Thus this industry declines, capital is sunk, labor is diverted from a chosen field to be employed in depressing the pork, beef, wheat, and corn production: the young men with æsthetic tastes will seek the factory, which has not now work for all the skillful because of foreign goods, or our towns and cities, to stand by the counter or enter the lists with buyers and sellers, a number now in most ruinous disproportion to the actual producers in the country. Nor is this all our incipient manufacturers would want for a home product, and be sure to decline. Transporters would have larger profits, producers less, because distant from a market regulated by the cheapest labor of the world, and consumers less ability to pay on account of wasted capital and competition in the fields of employment. More than all, we strike a blow at our financial independence, which Franklin early sought by counsel that we live independent of rivals, and the independence which Jackson urged that we might be more Americanized. Ours would be that of the late condition in the South, both a lesson and a warning. Remember, too, that to revive and restore flocks like ours is not the work of a year, scarcely of a decade; most unlike the production of a crop of wheat, corn, hemp, or flax, which is the work of a season. With the flock there is to be acclimation, and there are the risks by contagious diseases and the experience and skill of a shepherd to attain such excellence as ours, which has awakened the envy of the world.

I will be no party to the debasement of our great cloth staple, or to that political quackery or imposition which denies fair and equal protection to our flocks. I rather desire that these best scavengers of neglected fields and enrichers of wasted lands, animals that have stood in the foreground of the civilization of nations for thousands of years, shall be multiplied by millions to consume the verdure now swept by prairie fires, and give refined and rational employment to our people without commerce and distant from cities, diversifying industry and distributing the greatest benefits of toil to a people removed from the centers of trade—an interest now only asking the encouragement which is given by an impost duty to the glass and gunpowder maker, to the salt boiler, hemp and tobacco raiser, and kindred occupations.

To a people one thousand miles from the sea-board foreign commerce is of little concern compared to good wages for the masses and the prosperity of domestic trade, which is many times greater than the foreign. The healthy growth of our cities, now prospered because of the introduction of manufactures, is of greater concern than the profits of the importer and jobber, and the desire that enterprise and capital should be in proximity to cheap food, fuel, and motive power, and that hundreds of millions of rich acres should be reclaimed, is more rational than that our exchanges and customers should be in a country with no advantage over ours in climate, schools, and society, and which, like New England, raises just wheat enough for her people two weeks in a year and meat for ten weeks—a surer road to independence than to cultivate the foreign market for the two and a half per cent. of our staples. To do this is to destroy our infant industries and disperse our skilled labor, and repeat the exactions by a demand for high prices which it is not easy to resist.

I have purposely avoided a wide range of discussion in hope that one branch of this subject, treated I trust with candor, may secure a wide application. To enjoy prosperity we must have more producers and fewer to take toll on labor, and a lessening of the cost of marketing and the time required for making the exchanges. Chosen industries should have protection against foreign labor, which enjoy no better conditions for production than our own. Nor should one class be forced into a field not of their choice, which so often results in a glutting of the market. Let Congress discourage and not encourage importations, keep our people in work and cheer by fabricating our own wares and goods, and lightening internal taxation. Make it for the interest of foreign capital to be here employed in diversified industries, and our wasted lands will be occupied, trade will be healthy, and times thriving, taxes will be lightened by increase of population and wealth. The day for specie payments will not be then in the dim distance, and with slavery dead, our nation reconstructed on the eternal principles of justice, though the next generation should pay the last installments of the debt contracted in a holy cause, they might more highly prize institutions which cost uncounted millions and blood.

Indian Appropriations.*SPEECH OF HON. J. F. CHAVES,

OF NEW MEXICO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 2, 1867,

On the bill making appropriations for the Indians for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868.

Mr. CHAVES. Mr. Speaker, I hope the House will not commit such manifest injustice as to refuse to make the necessary appropriation for the clothing and subsistence of the Navajo Indians on the Bosque Redondo reservation. These Indians have been for nearly two centuries the scourge and curse of the people of New Mexico. The Spanish, the Mexican, and the American Governments have made successive campaigns against them; some of these were partially successful, and brought peace to the country for a series of years; such as the campaign of Bizarra, a lieutenant colonel in the Spanish service, who made such a vigorous and successful campaign against them that the Indians, regardless of consequences, rushed unarmed into his line of soldiery, bearing small wooden crosses upon their breasts and in their hands, and prostrating themselves at the feet of Bizarra implored his mercy and sued for peace. Others have been extremely disastrous in every way, producing no good results, costing the Government which undertook them large expenditures, and bringing neither peace nor protection.

Of all the campaigns waged against this powerful tribe Bizarra's was the most successful. The Navajoes kept perfectly peaceable for twelve years. They and the Mexicans herded their flocks together; and it was quite a common occurrence to see the poorer class of Navajoes hire their services to the Mexicans to herd their sheep. A very large portion of the tribe lived within the Mexican settlements. The flocks and herds of the country became so large and prosperous during the twelve years of peace that succeeded that twenty-five cents was considered a very fair price for sheep and five dollars for a cow.

Since the year 1846, when the American troops invaded the Territory of New Mexico, several campaigns have been made against the Navajoes by this Government; nearly all of them have resulted in treaties of peace, but the actual fact was the contrary. In 1861 Colonel Sumner, at that time commandant of the department, made a campaign into the Navajo country and got his troops into the Cañon de Chelle, (Tchay-Yay,) a very high, deep, and narrow gorge in the Mesas, with nearly perpendicular cliffs; the Navajoes occupied the cliffs above, and compelled him to abandon his intention of attacking them in their stronghold by rolling large rocks upon the troops. Colonel Sumner then retired to a place called Cañon Bonito, about fifty miles east of Cañon de Chelle, and established a military post, which was called Fort Defiance. (since then Fort Canby.) He again made a treaty of peace with the Navajoes, and they kept it tolerably well until the year 1858.

During these seven years, although the people lost some stock by these Indians, yet the country grew in wealth and prosperity, and over two hundred thousand sheep were sent into California from the Territory. Unfortunately, through the mismanagement of the commanding officer at that post, Major Brooks, who ordered the guard at the hay-camp to fire upon any Indian stock found grazing at that camp, a new war was inaugurated, and it has continued almost uninterruptedly from that time until the present. The Navajo's law is "an eye for an eye" and "a tooth for a tooth." After their stock had been fired upon and some of it killed, an Indian named Cayetanito proceeded to the fort, and knowing that a black boy at the post was the property of the commanding officer he deliberately drew an arrow and shot him dead on the spot. Now, sir, this war could have been entirely prevented had Major Brooks only been willing to give the Indian who claimed to own the land on which the hay-camp was situated a few insignificant presents, and the large expenditures which the Government has been forced to make, the losses of all kinds of property to the Government and to the citizens, and the losses of many valuable lives both of citizens and soldiers, would have been thus prevented.

In the inauguration of this war, neither the citizens nor the Indian agent were at all to blame; this is a sin for which the military alone will have to answer for. In fact, the military in New Mexico have never been in the slightest degree restrained by the action of either the superintendent or any of the Indian agents. I have one particular instance in my recollection, when the Apache Indians (the Coyoteros) in 1864, desired to see Dr. Steck, the then superintendent, and who had been their former agent, and in whom they had entire confidence, in order to treat with him, he was officially notified by General Carleton that he should not go, and he (Carleton) sent down instead one or two officers; but the Indians said they wished to see their friend Steck and refused to have any talk with them.

Now, sir, through the representations of General Carleton to the War Department, and of him alone, have these Navajo Indians been brought four hundred miles from their country and established upon the reservation at the Bosque Redondo. I myself was in the military service at the time that active operations were commenced against them, in July, 1863, and was in command of Fort Wingate, in the Navajo country. The instructions which I received from General Carleton in person and by letter were to call in some of their principal men and notify them that a vigorous war would be waged against them for their many depredations against the citizens, and that all of those who claimed to be good Indians and who wished to save themselves, their families, and their property must come by a certain fixed day into Fort Wingate, and that they would be transported to the Bosque Redondo with all their property, and that at that place they would be taught to live like the whites, by cultivating the soil and raising stock, and that they would be fed, cared for, and protected by the Government until they should be capable of doing so themselves, and until they would prove by their actions that they would be like the Pueblos; that if they did not come in voluntarily by the 20th day of July, 1863, they would be attacked wherever found and killed or captured; that the soldiers would not be able to discriminate the good Indian from the ladrone, (thief;) that the whole matter rested with them entirely, and that if they failed to accept the terms made to them by the Government, they must take the consequences, and not complain hereafter that they had not been duly advised.

I know these facts myself, not only because I commanded at Fort Wingate, but also for the reason that I interpreted from Spanish to English to General Carleton himself what the Indians said to the Navajo interpreter. In proof of the above I beg leave to refer the House to page 116 of the report of the joint special committee, appointed under joint resolution approved March 3, 1865. In that page will be found a letter of General Carleton to me, dated headquarters department of New Mexico, Santa Fé, New Mexico, June 23, 1863:

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF NEW MEXICO,
SANTA FÉ, N. M., June 23, 1863.

COLONEL: I inclose herewith General Orders No. 15, current series from these headquarters, which organizes the expedition against the Navajo Indians. It is hoped now that the people of New Mexico will become more secure in their persons and property. As soon as the troops take the field the small bands of Navajo robbers now infesting the settlements will doubtless return to their country to look after the safety of their women and children, and as long as the troops are engaged in active operations against their tribe they will not have a disposition to come in on the river.

You remember what I told Barbencito and Delgadito about what would be required of all Navajos who did not want to engage in war or be sufferers from it; that while hostilities were progressing against their tribe no peace party of Navajos could remain in the country; that all those Navajos who claimed not to have murdered and robbed the inhabitants must come in and go to the Bosque Redondo, where they would be fed and protected until the war was over; that unless they were willing to do this they would be considered hostile and would be proceeded against accordingly; that in this event, if they or their families suffered, these consequences would be the result of their refusing to accede to such a reasonable demand, and the responsibility would rest upon them, not upon me; that a time would be set for all those who desired to avail themselves of the offer to come in with their families to Fort Wingate; that they should be transported to Bosque Redondo in our trains, &c.

Send for Delgadito and Barbencito again and repeat what I before told them, and tell them that I shall feel very sorry if they refuse to come in; that we have no desire to make war upon them and other good Navajos; but the troops cannot tell the good from the bad, and we neither can nor will tolerate their staying as a peace party among those against whom we intend to make war. Tell them they can have until the 20th day of July of this year to come in—they and all those who belong to what they call the peace party; that after that day every Navajo that is seen will be considered as hostile and treated accordingly; that after that day the door now open will be closed. Tell them to say all this to their people, and that as sure as that the sun shines all this will come true.

I am, colonel, respectfully, your obedient servant,
JAMES H. CARLETON,
Brigadier General Commanding.

Lieut. Col. J. FRANCISCO CHAVES, First New Mexico
Vol., commanding at Fort Wingate, New Mexico.

[Copy of this letter furnished Colonel Carson, June 23, 1863.]

Official: ERASTUS W. WOOD
Captain First Veteran Infantry California Volunteers, Acting Assistant Adjutant General.

About the 20th day of July, or soon thereafter, active hostilities were commenced against the Navajos from Forts Wingate and Canby, and a great deal of destruction of property ensued, such as their corn-fields and the capture of their sheep and horses; and some of the Navajos who were more timid began gradually to surrender themselves, and by orders from headquarters of the department they were rationed at whatever post they surrendered until transportation could be furnished to conduct them to the Bosque Redondo.

By the month of May, 1864, about seven thousand Indians had surrendered themselves, and were either already at the reservation or in transitu thereto, and General Carleton prevailed upon Governor Connelly to issue a proclamation, to which I beg leave to refer the House; it is to be found on page 333 of the report already mentioned:

PROCLAMATION.—Whereas a suspension of arms in the prosecution of the war against the Navajo tribe of Indians exists, as the more hostile part of that tribe is now reduced to and located upon the reservation at the Bosque Redondo, and the remainder of the tribe coming in and surrendering themselves to the military authorities; and whereas any hostile demonstration upon the part of our citizens toward the said Indians during this suspension of hostilities would frustrate the intentions and efforts of the Government in the peaceable removal of the remainder of this tribe, now collecting around Forts Canby and Wingate, to whom has been granted safety to life and property while there and in transitu to the reservation: Therefore,

I, Henry Connelly, Governor of New Mexico, do issue this my proclamation, and ordain:

1. That hostilities on the part of the citizens with the remainder of the Navajo tribe of Indians, who have or have not presented themselves at the military posts for removal to the reservation, shall cease.

2. That all forays by our citizens of a hostile character into the country heretofore or now occupied by any part of the said Navajo tribe of Indians are hereby positively prohibited under the severest penalties.

3. That any parties of armed men, with hostile intentions, hereafter found in the Navajo country, will be immediately arrested by the United States troops and sent to the headquarters of the department of New Mexico, there to be dealt with according to law.

4. It is proper in this connection to warn the people against further traffic in captive Indians. The laws of the country, as well as those of justice and humanity, positively forbid such a traffic. Measures are now being taken by the Department of the Interior to have all Indians surrendered who have been sold into slavery, and the people therefore have this timely warning to refrain at once from any such traffic in Indian captives as has heretofore been practiced among them.

Done at Santa Fé this 4th day of May, 1864,

HENRY CONNELLY,

Governor and Commander-in-Chief of the Militia.

By the Governor:

JOHN WATTS, Private Secretary,
in absence of the secretary of the Territory.

From that time until the present the military in New Mexico have been constantly pursuing a few scattered bands of the tribe that remained in the Navajo country, and whenever caught, if not killed in the act, were captured and sent to their reservation.

Now, sir, I submit that these Indians were brought to the reservation by compulsion and by promises that they should be fed, cared for, and protected from all their enemies in case they complied with the demands of the Government. Is it right, just, or humane that a great and powerful Government like this should fail to comply with its solemn promises to a poor, ignorant, degraded Indian? You may say the Government did not make these promises. But your authorized agent did; he was so recognized by every American and Mexican citizen and by every Indian that came in contact with him, and you yourselves recognized his authority when you established the reservation by law. You may say that it costs too much; then you should have made your estimates before you took upon yourselves to create this reservation and to transfer these Indians four hundred miles from their native homes. You may say that you were deceived by your agent, that he promised that the Indian should be self-supporting in one or two years. I answer that it is your fault if you appoint incompetent or dishonest officers to discharge your wishes.

Besides, these Indians have been lately transferred to the Interior Department. How is it possible for that Department to attempt to make them a self-supporting tribe if you do not furnish the means, for at least one year, to subsist them upon, so as to give the experiment of a reservation a fair trial? And what would be the result if you withheld the necessary means to carry it out? The Interior Department, in my judgment, cannot accept these Indians without the necessary appropriation being made for their subsistence; and the War Department will either continue to subsist them, as at present, or in case that Department is forbidden to do so, these Indians will, in common justice and humanity, be permitted to leave the reservation and to procure their food as best they may. The result of this latter course will be that these Indians will make their way as soon as possible to their old home in the Navajo country, and on their route will entirely desolate the richest portion of the Territory. Hardly a sheep, cow, horse, mule, or borough will escape them.

From their having been forced by the vigorous prosecution of the war against them to abandon their native country they have become impoverished, and they will most certainly continue their raids among the sparsely settled portion of the Territory. The course which you have pursued among them has embittered them. Your soldiery have diseased their women and they their husbands. Nearly one third of them sleep under the sods of the Bosque Redondo. They will think of these things by day and dream of them by night, and will ever remember, if such be your course, that the Great Father, as they are wont to style the Government, speaks with a forked tongue, and that his promises cannot be relied upon. They will brood upon eternal vengeance, and the blood of every white and Indian that is spilled through your neglect will be upon your heads.

On the other hand, what have the people of New Mexico done that you should forget your treaty stipulations and fail to accord to them the protection which they require? You may say that the country is so poor that it will never repay you for your outlay. Sir, supposing that this were true; did you not force them to come into your Government? They were living very happily under their own, and if you fail to make a good bargain are you going to play the child? But I deny such an assertion. What would you have done with-out the mines of California and Nevada during the late war? Where would you have procured your gold? Yet California and Nevada are only a small portion of the cession of the magnificent territory which Mexico made to you in 1848.

New Mexico and the country will yet see the day when she will fully repay for all its expenses in her behalf. When the Government found itself in need and the life of the nation imperiled she rushed to her assistance and at one time had as many as five regiments of her gallant volunteers in defense of her adopted mother. Her people have a love and affection for this Government. Do you propose to repay that devotion by forgetting your treaty stipulations, or do you propose to forget your solemn obligations by turning them over to the tender mercies of savages, goaded to desperation by the mismanagement of your authorized and recognized agents and by your failure to comply with your most solemn promises? God forbid that such a course should be pursued and that such counsels should prevail.

SPEECH OF HON. THOS. T. DAVIS, OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 13, 1867,

Upon the bill to provide for the more efficient government of the rebellious States.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, it is clearly the duty of Congress to do whatever it may for the restoration of harmony among the States of the Union and of prosperity to the whole Republic.

Ten States, once independent, once bound by the silken and beneficent ties of constitutional restraint to the Federal Union, no longer answer to the roll-call in the Halls of Congress; practically they are excluded from the enjoyment of those privileges which the Constitution was intended to secure.

The fact that these States, or their representatives, withdrew from Congress was no fault of the loyal States of the Union. The withdrawal left, of necessity, the administration of the Government and the conduct of the war that followed rebellion, in the hands of the loyal States and of the Union party, which alone sustained the administration of the Government; and when the rebellion was suppressed, the duty of restoring the insurrectionary States clearly belonged to the Union party of the country. The rebels could not claim a right at once, unrepentant and unfor-given, to aid in carrying on a Government which for four years they had in every mode of honorable and dishonorable warfare attempted to destroy; nor could the Democratic party, as such, having as a political organization pronounced the war a failure, and that peace ought to be attained by the sacrifice of all for which the war was prosecuted, solicit a prominent place in the work of restoration or reconstruction.

But, Mr. Speaker, the Union party, in its work of reconstruction, is bound to regard the organic law of the Republic, and so far as possible to conform to those republican principles which alone, impressed upon the laws and institutions of the country, give value to its Government. Nothing can excuse the disregard of these duties save absolute necessity. The Constitution enjoins upon Congress the duty of guarantying a republican form of government to each State of the Union, and this means a representative government, based upon just and equal laws and conferring equal rights and protection before its laws upon all citizens. It means no government of pure military force, where the edicts of a military chief are substituted for the body of the civil law, and the will perhaps of a single man, responsible to no power and bound by no restraint save his own volition, is the government and law of nine million people. Yet, sir, this bill, as now introduced and advocated here, which proposes "to provide for the more efficient government of the insurrectionary States," divides ten States of this Union into five military districts and establishes martial law throughout them all, assigns a general of the Army to each district, and provides a military force sufficient to enable such officer to perform his duties and enforce his authority within his district. Those duties are prescribed by the third section of the bill in these words:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of each officer assigned as aforesaid to protect all persons in their rights of person and property, to suppress insurrection, disorder, and violence, and to punish, or cause to be punished, all disturbers of the public peace and criminals, and to this end he may allow civil tribunals to take jurisdiction of and to try offenders, or, when in his judgment it may be necessary for the trial of offenders, he shall have power to organize military commissions or tribunals for that purpose, anything in the constitution and laws of the so-called States to the contrary notwithstanding; and all legislative or judicial proceedings, or processes to prevent or control the proceedings of said military tribunals, and all interference by said pretended State governments with the exercise of military authority under this act, shall be void and of no effect.

Here, Mr. Speaker, are the positive elements of an absolute government. The officer is to punish or cause to be punished all disturbers of the public peace and criminals. He may decree such punishment as he may deem best, and he may invoke the aid of such civil tribunals as shall exist by his permission, or he may institute military commissions at his pleasure. But these positive elements of despotic power are fortified by the inhibition of the fourth section upon the officers of the Federal courts:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That courts and judicial officers of the United States shall not issue writs of habeas corpus in behalf of persons in military custody, unless some commissioned officer on duty in the district wherein the person is detained shall indorse upon said petition a statement certifying, upon honor, that he has knowledge or information as to the cause and circumstances of the alleged detention, and that he believes the same to be wrongful; and further, that he believes that the indorsed petition is preferred in good faith, and in furtherance of justice, and not to hinder or delay the punishment of crime. All persons put under military arrest by virtue of this act shall be tried without unnecessary delay, and no cruel or unusual punishment shall be inflicted.

There, Mr. Speaker, are such powers as in no constitutional or representative Government have ever been lodged in the Chief Magistrate. They are such as relate only to despotism on the one hand, and a subject race on the other.

Sir, I have no available apology to offer for that blind fatuity of the people of the South which, in attempting the destruction of the Union to maintain slavery, destroyed absolutely and forever the very institution it sought to preserve. In fact, in the terse expression of another, "it essayed murder, but committed only suicide." The southern States waged war for more than four years against a Government that had never harmed them, to perpetuate a system which was a curse to them and to the country. Their armies were beaten and discomfited; their seaports were seized; their capital was beleaguered; and when the marshaled legions of Grant encircled Richmond and surrounded Lee there seemed no possible escape from absolute, unquestioning, and unconditional submission to our arms.

By a dire misfortune, through undeserved clemency, the terms of surrender permitted by

Mr. Lincoln to the armies of Lee and his associate generals were such as yielded half of the advantages of victory to the vanquished. They condoned all treason and treasonable action on the part of every soldier of the confederacy coming within the list of the surrendered, and one hundred and twenty thousand missionaries of discord and dissatisfaction were let loose to roam over the southern States, amenable to no law for former crimes and punishable only for future offenses.

Again, when Mr. Johnson acceded to the duties of the presidency, with a magnanimity quite equal to that which inspired the policy of the lamented Lincoln, he pardoned in civil life many who had been prominent in rebellion, and who by that prominence had forfeited all claim to favor.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I submit that when the armies of rebellion laid down their arms and gave up the contest, it was with the confession and consciousness that full effect was to be given to the proclamation of emancipation, and that equality of right in the freedman before the law, was no more to be questioned or denied; for that equality was assured by the proclamation, and the faith of the Government plighted to its maintenance.

Again, I submit that the South, in surrendering to a power they could no longer resist, well understood that the Government were bound by every consideration to protect the loyal citizen, who, at the South during the war, proscribed, maligned, persecuted, and despoiled, had still been unfailing in his fidelity to his flag and his country.

I hold, therefore, that it was the duty of the southern people at the close of hostilities to accept the consequences involved, under the conditions stated, in their submission. These were: the entire and perpetual annihilation of slavery; the social changes resulting from the destruction of that institution; the concession of all the rights of the freedmen flowing from their emancipation; the claims to immunity of all citizens of the southern States who during the war had remained faithful to the Federal Government; and then such changes in State constitutions and laws as should be requisite to produce conformity with these altered conditions. These were clear and obvious duties, and their honest performance, I fully believe, would before this day have secured representation to these States with the cheerful assent of Congress. Unfortunately, the people of the South assumed a different attitude, and although defeated in battle and deserving of severe punishments, clothed themselves with the vestments of injured innocence, and asserted rights of citizens of the United States which they had forfeited by rebellion against the United States.

I do not propose, sir, at this time to detain the House by recitals of evidence existing on the files of the House in respect to the condition and action of the southern States since the war. This has been so frequently referred to, and so much other evidence is before the country, that I shall simply state as the conclusions to be derived from that evidence the following propositions:

1. That a state of insubordination and lawlessness prevails very generally in the States lately in rebellion, which is attributable in great degree to a determination not to regard in any wise the enactments of Congress for the preservation of order.

2. That the liberties and rights of the freedmen have been ignored and trampled on, and that they have often been foully abused, outraged, and murdered, without the arrest, trial, or conviction of the guilty parties, and even without inquiry into the circumstances by any civil magistrate or court.

3. That men of known loyalty have been proscribed, their property seized, their houses burned, their estates despoiled, and their lives destroyed by combinations of the sympathizers with rebellion, and that the local courts have neither instigated nor entertained complaints of such enormities, nor have any remedies been addressed to their correction or punishment.

4. That men prominent in rebellion can alone be elected to political offices throughout these States, where treason is rewarded and where loyalty is a crime.

5. That with singular unanimity these States have rejected the amendment of the Constitution, which became necessary by their rebellion, because a people whose history for four years was one consistent record of piracy and violence and murder, who tortured the prisoners taken from our Army by the fortunes of war, in the chancel houses of Richmond, Belle Isle, and Andersonville by slow starvation, who murdered them in cold blood, and who suffered them to be reduced to skeletons by privations and exposure that they might never again enter the Federal ranks as efficient soldiers, could not submit to the adoption of the amendment consistently with their honor!

6. That the belief in the heresy of State sovereignty, for the maintenance of which the South appealed to the arbitrament of arms, and which appeal was decided adversely to the appellants, is still the prevalent creed of the southern people, who would, if practicable, again assert it at any period when the reestablishment of African slavery could be effected.

I concede, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that the present is no time to be over-scrupulous in the exercise of that power over the southern States to which I believe a nation may resort for the preservation of its own life and the discharge of its high duties to its own citizens.

But I am unwilling to forget justice and reason while inflicting punishment. The purpose of punishment is not to inflict torture on the victim, but to reform him, and to teach to the people that law must be obeyed. Justice delights not in the agonies of the prisoner whose nerves and muscles and limbs, writhing and contorted, as he hangs suspended from the gallows, waken sympathy even in the heart of his executioner. In the case of our erring countrymen the purpose of punishment is to reform, not to destroy them; and we ought, as wise legislators, to see that the punishments we inflict upon a whole people shall not render their reformation either more difficult or altogether impossible.

I believe, sir, in my conscience that the terms prescribed by the bill under consideration are unwise, inexpedient, and aggressive, and they cannot, without amendment, receive my approbation.

Within a few short days my responsibilities as a Representative will cease, and I shall go forth from this Hall with the consciousness that while I have ever been willing to assert the ultimate power of this Government, and to employ its entire Army and Navy in giving protection to those to whom we had pledged it, I have never been willing to inflict one unnecessary pang or to impose one avoidable hardship upon any portion of the American people.

I deem it a duty to look at the propositions before us in the light of philosophy and in the absence of prejudice, and ask here, in the name of reason, in the light of experience, and upon the basis of a philosophical inquiry into cause and consequence, as exhibited in the individual or the collective history of a people, whether we can expect reconstruction, harmony, loyalty, peace, or prosperity to flow from the establishment of a military despotism in the southern States as a process of reformation?

I believe, sir, that we must not forget in the legislation we propose to enact for the restoration of the peace of the Republic, that whatever differences may exist between the southern and the northern States, in soil, climate, social institutions, or political views, human nature is the same in both. Human nature, here or elsewhere, defies legislation. Education, experience, observation, often modify the natural disposition of the individual, but neither the decrees of despotic power nor inquisitorial tortures ever changed a religious conviction. No legislative act ever changed a political faith, nor will it ever. A sincere conviction in reference to a religious system or a political faith is utterly beyond the province of legislation, because legislation can act only through physical agencies, and physical agencies are powerless over intellectual organizations.

A thousand acts of Parliament could not have made Russell a monarchist nor Strafford a republican.

What we believe, Mr. Speaker, we believe from education, and education consists not only of what may be taught us in our youth by the schoolmaster, but of that which is impressed upon us by our own observations and experience in life, or that which we receive from intellects more powerful or more persuasive than our own.

If we look now at the relations existing between the northern and the southern States at the period of the Confederation, we shall observe that education was teaching to the respective parties theories which resulted in the clear and distinct issues between loyalty and rebellion in the great struggle which terminated on the soil of Virginia in 1865.

The southern States were largely slave-holding States; the northern but nominally such. To the northern States slavery was not felt as an evil per se, because the percentage of the black to the white race was so unimportant. But in the South slavery was the support of manual and menial labor, and to labor became a reproach to a white man.

Aristocracy grew up on slavery, and society consisted of three classes:

1. An aristocracy; rich, as owning both land and labor;
2. The common whites, who hired slave labor because labor was disgraceful in a white man; and
3. Of slaves, who, kept in abject ignorance, supported their masters by involuntary toil and submitted to a social system which made slavery an abomination.

This system of slavery, even then regarded by the northern States with aversion, was recognized in the Confederation and in the Constitution, because by its recognition alone could the Confederation be perfected, and by it alone, afterward, was the adoption of the Constitution secured.

We began existence as a Republic, with the concession that slavery was not inconsistent with republicanism as then defined, and the southern States have held that slavery and aristocracy both were proper appurtenances to a republican Government.

Moreover, it is true that from the organization of the Union southern statesmen have maintained the doctrine of independent sovereignty in the States, and asserted the heresy that each State might terminate its connection with the Federal Government at any time and for any reason it might deem proper. The ablest philosopher of this school of statesmen sedulously taught this doctrine to the South for a whole lifetime, and foresaw in the advancing wealth and power of the North the approach of that day when the southern States could maintain their political ascendancy only by a separation from the New England and her northern associate States. The philosophy of Calhoun became the faith of many of the political leaders of the southern States, and through them took extensive though not entire possession of the public mind. This philosophy inaugurated and sustained the rebellion; and hecatombs of miserable victims were sacrificed in its honor.

I am not prepared, Mr. Speaker, to say that the masses of the southern people thus educated and thus controlled were not as sincere in the support of rebellion and in their maintenance of the right of secession as were loyal members of this House in putting down that rebellion. In truth, sir, I believe that many of those who endured and suffered most for the confederate cause were just as sincere in their sentiments as you, Mr. Speaker, in yours, or as I am in mine.

What follows? We have conquered and subdued them, and unless they will surrender their convictions and profess to be loyal citizens you propose to annihilate them. You subject them to military rule, unlimited as to the extent of power or the period of duration. Even the kind-hearted gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] proclaimed upon this floor that as the constitutional amendment had been rejected, the door of mercy should be closed forever; but it is due to say that on reflection he retracted the unworthy utterance, or thought perhaps that he uttered it in a sense slightly Pickwickian. I ask myself, if I had been a southern man, educated with southern views and surrounded by southern institutions, would I have been a secessionist? And I answer very likely I should have been; and I am satisfied that many on this floor who advocate the extreme radical doctrines would have been, in the same circumstances, active abettors of rebellion. St. Paul was sincere and conscientious when he persecuted the saints; and Lee, I doubt not, was sincere when he cast his lot with the confederacy and attempted the overthrow of the Government.

Now, I think that we are insane when we attempt to legislate the southern soldiers and supporters of rebellion into love of the Government. They revolted against the Government in great part because they believed in the right of revolution or secession as a principle of the Government, and that the cause assigned justified the revolution. Confine them in prison; will imprisonment change their convictions? Put them under martial law, and strike down commerce and production and industry and development; will that act make them loyal which deprives them of their means of livelihood, by taking away that protection without which industry dies, production ceases, and commerce suspends its beneficent influences? Put them under the restraint of military laws alone, close their courts, invoke courts-martial for the trial of civilians on promissory notes, for the smaller grades of criminal offenses, assault and battery, libel, slander, larceny, and the like, and how many courts-martial, how many soldiers would be required to make and to enforce the judgments of your commissions.

Sir, this bill proposes no remedy for the evils it inflicts, no term as a limit to the exercise of the power it confers, and offers no hope to those who become the victims of its enactments.

Reluctant as I am to adopt severe measures, as to the constitutionality of which serious doubts may arise, I am willing to yield much to the exigencies of the present, and to assent to the exercise of military power, provided the authority shall be preceded or accompanied by a provision authorizing the establishment of civil governments in those States, under loyal control, and the maintenance of the authority thereby granted by the military arm, if necessary, until through the humane influences of the civil law, respected and enforced, prosperity may be brought again to the desolated homes of the Carolinas, of Georgia, and Mississippi, and peace shall resume its sway over men who, disliking a Government which they have injured beyond forgiveness, are yet, either of their own will or by the power of the law or the force of arms, to be compelled to respect its authority and obey its laws. While I am not willing, sir, to impose unnecessary restrictions on the late confederates on the subject of representation, I must express my hearty contempt for the consummate folly exhibited by the southern States in refusing terms of reconciliation more generous than any which in the history of the world were ever before offered by a sovereign suppressing a revolt to subjects abetting a revolt. As they withdrew from us of their own volition, they must return to us only when they can return with our volition. In this matter Congress and Congress alone is absolute, and however much Congress might yield as a matter of generosity it can be asked to yield nothing as a matter of right. I believe, sir, it to be the interest of the South to return to the Union on any terms that Congress sees fit to impose, because with the present generation the hostilities of the present will pass away and be forgotten: but if they shall madly refuse to submit to the conditions heretofore imposed they may defer indefinitely their return to the Union, but they will not destroy the Federal Government. That like the sun in respect to the planets of our system, will still control the order and establish the relations in which they shall stand to each other.

Reconstruction—Mr. Davis.

In some unknown age of the past, in the vast interval which separates Mars from Jupiter, a planet held its course around the sun in silent homage to its power. The spirit of secession seized it, and with heat engendered by internal strife in its attempt at secession, it was rent into a thousand fragments, and these, broken, shattered, amorphous, and azoic, still bound by the law of their original constitution, roll on around the central sun in eternal silence and eternal desolation. Yet the solar system is not destroyed. Yet the sun, whose light was spurned and whose power was repudiated, is still to the loyal planets the source of light, the fountain of life, the center of attraction.

How long this anomaly in the harmonious relations of the solar system has existed God only knows, and how long the anomaly in the existing relations of the disloyal States to the Federal Government can continue I shall not attempt to predict; but so long as those States shall continue proudly to despise or deride the powers to which all they ever attained of greatness was due, so long, like the asteroids, will they remain devoid of beauty, desolate, and lifeless.

It has ever seemed to me, Mr. Speaker, that we should impose such and such restraints only upon these States as shall secure their due submission to the laws which may be properly enacted by Congress, having in view the speedy return of their people to the paths of industry and prosperity, and that so far as is consistent with the safety of the loyal citizen and freedmen the administration of justice should be left to the civil tribunals of the country.

If, as it seems, these courts will not redress the wrongs of loyal men, if they will not protect the rights of the emancipated slave, we must interfere by the strong arm until justice shall be meted out to all. But why close the door to deliverance from military domination, as this bill proposes to do; why set up a government as despotic as that which characterized the confederacy itself? Such a government can neither create nor maintain peace, neither the loyal nor the disloyal will prosper under it, and the sympathies of the world will be enlisted for those who, though erring and criminal, are made the helpless victims of military misrule.

Time and prosperity will bring their healing influences to wounds yet bleeding and painful. The sentiments of asperity which have grown upon northern soil will be mollified by years, and the bitterness of southern feeling, arising from war and the ruin it has wrought, will be forgotten when thrift shall crown industry with merited reward.

It is well known, Mr. Speaker, that I have never obeyed the dictation of the leading Radicals of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and I have been the subject alike of criticism and ostracism because I have not.

I am content with either or with both. The love which I bear my country, from the source of the Mississippi to the hot waters of the tropic Gulf, from the bold headlands of New England to that shore where the Pacific waves break upon golden sands, is too deep to be affected by the considerations which are alone personal to myself.

I have opposed the policy of the extreme Radicals in Congress because I do not believe it to be founded either upon real unaffected patriotism, upon substantial justice, or upon sound statesmanship. Under that policy we have had forced upon our consideration schemes of confiscation at war with every sentiment of patriotism, philanthropy, or law. We have asserted that within the lines of the confederate States all citizens, loyal or disloyal, to the Federal Government were public and alien enemies; and yet that they were traitors whose property of every nature was confiscated by the act of 1862, and ought to be held for the payment of the war debt of the Government.

One of the grave charges against the President by way of impeachment is, that he has restored property thus confiscated by the act of 1862 to its former owners. This doctrine of universal confiscation, as asserted by our legislation, is a disgrace to any civilized nation under Heaven living under a Government of reason or constitutional law; and our advocacy of it has been one of the cardinal difficulties in the way of restoration or reconstruction.

If the rebellion resulted in a public war between North and South, and the citizens thus became public enemies, the private property of such citizens could not be confiscated for treason, although while the war was raging, "dum bello flagrante," all property of an enemy might be seized within the lines of disputed possession, yet the property of a friend or ally occupying the same location was liable to the same seizure. The ground of seizure in either case rests upon the fact that property thus situated is liable to be taken by the enemy to support a hostile force.

No other ground was ever taken to justify the seizure of the property of a friend or an ally, until the venerable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] proclaimed it in this Hall. I said then, as I say now, that the whole theory is an outrage upon reason, and as far removed from all true statesmanship as is Sirius from the sun. Statesmanship is passionless. Calm amid the tumults of war or the strife of parties it looks steadily at the permanent interests of a country committed to its care, and so far as possible holds in check every movement calculated to endanger and impair these interests.

And here, sir, statesmanship has its eye upon the unity of the Republic, upon the control on the one hand of the disloyal sentiment of the southern people and on the other of the vindictive sentiment of northern partisans, that by prudence, judgment, and reason, our country may safely pass the ordeal which now tests the strength and endurance of the Government, and come forth with true loyalty everywhere in ascendancy over the spirit of disunion, with no principle of republicanism sacrificed to temporary expediency, and with the Constitution modified only in the interests of liberty, marred by no violence, and prostituted by no oppression.

Mr. Speaker, with such views I have never hesitated to sustain any measure that I deemed essential for the protection of the Republic in its unity and its sovereignty, although I have withheld my support from what I have considered schemes for the maintenance of party interests alone. I care not, sir, by what organization the safety of the Republic be assured, if only its safety be rendered certain. The interests of individuals and of parties sink into utter insignificance when compared with the interests of the Union. Individual life and party organizations are ephemeral, while forms of government, established upon the principles of justice and right, may survive from generation to generation, and become coeval with the compact of society.

Good government, Mr. Speaker, is not the creation of a moment; it is the growth of ages. And the idea of a Republic, the best form of government yet devised by man, springing into existence far away in the dark centuries of the past, has not yet put on the vestments of perfection. The philosophy of government may well assume, what the philosophy of natural forces is ready to concede, that in each department more remains to be learned than has yet been compassed. Progress and development are the ends of our existence here; and when research and inventive genius shall have extorted from nature the secrets of her alchemy and the mysteries of her power; when in the world of morals no new truth shall be revealed to the profound inquirer; when no new legislation can be enacted without impairing the value of existing statutes; when government shall be immutable because it is immaculate, then will the human race have performed its mission and have fulfilled its destiny.

He, sir, who expects by legislation to wring from the present year those moral, social, and political results which are due only to time and to those laws of development and progress which have never yet disregarded time as an essential element in their operation, is no wiser than he who expects by legislation to compel the fig tree of the spring to yield instantly the ripened fruit that belongs only to the autumn.

I am content with gradual development. I am satisfied with allowing nature to assert her authority alike over the physical and moral constitution of the world. The old clock, whose pendulum moved by a uniform force, swings backward and forward within prescribed limits and with regulated motion, indicates by the hand upon the dial, the true time, while if the swaying pendulum be struck by the hand of a madman with insane force and driven continuously far beyond its appropriate position, the index points out a false time and deceives all who trust it. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to be deceived. I would not deceive others, but I feel assured that we can commit no graver error than by attempting to restore this Union by a measure of legislation which arouses almost naturally the hostility of those whose friendship and submission it is our avowed purpose to secure. We are expecting to hasten the return of loyalty by measures which would strangle it at its birth.

Were I, as a southerner, to be subject to the operation of this bill without a limitation upon its term, without a provision by which the military government it sanctions might be abrogated, without the power of seeking any protection save at the hands of a military commission, I would either flee from the country or resist your law. And I submit that the enforcement of the provisions of this act will do as much to depopulate the South as did the ravages of the war itself.

But, sir, without saying much that I desired, I must draw my remarks to a close. In its present form I cannot sustain this measure, but if the amendment suggested by my friend from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] shall be incorporated in it, by which provision is made for the establishment of civil governments in these States, I shall feel constrained to support it, not because I shall approve it in all its features, but because I believe that the South are responsible in a great measure for the existing condition of public affairs, and that they should endure inconveniences and restraint and annoyance, rather than that power should be at once surrendered to the wicked men who struck at the life of the Republic, and still justify the attempted parricide.

SPEECH OF HON. EDGAR COWAN,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE UNITED STATES SENATE,

February 16, 1867,

The Senate having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1143) to provide for the more efficient government of the insurrectionary States.

Mr. COWAN. Mr. President, that we have no power to pass this or any similar measure is to me so plain as to defy argument. There is nothing more obvious than the statement of the question itself with which to compare or illustrate it. If I should discuss it, I should feel on meeting a lawyer as Cicero thought Roman augurs must feel when they met one another after consulting the auspices. He wondered how they could keep from laughing in one another's faces. We have a Constitution plainly written, easily understood, and which we have all, in the presence of God and in His great name, taken a solemn oath to support, an oath which the people we represent imposed upon us, that we, being stronger and wiser than they, might stand as guardians to preserve their covenants with one another, even though they themselves, or a majority of them, in the passionate excitement of some frenzied hour, should wish to overleap its sacred bounds and desire that to be done which it was made to prevent. It is their covenant that the powers of the Federal Government shall be limited—"thus far shalt thou go, and no farther"—that there shall be no wrong, no tyranny, nor any lawful power to commit the same upon even the poorest citizen of the land. That has been its pride and its boast; that has endeared it to all our people, and made it a beacon-light to nations struggling for national freedom.

It establishes a Republic; the measure before the Senate establishes a despotism. It secures the rights of States; this takes them away. It gives to all a fair trial by due process of law; this subjects the people to trial and punishment according to the will of irresponsible rulers, not even chosen by themselves. I say this measure establishes a despotism. I say more; it contemplates a despotism compared with which the worst despotisms in Europe are beneficent, and the worst in Asia a thousand times preferable. This enthrones a tyrant, unlearned in the law and unskilled to rule, in every town and hamlet in a country as large as Great Britain, France, Austria, and Prussia, and inhabited by ten million people. These tyrants are the creatures of Federal appointment, are to decide according to martial law, (which is no law,) and their decrees are to be executed by the Federal bayonets.

And what is the pretext for this sum of all the atrocities—what is the reason given for this monstrous measure, so repugnant to the religion and civilization of the age? Is it because the southern people have now no governments, that they have no laws, that they have no courts to administer them? Not at all. Even the diabolism of party strife cannot deny but that they have constitutions and laws hardly differing from our own; that they have Governors and Legislatures, courts and juries, all working in the most regular manner; and further, that the vast mass of their people, white and black, are perfectly satisfied with them as they are.

What, then, is the difficulty? There seems to be two, one real and one pretended, and this latter is paraded in front with great clamor and great ostentation in order to conceal from the eye of the spectator the former, which nevertheless irresistibly intrudes itself and shows to all that if it were out of the way as a cause, these measures would have never disgraced these Halls even as bare propositions.

I will first examine this show reason with which Senators are endeavoring to fright the country, and upon which all the falsehood and ingenuity of radicalism has been busily engaged for the last nine months. It is that loyal Union men in those States are not secure in their lives and property, but are butchered by wholesale in great numbers with as little concern as though they were dogs. And who, pray, are these loyal Union men who thus suffer? Listen, and be instructed. They are negroes, whom it is alleged the southern people kill and murder for pastime, just as a naughty boy would kill flies. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] has in his possession a little book for you to look upon, in which there is catalogued all the enormities done and committed upon them with an exactitude worthy the most correct statist. He can give you the exact dimensions of crime in the southern States; can tell you how high it soars, how deep it dives, its superficial measure, or its cubic quantity to a hair's breadth; do anything in the world except to satisfy you that the whole is not cooked up and exaggerated expressly for the occasion. Testified to by nobody either, except agents of the Freedmen's Bureau, cotton thieves, and other individuals of an equally interested stripe, who, like the hair-worms, only wriggle in muddy water. These fellows, male and female, have found the woes of the negro such an easy and profitable way to fame and consideration that, like the dogs of Lazarus, they live by licking his sores; and to hear and see them we would think the world was exceedingly wicked, wholly on account of the negro and for no other reason.

Now, I aver that all this is sheer fabrication of the most flimsy character, and that not a single negro has been killed in the South because he was a Union man. If killed at all he has been killed for some sufficient reason, which that is not. I suppose no one will pretend that any respectable man, however much opposed to the Union cause, would care to commit murder upon a negro because the latter favored it. Emperors, kings, and Presidents have been assassinated at times to get rid of them in politics, but why any one would go to so much trouble, to so little purpose in the case of a negro, is beyond my comprehension. I am inclined, therefore, to think that in the first place these killings, if done at all, are not done by any but common offenders, and that the causes are to be found anywhere else than in the political sentiments of the parties. Everybody knows the tribal antipathy existing between the lower sort of white men and negroes, and no one expects that it will not be the source of frequent brawls and quarrels, especially since the blacks have now no masters either to advise or protect them. In these conflicts the weaker will go to the wall, not because he is loyal or disloyal, but because he is inferior in every way to his antagonists. And the false and foolish notion of equality which you have lately put into the head of the negro amounts only to a standing invitation to every white man to break that head as soon as it insults him.

These tales are too monstrous for belief, have no foundation upon which to rest, and the few cases which give rise to them would no doubt show as usual that neither of the parties was either wholly innocent or wholly guilty. In nine cases out of ten they would turn out mutual brawls, the consequence of which is often the most fitting punishment for those engaged in them. That they amount to an adequate cause for such extraordinary measures as those here proposed to remedy it no sane man can believe.

These measures are intended for a very different purpose than that of providing for a better administration of the civil and criminal laws in the South. They are not intended to make life and property more secure; but they are designed to overturn the State governments there, to substitute in their stead an irresponsible military despotism, and in the trouble and confusion which will follow their authors hope and expect that new governments may be formed upon the basis of political equality between the two different races which inhabit there, and that there may be a chance when all is finished that the political power of the South may be either paralysed or transferred to the radicals, and that in the mean time no representatives from there are to be allowed to enter either House of Congress or cast any vote at the next presidential election.

That both the bills before us are well calculated to bring about such a result I have no doubt the framers of them believe—some in the one and some in the other, and perhaps nothing but the actual experiment will undeceive them. History seems to have lost its virtue in furnishing lessons of warning and examples of madness, or one would think nobody at this day could look for any but the worst results from schemes like these.

In the first place the States are to be abolished, their governments to be destroyed, a great number of their leading people to be put under a perpetual ban of exclusion from political rights, and their recently emancipated slaves to enjoy them in their stead. One bill establishes a military government for them, pure and simple, till this is brought about, and the other a kind of mongrel tyranny of Governor and Council appointed by Federal authority, whose decrees are to be executed by a Federal soldiery if need be. Either plan treats the people as a conquered people, and at one fell swoop deprives them of all their dearest rights as American citizens, and denies to all, guilty and innocent, the right of trial by law. We are told, as I have already remarked, that some measures of this kind are called for and necessary to protect the negroes from the outrages continually committed upon them by the whites. Suppose I admit the story of these outrages is true, then let me try and show if I can what will be the effect of the proposed remedy.

I suppose if the whites kill the negroes now, they do so because they hate them. Will they love them any better when they find you have come to their rescue in such a terrible fashion? Will it incline their hearts tenderly toward the negro when they find in addition to the old grudge he is now the cause of the loss of their States as members of the Union—the loss of their State governments—that he has deposed their Governors, dispersed their Legislatures, shut up their courts, and put their magistracy out of commission? Nay, more; will they not visit upon him as far as they are able that vengeance which under other circumstances they would reserve for you? And what kind of fraternal brotherhood will exist between these two races after this fearful drama has been enacted for some years; and after you have consummated the indignities which mark it by conferring suffrage on the negro and taking it away from large numbers of the white men?

It seems to me that it would not be possible to invent any kind of scheme so well calculated to sow dissensions among neighbors as this, or one more dangerous to the peace and security of the weaker of the two parties, which in this case is the one you profess a desire to protect. Such an entire change in all the political relations of a free people as these new laws will work will create such a feeling of desperation, and furnish such ample apologies for even the most violent and bloody attempts to avenge the wrong it inflicts, that the number of those willing to adventure themselves for such a purpose would unquestionably be much increased. That crime upon which the community now looks with horror would then be perhaps considered meritorious; at any rate, the enormity of it would be lessened so much as not to interpose a very effectual barrier to its commission. During the late war it is well known that killing on the borders by partisans was not looked upon as murder; though certainly it was not honorable war; those who began it, still it became equally laudable as matter of necessity. I may be told, however, that the military rule here proposed will be the very best to prevent and keep down the tendency to such outrages. Let us see.

The territory you propose to occupy and govern has an area of about six hundred thousand square miles—equal to a dozen of Irelands, five Polands, sixty Candias, and one hundred La Vendres. This immense tract is not simply to be overrun by our armies; it is to be held by a military occupation, which is a very different thing. This, to be effective to carry out the objects of the bill, must be all-pervading, must be everywhere, in every city, town, hamlet, and neighborhood; wherever there is a loyal Union man to be protected, either in person or property, there must your military be also.

This country, too, is full of great forests, dense thickets, impassable swamps, tangled everglades, is divided by a chain of high mountains, and drained by immense rivers. It affords every facility to a desperate population to carry on clandestine war, parts of it as inaccessible and wild as the Highlands of Scotland or the rocks and crags which Schamyl so long defended against the Russians. We ourselves may well remember what it cost us some years ago to subdue a few naked Indians in the swamps and everglades of Florida; and we know, too, how another part of it furnished shelter in the days of the old Revolution to such heroes as Marion, Hugur, and others, while struggling with attempted British military occupation. This vast extent of defensible ground is inhabited by six million white people of unquestioned courage, spirit, and capacity, of such force, energy, and resolution that it took the nation long years of terrible war to put them down when they rebelled against us; this, too, in open war, with immense armies in the field, when we only tried to seize and hold a few strategic points. Such, Mr. President, is the people we sit here to-night to legislate into political slavery by means of a military despotism.

What are our means by which to carry out this gigantic undertaking? If we say we can put sixty thousand armed men to this work we shall have done well, but will that number suffice? That will put one soldier on every ten square miles, or ten soldiers on every ten miles square—a plot equal to the old District of Columbia—and it will not man it any stronger. But, again, we must remember that at many points, such as large cities, it will require considerable bodies of men, rising perhaps to thousands in a few cases, and this will materially diminish the force for the country.

Now, these sixty thousand must stand face to face with half a million of able-bodied fighting men, veterans of the rebellion, and in this duty of military occupation they will not enjoy the advantage of superior arms, higher discipline, &c., which give such power to concentrated armies; they will be scattered all over the country to watch over the rights of person and property among the freedmen.

How will our soldiers perform the duties devolving upon them by this act? They are not very fond of the freedman now as it is, and being white men themselves, and among white men of their own race—indeed, it may be said among their relations, for many of them will find relations there; they will in almost every case find people of the same name as themselves, or of their mothers or wives—how will they like this service? Especially after they have been stationed at one place long enough to fraternize with the people (the white people, mark) and to hob-nob a few times with the rebel soldiers whom they are sure to meet, I should think they would not be a very effective police to protect the blacks; indeed, it is possible many of their officers might be of their way of thinking. So that whether we speculate upon the conduct of the people toward our soldiers as hostile or peaceful the prospect is not flattering; if hostile, we are not strong enough; if peaceful, there will not be much done to carry out the purpose proclaimed as the reason of the measure.

I have alluded to the moral effect it might have upon the southern people if they were to resent, as they would do most likely by resorting to every mode of annoyance short of actual war. It would give their wicked and desperate men a chance to exert themselves and ply their trade of death in a popular cause. The weapons of murder and assassination would then be consecrated to liberty; crimes will become virtues; every sword that gleams will be that of Wallace, and every arrow that whistles through the jacket of a brigadier will remind us of Tell; nor will the Gesslers and Hazleriggs of to-day have any more of the world's sympathy than in the olden time.

There is another view of this project which it might be well to consider. You offer to the southern people military government on the one hand, and a negro government at the same time on the other, cutting off all hope on the part of a great number of the best of them that you will ever allow them to enjoy their political rights. From these you surely have nothing to expect; you ostracise them and you arm them; they are your enemies henceforth and forever. They may deceive you in all your calculations and bring to a very different result the plans you are now devising to enslave them. But in this terrible alternative which you present to the rest of the southern people you may work your own and the country's ruin in another way. They may take you at your word, may receive your general and his soldiery kindly, may use them to keep in subjection your negro friends, and finally, as you have taken away all hope from them of political liberty, they may proffer the empire to your Army and its chieftain as a reward for his justice and clemency while governing them as your prætor. Why not? Those whom you still persistently continue to treat as conquered victims on the one hand and as unhanged traitors on the other, entitled to no protection as citizens and no quarter as belligerents, may prefer to establish a monarchy rather than to wait for a republic till you come to your senses. The crown will be the glittering prize to tempt the leader, a title and large grants of land to his captains will make an aristocracy to flank him, and the soldiery can be paid in the same way on a smaller scale. They can furnish him of the rank and file of the veterans of the rebellion as many as he wants, and his first care will be to see, as Cæsar did, as Cromwell did, as the Bonapartes did, that no such stupid, clumsy, and corrupt bodies as Senates or Parliaments will stand in the way of success. He will know how to purge bodies of that kind as well as you do, he can keep out his opponents and force in his friends upon your precedents as well as those of Cromwell and Bonaparte if he thinks it proper to delude with the pretense of a Congress at all, or he may dissolve you with equal propriety. When the dukes of Virginia, North Carolina, &c., come here into your House of Lords, they will not halt their legions and take your test oath; they will offer their credentials with a mailed hand, and you will be glad to receive them—to sit in good company. There are precedents for this, too, if we looked them up.

The people of the North, too, weary of the eternal struggle and turmoil of continued partisan strife, in which knavery, quackery, and demagoguism are always successful, oppressed with the burden of enormous taxes and excises, with the whole of their ancient polity, State and Federal, torn to pieces, may look about them and come to the conclusion that the tyranny of a corrupt and vengeful majority is more terrible and all-pervading than that of a single despot; and what is worse still, a good deal more expensive. Powerful minorities may seek protection from the new Cæsar, and with the aid of his bayonets turn the tables on their oppressors.

It were well, too, if every legislative body would remember that the moment it begins to encroach either upon the Executive or the judiciary, and assume power and authority not properly belonging to it, that moment it begins to insure its own destruction. This is just as true as that so long as it stands up stoutly for its just rights and privileges it will be the most popular and powerful of the several branches of the Government. Having no actual power in itself to execute its decrees, it is of necessity obliged to employ some outside agency for this purpose, namely, the military, which in its turn becomes its most dangerous enemy. I believe there is no instance in history where an usurping Legislature has not been destroyed by the very force it had invoked for the destruction of its coördinate departments. This was notably the case of the Long Parliament of England, which was forcibly dissolved by the Lord General Cromwell in 1653; a power of its own creation, and one it had found very useful in fighting its battles, but like the horse in the fable who took the man on his back to aid in driving the stag from the pasture, they had put a rider in the saddle who refused to dismount when the work was done. So, too, in the French Revolution, whenever the Legislature overstepped its proper bounds it was obliged to obey the dictation of the clubs, the committees, and the Directory, until at length on the 18th Brumaire it was finally dissolved and driven out by Bonaparte, the Cromwell of the present century; not the only one, indeed, that has been or is likely to be from present indications. In fact, it cannot well be disputed but that to-day the United States are just as much in a state of revolution as was England in 1648 or France in 1791. We have not only all the ordinary symptoms, but we observe such a wonderful parallelism running all through these great national commotions that it seems to be possible to reduce them to general fixed laws even more readily than every-day social phenomena can be.

It is a distinguishing feature of all revolutions that at the outset the first demands for change are right in themselves, and in the great majority of cases they consist in asking that ancient constitutions and laws may be restored, that the gradual and almost imperceptible encroachments made upon them during ages shall be disavowed and given up by the usurpers, whoever they may be. Thus the English patriots, led by Hampden, Ryan, and Holles, only required of Charles I to conform his administration of the kingdom according to the undoubted principles of the English constitution, settled hundreds of years before by the great charter, and confirmed in that interval thirty several times. They would have been perfectly satisfied had the King given up his claim to levy taxes without the consent of Parliament, to imprison arbitrarily, to try by military commissions according to martial law, to make forced loans, and to billet his soldiers in houses without consent of the owner. So, too, were Mirabeau, La Fayette, and Bailley willing to stop with the constitution of 1791, if the King had in good faith obeyed it; and so, too, in our case the Republicans proper would have been perfectly satisfied to have left the question of slavery in the Territories with Congress, as it had been left for seventy years.

A second feature to be noticed in revolution is that as soon as the patriots have done, then the reformer, or rather innovator, makes his appearance, demanding not to secure that which has been approved good, but to experiment in order to find something better. The English had hardly made successful efforts to compel Charles again to confirm Magna Charta when the Scotch reformers developed themselves in the "Covenant," and then agitation spreading into England it became the second step in the progress of the revolution, and to secure the aid of the Scots the Parliament subscribed the "Solemn League and Covenant" which it was confidently expected would put an end "to Popery and prelacy, superstition, heresy, schism, and profaneness." The French, led by La Fayette, were superseded by the Girondins, who insisted on a republic and the total abolition of the monarchy, precisely as the Abolitionists a few years ago superseded the Republicans and demanded an entire remodeling of the Constitution to bring about negro equality.

After the reformers or innovators have in troubled times had success, it invites another and different class to enter the arena and struggle for the palm. This is the knave. Having seen the labors of the patriot crowned with success and glory, having seen the fool and fanatic attain to power by the advocacy of the impossible plausible, he comes to the conclusion to try the very worst which can be done to dupe the people—he becomes a Radical. In England he called himself a root-and-branch man, or independent. He was in himself equal to all things; kings, bishops, priests, every one and all vanished before him. Why not? Godliness was his specialty; he knew the mysteries of the Most High, spoke in scriptural phrase, sang through his nose, and on the whole was perhaps about the most dangerous sort of villain which has ever infested the planet. He stops at nothing, cares for nothing; having gone so far that he feels himself guilty, his very cowardice urges him on and prevents repentance. He has found the descent to avenues easy, but a return impossible. In England he beheaded the king, abolished the Parliament, and in the name of God and liberty and the most sickening cant established a military despotism which preyed and plundered with the same fury as long as it endured. In France the same character appeared, and was well personated in Robespierre, whose circumspect life and diabolical cruelty fitted him exactly to do and perform his part in the most terrible drama the world has ever witnessed. Here, too, a king was beheaded, all regular Government abolished, and a tyranny set up which exceeded in sanguinary ferocity any that had ever existed. To be suspected was to be convicted, and to be convicted was to be executed immediately. Imperial butchers—Nero, Caligula, and others—were all relieved, to some extent, as the eyes of the world took a new direction, and saw in republican France spectacles of wholesale murder equal to those furnished by old Rome in the palmiest holidays of her slaughters.

Shall we, too, come to this? We, too, are men, and men of like passions with those who have done these things. We, too, indulge in the most extreme partisan views and feelings, and we ought to be warned by such terrible examples of the dangers which result from it. Establish the tyranny contemplated here over the southern States, and you have done your share to consummate the revolution. From that moment you certainly cease to be its masters; it has become yours. The doors once opened, a thousand unforeseen enemies will enter, a thousand unforeseen accidents will occur, all calculation will be baffled, and at last when the nation, worn and weary, comes back to repose on old forms, those who disturbed them will have fared no better than the rest.

Another strange thing to be noticed in all these revolutions, is that they are started, carried through, and pushed to their termination by minorities. It cannot be well disputed that the Covenanters in England were at the time they covenanted but a mere handful, and if we add to them the Scotch and Irish Covenanters they were far from being a majority of the people of Great Britain. What shall I say, then, of the Independents, a still far smaller minority, as the Presbyterians much outnumbered them, and if both together were a minority it can be easily seen how the Independents stood when the Presbyterians were away. The strength, however, of the Independents lay first in the fact that they were the army, and second that they were headed by Cromwell. I am asked, however, in what manner this minority obtained power? I answer, just as it always does, by terror and purgation. At first, in 1647, the army frightened Parliament into submission, and in 1648, December 6, it was purged by main force, Colonel Pride, with two regiments, having arrested forty-one members and kept one hundred or more from entering, enabled the sixty who remained to have their own way. In the same way the Jacobins of France purged the convention of the Girondists. Henriot having surrounded it with an armed mob of twenty thousand men, compelled a surrender of the obnoxious members, Marat engineering the whole affair in his own peculiar manner.

Now, although we have had here no forcible purgation of Congress, yet we have what is equivalent to it: we have the resolution of those now in, that the representatives of ten States shall not come in. By this twenty Senators are kept out of this Hall and fifty members are kept out of the House of Representatives; and by this the dominant party are enabled, in spite of the veto of the President, to pass any measure they choose to pass. It is, in fact, by virtue of this unconstitutional and unlawful exclusion, that they are enabled to encroach and usurp, to be revolutionary and to be dangerous, whereas were it not for this they could do no possible harm, nor could any one else.

From this unlawful exclusion come nine tenths of the mischiefs which threaten the country to-day. If the South were here represented we would not be creating military despotisms to avenge murders which have never been committed, and to protect those who have never been assailed. The members from that region would soon silence the tongues of anonymous slanderers, as well as those of open traducers. They could procure the proofs and present them to us fairly; but as it is now, the evidence is all ex parte, and so very extravagant in its character that no one in his common senses could believe it, and I am inclined there are none who do believe it.

In order to offer something to the country to give color to this monstrous project, you affect great concern for the negro in another direction, namely, his political status for the future. You first assert his utter and entire helplessness in the presence of the whites; that he cannot defend himself against wholesale murder, even with the Freedmen's Bureau and its military force at his elbow; that he has not sense enough even to contract for himself without the guardianship of the Government officials; that, in short, he is unfit to cope in the battle of life as a freeman, that he must be coddled and nursed, educated and instructed for a year or so, until he bursts his savage cocoon, when it is supposed he will be able to soar away on painted pinion, a full-grown Radical bombyx. Only a year or so at farthest is allowed to convert these semi-barbarian slaves into honest and capable patriots, whose wisdom and virtue are to underlie the revised and improved governments of ten States of this Union. Yes, I say a year or so, if the South accept your proposition, is all you allow for this wonderful transformation. Then will the day of Pentecost be fully come, and three or four million negroes are to be changed, not by the apostolic teaching of divinely-inspired men, but by virtue of amended constitutions and the pedagogic efforts of strong-minded school-marms.

Was the world ever so mad as now? When heretofore has it sought relief in such shallow and transparent pretenses? You base your action upon the assumption: first, that six millions of your own race, kith and kin, in the South are traitors and rebels, unfit to be trusted with political power, or heard in their own defense. Second, that the three or four million negroes there, civilized only by slavery, and with whom you can neither eat, drink, sleep, or marry without degradation, who have nothing in common with you in form, feature, history, tradition, or habits; that these, forsooth, are loyal to the Constitution and laws and devoted to the Union. In fact, you boast shamelessly that they protected the one and saved the other by the valor of their arms, and that therefore you have warrant to enslave the white and raise the black to political equality on the score of gratitude if no other.

Now, what are the real facts. We had an immense empire, a Union of thirty States or more; a quarrel arose, no matter how, and a terrible war ensues with ten or a dozen States on one side trying to get out of the Union, and the rest on the other trying to keep them in. The weaker are defeated and submit, and agree to stay in the Union. We refuse either to believe or trust them, and propose to hold them as serfs, while we give to their negro slaves political power and dominion over them.

Now, even if we did hold the whites as a conquered people, whoever before was guilty of such folly as to expect to rule them with negroes?

But you say the negro was loyal to the Constitution. I say no greater absurdity ever was uttered; not true, not even possible to be true. In the first place, he knew nothing about your Constitution, had no means of knowing, had no capacity to know, and has not to-day any more notion of it than he has of the theory of the fluxions or the precession of the equinoxes. But grant that he does know as much about it as you do. Pray what was there in it to make him love and desire it—to make him loyal to it? Was it because it reckoned him only a fractional man in the scale of representation—a little more than a half and a little less than three fourths of a man? Was it the nice adjustment of his comparative value that struck his fancy to it? Perhaps it was that clause commonly called the "fugitive slave" clause which attracted his attention and won his affection? But you say he was devoted to the Union—to-day he is the Union man par excellence; and if that be true there must have been some good reason for it. What, then, induced him to devote himself to the Union? Was it that it made us strong in foreign war, or that established uniform laws for naturalization and bankruptcy? Was it because of its convenience for post office purposes; or because it gave Congress the right to coin money and regulate commerce?

Now, in all seriousness, does any sane man believe such things? Not one. But everybody knows that if the negro was loyal to any one it was to his master. All over the South, from one end to the other, he remained with him or his family, serving just as before, and was only seduced away from his servitude when our Army with its banners approached, when he heard the rattle of its drums, the blare of its trumpets, and saw the pomp of its array; then, half invited and half forced, did he fall in as great boys or half-savages would do, to enjoy the excitement and indulge in the license it afforded. He was free, but his new liberty he found did not furnish either food or raiment, neither homes nor shelter gratis—he had to battle for them all just as before, except that now he had no certainty of winning; his master had ceased to be his insurer.

One of the schemes now before us contemplates arming him, I suppose, still further to enable him to protect himself. I predict for this the same result as giving him the ballot: the more of such favors he receives the sooner he will disappear from the face of the white man. It is strange that those who profess to be his friends cannot see that the more they multiply the points of antagonism between the two races the worse it will be for the weaker. If they were even legislating for a day their course would be of no value to the black, but when it is considered that they invite him to a struggle of generations it becomes cruel and pitiless in the extreme. It ought to have satisfied even the most rabid of demagogues to thrust him into the arena to get his food, raiment, and lodging in a contest with the sharpest and most rapacious traders in the world, but to ask him to enroll himself in the militia and take part in politics betokens an utter disregard of all the laws which govern the conditions of life.

Liberty is a glorious boon, it is true; but still there are many good people foolish enough to think it were better to be a well-fed slave than a famished freedman, better to wear a master's livery than vote naked and shivering at the polls. That liberty which renders subsistence precarious and deprives its votary of the necessities of life, cannot for a great while be thought by the negroes preferable to servitude without the care of providing anything for sickness, winter, old age, or for children especially, if we remember that his value was always a sufficient guarantee to the slave against excessive cruelty on the part of his master. No future census will show the blacks increasing twenty-five per cent. in a decade; on the contrary, from this time they will be found to diminish and finally disappear forever. The turbulent and fanatical demagogues who fancy they are philanthropists will soon have an opportunity to discover the work Providence set them to perform, and for which they were admirably fitted by their blindness and folly, because they will soon see they were but instruments in His hands to remove an inferior race out of the way of a superior, and that while slavery multiplied the negroes more rapidly than any other people in the world, abolitionism insures their sure and rapid extinction. There is much work in the world wise men cannot do—fools are found to do it.

I come now to another phase of these schemes, and one which is by no means the least interesting, especially to the people of the North; that is, the question of the cost of the experiment. If the Freedmen's Bureau, which costs eleven or twelve millions annually, is of so little use that negroes are slaughtered by hecatombs right under the very noses of its agents, how much is this military or provisional government, which is intended to be efficient, to cost? Suppose we put sixty thousand men on duty there? What will they cost? Sixty, ninety, or one hundred, and twenty millions? The history of the Florida war, the other Indian wars, and the great war ought to enable us to give a tolerable guess, and we may be sure we will not estimate it high enough. It matters little as to the figure at which we put it, if the lowest sum is likely to be intolerable when invested for such a purpose. And in order to show very briefly our situation, which does not seem to be well understood, I propose to go back to 1861 and see in what way we have managed our finances. There may be instruction in it. Our first folly was in the attempt to conduct the war and pay in gold. The banks loaned us $200,000,000, and wanted to cash our drafts for that amount in gold, if need be; but if the holder was willing to take their paper that was his affair, not ours. This was refused, and we made them pay us gold, which we distributed. This run on until we drew one hundred and seventy millions or thereabouts, when the golden stream was exhausted; and as a matter of necessity the banks were completely drained, suspended specie payments, and we had disabled the hand that first came to our rescue.

Our second error was, that instead of going into the market and borrowing money, as anybody else would have done, by giving our bonds at such discount as was possible, we concluded to coin our credit and make money ourselves. The consequences were that we were put in antagonism with everybody who received our money—and all soon discovered that the more they depreciated it the more they got of it, the more they received for their commodities, and the less taxes they had to pay—in short, everybody was interested to lower our credit as much as possible; whereas if we had borrowed on our bonds and let somebody else make the money, our bondholders would have been directly interested to sustain our credit rather than depreciate it.

The third error was in making this credit money of ours a legal tender in discharge of all indebtedness, the past as well as the future. This set on another set of vultures to tear our financial reputation, namely, the debtor class; inasmuch as the cheaper our paper dollar became the more easily they could get it; and when gotten, it was just as good as a real dollar to pay debts with, because the creditor must take it. Then came the legalized robbery of widows, orphans, old men, in short, everybody living on fixed incomes—ground rents and annuities dwindled, and the weak and helpless were fleeced to enrich the strong.

At least $100,000,000 annually were thus taken from one class of our people and put into the pockets of another class, without the slightest consideration or the least benefit to the Government, besides violating every principle of honor and good faith among men.

Another result followed, which the passionate stupidity of the times could not foresee; indeed, cannot see now, or will not see. The money which is made a legal tender by the Government becomes by that means the measure of values, the same as lawful weights are measures of gravity, and yard-sticks and foot-rules are measures of length. Now, any fool could see what a disturbance would be created in the business of any country if the Government were to throw away the yard-sticks and pound weights, and compel people to buy and sell with new standards which varied with every change of temperature or passing breeze; so that to-day the yard was thirty inches, yesterday it was thirty-three, and to-morrow it may be twenty-five; the pound is sometimes ten ounces, sometimes twelve or thirteen, but hardly ever sixteen, which it ought to be steadily at all times. I say anybody could foresee the consequences of such folly; and I think it a great blessing that Providence has put it out of the power of Congress now to affect the certainty of weights and measures, because if these could have been made to depend on uncertain contingencies some patriot would have tried the experiment as necessary to put down the rebellion.

At all events, we did with our United States notes or greenbacks an equally wicked and precisely as foolish a thing when we made them a legal tender, especially in a time of war, when all must know that the public credit would go up and down just as our arms were successful or unsuccessful; and that these notes, having no value in themselves, but resting on our credit, would go up and down in like manner, being one day eighty cents for a dollar, on another fifty, and at one time thirty-five cents; and at no time since has it been a real dollar or one hundred cents. Our wisdom, then, came to this: he who had commodities to sell rejoiced in our defeats because his prices rose; he who had debts to pay did the same, as he got the money which paid them the more easily. To all such our victories were ruin. No man could either buy or sell without looking these unknown, impossible-to-be-known, contingencies in the face, and like the gambler, the whole nation was set to betting upon chances. The risks multiplied as the war became more and more desperate, and prices rose in proportion to the uncertainty. Everything was at three or four times its actual value, and $200,000,000 a year were added to our losses from this cause alone.

To add still more to the disturbance, the Government was obliged to pour an immense stream of some three or four millions in upon the North for Army supplies, &c., necessary to the war. Everybody was stocked with its credit, and grew wildly extravagant and lavish in all kinds of expenditure. Fine houses, fine furniture, fine clothes, and fine equipages appeared everywhere, until even those who most clearly saw the delusion were seduced into silence for fear of dispelling it.

It is now over, however, and the little cloud no bigger than a man's hand already hangs out in the clear sky; soon it will bank up thicker and deeper on our financial horizon, and at last burst forth in such a storm as none will wish to see again. Men are beginning to realize that all that immense influx of wealth was really only one of the most gigantic losses of national wealth ever experienced in the world before; that it was only achieved by the Government through the medium of a loan from themselves, and which they will first have to repay to be repaid. Surely not less than $10,000,000,000 went down and was irrevocably lost in the vortex of the war, and naught remains of it but the paper evidences of that part of the bill which yet remains to foot, equivalent to a debt of more than three thousand millions to be paid as an actual debt, as pensions, bounties, &c.

And now, sir, what is the spectacle we present in the face of this undoubted condition of affairs? For what consideration did we throw away $10,000,000,000 of national wealth? What moved us to sacrifice half a million of citizens on the battle-field? What was it, I demand? Was it to preserve the Union or to destroy it? Was it to save the Republic or to render it impossible? Was it that the free governments of the States should be perpetuated, or that they should resolve themselves into a central despotism so enormous and unwieldy that its abuses might defy correction? Let the business we have on hand tonight be the answer. What is the proposition before us? Is it not to declare the annihilation of ten States of the Union? Is it not to reduce these people to the condition of conquered people? Is it not openly, avowedly, in spite of the Constitution and of all the principles of liberty, to establish a military despotism over one third of the American people?

And this Thirty-Ninth Congress, now about to report to the people the result of its efforts to reap the fruits of the war, what will you say to them on your return? When you are asked whether you maintained the Constitution, will you not be obliged to say, "We have broken it?" Are all offenders triable by due process of law? "No; by martial law." Have they trial by jury? "No; by military commission." Have you restored the standard of value to the certainty of coined money? "No; it is measured by the ever-shifting value of greenbacks." Have you exercised none but delegated powers? "Yes, we usurped under the 'war power.'" Did you respect the rights reserved to the States? "No; we treated the reservation as void." Can you say aught else to these questions, if you vote for the bills we are considering, or any of them?

And when you are interrogated by one who lost a limb or an eye in suppressing the rebellion, how will you answer his question, Did you restore the Union? "No; ten States are yet out." Were they willing to submit and come back to duty? "Yes; but we were afraid if we let them in they would have sided with the President, so that we could not pass bills in spite of his veto." Have you restored peace and harmony to the theater of war, that its people may prosper and help us to pay the national debt? Here a bondholder awaits your answer with some solicitude. You give it: "No; we thought the hearts of the people were not right yet; and we have treated them as traitors and criminals in chronic rebellion; their industry still languishes, and their poverty remains unimproved."

Well, it seems, then, that you ought to have given us something for the sacrifice of blood and treasure we made during the war; and as you admit you have a violated Constitution and a broken Union, now pray tell us what you have done and what you have given us instead of these? "We have passed a reconstruction bill which subjects the southern States to military rule, and which will keep them in order until the few white friends we have down there, in conjunction with the freedmen, can have an opportunity to meet in convention and establish republican forms of government, which being entirely under our control, we can then restore the Union without endangering our party supremacy."

You offer them these, your alternative: negro suffrage or military despotism. That is the harvest of the war as gathered in by your sickle. These are the fruits of the great contest as brought home in your baskets. Negro suffrage or military despotism. Think of it. Oh, my countrymen, is it true that it has come to this: the rule of the servile barbarian, or the rule of the bayonet. How dare you go home to your war-worn soldiers and crippled veterans who fought your battles and tell of this most foul consummation? How dare you, in the face of the civilized world, announce this as the result of the great experiment? Thus far you have gone as a Congress; thus far did the Long Parliament go; thus far did the French Convention go; one of them had a Charles, the other had a Louis, you have a President; one of them had a Lord General, the other had a First Consul; what will you call your master when he comes?

At a subsequent period of the debate (between three and four o'clock on Sunday morning, February 17)—

Mr. COWAN. The only thing I wanted to say was this: after we had possession of a rebel State there was a question whether its government was annihilated by the rebellion or not. One said it was, another said it was not. I was of the opinion at the time, and I am of the opinion now, that General Sherman was right when he decided such governments still existing; but there was such a tremendous ado made about it that the Government decided otherwise, and I do not complain. But I would not have disturbed the government of one of the rebel States. If there had been a rebel Governor, a rebel legislator, or a rebel judge, I would have either let him alone or I would have indicted him for treason. In the latter case I would have arrested him and tried and punished him if he was guilty. Owing, however, to popular clamor and the course taken previously in the case of Louisiana, it was resolved to have new constitutions made and new governments organized in all the States where the rebellion had been, the same as though the old had been abrogated. This gave rise to the vexed question of reconstruction, of which so much has been said to such little purpose.

Now, pray, what had the President to do with reconstruction except as Commander-in-Chief of the Army? All he could do was to keep order in the meanwhile, and in doing this he was bound by no laws except those which bind the General to preserve the peace till the civil governments could take the matter off his hands. Nor had Congress anything to do with it, except in so far as to provide the means, such as men and money, to enable the General to do his duty.

Neither the President nor Congress have the slightest power or authority to interfere in the making of State constitutions or State governments, except that both are expressly bound by one of the guarantees of the Federal Constitution that they will allow nobody else to interfere. The States themselves must be allowed to perform that duty for themselves, free from outside force or outside dictation; and when they thus act of themselves freely, the constitution and governments they make will of necessity be republican in form; no matter what may be thought of them by people who do not live in the State and who cannot in any way be affected by them.

I do not know what people believe now, or what kind of notions they have about our Government; but at the time the question was started everybody believed that if a State was to have a government at all, that government must be made by the people of such State and by nobody else. Then came the difficulty. Who are the people? And what does the term include, and in what sense is it to be taken? Is it people in the popular sense; men, women, children, black people, white people, everybody? Or was it to be taken in its limited political sense, as when you submit a question to "the people," you submit it to the people who are entitled to vote? That is all clear; but another difficulty still followed. How are we "to tell" who are entitled to vote? The people designated by the law of the State is the only answer possible. The President is sworn to see that the laws are executed. What laws? The laws that he finds made, not the laws that somebody thinks ought to be made. He must take the laws as they exist. Then the President of the United States, Mr. Lincoln, in the first place, went to the laws of the State to ascertain who were the people entitled to vote, and he intrusted them with the making of the State governments. When the present President came into power he followed that example, and he intrusted the making of their State governments to the people of the States; that is the people who were entitled to vote by the laws of the several States. Who could complain of that?

I heard the other day, and I have frequently heard gentlemen make a great to do that both the Presidents in doing what I have just mentioned had usurped legislative powers; that they had authorized people to make governments, and so on. I deny it. In all this there is not assumed any legislative power whatever, but the very reverse, as it cannot be usurpation of law-making power to defer to laws already made. Now, when Mr. Lincoln and Mr. Johnson permitted the people of the several States to make governments for themselves they merely permitted what was lawful, but made no new law. And again, when the present President sent down to the people of the southern States and said: "You had better do this and you had better do that," that was not usurping legislative authority; that was not making law, it had no resemblance to making law; and any lawyer ought to know that it had not. Counsel is one thing and law is another; law must be obeyed, but counsel is advice which you may follow or not. Nor did the recommendations of the President bind the southern people. They were not bound on that account to repeal their secession ordinances, or to repudiate their rebel debts, or to do this, that, and the other thing.

The President of the United States cannot make law; could not if he were to try; and even if we grant he had no right to give advice or impose conditions, still it does not lie in your mouths to complain if the advice was good and the people took it. It is no business of yours if the conditions were wholesome and accepted by those to whom they were tendered. The southern people do not complain. Why should you? Is not your carping at this mere hypocrisy? And would you not have raised a much greater clamor if the President had not taken the course he did. The truth is that you who now profess to be shocked at this pretended usurpation were only sorry at the time that it had not been far greater. If Mr.

Lincoln had let the negroes vote in violation of all State laws, or if Mr. Johnson had refused to let any white man vote in the South, you would have thrown up your caps and shouted your applause. Again, if you were allowed here in Congress to carry out the most stupendous of all usurpations, that is, the making of constitutions for the States and compelling these people to adopt them, then you would, in the same spirit of canting hypocrisy, proclaim to the world that you were guarantying to them republican forms of government, while you let alone your own States having the same provisions.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Did he not make a law in prescribing qualifications for the probate judge of Mobile?

Mr. COWAN. I do not know anything about that. That was not the question. Why do you not charge him with that? That is in your programme, not ours. If he refused to allow Semmes to be probate judge have you a right to complain of that?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Did you not say he did not make the law?

Mr. COWAN. I say in this particular case he did not. I say it now, and I say it all the time. There was no law about it. If he did radical things against the law you can attend to that. That is your business, not ours. In this business of reorganizing State governments, who was to make the State governments? Why, the people of the State, as I said. Who are the people of the State? The people of the State are designated by the law; and I say that if the President erred at all, he erred on your side. He restrained, he limited the people who were to make the governments. He required a new oath of allegiance.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Was not that making laws?

Mr. COWAN. Not at all, because nobody was bound to take the oath of allegiance. I wish the chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate to know that when the law speaks it speaks to command, and it commands where it can compel obedience. Let the honorable chairman read the first chapter of Blackstone. Let him understand the difference between law and counsel or advice, particularly when the fate of an empire may depend upon the construction that he puts upon it. I say it is absurd and ridiculous to talk about the President of the United States making law or making anything that anybody is bound to obey as such.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania answer me this question—

Mr. COWAN. Any question you choose to put.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Did not the President appoint a man provisional governor? Is there any law under Heaven for it? Did he not pay him a salary? Is there any law under Heaven for it, civil or military? Did he not say that certain persons should not take part, and did he not compel—

Mr. COWAN. I want to know whether you quarrel with him for that?

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is not the question.

Mr. COWAN. Yes, sir; it is the very question. I agree that the President did a great many things that I was not in favor of, but they were done under your influence, under your auspices; you encouraged them, and you cried Io triumphe, io triumphe; and now you ask me to explain them. I am not here to explain any of those things. Attend to your own side of the question. You have got enough to do there.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Pennsylvania asserted that the President had usurped no authority; and when I ask him a question, if there was any authority for an act done, what does he say? "Oh, that was your business; you may find fault with him for that." That is the answer he gives.

39TH CONG....2D SESS.

Reconstruction—Mr. Cowan.

SENATE.

Mr. COWAN. I consider it the height of audacity—I do not put the Irish phrase exactly—to ask me whether that is usurpation or not; that any individual in the United States Senate who is in favor of a bill creating a military despotism all over the southern States should ask me, when I am in favor of that action of the President, which has been perfectly lawful, which has been perfectly free from any objection whatever, to explain this abnormal, eccentric action of the Executive. What right has a Radical to ask about the appointment of a provisional governor of a State when he proposes to destroy the free government of the States and establish a military despotism in their stead? I might ask his question, and I might get up a very handsome quarrel with the Executive upon that subject; but I do not know by what right gentlemen here, who take these excessive grounds, and who encouraged all these things and insisted that there were not half enough of them, come around now and say that this is an offense. Here is a Radical who wants military commissions and says the Supreme Court ought to be abolished because they have declared them unconstitutional. He comes to me and says, "Why, the present President authorized them to a certain extent." What have I got to do with that? That is your side of the question. And I have only to say to the honorable chairman of the Judiciary as to all these things that is his side of the question; not, indeed, as to military commissions, because I give him great credit for his opinions and his arguments and his efforts upon that question. We were together upon it; and I trust I shall never fail to award to all men their deserts in any particular department, no matter how much they may be lacking in others.

If I had been the President I am very free to say I would not have appointed provisional governors, although I heard no cry come up from the true and genuine radical patriot, the fellow who had the real ring, and nobody else had the ring, at the time when it was done. I do not believe we would have heard anything about it if the President had followed in the lead steadily and consistently in which it was supposed he started out. It was supposed that the assassination of Mr. Lincoln was a God-send, and that instead of having a King Log who would not hurt anybody and would allow everybody to set up and croak ad libitum, you had got a King Stork to devour the southern people wholesale. If President Johnson had gone on playing Stork, if he had really usurped, if he had really made laws, and really enforced them by executive power, he would have won your approbation and received your homage, and he only incurred your displeasure when he refused to break his oath of office and sanction the most monstrous and palpable violations of the Constitution. It is not that he has done that you complain of, but that he has not done enough of it that you quarrel with him.

I am sorry, Mr. President, that this digression has drawn me away from the point which first attracted my attention, and that was that the honorable Senator from Ohio says these are not governments; that they are mere pretended governments; that they have not been submitted to the people, &c. Suppose that is all true; suppose that the President made a great mistake; suppose that Mr. Lincoln made a great mistake in regard to the government of Louisiana; and suppose that Mr. Johnson made a great mistake with regard to North Carolina as to who should make the government; who complains of it? What is wrong about the government? I doubt very much whether the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] could pick out wherein the constitution of North Carolina differs from that of Massachusetts; and I am very certain that the honorable Senator from Illinois at this time could hardly tell wherein the difference between the constitution of Louisiana and that of Illinois consists. These constitutions that the people have made are all right enough. We have all read them. They are very good constitutions, quite an improvement, evidently a very great improvement upon American constitutions made in the early part of our career, if it be an improvement to make them more and more liberal.

Now, when a constitution is made, and when the people acquiesce in it, and when they are living peaceably under it, and do not agitate to be relieved from it in large numbers, why not let it alone? Why should people living under other constitutions and in other States busy themselves to overturn these governments and institute new ones in their stead? I do not know. That is the reason I ask the question. Are not these good constitutions? Are not the laws which are made under them good laws? Do they not, if executed, protect the people in their rights of person and property? I agree they do not allow negroes to vote, and they should not unless the people of the State choose to grant them the privilege, because that is a function which the people must eventually exercise and which they will exercise. It is essential to the very existence of a free State that it shall determine itself who shall wield its political power.

It is idle to say that a State can be free and that somebody outside of it shall dictate who shall cast its ballots. If that is the case, why may not somebody outside dictate who shall be its officers? Why not? Does not the ballot select the officers? If you give me leave to tell you who shall vote in your State, I will tell you who shall be your officers. In olden times, when liberty was understood and when freedom was a thing to be prized and esteemed as it ought to be, nobody dreamed that any power dehors the State should say who should vote; and for one of the best reasons in the world. Why should I say who should enjoy the right of suffrage in Illinois? Suppose I, a citizen of Pennsylvania, should undertake to dictate those who should vote in Illinois? The stupidest man in the State would tell me, "What have you to do with Illinois? The Governor of Illinois does not govern you; the Legislature of Illinois do not make laws for you; the courts of Illinois cannot draw you into their jurisdiction; what, then, have you to do with Illinois?" I should like to know how any Pennsylvanian would answer that question. And the fact that no one can interfere except citizens of the State in its governmental affairs constitutes the very essence of its freedom.

Now, however, all things are changed, and the Senator from Massachusetts, in the large, all-embracing philanthropy which distinguishes him, thinks that Mississippi or Alabama, or indeed any southern State, has no right to enjoy this privilege of a free State. Why? Why, says he, they will not let the negroes vote. Think of it! What an outrage on the part of Mississippi or Alabama! And he, forsooth, has a right to reach in, dehors the State from the outside, and regulate Alabama and Mississippi; and if Alabama and Mississippi do not be regulated he will make them regulate. Now, if an Alabama man were here, would he not have the right to say: "My dear sir from Massachusetts, you are a very clever fellow and I like you very well; but would it not be just as well for you to attend to your own business and regulate Massachusetts, especially as the laws of Alabama and the laws of Mississippi do not affect you in the slightest degree?" I remember the time when there was no answer to this.

As I said to-night before, if this is to be a consolidated Government, if all State lines and State distinctions are to be broken down, and we are to have a consolidated Government, a centralized empire, why not say so? I will tell you then what I think about it. I know a great many arguments that go to sustain that view as the proper one. But, sir, we went up to your desk and we took an oath to observe the Constitution. I do not profess to be a remarkably religious man, but I do not like to break my oath. I have that foolish kind of superstition that a man ought to keep his oath. Now, if the American people are willing to consolidate and have a new constitution; if they are willing to centralize all political power in the Federal Government, I shall yield myself to their will as gracefully as anybody; but I do say that I cannot abandon the old till I am liberated in some way from the obligation they have imposed upon me to sustain it as it is at present established.

Then, I ask again, what have we to do with these southern State governments? Nothing in the world. The State government is made by the people of the State. If the State of New York chooses to alter her constitution tomorrow, what have Congress to do with that? If the State of New York makes a constitution which my brother MORGAN thinks is not the right one, and which does not give him the rights, liberties, and privileges that he thinks are his due, he does not appeal to Congress; his remedy is that he can come over to Pennsylvania, and he can perhaps have them there. That is the only remedy that any of us have. I cannot in Pennsylvania get a constitution made there that exactly suits me. There are a great many things that I want put in the constitution that the people of Pennsylvania will not agree to, just because they do not see it precisely as I do. If I thought these things were insufferable, intolerable, not to be borne, I may go over to New York or Ohio or any other State in which I can be suited; but I could not expect aid from any of the people of other States to assist me in coercing Pennsylvania into a new constitution just fitted to my case.

The Senator from Massachusetts thinks, on the other hand, that we ought to supervise the State constitutions in order to see that they confer as many privileges on the negroes as they grant to white people. That seems to be his notion of what the United States ought to do—indeed, what it was created to do—but I have not heard him claim any such right for us on behalf of the whites whom the States disfranchise. He has not done it for foreigners who have to wait five years; he has not done it for women, for minors, or for the poor who cannot pay the qualification tax, or indeed for anybody but negroes. Why should he do it for them alone? His people whom he patronizes, and who are his clientela, and who follow him as they did the old Roman in ancient times, have the same power and remedy precisely that the classes named as disabled have. If they do not like a particular State they can go to some other one; but I do not know that they have any right to insist that the whole State shall be remodeled in order to suit their particular case; and I do not think they have any right to ask an outsider, who has nothing to do with it in the world, and who is not to be governed by these things, to come in and help them to coerce a majority of their fellow-citizens to make things to suit them.

Mr. President, this was all I had to say to the honorable Senator from Ohio at the time that I desired to interrupt him. I wanted to know by what authority, by what warrant, he undertakes to say that a State in this Union has not the government that it ought to have? By what warrant does he undertake to say that a southern State has not that government any more than a northern State? I know he would not dare to say that Pennsylvania had not that government, or that Massachusetts had not it, or that New York had not it. Then by what warrant does he say that Mississippi has not got it, that Alabama has not got it, or that Louisiana has not got it? By no warrant at all, except the warrant of the conqueror, the warrant of the man who cuts himself loose from all constitutions, all laws, all obligations, and who proceeds by virtue of sheer force only. What does sheer force amount to? I believe William of Normandy did whip Matilda, while he was courting her, with a bridle—it is so reported by historians—and a union resulted afterward; but that is the only union that I know of that resulted from such a flogging as that was.

Now, Mr. President, our Union is either a fact or it is a delusion; it is either something or it is nothing. If it be a fact, or a Union at all, then it is a Union made of States. If it is not such a Union, then it is only a name, without any of the attributes of a real Union. If it is of this last class of creation, what a terrible pack of fools we have been. Think of it! Have we been following such a will-o'-the-wisp, an ignis fatuus, or a jack o'lantern? Have we been carrying on a terrible war during five years last past—hundreds of thousands of men slain, thousands of millions expended—for a mere phantom which exists only in contemplation of law, but has no reality? If the Union is a reality, and we have been fighting, struggling, and expending the national blood and the national treasure for it as such, then the States which make the Union are realities. If that is not logical I must confess I do not know what is. If they are not, then the Union is gone; the Union is a failure; and we were fools to have relied on it. Then we should have taken the advice of some politicians who said to us at the outset, "Do not make war; war will not make a Union; war will destroy the Union; war will not heal the breach, it will widen it; war will not bring people together, it will separate them further apart." No, no. We said that opinion was semi-treasonable. And after we had made a war for about four years, these same deluded people, who did not love the country of course, who could not love it, who could not have the same affection for it that we had, although they had in it wives and children and property as we had, met at Chicago and "resolved the war for the restoration of the Union had been a failure." What then? What did we do? All over the country, everywhere, we shouted that this resolution was little better than treason! We did not treat it very fairly I agree. We pretended to say, in the first place, that they meant that this was not a good or a just war.

But they could not have meant it was not a war of great battles, with great glory and great destruction of men and money. Surely not; but as I said before—

Mr. SAULSBURY. I wish to correct my friend in one particular. The Republicans of the country have published it far and wide, their newspapers have so published it, their speakers have so published it, that the platform of the Democratic party at Chicago said that the war had been a failure. I suggest to my honorable friend that it said no such thing. It said this, and it said no more: that the war had failed to restore the Union. There is a very great difference between the two expressions.

Mr. COWAN. That is just what I was coming to exactly. I say that is what they did say exactly. I say they did not mean to say that the war was a failure. The war was a successful war. It killed great numbers of people; and we had the greatest battles, and more of them than in most wars. They were not such fools as to assert that, although they did say it failed to restore the Union. That is what they meant to say. They said, although it was a good war to cover the ground with dead and trench the earth with new-made graves, yet that it did not fulfill its purpose. I did not believe it at that time, and I was sorry that they said so, because when the war began I thought it would restore the Union if it was well managed and in prudent hands. I had no doubt of it; and even then I thought if we had a fair chance it would still save the Union, and therefore I did not like this Chicago utterance by any means. But I had no expectation that the Radical party here to-day would come and try to verify it. I never dreamed of such a thing. I never dreamed that I would have found Senators from Illinois and Senators from elsewhere, from patriotic, loyal States, coming here to prove that what the Democrats said in that resolution was true. I would have died first. I would have been torn to pieces by red-hot pincers before I would have done that, I would have said the war is no failure; and to prove my assertion I would have restored the Union on the spot, and made it a monument worthy of the struggle made to save it. But we had a parcel of timid people, who are afraid of twenty Senators here and fifty Representatives in the other House from the South, and they would not restore the Union. They were afraid "some devilish cantrip slight" might occur by which they would not get into office again; that their chances were better with it broken and disrupted than if it were to exist again in its old integrity.

Sir, I would have restored the Union at once. I would have done it if it had been for no other purpose than to show these fellows at Chicago that they did not know anything about it. And, Mr. President, to be serious about this subject, that was all along in my mind. I wanted to show, not only to those who doubted, but to the world, that the American people, democratic as they were, popular Government as theirs was, could put down a rebellion, rescue a people who were involved in it, and restore their Union. I wished to show to the world a Government intact, reproduced in this way out of the fiery flames of war. I would have done it if I had had my way, and I would not have been here to-day, as my Radical friends are, to indorse the Chicago convention. I would not have been here to-day to fulfill the prophecies of my Democratic opponents, which they made in 1864. I would have been ashamed of it.

And yet that is the position in which we are now placed. That is the position in which this bill places us. We admit by it that popular government is gone, gone over ten States; the Union is gone over ten States; the Constitution is gone, liberty is gone; everything for which men have struggled and toiled and bled and fought and pleaded for centuries upon centuries, Magna Charta, the petition of right, the bill of right, the writ of habeas corpus, everything is swept away. What for? To verify a resolution of the Democratic Chicago platform of 1864. If you had any respect for wise men, for prophetic men, for men of clear vision and insight into the future, you would call that convention to take the Government off your hands and conduct it. Why not? How did they discover this great fact that we did not discover? How did they foresee that if it was not a failure then, in 1864, we would make it one hereafter, in 1867?

Mr. President, there is but one safe course for this Congress and this people, and that is to stand upon the Constitution as it now exists and the laws made in pursuance of it, and the construction which the Supreme Court may put upon them. It may grate upon the feelings of some as the operation of all Governments must grate more or less, but that will be the wisest and the best course for the American people. Whenever they abandon that they are at sea. Cut loose from it and where are you? Rhode Island refused to accede to the Constitution of the United States for two years after it was enacted, and so did North Carolina. Was force used to bring them in? What hold had you on Rhode Island or North Carolina? What hold have you now on North Carolina? The hold you pretend to have is the hold of military despotism; because you can, you will, not because you have a right. How long will that hold remain? It will remain this session of Congress, and perhaps the next, and perhaps the next after that; but everybody knows the law by which these holds are retained. You hold these States just as long as you can and no longer. Is there any Senator to-night who supposes we can hold these southern States, if we undertake to govern them by military rule, any longer than we can maintain that rule? I think not. I never heard anybody pretend there was any other guide, any other law of it than that: "just as long as you can and no longer."

Mr. President, I have no words, I have no heart to express what I think of this bill. I had hoped all the time, and hoped even against hope, that this cup of humiliation would have passed from us, that returning sense, returning reason, returning humanity, Christianity, anything that is good and great and generous and noble, would have come to our rescue before this had come to pass. Do gentlemen suppose this is demanded on the part of the people? I can say to them that in a journey of three or four hundred miles in the country in the last four or five days I did not meet a man who did not hoot at the idea of this bill being passed, no matter to what party he belonged. That we, the descendants of revolutionary sires, we who had prided ourselves upon our Government, upon our institutions; we who had held ourselves up as a model for other nations, should in the short space of six years so far forget everything that had heretofore been deemed sacred, true, wise, and salutary in politics, as to attempt the establishment of a military despotism over any part of the American people! And particularly is it astonishing that this should be done in the light of such recent lessons of history. We ourselves are monuments to-day of the destructive character of such a policy. You have listened to speeches on this floor to-day deprecating it. Go to the debates of the British Parliament, and read Fox, Pitt, and Burke on that same subject, in that same strain, wherein they begged the English Government not to treat the Colonies in the way they were doing, and they did not pretend to treat them as this bill would treat the South. What was the consequence? The consequence was that they lost the Colonies; the brightest jewels in the Crown were torn from it by our forefathers, and this once great and glorious fabric established.

Is it not strange that in so short a time we should have forgotten all for which we struggled? What was the struggle for? No man is such a fool as to suppose that there ought not to be some good reason why New York wants a Union. Has New York any natural right to govern the people of Virginia? I do not think Pennsylvania claims any such right. We did not make this war because we insisted that we had a right to govern the southern people. Instead of making it for that purpose we proclaimed always to the world that all peoples had a right to govern themselves, that we governed ourselves upon that principle; and after the war commenced we declared that it was not to conquer the people. What, then, did we make war for? We made it for the Union. And I have sometimes been astonished to find after all the talk of Union how little the Union is understood. Because Russia governs Poland that is not a union. Because England governs Ireland that is not a union, except so far as it is voluntary on the part of Ireland. We prized the Union because the Union did certain things for us that we could not do very well as States. We did not want thirty-six different post office establishments, and therefore we agreed to give the General Government the right to have one Post Office establishment all over the Union. See how convenient it is! If we had thirty-six of them there would be a terrible time in getting a letter through eight or ten different States to go to eight or ten different post office departments to be checked and stamped, &c.

Again, it was a great convenience to the people of this country to have uniform laws of bankruptcy. We have had that matter up. We established a Union for that purpose, so that what was a discharge in one State would be a discharge in another State.

But the great and paramount object of the Union, the one for which it was made and the one which, if you take away, Pennsylvania does not want a Union and New York does not want it, was that we might be strong from the Union; that instead of each State having an army and a navy of its own, there might be one Army and one Navy for all; that instead of settling their disputes by the arbitrament of the sword, they might be settled in the Federal courts and through the medium of the Federal Government. If it was not for that we should not have made war for the Union. If any man could have assured the Senate and House of Representatives in 1861 that there was no strength in the Union, that there was no convenience in the Union, we should not have gone to war. I would not give you anything to live under the same Government with a man in Florida if I was not to be the stronger for it or to save expense by it.

Now, for the corollary: I ask you, I ask all Senators, what will be the effect of this bill upon the strength of the Union? Is any man so mad as to believe that a Union will be strengthened by making one third of the people bitterly hostile and antagonistic to the remainder? If these ten States were put under military despotism by us, of course they will be hostile and inimical to us; and if we should come in contact with a foreign Power under such circumstances, they will diminish our power just in proportion to their weight in the scale in comparison with us. Instead of making the Union strong, a military despotism will make it weak. If we have twenty million inhabitants and these ten States have ten millions, and we hold them by a military despotism, then we have ten millions of our force checkmated by them in the event of a quarrel with a foreign Power. It would have been better if we had let them go entirely, as in that event we would have the force it takes to hold them free to be used in our defense when needed. Hence I venture the assertion that we lose every advantage which we derive from the establishment of the Constitution of the United States of America, and which we have been in the habit of expressing by the single term "Union," the instant this bill becomes a law and is carried into effect.

Then, Mr. President, what is the difficulty about restoring the Union? What is the difficulty of restoring it just as it was, and according to its original frame? The most that any human being can make of it, any unprejudiced individual, is this: that there will be twenty Senators coming into this Chamber from the South. Surely gentlemen are not afraid of them because they have been what they call rebels. At least I see people that were in the rebellion, and in it pretty strongly, circulating around among gentlemen here without any apprehension seemingly on their part; and I should think that if they had any apprehension, there is a remedy, but not such a one as they prefer. But suppose twenty southern Senators should come in here, what then? That would not change the Radical majority; they would have a majority still, and a good working majority, and I would say a far safer majority, a hundred times over, for a party, than the majority it has now; but you could not pass bills over the veto. Suppose you could not, what of it? That would be but a healthy, normal working of your institutions. Obstructions, and among them the veto, have been put up as barriers to prevent people, when they get crazy, from doing such extraordinary mad things as we saw done by these revolutionists.

Suppose you could not pass a law at all, have you not enough? We got along very well with what we had up to 1860 or 1861; and I think wisdom would have dictated that no new law should have been put upon the statute-book which excites these angry discussions, and which arouse these feelings of partisanship to such an extent as to endanger the very Government itself. Hence, when these difficulties occur, is it not of the greatest importance, of the most vital moment, that some hand shall stay faction till the time for the sober second thought of the people comes? You are not afraid that by the addition of twenty men to the minority here you would be beaten, that they would do any mischief. You do not fear that; you cannot fear it. All this hue and cry about restoring them to the rule of the country is mere badinage to catch the partisan ear of the stupid, who will not look further in to see whether it be true or not. Twenty Senators here might keep you from doing mischief; but twenty additional Senators here could not do mischief if you were true to your duty. Fifty members more in the other House might keep that House from doing mischief, in conjunction with the President; but they could not do mischief, and they could not, even joining themselves with the Democrats, be able to do any conceivable mischief. And yet you will not allow these States to be represented. Why not? You would take from men the highest and holiest of their rights, whether guilty or innocent, and say no matter. Sir, even the hand of the barbarian was stayed by, "Strike, but hear." You strike, but you will not hear.

SPEECH OF HON. G. F. MILLER,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 13, 1867,

On the bill (H. R. No. 1143) to provide for the more efficient government of the insurrectionary States.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, the bill under consideration is one of grave importance and has been attacked with great severity. It contains five sections. The first divides the ten late insurrectionary States, to wit, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Mississippi, Alabama, Louisiana, Florida, Texas, and Arkansas, into five military districts, to be subject to military authority—Virginia to constitute the first, North and South Carolina the second, Georgia, Alabama, and Florida the third, Mississippi and Arkansas the fourth, and Louisiana and Texas the fifth district. The second section designates what officers shall be assigned to the command of the districts. The third section provides:

That it shall be the duty of each officer assigned as aforesaid to protect all persons in the rights of person and property, to suppress insurrection, disorder, and violence, and to punish, or cause to be punished, all disturbers of the public peace and criminals, and to this end he may allow local civil tribunals to take jurisdiction of and to try offenders, or when in his judgment it may be necessary for the trial of offenders, he shall have power to organize military commissions or tribunals for that purpose, anything in the constitution and laws of the so-called States to the contrary notwithstanding; and all legislative or judicial proceedings, or process to prevent or control the proceedings of said military tribunals, and all interference by said pretended State governments with the exercise of military authority under this act, shall be void and of no effect.

The fourth section provides when and in what manner writs of habeas corpus may issue, and the fifth and last section provides—

That no sentence of any military commission or tribunal hereby authorized, affecting the life or liberty of any person, shall be executed until it is approved by the officer in command of the district, and laws and regulations for the government of the Army shall not be affected by this act, except so far as they conflict with its provisions.

The main argument urged against the passage of this bill is that the proposed law is unconstitutional—that the said ten late rebellious States have organized governments, and therefore no power exists in Congress to extend over them martial law to take the place of the civil law. I admit, Mr. Speaker, that this extraordinary power should only be exercised in extreme cases. It is, however, a universal rule among all civilized nations that, when the civil law is not strong enough to afford ample protection, the more powerful, to wit, that of martial, must be resorted to, and it is evident that these ten States present a case demanding such extreme measures. The civil governments of which we hear so much were not established by the action of Congress, but under the auspices of Andrew Johnson, the present Executive, without any authority delegated to him for that purpose. These pretended governments do not afford adequate protection to the persons and property of the loyal people resident therein, hence the necessity of a more stringent procedure. Is there anything in the Constitution of the United States, adopted by the Convention on the 17th of September, 1787, and ratified in 1789, vesting in the Executive alone the establishment of governments in these States? In that instrument it is declared—"That the Constitution and the laws of the United States, which shall be made in pursuance thereof, shall be the supreme law of the land; and that the judges of every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding."

Who, then, can make the laws? Not the Executive, as he possesses only the power to give or withhold his assent when bills are presented to him. The answer is indicated by the Constitution, and that is, it rests with Congress to pass laws, and if the Executive interpose the veto power, such bills can, notwithstanding such veto, become laws if the same shall be passed by a two-third vote in each House; thus showing clearly that the Executive alone had no power under the Constitution to undertake to reconstruct these ten rebel States by establishing civil governments therein, and his acts in that matter were usurpation.

Then the question recurs, have Congress under the Constitution power to pass the bill under consideration? The fourth section of said Constitution provides that—"The United States shall guaranty to every State in the Union a republican form of government."

This injunction vests in Congress plenary power to use all measures necessary to accomplish such a result. These ten States are in a peculiar position. Having rebelled against the Government of which they are a part and attempted to set up one independent to that of the United States, they by that act suspended their operation as State governments, and are amenable to the General Government, which they attempted to destroy, for their conduct; and it is incumbent upon the United States to secure to the citizens of those States a republican form of government. But as it is evident from the disposition manifested by the majority of those residing therein that they are not in a proper mood to be governed by the civil laws, hence the necessity of employing for the present more powerful means.

It is said, Mr. Speaker, that if they are to be considered as States then we have no power to extend over them in time of peace martial law. In answer to that I have to say that although the open rebellion in arms has been subdued, still the people therein who participated in the rebellion yet show in their actions a rebellious spirit, and it must be borne in mind that the Constitution expressly declares that to "every State" a republican form of government shall be guaranteed, showing evidently that the patriots who framed that instrument contemplated that a contingency might arise that would require the exercise of extraordinary power. In order to sustain this bill on constitutional grounds it is not necessary to argue the doctrine promulgated by some, that in consequence of the rebellion these States must be considered as territories or conquered provinces. Sir, I hold to no such theory. They are States, and called such by the Constitution; but, as I have said, by rebelling they have suspended their governmental organization, and in order to enable them to stand in proper position with the States that remained loyal they must submit to such regulations as Congress may prescribe.

This bill is not intended as a permanent arrangement, but only to secure the rights of all persons residing in those States until a civil government can be organized upon the basis of a republican form, which will be as soon as a loyal spirit is manifested by those who were in rebellion. If, as contended for by some, Congress possessed no power to extend such laws over the late insurrectionary States, then the nation would be unable to maintain its nationality, or, as asserted by a high official under the administration of James Buchanan, though no authority exists in the Constitution for a State to secede, but in case an attempt was made there was no power to coerce. I am happy to say that such infamous doctrine is not taught by the Constitution nor sustained by any precedents, and no true loyal citizen ever did, and I trust never will, maintain such an absurd idea. Then, Mr. Speaker, as to the necessity and constitutionality of the bill under consideration I upon mature deliberation have no doubt; and its provisions, if faithfully carried out, will surely hasten the restoration of those States to full political rights, so as to give them a representation in Congress, and on this point I will add that this bill, or a similar one, is asked for by the loyal citizens resident therein.

I am somewhat surprised, Mr. Speaker, at the arguments of some of the gentlemen on this side of the House. The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] finds fault because the bill does not provide a mode of restoration. Whether an amendment of that kind may be offered in the Senate I of course cannot say; that, however, is a subsequent consideration, but suffice it to say that stern justice demands speedy action in order to afford adequate protection, and there is no time to cavil; let us do one thing at a time. This bill has been agreed upon by the Reconstruction Committee, composed of members from each House. If, as the gentleman seems to fear, the President does not appoint competent officers and fully carry out the provisions of the bill, he will be amenable to the nation, and I have no doubt will be dealt with by Congress as justice may demand; nor do I see what the disposition made by Alexander the Great when he conquered a Province, of which the gentleman spoke, has to do with these rebellious States. The loyal people, I have no doubt, will take care of the Government. The honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVIS] also interposes objections to the bill, and one remark made by him I must confess struck me with astonishment. After speaking of supposed sincerity of rebels, he said:

"St. Paul was sincere and conscientious when he persecuted the saints, and Lee I doubt not was sincere when he cast his lot with the confederacy, and attempted the overthrow of the Government."

Though the Apostle Paul when he persecuted the saints, owing to his training in strict conformity to the sect to which he was attached prior to his conversion, may have thought he was doing God's service, is that any apology or palliation for Lee when he turned traitor against his country? He was educated in the military school of the United States and instructed in all the arts of war, and, being aid to General Scott, he became acquainted with all the plans of our Government to suppress rebellion, and being thus indebted to the United States for his education and information so as to give him superior military skill, he turned against his country, joined the rebellion, and used all the training and information imparted to him by the Government he had sworn to maintain, to destroy this Republic; and he caused to be slain thousands upon thousands of loyal soldiers, and the land to be filled with widows and orphans. Sir, ought a man of that kind be eulogized? No punishment is too severe for him, and it is a disgrace to the nation that he should escape condign punishment. There is no excuse or palliation for his conduct, and I look upon his crime as infamous, and such as ought not permit him to enjoy the blessings of this Republic; and it would have been a credit to the nation if such leading rebels had been disposed of by military commission.

It is useless, Mr. Speaker, to undertake to answer the arguments of the gentlemen on the Democratic side of this House, as they all oppose any reconstruction, but favor the admission of Representatives from those ten insurrectionary States without any guaranty whatever for their future conduct, and desire that they should retain their present pretended State governments, for which they claim to have the sanction of Andrew Johnson, the President of the United States. This, sir, never will be allowed as long as we have a loyal Congress who stand up for a safe and secure Government. I trust this bill will pass without any further delay, so that the people in those States may have adequate security for their persons and property, and the disloyal element be kept in subjection.

SPEECH OF HON. E. DUMONT, OF INDIANA,IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 16, 1867.

The House having under consideration the President's annual message.

Mr. DUMONT said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I ask the Clerk to read the paragraph I have sent up to his desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

"A hotel keeper in Washington posted on his dining-room door the following notice: 'Members of Congress will go to the table first, and then the gentlemen. Rowdies and blackguards must not mix with the Congressmen, as it is hard to tell one from the other.' [Laughter.]"

Mr. DUMONT. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the paragraph just read has much application to the remarks I shall beg leave to submit, but seeing that some of the members are a little drowsy, and fearing that no remarks of mine would disturb their slumbers, I thought I might, perhaps, accomplish the object by bringing to their attention this brutal assault on their own reputations. I do not wish to move in the matter myself, being young and inexperienced, but would suggest the raising of a committee to find out the name of the assassin, and have him dealt with for his impertinence and vulgarity.

What I propose to speak about for a brief period is the decision of the Supreme Court recently made in the Garland case, to the effect that the act of Congress requiring attorneys-at-law to take what is familiarly called the iron-clad oath is unconstitutional and void, and cannot be enforced; and that the applicant Garland, an acknowledged traitor, cannot be required to take it nor excluded from the bar for refusing to do so.

The decision was not unanimous; it was made by a mere majority of one of the court, five on the one side and four on the other, and does not carry the moral force of a decision made with unanimity. If it is not so the decision of a mob might command respect, because a mob has heads enough, as Franklin said, but no brains.

It may be that what I may say may not have much influence with the court, and may not move those who hear me; but as has been well said by a sensible author, the true and philosophical speech-maker in Congress addresses a greater and a grander auditory than that which surrounds and hears him. He speaks to hearers in farm-houses, in hamlets, and in cities. He directs his voice to dwellers in granite hills, fertile plains, and golden valleys. He addresses an audience not so fixed in error nor so firmly grounded in the truth that they cannot be moved if sufficient motive is presented. He strives to move those by whose movements the earth is shaken, and before whose breath judges, rulers, and politicians fly as chaff before the wind.

As I shall want to introduce the oath required by act of Congress into my speech, this would seem to be an appropriate place to do so. It is set forth in the opinion of Judge Field, of the majority of the court. As I would do no injustice I prefer to use his own statement of the case. He states it thus:

"On the 2d of July, 1862, Congress passed an act prescribing an oath to be taken by every person elected or appointed to any office of honor or profit under the Government of the United States, either in the civil, military, or naval departments of the public service, except the President of the United States, before entering upon the duties of his office, and before being entitled to its salary or other emoluments. On the 24th of January, 1865, Congress passed a supplementary act extending its provisions so as to embrace attorneys and counselors of the courts of the United States, which provides that after its passage no person shall be admitted as an attorney or counselor to the bar of the Supreme Court, and after the 4th of March, 1865, to the bar of any circuit or district court of the United States, or of the Court of Claims, or be allowed to appear and be heard by virtue of any previous admission or any special power of attorney, unless he shall have first taken and subscribed the oath prescribed in the act of July 2, 1862. The act also provides that the oath shall be preserved among the files of the court; and if any person take it falsely he shall be guilty of perjury, and upon conviction shall be subject to the pains and penalties of that offense.

"At the December term of 1860, the petitioner was admitted as an attorney and counselor of this court, and took and subscribed the oath then required. By the second rule, as it then existed, it was only requisite to the admission of attorneys and counselors of this court that they should have been such officers for the three previous years in the highest courts of the States to which they respectively belonged, and that their private and professional character should appear to be fair. In March, 1865, this rule was changed by the addition of a clause requiring the administration of the oath in conformity with the act of Congress.

"In May, 1861, the State of Arkansas, of which the petitioner was a citizen, passed an ordinance of secession which purported to withdraw the State from the Union, and afterward in the same year, by another ordinance, attached herself to the so-called confederate States, and by act of the congress of that confederacy she was received as one of its members. The petitioner followed the State and was one of her representatives, first in the lower house, and afterward in the senate of the congress of that confederacy, and was a member of the senate at the time of the surrender of the confederate forces to the Armies of the United States.

"In July, 1865, he received from the President of the United States a full pardon for all offenses committed by him by participation, direct or implied, in the rebellion. He now produces this pardon, and asks permission to continue to practice as an attorney and counselor of the court, without taking the oath required by the act of January 24, 1865, and the rule of this court, which he is unable to take by reason of the offices he held under the confederate government.

"He rests his application principally upon two grounds: first, that the act of January 24, 1865, so far as it affects his status in the court, is unconstitutional and void; secondly, that if the act be constitutional he is released from compliance with its provisions by the pardon of the President. The oath prescribed by the act is as follows: 1. That the deponent has never voluntarily borne arms against the United States since he has been a citizen thereof. 2. That he has not voluntarily given aid, countenance, counsel, or encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility thereto. 3. That he has never sought, accepted, or attempted to exercise the functions of any office whatsoever under any authority or pretended authority in hostility to the United States. 4. That he has not yielded a voluntary support to any pretended government, authority, power, or constitution within the United States hostile or inimical thereto. 5. That he will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic, and will bear true faith and allegiance to the same."

I listened the other day with a great deal of interest to the discussion that took place at the time the Louisiana reconstruction bill was brought up, although it was not entirely confined to the consideration of this bill. I noticed, for instance, the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. HARDING.] He had manifestly been reflecting more on another branch of the argument, and while considering the matter under consideration, spoke to that to some extent. I saw no impropriety in it; none, inasmuch as many measures may at the same time be pending before this House; and if a member speaks pertinently to any one of them he will do a great deal better than I fear I may be able to do to-night. I will simply do as well as I can, and trust to Providence for the rest.

Much interest is manifested now in the country in regard to the decisions of the Supreme Court, in the "iron-clad-oath" case, as it is called. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HARDING] adverted to the fact that we had introduced a bill for the purpose of heading off the Supreme Court, as he seemed to fancy; and he appeared to be somewhat indignant, exceedingly hurt, in regard to it. We were treading upon forbidden ground; it was a sign of the degeneracy of the age; we had no longer any respect for our high judicial tribunals. I do not pretend to give his exact language, but that was the strain of his remarks. Now, if we are to believe it wicked to call in question the decision of a court, that wickedness is one of which very many are guilty. Lawyers are neither better nor worse than other men, and yet that is the stuff whereof judges that we may not criticize are made. Out of a fallible lawyer it were unreasonable to expect an infallible judge, since this is not the day of miracles. An old shop-keeper said that he might make a mistake on his blotter and charge a customer with an item not sold, but if it was on his "legister," as he called it, it was bound to be right and couldn't be up-tripped. So one may possess no very extraordinary qualities as a lawyer at the bar, but transfer him to the bench and he becomes at once an immaculate conception; then it is, so to speak that he is transferred from the blotter to the "legister," and it becomes blasphemous in the last degree to doubt his infallibility.

In this country, where we believe not in the divine right of kings any more than we do in the divine right of constables, nor in the ruling by the grace of God, and do not hold that one class is born booted and spurred, it is folly to talk of infallibility of courts or judges. By old Shylock's test, after all, they are but men:

"Hath not a Jew eyes? hath not a Jew hands, organs, dimensions, senses, affections, passions? fed with the same food, hurt with the same weapons, subject to the same diseases, healed by the same means, warmed and cooled by the same winter and summer, as a Christian is? If you prick us, do we not bleed? if you tickle us, do we not laugh? if you poison us, do we not die? and if you wrong us shall we not revenge?"

We are told now to believe it treason to call in question the decision of a court, the opinion of a judge; that to do so is as blasphemous as to doubt the divinity of Christ or the truth of God's word. We must believe that a judge is shielded by something of that divinity which hedges in a king. Listen to the strains of the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. HARDING,] always compact, pointed, vigorous, and perverse, as he reflects upon our doom, on account of this great wickedness. I read from his speech delivered upon this floor a few days ago:

"The other prediction I wish to recall is that of another great man, from a different section of the country, and, as I have said, great in a very different way—a man who loved his country above all things else, a man who looked into the future with almost the vision of a prophet—Daniel Webster. He is reported to have exclaimed on one occasion:

"Let these infernal fanatics get control of the Government and they will treat the decisions of the Supreme Court with contempt; they will make laws to suit themselves; they will lay violent hands on all who oppose them; they will bankrupt the country, and finally deluge it with blood."

Now look at what has been done. That very party obtained control of the Government. There has been war; that war is over, but the Union is not restored; and at this very moment the public debt, mountain high, is casting its deadly and blighting shadow of bankruptcy over the whole country. We are literally bankrupts to-day; and generations to come must be ground to the earth under the crushing weight of this monstrous debt. Has not the land been deluged in blood, been literally reddened all over with the blood of half a million men?

"And last, has not the Supreme Court been treated with contempt here in this very Hall? Yes, sir, we have seen here the attempt to bring into ridicule and contempt the last refuge of liberty for the oppressed. The only hope that now lights up the darkness of the horizon is that court; and that court has been rudely assailed here in this Hall, and why? Because it proclaimed a truth known to every lawyer who has read at all. That truth was that a military commission taking charge of a citizen not connected with the Army or the Navy, and trying and executing him, is guilty of murder." That is the whole of it. And I aver now that whenever a civilian not connected with the Army or the Navy is tried by a military commission, sentenced and executed; that is an act of cold-blooded murder; and there is not a lawyer in the United States who can frame even a plausible defense for such an act. And for declaring that truth the Supreme Court of the United States has been assailed and everywhere treated with contempt. And now, right in the face of that decision of the highest judicial tribunal of this country, it is proposed to renege and sanction these bloody military commissions."

"How long do you suppose there will be any respect felt for republican government in any part of the country? When the Supreme Court of the United States and the Chief Executive of the nation are denounced, when both are ridiculed and brought into contempt, when one third of our whole territory is surrendered up and passes into the hands of a bloody despotism, how long will the people revere the Constitution? How long will these military men in the South be satisfied with this power, with absolute and supreme power over one third of the Union? Does any man suppose they will be content with that? How long will it be before that despotism will extend and enlarge itself until it covers the whole Union?"

"Mr. Speaker, those military men who receive these appointments, who are to be intrusted with this absolute power of life and death over loyal and disloyal, must of necessity have the spirit of tyrants. It is utterly impossible it can be otherwise. No matter what is intended, such is the result. You are going to place absolute power in the hands of the worst men to be found in the United States. There is no true patriot, no friend of his country, who will ever aid in subverting and destroying its liberty. In other words, there is no man who will consent to do the work of a tyrant who is not a traitor and a tyrant himself. I say it boldly, whenever you pass this bill, any man—who do not care what his fame may have been before—who accepts an office like this of absolute power of life and death over one third of the whole country, must necessarily be a tyrant and traitor."

Mr. GRINNELL. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield to me for a moment?

Mr. DUMONT. Yes.

Mr. GRINNELL. I would inquire of the gentleman if he is aware that this assertion, so often repeated upon this floor, that Daniel Webster predicted that the abolitionists would get possession of the Government, ruin it, &c., was one which he never made? It is not to be found in any authorized edition of his works and speeches. And I am ready to offer a large premium to any one who will find it in any authenticated edition of his works.

Mr. DUMONT. I do not say whether Daniel Webster uttered that sentiment or not; I am not sufficiently familiar with his writings, and I confess I have not made any investigation to assure myself. It occurred to me, however, when I heard it, although the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HARDING] would not have introduced the statement unless he believed it to be true and genuine, that it was in conflict with the whole tenor of the life of Daniel Webster, and a kind of libel upon his memory. That it is not found in any authorized editions of his works I do not think conclusive, because his friends, those who revere his memory, might have suppressed it as a blot upon his reputation, a spot upon the sun, a stain upon a stainless name. I thank the gentleman from Iowa for bringing the matter to public attention, for if it is not authentic, of which the gentleman is likely to be well informed, it is time it was known.

Now, the gentleman from Kentucky undertook to lecture the member from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] for some expressions made by him that he fancied did not comport with the forgiving precepts of the New Testament; and hearing him I was sure he himself would go through his own speech guiltless in that regard. One of the Apostles of our blessed Saviour said, "We know that we have passed from death unto life because we love the brethren." As I listened to the gentleman's scornful words—I mean the honorable gentleman from Kentucky—I was led to fear that he had not himself passed through any such blessed transition. He seemed to love the Supreme Court powerfully, but his love for the soldier was not boisterous, kind of latent, did not crop out much. I fancied that in his words there was more scorn than love, more venom than gratitude; still he seemed to be sincere in what he said and to speak in more sorrow than anger, and I am sure I would not wantonly add to his grief.

"Oh! who a bleeding heart would sting?
For sorrow is a sacred thing."

We must not fall out nor speak as though we had drank at the fountains of bitterness, lest we give color to what was once said—but that was in days of other years when plantation manners were the standard of excellence—that Congress was a collection of small men engaged in the business of shaking their fists in each other's faces.

But how long has it been since it came to pass that courts might not be criticised in just, temperate, truthful, and respectful language? It was not always so. On the contrary, Jefferson and Jackson and Benton and Wright and Douglas and a host of other honorable names who lived in the best days of the Republic, when Democrat meant democracy, did not lift up their hands in horror if that thing was done. Not a bit of it; but on the contrary, they put no padlock upon their mouths and submitted to no such slavish rule as the gentleman from Kentucky might seem to favor, when they deemed it proper and necessary to speak. There may be times when the very stones would speak if man became so base a slave as to fail to do it.

Why, Jefferson, the great Democratic apostle, not only deemed it right and proper to criticize, but went so far as to doubt the binding force of their adjudications, and to intimate that if their judicial legislation and usurpations were not checked they would sap the very foundations of civil liberty. His own golden utterances are better than my poor words. I ask gentlemen to hear the language of the departed sage; it may allay apprehensions and tend to soothe and tranquilize. He is the self-same Thomas Jefferson who said, referring to the villainy of slavery: "I tremble for my country when I reflect that God is just and that His justice will not sleep forever."

Jefferson to Mr. Jarves, September 28, 1820.

"You seem to consider the judges as the ultimate arbiters of all constitutional questions—a very dangerous doctrine indeed, and one which would place us under the despotism of an oligarchy. Our judges are as honest as other men, and not more so. They have, with others, the same passions for party, for power, and the privileges of their corps. Their maxim is bons judicis est ampliare jurisdictionem, and their power the more dangerous, as they are in office for life, and not responsible, as the other functionaries are, to the elective control. The Constitution has elected no such single tribunal knowing that to whatever hands confided, with the corruptions of time and party, its members would become despots."

Jefferson to Mr. Hammond, August, 1821.

"It has long been my opinion that the germ of dissolution of our Federal Government is in the constitution of the Federal judiciary—an irresponsible body, (for impeachment is scarcely a scarecrow,) working like gravity by night and by day, gaining a little today and a little more to-morrow, and advancing its noiseless step like a thief over the field of jurisdiction until all shall be usurped from the States and the Government consolidated into one."

Jefferson to Edward Livingston, March 25, 1823.

"One single object, if your provision attains it, will entitle you to the endless gratitude of society—that of restraining judges from usurping legislation; and with no body of men is this restraint more wanting than with the judges of what is commonly called our General Government, but what I call our foreign department. They are practicing on the Constitution by inferences, analogies, and sophisms, as they would an ordinary law. They imagine they can lead us to a consolidated Government, while their road leads directly to a dissolution. This member of the Government was at first considered as the most harmless and helpless of all its organs; but it has proved the power of declaring what the law is ad libitum; by sapping and mining, slyly and without alarm, the foundations of the Constitution, can do what open force would dare to attempt."

39TH CONG....2D SESS.

General Jackson, too, had the presumption to believe that there were some questions with the solution of which the Supreme Court have nothing to do, and upon which their adjudications have no binding force and entitled to no consideration. Pursuant to which infidel opinion the stalwart old soldier vetoed the bill rechartering the United States Bank on the ground that it was unconstitutional, though the contrary had been held repeatedly by that court, Chief Justice Marshall himself on the bench. And it is but recurring to history to say that on appeal to the people he was most triumphantly sustained. Referring to the allegation of the friends of the bill that the constitutionality had been settled by the court, he said:

"It is maintained by the advocates of the bank that its constitutionality in all its features ought to be considered as settled by precedent and by the decision of the Supreme Court. To this conclusion I cannot assent. Mere precedent is a dangerous source of authority, and should not be regarded as deciding questions of constitutional power except when the acquiescence of the people and the States can be considered as well settled. If the opinion of the Supreme Court covered the whole ground of this act it ought not to control the coördinate authority of this Government. The Congress, the Executive, and the court must each for itself be guided by its own opinion of the Constitution. Each public officer who takes an oath to support the Constitution swears that he will support it as he understands it, and not as it is understood by others. It is as much the duty of the House of Representatives and of the Senate and of the President to decide upon the constitutionality of any bill or resolution which may be presented to them for passage or approval as it is of the supreme judges when it may be brought before them for judicial decision. The opinion of the judges has no more authority over Congress than the opinion of Congress has over the judges, and on that point the President is independent of both. The authority of the Supreme Court must not, therefore, be permitted to control the Congress in their legislative capacities, but to have only such influence as the force of their reasoning may determine."—Veto Message, July 10, 1832.

The decision of the Supreme Court in what is called the Indiana case is, in my humble opinion, not so wrong as this, for I hold there may be degrees of error. And yet what does Mr. Stanton, the Secretary of War, say of that decision? Does he lay down in the dust simply because it was made, or say, like a man, "it is wrong?"

"My opinion of the law is that all such cases are properly cognizable by military tribunals. I believe that those persons were properly convicted, and that Milligan was also properly convicted. I think that the true exposition of the law of this country, and of every other civilized country of the globe, justifies me in saying that trials, convictions, and sentences by military tribunals were perfectly legal. I do not think that the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Milligan was justified by any principle of law recognized by any civil Government on the earth. I think it is wholly inconsistent with the protection of persons in the military service, or with the preservation of peace and safety in any of the States in insurrection. Whether this view of the law be correct, or how it can be enforced, if correct, is properly a subject for legislative wisdom, and one on which I cannot make any suggestion."

There was a time when the name of Jackson would stand against the world. Whether he is in good standing in the present Democratic church, or whether there is any one so infernal mean as to do him reverence, I do not know. I rather think not. He, unlike poor, miserable, old Buchanan, had no difficulty in finding a law to put down treason and for hanging traitors, both of which are now counter to the Democratic gospel; and he was not ashamed to speak kindly of a downtrodden race, who had fought bravely at his side, and to call them "fellow-citizens," which no member in good standing in the Democratic church of the present day would dare to do. I simply introduce his testimony on a question of some interest for what it may be worth, and will say not a single word as to the credibility of the witness or the weight due to his evidence. God forbid! He needs not my poor indorsement. Enshrined as he is in the hearts of the nation, the American people would ill brook a word from me that would look like an attempt to corroborate; still I do not flatter myself that the testimony of Jefferson and Jackson will be regarded as respectable by gentlemen who were neutral when war was flagrant and the nation's life at stake, and who are now conservatives. I rather bring these things forward in their presence and hearing as the lawyer did Blackstone, who undertook to read a passage from that book to the court as applicable to the case under consideration. The court ruled the book out, assigning as a reason that it was a British book and not law in this country. The attorney, however, insisted on reading it, not as the law, but that the court might see what an old simpleton and block-head Blackstone was.

The gentleman must bear in mind that this is a political question from which this court might have kept aloof, and left it where Congress had left it, but they preferred to enter the turbid pool of party strife, and it required no gift of divination to know that their opinion upon a purely political question would be subject to rigid scrutiny, and that it must stand, if stand at all, on its strength, and not on forbearance. The pitiful begging for quarter now is a confession that it cannot stand the test. How could the court have kept aloof? Simply by attending to its own business—I speak respectfully—and not seeking to invade the province of Congress. It was not for the Supreme Court to attempt to relieve by judicial legislation the rebels from the consequences of their rebellion, nor to construe men guiltless that the whole world knew to be guilty as sin; that was perverting the province of construing to purposes never intended by those who provided for the organization of the court.

It is absurd to think of a court undertaking to settle the status of the conquered. It belongs to the people of the nation who achieved the victory, and woe be to any court that shall attempt to wrench it out of their hands. It illy becomes those withdrawn by their duties from the field of strife to rush so frantically upon the field of battle after the victory is won and demand the right to settle the terms of surrender and construe "everything beautiful and lovely and nobody to blame." The nation will beg to be excused from accepting the proffer of such sublime benevolence, and the people will decide for themselves when the dread point of danger is passed; they, through their representatives in Congress, will decide when the war is over and when the rebellion is fully put down. In the second volume of Rutherford's Institutes it is said that when an effort is made to destroy a nation, and that effort has been overthrown, there is not necessarily a termination of the struggle, but that it then devolves upon society to ascertain what precautionary measures may be taken to guard the nation in the future, and to secure its tranquility, and that is the true theory of political science, of human government.

It is but due to courts and judges to say that these claims to infallibility are not made so much by courts and judges themselves as by partisans, who cry out as naturally as cream rises to the top of a bowl of milk, "a second Daniel come to judgment," whenever a decision happens to be made that seems to have a political aspect or capable of being perverted to party account—a trick of the trade, of which one party is guilty about as often as the other. The Democratic admiration for the Supreme Court is of comparative modern date. We heard not much of it until the Dred Scott decision, to cover the enormity of which were as easy as to kindle a conflagration in the bosom of the sea. It was not until this decision was manufactured to order that Democratic admiration culminated; not until it was thought that it could be made an engine of oppression, of grinding to powder a poor, helpless, imploring, downtrodden race, and cursing with the blight of slavery every foot of soil that before that day had been consecrated to freedom. And when in the recent Indiana case the court felt itself called upon to turn men loose who were worthy of a halter, and in the Garland application for admission to practice law, decided that perjury was no crime and did not affect or in the slightest degree soil a man's moral character—that is the decision, stripped of all circumlocution and redundant words—the deep notes of the Democratic slogan, reverberating as it did amid the Scottish hills, were again heard calling the faithful together to rejoice. Never, until it was feared by all good loyal men that there was about to be a general jail delivery of assassins and scoundrels, did the Democratic heart so overflow. Then, indeed, was their cup of bliss, like Tam O'Shanter's, full and sparkling to the brim:

"Kings may be blest, but Tam was glorious, O'er a' the ill o' life victorious."

The Constitution will lose its power and cease to be venerated if it shall come to be understood (as it will be if these political judicial opinions continue to be made) that instead of being the palladium of liberty, the bulwark of freedom, and a terror to evil-doers, it is something behind which a criminal can skulk and hide. When in the history of this or any other land was crime held in such tender regard that a half dozen or more sections or clauses of the Constitution could be invoked to stand between the offender and the punishment due to the most flagrant crime? I know of but one parallel case of tenderness, and that is not of classic birth or historic renown, but of a domestic kind: it is the case of the kind and loving old matron who administered chloroform to her refractory son before applying the rod to his back, for fear it would hurt him; and that is the reason assigned why rebels must not be excluded from the bar, for fear it may hurt them; and that is the reason why rebels may not be required to take the oath that you and I and all of us had to take, nor excluded from the bar for refusing to take it, for fear it may hurt them. The Constitution stands between them and harm; but it did not stand between them and the soldiers of the Union, whose bones are now bleaching upon a hundred battle-fields, and who are now numbered with the sheeted nations of the dead.

The disloyal element is now loud in commendation; but this court may find out after it is everlastingly too late (everybody else knows it now) that this new-born and frantic Democratic love, like that of the bears, may squeeze its object to death. The carresses of the wicked are more to be dreaded than the serpent's deadly coil. If I should fail to cry aloud against such amazing lenity toward the bloody handed, I should not want to meet my people; I should feel like fleeing when they approached me as Adam fled when in the cool of the morning he heard the voice of the Lord God in the garden. Our people will not willingly see the fatted calf killed for the wicked men who have brought our beloved land to the verge of ruin until they bring forth fruit meet for repentance. The green graves of the heroic dead and the wail of the widow and orphan plead against it.

The American mind is athletic and inquiring, and thank God not in the slightest degree base or slavish. It will look at and inquire into the acts of all public servants, judges included, and it will not seem to be so wrong to do so, but on the contrary eminently right and proper when it is reflected that judges themselves are daily calling in question the opinions of other judges and reversing their decisions. That is their business; if it were not they would have none; Othello's occupation would be gone. More than one half perhaps I might say without being much wrong of all the decisions that go from one court to another are reversed. The reports of reversed cases are piled up mountain high, and with them the library of every lawyer groans. And if it be said that these reversed cases were but the rulings of inferior tribunals and not of courts of last resort, then I ask what becomes of that numerous class of cases overruled and doubted by the very court that decided them? We know that large volumes and tomes are crammed with such cases, and whoever will give himself the trouble to glance into such a volume will come to the conclusion that the only necessary difference between a court of last resort and one below it is not necessarily in wisdom nor learning nor independence nor integrity, but in having the last word, in the fact that the suitor is there at the end of his rope.

Two lawyers were arguing a case; one stated what he supposed to be a correct legal principle; the other replied, "That is not the law." The first rejoined, "The Supreme Court has so decided." "Then," says he of the negative, "it's the law whether it is or not."

Lawyers have their anecdotes, among them this one: that at one time there was pending before a State circuit judge sixty cases, all between the same parties and in all respects alike except in the amount of the judgments that had been rendered by the court below. They were all cases in scire facias upon judgments of an inferior court, not depending upon proof, but to be decided on demurrer upon the records. The judge was pressed with other cases and for time, and a decision was insisted on by both parties. So in his dilemma he divided the records into two piles, taking them just as they came, as you would deal a pack of cards, thirty in one pile and thirty in the other, and decided—one pile in favor of the plaintiff and the other pile in favor of the defendant. In all the cases an appeal was taken from the circuit to the supreme court of the State, and after mature consideration (of course the consideration was mature) the judgment of the circuit court was affirmed in each and all the sixty cases, and the affirming opinions were pronounced by all who read them as the perfection of human reason.

The fact that one man occupies a higher official position than another may be due as much to mere fortuitous circumstances or his arrogance and assumption as to his wisdom and virtue. These remarks are general and not of personal application, as true, I fancy, in the abstract as concrete, applicable alike to the past, the present, and the future, and would be made by me if my delight in the decision under consideration were as great as my regret. They apply no more to Federal than to State courts, no more to courts in this than in any other country. They are spoken as good doctrine, to show that a fair examination is not forbidden ground. While I would not surrender the utmost freedom of fair discussion, I would not wish to speak harshly or indecorously of the venerable men comprising the court. It is the opinion and not the court that I combat. I know, too, that it is hard argument and not hard words that wins its way to the conscience and understanding. I know, too, that injustice rebounds upon him who employs it in argument or otherwise. I know, too, that any arrow from my poor quiver not barbed with truth and justice will fall harmless. I know, too, that my ~~title~~ <sup>title</sup> to speak, if I speak with propriety, is the crowning glory of my country, which guarantees to the lowly and the humble that permission and hampers the privilege with no slavish restrictions. I desire to be moderate, temperate, and respectful, but it must be the moderation of truth and not of pusillanimity.

There is not the slightest danger to be apprehended from reasonable latitude in this respect, for though here and there there may be one who believes it dangerous to presume one possessed of wisdom or learning, religion, loyalty, or patriotism, simply because these qualities would adorn the station he occupies, yet we know that the inclination of the popular mind is the other way; they ascribe wisdom to one because he is judge, and are innocent of suspecting that he got to be judge on account of his wisdom; they suppose that the wisdom and the judgeship came together at the same instant, and are inseparable, a sort of Siamese twins. It is on account of this popular hallucination that we politicians are so prone to parade our official rosters and boast of the offices that have, from time to time, been bestowed upon us, as though that was any reason why a willing horse should be rode to death or why we should be permitted to continue to monopolize. The best minds in this or any other country belong not necessarily to politicians and pertain not necessarily to those who hold office. We have all known those who never held office, and who never dreamed themselves fit for any official station, and never held a place of honor, trust, or profit in their born days, who on comparison of attainments and cultivation and capacity would put many a windy Congressman to open shame.

In the annals of the hustings we find a good deal of Attic salt and racy passages, a good deal of rough wit, and the taking down of many an inflated boaster. In the vein to which I have alluded, one of these gentlemen was on an occasion giving free play to his rhetoric; he told his audience how much he had been honored by his fellow-citizens, enumerating the stations that had from time to time been bestowed, asserting that his highest ambition was fully satisfied, but that his heart was too full of gratitude to refuse any additional call. Among the auditors was a rough, sturdy, plain-spoken old farmer, who did not seem to be much impressed with the solemnity of the occasion nor overwhelmed with veneration for the speaker. He did not say so p'intedly, but I rather inferred it from what he did say; "You may," says he, "have held all these places; I do not doubt it; I myself know it to be true; but if you are not still an ignoramus and an ass, then God Almighty don't write a legible hand."

And yet mankind in general, and the human family in particular, are prone to ascribe to official station the qualities that adorn it. It is for this very reason that these inventories, catalogues, and schedules are so often paraded, because mankind is prone to ascribe to official station the qualities that adorn it. The individual comes under the influence of the delusion, no matter how well he may know the facts to the contrary. There is a case in point, and I will state it: out West the neighbors are friendly and aid each other all they can; they assist each other in raising their cabins, rolling their logs, &c. After the work is done they frequently kill two birds with one stone, as the phrase is, by holding an election while the voters are together. At one of these log-rolling elections an old farmer was elected a justice of the peace, and it is from him I have the story, to the effect that a number of voters, knowing that an election was to take place, brought their title-deeds along, tied up in red bandana handkerchiefs, and as soon as it was decided that he was elected he was taken out successively by these men to examine their deeds and pass his legal judgment on the goodness of their land titles. He had lived a neighbor to them for years; they had never before asked his opinion; they knew that he had never in his life-time looked within the lids of a law-book; but he was elected a justice of the peace, a judicial station, and they could not, to save the world and their own souls, resist the tendency of mankind to ascribe to official station the qualities that adorn it. Seated on a log in the wilderness, among howling wolves, he pronounced their titles good, without a flaw, and no babe ever reposed on the bosom of its mother more trustingly than they on the opinion thus pronounced. And yet the gentleman from Kentucky will talk of the danger to be apprehended from a little freedom in the examination of judicial opinions. He fears that the foundations of society are to be jarred and loosened, and that we are to drift about, without guide or compass, God knows whither; though you might as well attempt to change the laws of gravitation, or to dam up Niagara with bulrushes, as to eradicate the delusion to which I have alluded. There is another justice-of-the-peace story, if I may be pardoned for its reproduction and for the use of homely illustrations, showing that there is now and then one not laboring under the hallucination.

A constituent of my colleague, [Mr. FARQUHAR,] in whose district I once lived, was elected justice of the peace, and thereupon, believing that his was one of the few immortal names not born to die went to the clerk of the court to file his bond and be sworn into office. He exhibited his commission and said he had come to file his bond and be qualified. "Hold up your hand," responded the gruff old clerk, who, when enraged and indignant, was a little rough and profane; "I'll swear you in: all h—I can't qualify you."

Let all this stuff go; it is foreign to my purpose, and I beg pardon for being tempted into it. I must have done with it or some block-head will accuse me of an effort at satire; some one with too little understanding to see my drift. In order to decide that the conditions of the iron-clad oath could not be required of an attorney, the court felt itself called upon to argue that the office of attorney-at-law was not an office. Perhaps not; it was a wholly immaterial argument, because we know that in all past time conditions and qualifications have been affixed by legislation to the privilege to hold office and practice law indiscriminately. The right to do so has not heretofore been doubted, because these things are not rights at all, but privileges to be granted and regulated by law. The statutes are innumerable and the conditions various; as for instance, a judge must have been a licensed lawyer; to entitle a lawyer to a license he must be a man of good moral character, and in some of the States have studied law a designated period of time and pass an examination; before a candidate shall be even examined touching his qualifications to practice he shall have procured it to be certified by a court of record that he is a man of good moral character; no one but a printer shall be eligible to the office of public printer; no defaulter shall be eligible to a seat in a legislative body; one who has given or accepted a challenge to fight a duel shall not be eligible to office; any one who has fled the State or the United States to avoid the draft shall be disqualified; no one not a freeholder shall be eligible to office, and ceasing to be a freeholder shall work a forfeiture; and those who may be adjudged guilty of certain infamous crimes shall be disfranchised; and a thousand more examples, found in our statute-books. Now, it will be observed that some of these statutes are prospective and some retrospective or retroactive. They are not uniform. Some apply to offices and some to attorneys. Does it not sound strange at this late day to say that all of this legislation was right, and yet that Congress cannot say that one guilty of treason and perjury shall not be permitted to practice law?

The opinion of a court deciding a statute of Congress unconstitutional ought to be quite plain and conclusive, because it is a rule well settled that a statute cannot be declared unconstitutional unless it is so beyond a peradventure. Deference to the deliberations of the law-making power not only recommends this rule, but makes it imperative; like one charged with the commission of crime, a statute, on trial, is entitled to the benefit of all reasonable doubts. It follows that where a decision is against the validity of a statute it ought to be arrived at by reasoning the most cogent, and logic the most inexorable. While I find the dissenting opinion, in the case under consideration, to be clear as the noon-day sun, wholly unanswerable, and an honor to the minority of the court, and especially to Judge Miller, the clear-headed and right-minded judge who pronounced it, I must say in all candor that I found the majority opinion obscure and confused. It is not as it should be, the king's highway along which all can travel and none get lost. It starts out bravely enough, it is true, but there is a flagging, a wonderful letting down before we progress far. The obscurity is such that we are bewildered to know what it really means. It is like a western road which a political orator said opened stately enough with planted trees on either hand to tempt the traveler, but soon became narrow and narrower, and finally dwindled into a squirrel track and run up a tree. A jury must agree unanimously or there is no verdict. It is not so with a court composed of a plurality of judges; but who can say that the reasoning is not as strong in the one case as in the other? Chief Justice Marshall would not hear a case at all touching the validity and constitutionality of a statute, because the bench was not full, from which it may be inferred that he would not have any great veneration for a decision made by a majority of one—five on the one hand and four on the other. Where a case seems to be trembling in the balance it would almost tempt one to wish to poll the court, hoping to lure one of its members over, and then the boot would be on the other foot, the decision the other way.

The reception that this decision is to meet with may be judged somewhat by what has already transpired. Before its echoes had died out the supreme court of the District of Columbia decided, the most unkindest cut of all, that it was of no binding force, and that they would not be governed by it; and that they would protect themselves against the contamination of perjured attorneys whether the Supreme Court of the United States would or not; and even before that this House had passed the bill, over which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HARDING] seems so distressed, by which it is enacted in substance that if the oath cannot be required of attorneys under the decision because it requires a man to accuse himself, or is expurgating; or ex post facto, or for any other reason or cause, still no one guilty of the crimes enumerated in the oath, or any of them, shall be by any court of the United States admitted to practice law. In the language of Monsieur d'Alembert's eulogy of Montesquieu, If we are beholden to an aggressor for the good which he has done us without wanting to do it, we owe this court eternal thanks for having aroused the country and superinduced the passage of this statute.

Now, let us see if the gordian knot is really untied, and how we may get along without the oath. The oath I consider a good thing, for it was well remarked by the able and fearless Judge Miller of the minority of the court, that if all the lawyers and ministers of the rebel States could have held up their hands in presence of God and truthfully taken that oath there would have been no rebellion. But how can we get along without it? The lowest qualification required in any civilized land for admission to the bar is a record certificate of good moral character. Now, Mr. Attorney, you may not be required to take any oath as to what you have or have not done, still you must come into court with clean hands, and the right to require this inheres in the court without any legislation at all. An application is made to a court for admission to the bar; I oppose it on the ground that the moral character of the applicant is not good, in support of which I prove that before the rebellion he had taken an oath as an attorney to support the Constitution of the United States; that he had afterward gone into the rebellion and committed treason. I thus fix on him two infamous crimes, both felonies at common law, one punishable with death, and the other with imprisonment in the penitentiary, and thereby succeed, I rather suspect, in showing that he is not a man of very extraordinarily good moral character.

Do not let any one be alarmed with fears that I surrender the oath. God forbid. We intend to continue to cram this iron-clad oath down the throats of rebels all over this broad land; or if they cannot truthfully take it make them and their attorneys stay out in the cold, notwithstanding this bull against the comet by the Supreme Court. But if we are blockaded in that respect, as we are not, the way, bless God, is perfectly clear and unobstructed in the other direction. It is not good treatment, I would say, by the way, to the soldier to attempt to make treason respectable, for it was to put down treason and make it odious that he fought. Out of respect for the holy cause for which he fought and bled and died, he would merit better treatment if his blood were ditch water and his body only fit food for the carrion kite.

And the court will find it an up-hill business to change the meaning of words and make retroactive and ex post facto mean the same thing. For ages it has been settled that they do not mean the same thing; that the one applies to civil and the other to criminal proceedings. The Supreme Court itself has repeatedly so decided, as any one can see who will glance into the reports and can understand English. (See Watson vs. Mercer, 8 Peters, 88; Calder vs. Bull, 3 Dallas, 386; Fletcher vs. Peck, 6 Cranch, 87; Ogden vs. Slanders, 12 Wheaton, 286; Satterlee vs. Matthewson, 2 Peters, 388.) But these distinctions are to be broken down for the benefit of treason, and hereafter we must consider them as synonymous terms, whether they are or not. On this point the remarks of Cook in the argument of the Magruder case are pertinent, and I beg leave to reproduce them:

"Now, I submit to your honors that this analysis of the decision constitutes a refutation of the decision itself; and without entering upon any special definition, with which your honors are perfectly familiar, allow me to inquire what is a bill of attainder, and what is ex post facto law? Let me, if possible, present the points with more pertinency. Is the rule of this court which you are asked to abrogate or modify in any respect a bill of attainder or an ex post facto law? Carrying with you, if your honors please, your own conceptions of a bill of attainder, allow me to inquire what there is in the act that has been declared unconstitutional that is of the nature of a bill of attainder or ex post facto law. Why, it has come traveling down the pages of legal lore that an ex post facto law is confined necessarily to laws affecting 'criminal proceedings.' I use the very terms of the Supreme Court of the United States; and if that be so, then this law is simply, in one of its features, a retrospective law, imposing conditions as qualifications for office, and not an ex post facto law. By what process of logic, by what intellectual ingenuity, can that law be brought within the fixed and circumscribed sphere of ex post facto law? It attaches itself to no criminal proceedings; connects itself with no penal offense; if it does, the matured lore of my learned brother can designate the particulars in which it does. It does declare as the edict of my country, of the nation, that he who has attempted to destroy the life of my country and my Government—it does declare that he who, whether influenced by State rights or other considerations, has dared to lift up his hand in wrath against the old stars and stripes shall not administer at the altar in the temple of justice. It does that, and it stops with that declaration. It is only an outgushing of patriotism that dared not slumber in the hearts of the legislators of the land, and that leaped forth and flung itself in the form of the law upon the statute-books; and it is of this that the complaint is made to-day. Is there any criminal proceeding against the gentleman who comes before your honors, and who asks for a modification of this rule? None whatever. No ex post facto law issues its thunders over him; but there is a law that I would throw around the temples of justice like flaming swords, so pure that no man who has dared disturb the tranquility of the nation shall teach its laws. It cannot, then, be maintained, if your honors please, that it is in the nature of an ex post facto law."

And we must, forsooth, learn to forget all we ever read defining bills of attainder, and consider this act of Congress a bill of attainder, and prohibited by the clause of the Constitution forbidding such laws, though it contains not a single element of such a law. A statute which designates no criminal by name, which declares no guilt, pronounces no sentence, and inflicts no punishment can in no sense be considered a bill of attainder. A bill of attainder works corruption of blood and forfeiture of estate; so that the person attainted has no inheritable blood in him and cannot transmit property to his heirs nor inherit it himself. All know that this is the most prominent and obnoxious feature of such a bill, and the very one intended to be prohibited; but where do you find any corruption of blood in this oath or in the act of Congress? It is not there and cannot be found, and we do not propose at this late day to begin to learn new definitions that attempt to overturn what has been settled for more than two hundred years. When a decision is worked out of such materials, and made the base work of an opinion, no wonder the fabric crumbles.

It seems to me to be a solecism to say that a statute imposing upon an attorney an oath of a certain form as a condition to his right to practice law is unconstitutional, if it be admitted that it would be within the province of a court to prescribe the oath and require it to be taken without any statute at all, because that would be placing the creature above the creator, and asserting the legality of an act if performed by a court without law, and the illegality of a statute that would attempt to authorize it. It is a matter of local history that the supreme court of the District of Columbia, by a rule of the court, required this oath to be taken two years before Congress legislated on the subject at all, so far as attorneys-at-law are concerned, simply under the authority authorizing them to prescribe rules for the admission of attorneys.

That such a right inheres in a court, independent of all statute, would seem to be quite clear, provided a court has a right to protect itself against the infection of the corrupt and vicious, and provided morality is not an unreasonable requirement. "Returning justice lifts aloft her scale," not in a temple where corruption is rampant and the wicked hold sway. Does it not sound passing strange to say that an attorney-at-law may be guilty of a crime that will send him to the States prison, hang him, indeed—of the blackest crime in the dark catalogue of human guilt—but you cannot exclude him from the bar for it? If it be so, while all other departments may protect themselves, a court has no protection.

"It is true the Supreme Court has seen fit by a majority to declare that this oath is unconstitutional; but conceding to that court a purity of intention equal to that of an angel on his pathway of light and love, and an opulence of intellectuality surpassing that of Bacon and Lord Coke and Story and Marshall, it is a historic fact, however, that they stand on that decision almost alone."

And with these eloquent and impassioned words of another I close.

Reconstruction.

SPEECH OF HON. E. R. V. WRIGHT,
OF NEW JERSEY,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 19, 1867,

On House bill No. 1143, known as "Sherman's military bill," creating five military districts out of the States hitherto in rebellion.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, it is with mingled feelings of surprise and regret that I have heard read from the Clerk's desk the bill under consideration. Up to the time of its presentation civil governments had been established in those States, and the process of reconstruction was in successful progress; and I indulged the hope that in a very short time all the stumbling-blocks in the way of a perfect Union would be removed, and that we might once again be a reunited and happy people. But this bill, if passed, will fall upon the land like the blight of the sirocco, and will cast terror and dismay into the heart of every patriot in the nation. This bill proposes to divide the States of Virginia, North and South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Florida, Mississippi, Arkansas, Louisiana, and Texas into five military districts, each district to be governed by an officer of the Army not below the rank of a brigadier general, to be assigned to his command by the President, and calls for a detail of a sufficient military force to enable each commanding officer to perform his duties and enforce his authority within the district to which he is assigned. These officers are to have supreme control over the persons and property of all within their respective districts; they are to have power to try offenders and to sentence and imprison for an unlimited period of time; to make confiscations of property and exercise absolute and despotic power over the people who are subjected to their authority, people who have no right of appeal to any court or reviewing tribunal in any case save one—where a person shall have been condemned to suffer the death penalty, in which case the proceedings on the trial and the sentence must be forwarded to the President for his approval.

Reconstruction—Mr. Wright.

Mr. Speaker, I am so amazed by this extraordinary proposition as to be unable fully to express my sentiments in regard to it at this time. In those States which are to be made by it the victims of military government and military injustice the rebels had long ago laid down their arms, peace existed, provisional governors had been appointed, the civil powers of the different States were in full play, the courts were open and justice was peacefully administered, everything was working regularly and harmoniously toward complete reunion, when this bill comes before us, overthrowing all the work toward restoration done in nearly two years, and proposing the creation of a body of military governors, not only unknown to the Constitution of the United States, but in direct violation of its injunctions.

And now, sir, let me ask what necessity is there for the passage of this bill, which, if it shall pass, will change substantially the whole form of our Government and present to the world the strange spectacle of more than one half of our country governed by the civil power under the Constitution, and the remainder governed by a military despotism, in contravention of the provisions of that instrument? This proposition is not only inconsistent, ridiculous, and absurd, it threatens not only to destroy the rights, liberties, and privileges of the citizen, but it threatens also to overthrow our republican form of government, and to override the organic law of the nation. If the Congress of the United States can place military governors over ten States of this Union in the absence of any constitutional right to do so, why may they not place a military governor over every other State, until at last we shall be merged into an absolute monarchy or a military despotism? The Constitution tells us that the military must always be subordinate to the civil power in time of peace? This Congress, when it deemed it needful to urge that the Constitution was in existence and required amendment, as it did some time ago upon the first amendment, demanded and secured the assistance of three of those States which it is now proposed to place under military law before that constitutional amendment could be legally approved of. For that purpose Congress recognized those States as States in the Union under the Constitution; but when they desired to be represented their representatives were refused, and they were informed that they were not States, but merely Territories.

How often has our Constitution been violated within the last five years by the party in power? It would take up the balance of my time, Mr. Speaker, to enumerate the one twentieth part of the horrible violations of law committed by that party during the rebellion; but I will cite a few instances. The suspension of the writ of habeas corpus, for example, in States not in rebellion and where the civil courts were open; the forcible invasion of private houses by pretended officers without process of law; the incarceration of citizens for months without any intimation as to the cause of their being placed in confinement, and their release without any explanation of why they were arrested or why they were discharged; unlawful seizures of property; cruel and unusual punishments, &c.; all these and many other shameful acts of violence, in direct contravention of the organic law of the land, which law, if obeyed and regarded, would have been amply sufficient to protect the rights, liberties, and privileges of the citizen, and at the same time to enforce the authority of the Government. Before this bill passes I should like to hear the gentleman having it in charge—although it comes to us in the shape of an amendment adopted by the Senate upon the motion of Senator SHERMAN—I would like to ask the gentleman who has this bill in charge to explain to me the necessity for its passage. However, my time is limited, and he will be entitled to the closing argument.

I will pass by the incorrectness of the preamble, which denies the existence of any legal State governments or any adequate protection for life or property in the States named. If it be true that those State governments are not legal, why not? Several instances occur to my mind in which, when it was necessary to use them as States possessing legal State governments, Congress demanded concessions from them as States, and held the Constitution of the United States in terrorem over their heads until their demands were complied with. But we find now that no sooner do those States yield to these demands made upon them as States than Congress, throwing aside the Constitution, proposes to deny them any legal existence as States. This measure is in harmony with the inconsistent legislation that has characterized the greater portion of the existence of this Congress.

But we are told in the preamble that no adequate protection for life or property now exists in the hitherto rebel States. Now, sir, from the information which I have received from various quarters I am clearly of the opinion that that statement is not true in point of fact. But even if it were so the difficulty could be remedied, and life and property might receive adequate protection under existing laws. With the power of the President of the United States, having control of the Army and Navy, might he not have sent, and can he not now send, without the passage of any such bill as this, any portion or if necessary the whole of the Army of the United States for the purpose of securing adequate protection to life and property? It is not my design, Mr. Speaker, to contend that adequate protection shall not be given to life, liberty, and property in that portion of the Republic, and it is not because I do not wish to see such protection secured to the people there that I oppose the passage of this bill. But, sir, I oppose it because it is based upon a principle so contrary to my sense of right in such gross violation of the great principles upon which our Republic was founded, in such plain contravention of the organic law of the land under which we have lived and prospered and grown great for nearly three quarters of a century, that I feel impelled by a sense of duty to my constituents to rise upon the floor and protest in their behalf, in the name of the Republic, and in the name of the Constitution of the United States, against this invasion and violation of that instrument and of the rights of the people of America.

Are we drifting into a revolution? Pass this bill, and my word for it it will come at no distant day. We are tending, it appears, toward a monarchical government, and the first step toward that is to put the military power unlawfully above the civil power under pretense of preserving peace and maintaining justice and securing protection to a certain portion of the people of a certain section of the country. Without the passage of this bill, as the law now stands, it is the President's sworn duty to carry out all that is contemplated by this bill, if the intention of the bill is honestly expressed in the preamble. But, sir, in my judgment, the designs of this bill are not expressed; there is a cat under the meal. This is a mad attempt to make history repeat itself. Rome, when she was in the zenith of her power, contributed by her government to the happiness and greatness of her people; but the time came when bad men were chosen to direct the ship of state, and she at last fell a martyr to the cry of "justice, protection to the citizen;" and where is she now? Controlled by such laws as this which we are now asked to enact for the southern portion of our own country, all that remains of her might be summed up in her title, the Seven-Hilled City.

If Robespierre, when he made the guillotine wreak with the blood of innocent men, some of whom were sacrificed for differing in opinion from him and his colleagues, and others for refusing to be as "progressive" as he required, (and I do not wish to institute any invidious comparisons, or I might point out those in this country who are quite as progressive as were the men of that day.) Robespierre, I say, would have been delighted to have had such a semblance of authority for his actions as is now proposed to be given to these military officers by this bill. Robespierre had no sanction of law for his crimes; but under the name of suppressing insurrection and violence, these governors who are to be appointed under this bill, may do all that Robespierre did; may violate every command in the Decalogue and escape all punishment; for there is no right conferred upon any one to try or punish them for their misdeeds. No voice of complaint may come up from the prison house after condemnation by one of these military tribunals. The weeping and wailing of the unfortunates who may be stripped of their property and dragged from their homes under the provisions of this bill can never reach the Executive Mansion or this body. The commanding general interposes an impassable barrier in the way of an appeal for a review of his decision. However illegally these generals may conduct themselves there is no provision in the Constitution which recognizes them or holds them to any responsibility, nor is there one single word, a saving-clause, in the bill itself by which they may be tried or punished for their misconduct.

Can any man in this House tell me from whence the authority is derived to pass this bill? The powers of Congress are clearly defined by the Constitution. Each branch of the Government has its rights and powers defined and limited by the Constitution; and there is not one single line or word in that hitherto sacred instrument that can possibly be cited to justify the passage of this anomalous, this dangerous, this wicked bill. Has it come to this, that the Congress of the United States is ready to substitute its own will for the authority of the Constitution, and to weaken the force of the Government by attempting to withdraw from the President his constitutional powers, and to create illegal tribunals in violation of the organic law? I understand that the original bill for which this amendment has been substituted purposed to take away from the President the right to assign these officers to their respective commands; but a little reflection induced the Senate to see that there was a limit beyond which even that body could not go without outraging the public sense as well as the organic law, and in this amendment they have kindly consented to permit the President to assign those gentlemen to the command of their respective districts. Is not the Army of the United States as competent now, if ordered down into those hitherto rebel States, to secure adequate protection to the citizen as a portion of that same Army will be when sent down under the provisions of this bill. If the Army were sent there in the former way, an officer who misbehaved himself in any way in the discharge of the duties imposed on him could be held responsible and punished under the Articles of War. But look for one moment at the inconsistency of this proposition. If this bill pass the same officers and the same men may go down there for the purposes here indicated—the suppression of disorder and violence and the protection of the lives, liberties and property of the people—and may act just as their inclinations or their caprices may direct without any responsibility whatever to any power upon the face of the earth.

What was done by Congress before I came here may perhaps be properly referred to as showing this spirit of hostility on the part of one branch of the Government to all legal restrictions and control. In the midst of the rebellion and of the excitement caused by it Congress passed laws, perhaps with somewhat indecent haste, and excused its action on the plea of a military necessity. Well, we are told that "necessity knows no law;" but that saying can hardly be applicable as a justification for this kind of legislation. Wrongs innumerable, under color of law, but without any existing law, were practiced upon citizens; and then when they came to seek redress for the violation of their rights, Congress, instead of attempting to secure to them that redress—I speak now of the peaceable and law-abiding citizens of the North whose rights were outraged by the satraps of those in power—instead of securing them that adequate protection about which they are now so solicitous, Congress passed a law in the body of which was contained the admission that these wrongs had been inflicted upon citizens of the United States, but exempting every officer engaged in committing those outrages, from the President of the United States down, from any responsibility or punishment for their crimes. But now, when peace has come and prosperity again begins to dawn upon the people of the South, the party in power proposes to rally its forces and against the complaints, against the remonstrances, against the earnest appeals of those people, to force upon them a code of government totally at variance with the oft-repeated pledge of securing to each of those States a republican form of government, and plunging them at once into a military despotism.

But, again: if the Congress of the United States may assume the power to overturn existing State governments and establish a military despotism over ten of the States of this Union, is there anything in principle that would prevent them from adding another to the catalogue of those now swayed by a military despotism until, one by one, star after star in our brilliant constellation shall be blotted out, to end in the deep, dark midnight of wrong and oppression and tyranny. Judging from the experience of the past few years one would think that the Republic only existed in name. When was it ever known before that our organic law, to gratify the insatiable ambition and lust for power by the dominant party of to-day, that the Constitution of the United States might be trampled upon and disregarded, and step by step increasing in boldness we at last come to the melancholy spectacle of finding two of the departments of the Government attempted to be shorn of their prerogatives and the undue aggrandizement of power by the legislative department. It seems to me that we are making retrograde movements and steps backward in civilization and justice. The most notable example that we have in history is that of the French Directory, where, under the malign influence of the consuls and under the government of the French Directory, because men did not move along rapidly enough to please that party of so-called progress that force was resorted to, and the guillotine reeked with the blood of those noble and patriotic men who had manliness enough to resist the tyranny that had been illegally foisted over them.

During the progress of the war outrages of every description were perpetrated upon unoffending citizens; blood was taken, lives were sacrificed by tribunals unknown to law by the satraps of the dominant party; and when upon the return of peace the unfortunate victims sought in our courts for some kind of redress, the Congress of the United States confessed the wrongs and passed a law to exonerate all who were concerned in the perpetration of these wrongs from the President to the humblest man in the land upon the simple but specious and false pretense and plea that it was done in the name of justice and on behalf of republican liberty. I have listened in vain to hear from the advocates of this bill some authority for its proposed enactment; and I cannot forbear to mention the glaring inconsistency that has marked the effort to pass this bill as well as that of much of the legislation of the same character during the Thirty-Ninth Congress. The President of the United States, the executive head of the Government, is restricted by the Constitution and the laws in the performance of his duties. His lamented predecessor had marked out a plan for the speedy restoration of the Union, and our present worthy Executive (doubtless consulted at the time) then agreed and has continued that policy up to the present time. He loves the Constitution of his country, desires to see the Union reestablished in its integrity at the earliest moment, and, if I know him, he would not go wide of the organic law even to gratify his own personal feelings, much less to favor the whims and caprices of any one, whether in or out of this body.

When Abraham Lincoln was in office did the Congress think it necessary to pass that hateful measure called the "tenure-of-office bill?" And of it I would say that it is neither more nor less than an indirect method of avoiding the Constitution of the country; so it passed for no other reason than that Congress would insist upon doing by force what the existing law would not justify, except that the President of the United States was not in accord with them. By virtue of the force of numbers the President has been unable to stay this tide of fanaticism.

And now, a few words more in respect of the provisions of this bill. The third section comes to us "sugar coated." The intent of this section is to confer absolute power upon the general in command of the division. Fearing, however, that the bill might be defeated if presented in its naked deformity, its framers introduced a provision that his high mightiness, the general, might give his gracious consent to have some of the cases examined before the local civil tribunals, which of itself means nothing; for in the concluding part of the section, which is the gist of the whole thing, when in his judgment, and I quote the law—

"It may be necessary for the trial of offenders, he shall have power to organize a military commission, or tribunals for that purpose."

Is this absolutism or not? I aver that it is anti-republican, despotic, tyrannical, and the sufferer, the victim, denied the right of appeal, can no more pass an edict of the commanding general of the district by way of appeal to higher authority, and the order, direction, and decision of such general will be as imperative and binding upon every citizen within the district as would an ukase issued by the Czar of Russia.

My word for it, Mr. Speaker, the people of the United States are unprepared for such a spectacle as this. Their universal intelligence bears with them an undeniable sense of right and justice, and this cob-house of despotism enacted for temporary purposes will be shivered to atoms at the first shock of public opinion. Sir, will not the passage of this bill be the first step in the pathway of revolution? Resistance to tyranny is the will of God, and whenever the Congress of the United States shall have become so forgetful as to lay aside the obligations of our great national bond and guiding star, the Constitution of the United States, then we are all abroad, power assumes the place of right, and tyranny usurps the place of justice.

I pray that I am mistaken in my forebodings, but I will say this class of legislation, as disclosed by this bill, is mischievous and pernicious in the last degree.

We are approaching the close of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and if time had been taken to pass over to those who are to succeed us a measure of this magnitude I am fain to believe that care, examination, and reflection would have brought them to some other conclusion than that which seems to be the disposition of the present Congress.

The great bulk of both sessions has been occupied by futile attempts at the so-called reconstruction, and on this floor, as the purposes and objects of the majority have varied, the States in rebellion have again and again been recognized as States in the Union, and excluded by this body as being territories.

Instead of the speedy return to that prosperity which is the hope of the civilized world, instead of reducing our national debt and providing such measures as would speedily secure its cancellation, we have taken up much of the time of this Congress in donating millions and millions of acres of the public domain to private corporations, and, permit me to say, in my judgment without adequate compensation and in the absence of all necessity.

Although the American people are unanimous upon this subject, we seem to be entirely insensible to the necessity of enforcing the Monroe doctrine in respect of the States that compose the southern portion of our continent; and while we have been permitting the Mexican people to work out their own salvation and drive away the foreign tyrant, with equal inconsistency we are slumbering and sleeping over the still more important fact that passive and unresistingly upon our borders we await the establishment of a kingdom.

I mention these matters incidentally, and hardly dare to insinuate that this condition of things may have been permitted as offering very little advantage to political demagogues.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that all this must soon change no matter how may be the power of that party which takes its will for law; it involves a class of legislation fleeting as a sunbeam.

I do not know that I can give you a better illustration of the estimate of the public in regard to this kind of legislation than by relating the anecdote of the Frenchman in the time of the first Napoleon. It is well known to you that the organic law of the land is the most solemn instrument that can be made and perfected by man. Napoleon sought, however, to overturn all existing laws by the creation and introduction of his code. It was given out in numbers, and to show at that moment the French people had a proper estimate of the value of such a fraud and of that description of legislation, I would say that a Frenchman called upon a bookseller to obtain the third part of the Code Napoleon. The bookseller replied indignantly, "No, sir; we do not deal in periodicals."

If this shall be the end of the unrighteous legislation of the last few years by the present party in power, the American people may be justified by the precedent in history that I have just illustrated.

The effort to put down the rebellion was no party question. The States and the people vied with each other in making that herculean and unparalleled effort that culminated in the complete overthrow of the rebellion and the consequent reintegration of the Federal Union. The vanquished fell beneath the saber stroke of patriotism, and our loved flag now floats peacefully, proudly, triumphantly over every broad acre of our loved Republic.

Since the rebellion, and upon the return of peace, it was to be hoped that all cause for strife would have ceased; the vanquished rebels readmitted to representation on just terms and conditions, and we would thus be enabled to have a speedy return to our former greatness and prosperity.

But it does seem that those hopes are destined to be disappointed. For us there is no prosperity; for the South there is to be no peace. What it will end in it does not become me to predict. I may be mistaken, but I do think when the people come to examine the various laws which have been enacted to oppress an already down-trodden, impoverished, starving, and repentant people, they will once more rally round our flag and Constitution and recover the land from misrule.

I appeal to the conservative men of this House to unite with us in averting the calamities that will befall the nation in the event of the passage of this bill. It is our bounden duty as conscientious men, both with our voices and votes, to unite in arresting any legislation that looks to the avoidance of constitutional obligations.

Pass this bill and from this day henceforward we introduce that very element that was used to crush out the patriotic efforts and smother the pleas for justice of the founders of this Republic. By united effort tyranny and oppression were banished from the land, and it was hoped forever. It is now reintroduced in the most insidious manner, and almost without a word of objection on the part of those in power. One third of this Union is henceforth to be governed by five petty military tyrants, who exercise all the power of absolute despots, and this I say without the slightest disrespect to the patriotism or ability and loyalty of the very distinguished officers who will be selected to perform so unwelcome a task.

Two forms of government—the one military and despotic and the other republican—cannot exist long without engendering a fearful antagonism, and sooner or later one or the other must go to the wall. This may not be prophecy, but if experience is to be our guide to proclaim our conviction is the dictate of wisdom.

When in a republican land like this, at a time of profound peace, you by a single act strike from the Constitution that provision of our safety which declares that the military shall be subordinate to the civil power, you sound the death-knell of the Republic. That far-seeing statesman, Daniel Webster, in language more expressive than any I can employ, gave one expression to his views upon this subject, and prophesied that whenever we undertook to invert the constitutional order of our Government and remove its safeguards by substitution, such acts would be attended with the most fatal consequences to the future existence of the Republic.

It is not my intention to occupy a moment more of the valuable time of this House than shall be necessary to put my constituents and myself right upon the record in regard to this important measure.

I had intended to discuss the fifth section of this bill, but I deem the effort futile, however iniquitous it may be, since per fas aut per nefas its arbitrary requirements are sure to be enforced either by the bayonet or the bullet.

I grieve to contemplate the anomalous character of our legislation should that bill unfortunately become a law. My prediction is that as this military juggernaut shall be set in motion and crush its helpless victims their blood will arise to Heaven to rebuke you for the wrong you will have committed. I implore you to stay your hand, to abandon this system of mischievous legislation, for although I may not live to see the end, as sure as the sun makes its diurnal round I honestly believe convulsions and turmoil and strife will pervade the land from the center to its extremest limits. Business will be destroyed, the prosperity of the country prostrated, our boasted superiority as a nation be scattered to the winds, freedom will no longer exist under the protection of law, licentiousness will assume its place, and our boasted republican liberty will become a by-word, a sneer, and a reproach.

SPEECH OF HON. N. G. TAYLOR,

OF TENNESSEE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 16, 1867.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the President's annual message—

Mr. TAYLOR, of Tennessee, said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I believe that in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union—and the debate of this evening is as if in Committee of the Whole—the largest liberty of discussion is allowed; and I shall presume upon the indulgence of the House to-night perhaps to make the remarks I shall offer of a very discursive character. There are, Mr. Chairman, many points of interest to this House and to the country at large the consideration of any one of which might well consume an hour, and far more than an hour. There is some difficulty, therefore, in selecting the most prominent points of the most important questions and confining the discussion to them.

I would like, if time would permit, to glance over the entire political field and touch upon the prominent points in the history of the country for the last six or eight years. But the limited time allowed in debate requires that I shall touch only upon those matters deemed most important; and therefore upon this occasion I shall endeavor to circumscribe as far as possible the field of remark upon which I shall enter.

The great question of the day, it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, is, how are the States now severed in their practical relations to the Federal Government to be brought back into their normal relations to the Government, and when?

We have just ended a fearful war. That war grew out of an effort of a portion of the people of eleven States of this Union to throw off the authority of the Federal Government and to establish an independent government of their own. On their part it was begun and carried on to achieve a separation and an independent nationality. On our part it was prosecuted to prevent that result: to maintain the Constitution and to preserve the integrity of the Union. Well, sir, we succeeded in accomplishing the end we set out to achieve. They failed. Their armies were crushed; their navy destroyed; and their quasi governments, State and national, were annihilated utterly. We achieved the results we designed to achieve; we prevented separation and maintained the Union.

Now, sir, no one can deny that when the war began the Federal Government had the legal and constitutional right to jurisdiction over all the revolted States, and that that right continued unimpaired in every phase of the contest, and was never impaired, at all events never by our success. This right was perfect at the beginning, in the middle, and at the end of the struggle, and has remained perfect to this hour; and upon the sole ground that these States were States of the Union, subject to its jurisdiction, owing to it obligations, and entitled to its privileges.

Now, sir, the rebellion suspended the practical relations of those States with the Government; but as it did not destroy the rights of the nation or the obligations and privileges of these States, as soon as the rebellion closed all these in legal contemplation resume their "statu quo ante bellum." And the question is now one of fact as to war or peace. As the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLEBARGER] remarked in the course of his very ingenious argument the other day it is now a question of fact as to war or peace. What is the fact as to this matter? For the treatment of these States by the Federal Government must depend upon the relations they sustain to us in this respect. What is the real status, then, of these States? Are they at war with us? Where? In what manner? Is there any rebel army now existing? Is there any rebel navy floating upon the ocean and preying upon our commerce? Is there any armed organization of rebels anywhere within the territorial limits of these United States making war upon this Government? Is there any civil organization in this country holding itself in hostility to this Government? If so, where? As I glance over our territory I see the declaration officially made by the Secretary of State of the United States that peace is restored, verified. I ask you, sir, and I ask the country, whether we are not in relations of perfect and profound peace with every State and with every part of every State that was engaged in the rebellion. Our postal relations are resumed; our revenue is collected, and the governments of these several States have acknowledged and do acknowledge the acts of secession and rebellion which they perpetrated against this Government are null and void. They acknowledge allegiance to this Government. And they wait only the action of this Government as to the terms and conditions upon which they are to be permitted to enjoy the precious right of representation in Congress, the denial of which by the dominant majority is the only remaining obstacle to complete reunion.

Now, sir, I am one of those who believe our good and lamented former President had a just conception of the relation these States bore to the General Government during the war, and that he acted upon the right theory in reference to the proper mode of restoring them to the relations broken by the war. Did Mr. Lincoln ever propound the theory that these States had ceased to be States? Did he ever hold that they had been guilty of felo de se or suicide, or that the act of war had destroyed their condition as States? If so, when? In what terms did he express such an opinion? Whenever this great leader of the Union party wrote or spoke of the rebel sections he named them States although seceded and at war with the Government of the United States.

And, sir, this was also the theory recognized by every Congress that has assembled since the opening of the war. They have not only acknowledged it in words, but in numerous acts Congress has passed. Did Congress not provide for the apportionment of these States by name? Did you not receive into the Thirty-Seventh Congress members elected from the State of Tennessee after that State had passed into a hostile league with the confederacy, assuming to retire from the Union and allying herself to the southern cause? Was Tennessee as a State dead or annihilated and her Representatives still received on this floor after her death and burial? The league was consummated, I believe, in May, 1861. The election ratifying the separation of the State from the Union and its legislative transfer to rebel jurisdiction was had in June thereafter. Thus if secession and actual rebellion ever carried out of the Union or destroyed a State Tennessee was out or destroyed on the 8th of June, 1861, when, according to Governor Harris's official proclamation, the people voted for separation by fifty-six thousand majority.

Nevertheless, although confederate soldiers were stationed all through the State, although at some points they held the polls and our voters were compelled to march under confederate bayonets and banners to the ballot-box, on the 6th of August, 1861, under these circumstances, within the confederate lines, our mountain boys marched to the polls. "Keep ing step to the music of the Union," and deposited their ballots for T. A. R. Nelson, HORACE MAYNARD, and George Bridges as the Union candidates for the national Congress. What was the result? All three were elected. All these gentlemen tried to get to Washington. Mr. Nelson was captured on the way, so also was Mr. Bridges after he had crossed the Kentucky line; but Mr. MAYNARD was fortunate enough to escape through Kentucky, and came here, not with his credentials legally made out, signed by the Governor, and sealed with the great seal of the State; no, sir, but he came with only sheriff's certificates or his own statement, stating that he had been elected. What did this body do? Did they turn him away and say this was no longer a State or was outside of the Union? No, sir, but they accepted his credentials such as they were. He was sworn in at that desk as a member of the Thirty-Seventh Congress, and served his term out. Mr. Bridges, after having been captured, and after remaining under arrest in the hands of the rebels—I do not know how long—in 1863 came here, was accepted, and received pay as a member of the Thirty-Seventh Congress.

And again, sir, did you not receive members and Senators from the State of Virginia after that State had seceded, placed herself in hostile array against the Government of the United States, and had her armies spread broadcast throughout the southern confederacy and all along the borders? Did you not go further, sir? If secession or rebellion or both destroyed the State of Virginia, or placed her outside of the Union, how happens it that after her secession and actual armed rebellion and many acts of war you solemnly accepted at the hands of a Virginia Legislature the cession of forty-six counties of her territory, which were subsequently erected into the State of West Virginia, and have been ever since represented in this House and in the Senate as a State? These are hard questions, Mr. Chairman, and honest answers will start the blush of shame and conscious condemnation on the cheeks of those who seek to justify their patent violations of the Constitution and their flagrant usurpations of power upon the plea that the rebel States are dead or out of the Union. Now, if secession and rebellion did not destroy or put out of the Union Tennessee and Virginia in the judgment of Congress, it is clear that they did not destroy nor put out of the Union the other rebel States, in the opinion of Congress, but if the facts stated prove anything they demonstrate that Congress recognized both those States, long after their secession and rebellion, as States and as in the Union, therefore Congress regarded them all as States in the Union.

The following resolution introduced into the House on the 22d of July, 1861, by the venerable patriot and statesman, John J. Crittenden, of Kentucky, and adopted with almost entire unanimity, not only solemnly declares the purposes of the war but the perpetuity of "all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States:"

"Resolved, That the present deplorable civil war has been forced upon the country by the disunionists of the southern States, now in arms against the constitutional Government, and in arms around the capital; that in this national emergency Congress, banishing all feelings of mere passion or resentment, will recollect only its duty to the whole country; that this war is not waged on their part in any spirit of oppression, or for any purpose of conquest or subjugation, or purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or established institutions of those States, but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution and to preserve the Union, with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired; and that as soon as these objects are accomplished the war ought to cease."

I might cite many other illustrations and examples to show that the Congress of the United States, upon many occasions and at sundry times, recognized them as States and so declared them. The most distinguished and able Radical members of this Congress acknowledge and proclaim in their speeches the existence and perpetuity of the lately rebel States. The executive branch and the judicial branch of the Government, all through the last and present Administrations, have sustained the same view. Many gentlemen on this floor and in the Senate have made themselves hoarse in denouncing the contumacy of the Legislatures of these States in failing to ratify the constitutional amendment proposed by this Congress, and yet maintain that the States are defunct and their Legislatures bogus.

But that is not all. When I come down here into this Congress I find, as I said, distinguished gentlemen, now not cooperating with me upon general questions, in their able arguments presenting the same fundamental idea that these southern States are and all the time have been States, and States in the Union. I was glad to hear the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] the other day admit and defend that doctrine. It is one, sir, which he could not refuse to maintain without differing with Congress throughout the war, with the Supreme Court, and with the action of the executive and every department of the Government. He is perfectly consistent with all these when he assumes this position as he does. These States have never ceased to exist as States, and are such legally this day.

But there is a point in the gentleman's argument to which I wish to call the attention of the country. I would like to know how any gentleman can with sound logic assume these States of the southern confederacy are States in the Union under the Constitution, and yet in the next breath deny to them the equality of rights that belong to States legally in the Union. If you acknowledge that South Carolina, Virginia, North Carolina, and all the confederate States are States, and in the Union under the Constitution, then I maintain as the inevitable logical sequence that they are justly entitled to all the rights of all the other States in the Union, and you cannot successfully combat that conclusion without violation of the logic of the case.

Now, Mr. Chairman, is it any wonder that the present President of the United States, following in the track of his illustrious predecessor, with all these facts of history staring him in the face, himself a part of the history of Mr. Lincoln's policy, (having been appointed by him provisional and military governor of the State of Tennessee, then in rebellion, and snatching as it were that State from the very vortex of revolution itself, reducing it to order and bringing it back to its normal relations to the Government of the United States,) I say, is it any wonder, with these facts of history before him, so recent and so fresh, whereof he was himself a part, that he should endeavor to reconstruct or restore this Government according to the fixed policy which had controlled Congress, the Supreme Court of the United States, the former President, and all of the military authorities? I think there is no matter of astonishment in that. Let us glance at the

PRESIDENT'S POLICY.

Before the war the Federal Government, in the exercise of complete jurisdiction under the Constitution over all the States, performed faithfully toward them all the prescribed functions of national Government. The States on their part discharged duly their obligations self-imposed under the Constitution, and enjoyed all the privileges guaranteed to them by that instrument. The Government secured life, liberty, and property, and all the machinery, civil and military, necessary to protect them. The States acknowledged allegiance, and gave dutiful and loyal obedience in return. Fealty of the States to the Government was the price of its protection. Peace, harmony, prosperity, and expanding civilization were the grand resultants of these reciprocal relations. The legal right of the Government was perfect, the exercise of that right unquestioned and unobstructed, and the resulting obligations and privileges of the States were equally perfect. Secession came and rebellion. War followed hard after. Now, let me ask what effect did war produce? Did it destroy the right of the Federal Government to constitutional jurisdiction over the seceded States? Undoubtedly not; it only suspended the exercise of that right. Did it weaken, impair, or destroy the obligations of those States to the Government or nullify their right to those privileges under the Constitution? It only hindered the faithful discharge of those obligations, and prevented for the time the enjoyment of those privileges. Did war destroy the Constitution or impair the rights it conferred or the obligations it imposed upon the respective belligerents? Clearly no; it only rendered perfect compliance with its stipulations and requirements temporarily impossible pending the contest. The States are bodies corporate and politic, created by the people and communities for their convenience, protection, and welfare. Their existence depends upon the will of the people, their creator; their form and powers are defined and prescribed and limited in the written constitutions of each and in the Constitution of the United States, all of which instruments are but the solemnly recorded expression of the sovereign will of the people of the several States and of the whole nation. But the Constitution of the United States nowhere declares that the rebellion of a portion of the people of any State or States works a forfeiture of the existence of such State or States, nor does it lay down any condition upon the happening of which such forfeiture can take place; nor does it recognize any possible contingency in which the Union of the States can be dissolved. Hence, therefore, rebellion and civil war can no more annihilate a State than secession can legally dissolve the bonds of the Union. Congress, indeed, may and is bound to provide for the common defense against invasion, rebellion, and insurrection, and to guaranty to each State a government republican in form; but Congress can find no constitutional authority to dissolve or destroy a State government republican in form, and giving allegiance, in fact, to the national Government, any more than it can find a constitutional authority to legalize secession.

A State cannot commit treason nor commit suicide, nor has Congress any more authority to punish a State than it has to destroy it. But if citizens are guilty of treason they incur the penalties of the law, and ought to be punished or pardoned as wise policy and the interest of the nation may dictate.

But, to resume, the war destroyed no States, nor did it confer on Congress any authority to destroy States. It temporarily alienated the governments of certain States from the Government of the United States, and severed the reciprocal relations of those States and the national Government. But victory came to our standard, and, with her, smiling peace returned to gladden the land. Now, what was the effect of victory to our arms and what the result of peace? Secession, pierced with countless mortal wounds, was slain; rebellion, encircled by lines of devouring fire, scathed and crushed by bolts of loyal wrath, its armies defeated and bleeding, its strongholds captured, its navy stranded and sunk, its commerce destroyed, its ports blockaded, its cities desolated with grass-grown streets, its industries paralyzed, its very vitals penetrated by the sword, and its wasted fields sprinkled all over with the blood of uncounted victims, now resting in red garments beneath their sod, deserted by friends, by its foes beset on every hand, with the brand of Cain blazing on its horrid front, and smothered in the blood of a million men, it died.

Our brave soldiers fought and bled, sacrificed and suffered, and thousands of them wrapped in garments dyed with blood fill heroes' graves—for what? To trample down the laws—to obliterate the Constitution—to dismember the Union? No, sir, believe me, no. To rescue, to maintain, to perpetuate these priceless blessings they toiled and suffered, they sacrificed and died. The perpetuation of liberty and constitutional Union was the prize for which they paid thousands of millions of treasure and poured out seas of blood. They grappled secession, and triumphed; they throttled rebellion and the prize was won. Lincoln saw the triumph and died by the hand of the assassin; and a nation's tears could not bring him back to life. Now, as secession, rebellion, and war, as we have shown, did not destroy the States nor impair their constitutional rights and obligations, so neither did victory and peace. On the contrary, the effect of peace was to afford an opportunity and occasion to the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, in discharge of his sworn duty, to restore, so far as he had constitutional authority, the normal relations between the national Government and the rebel States, in war suspended by the rude hand of rebellion. The plan foreshadowed by Mr. Lincoln in the case of Tennessee and of Louisiana was adopted and acted upon by the present President in its principles and leading features. The blockade was raised, the ports reopened to commerce; postal relations were gradually resumed; the courts were restored, and all the machinery of civil law reestablished. President Johnson proceeded step by step, in accordance as he had a right to believe with the policy of the great Union party as inaugurated by his illustrious predecessor, to gather up and bind together these broken relations. But the Constitution had limited his power over the subject; and when he had gone as far in the work as he could go legitimately, he then stopped.

But he had an advisory power, and he exercised it by advising Congress that in his opinion those States were now in a condition when Congress should consummate the policy on which he had acted, and reunite the last broken relation between them and the Federal Government by restoring to them their representation in that body. That work was one which Congress, and not the President, was authorized to perform. But Congress in its wisdom, willing to act upon its own responsibility, made a departure from the established policy of Mr. Lincoln and the Union party.

Now, it has been charged that the President has abandoned his party and turned traitor to those who elected him. If that be so, then I must confess that I am too blind to perceive a fact when it is before me. Is that charge in accordance with the truths of recent history, which we know right well? If so, then I have failed to comprehend the events of the last five years, upon which I have been intently gazing all the time. Sir, who inaugurated the policy which the present President of the United States has been endeavoring in good faith to carry out and consummate? Was it not Abraham Lincoln and the Congress that stood by him through the war and the great Union party of which he was the representative until the day of his death? That is according to my reading of history, and my understanding of what it teaches. The President of the United States has not deserted his former friends; they have turned away from him. He has abandoned no policy upon which he was elected; that policy has been discarded by those who elected him. And instead of pouring out the vials of their wrath upon his head they ought magnanimously to acknowledge that they have themselves come to the conclusion that some other policy might prove more profitable than the one with which they started out with him. They should blush now to cast blame upon the President, who is triumphantly vindicated by history, is consistent with his party and with himself from the beginning of his connection with this struggle down to the present day. So much for some things as we have seen them and as we now see them. Let us now turn our attention for a few moments to other facts.

I love theorizing as well as any man; I love to speculate and philosophize as much as any one. But when we are dealing with the destinies of a great nation, when we are endeavoring to ascertain the condition of the grand national vessel upon which are embarked the priceless treasures of this great country's liberty and prosperity and the hopes of the world, it becomes us to turn from theories and speculations to stern existing facts and grapple with them as statesmen. Let us endeavor to keep the ship of state in a safe channel, and see to it that while we try to avoid Scylla we do not fall upon Charybdis. We should keep her in her true course by the chart, so that we may pass through the narrow straits in which we are now floundering out upon the broad ocean of our true destiny.

But I am free to acknowledge here that, with no fault upon the part of the President, with no departure by him either from the theory of his former political friends, the President's policy so-called is to-day, in spite of its wisdom, justice, constitutionality, and patriotism, practically a failure before the country because Congress refuses to adopt it. Not because it is wrong in theory, not because had it been carried out it would not have accomplished fully and promptly and happily the restoration of this Union, not because of any fault in the plan or policy; but from the fact that the people of the States here represented have through their Representatives determined that it is and shall be a failure. Now, with this fact before us, what does it become us as wise legislators and statesmen to do? Shall we still cling to that theory and fasten our hopes and our destiny upon it, and wait to see what will turn up next? Or does it not become us rather, if we cannot accomplish what we desire in the particular manner in which we desire to accomplish it, to look about us and see if there is no other way by which we can come to the same result? That is the question for us to determine.

What is the grand result upon which the eye and heart of every patriot ought to be intently fixed? Unquestionably the integrity, the unity, and prosperity of this nation. Now, I believe that these States are to-day States in the Union; that is my theory. But what is the practical fact? They are unrepresented in this Legislature of the nation. I know they ought to be represented here; I know these wounds of the country should be healed; I know this country should be one grand united whole, having each of its parts in a condition of perfect equality with all its other parts. But when I come to face the facts I find nearly one third of the States of the Union practically disunited from the rest; one third nearly of the people of this nation unrepresented in the national Congress. They are prostrate in the dust, with their arms pinioned and powerless either for the development of their own physical, moral, and intellectual interests, or for the accomplishment of one single act calculated to advance the interests of the nation. Impoverished by war; dispirited by defeat and disaster; emasculated of all political power and denationalized; their trade ruined; their labor demoralized; their past unhappy; their present humiliating; their future rayless and dark, what stimulus is left to arouse the people of the ex-rebel States to activity and labor? Nature has given them a monopoly of cotton, rice, and sugar, and these constitute substantially the basis of our commerce and of our national credit. And just in proportion as the production of these staples is scanty or abundant so are all our industries, our commerce, and our credit damaged or prospered.

The thrift of the northwestern people greatly depends upon the production of these southern States. The profits of New England looms and New York and Philadelphia merchants depend upon the success of farmers and planters, and the revenues of the country to a large extent depend upon the manufacturer and the merchant, and the credit of the nation upon its revenues.

Who, then, aside from the other important bearings of this question, can exaggerate the immense importance of the speedy restoration of these States to their proper relations to the national Government?

The incalculable magnitude of the end to be attained sinks into comparative insignificance the question as to method or way of attainment.

Entertaining these views, it is my deliberate judgment that all parties in the South should yield quietly and in good faith to the pressure they cannot successfully resist, and hasten to restore to their respective States the political power they have ceased to enjoy in the national Government by reconstructing upon such plan as is offered them by the dominant power in the Government.

But, sir, where is your constitutional right to establish a military despotism over one third of this country? You cannot find it. The bill contemplating this purpose does not assume that the power is found in the Constitution, and it is not found there. Is there no remedy but that? Can you not under the Constitution strengthen the arm of the civil power and spread the protecting ægis of your banner everywhere over the Union men of the South? Then, sir, do it quickly if there is need, and save the Government. Cut it not down; leave it still to flourish for our children and their children and for the latest posterity.

Mr. Chairman, the nation looks to the majority of this Congress to save and restore the Government, not to destroy it. A fearful responsibility is upon you, and the American people will hold you to a strict account. I believe the plan of the President, had you adopted it, would long since have settled every difficulty, quieted every trouble, harmonized every interest, and brought unparalleled prosperity to the whole land. But you have rejected it and made it a failure. For Heaven's sake and the country's, then, offer us some reasonable, fair and magnanimous plan as a substitute, and make it a finality. I will support such a measure as a finality if consistent with my oath to support the Constitution; and if I cannot support I will not oppose it if it be a finality and the best you will offer. You have the power, exercise it, and upon some basis or other, even if it be a bad one, restore these States to their rights of representation, and let our reunited country once more press forward to the front of all nations in civilization, prosperity, and happiness.

Mr. Chairman, I find that I have been betrayed much further in this direction than I had intended, yet I have only just entered the threshold of the argument. But, sir, before I conclude my remarks there is another matter to which I desire to call the attention of this body and the country; and that is the just unsettled and unpaid claims which the loyal people of Tennessee have upon this Government. I hold, Mr. Chairman, that those claims are as sacred as any this Government ever contracted to its citizens. You know, sir, something of the history of Tennessee during the war. You know that when that dark period came upon the southern country, when the sun of liberty was for the time obscured, and when the Union people of that region could see no light, except by the eye of faith, under and beyond the clouds that enveloped them, there were true men all over the State of Tennessee who were not willing to bow down to the false idol, secessionism. You know, sir, that the stormy sea of insurrection rolled over the gallant, the brave, devoted, loyal men of that State; and though they bent to the waves and bowed to the storm that crushed them, yet they rose again and stood as they had been from the beginning, true to the Government of their fathers and the flag of their country.

The history of those loyal people of that State will never be fully written. It never can be written. The services of the loyal men of Tennessee will never be fully known. Their sacrifices are as little, perhaps less, known than their services; and their sufferings human tongue cannot tell, human pencil can never delineate. Sir, if I had time I would love to go into a narration of what I myself know of the services, sacrifices, and sufferings of that gallant people. I can only refer briefly to what I know of that particular section of the State I have the honor in part to represent. And when I speak of the services, sacrifices, and sufferings of the loyal citizens of East Tennessee I only reproduce the imperfect and partial history of every loyal neighborhood, of every loyal man and family in the State.

Sir, what are the facts. If you will look upon the map you will see that our section of the State was like a notch in the southern confederacy. But, although located within its borders, we were not willingly a part of the rebellion; in proof of which you need only look to the vote of February, 1861, when the State was not under the control of rebel bayonets, when the people were free to act without restraint or compulsion. What was that vote? About sixty-four thousand majority for the Union and against the rebellion. Is there a State north of the line that under similar circumstances could have brought out a larger Union vote in proportion to population? I think not, sir. It is true that subsequently, under the powerful pressure of military rule, which was shortly afterward extended over us, the public demonstration of Union sentiments was suppressed for a season. But it is equally true that in June, 1861, four months after the first vote East Tennessee, surrounded by enemies as she was, enemies hating her none the less because her people were their brethren by blood, schooled in the same political views, educated under the same social institutions, but now antipodal on vital questions, East Tennessee though thus surrounded and penetrated everywhere by rebel soldiers, gave in June, 1861, nearly thirty-five thousand votes for the Union to seven thousand against it.

Now, sir, they maintained that wonderful unanimity of sentiment throughout the subsequent history of the war. Our mountain boys, descended as they were from the hardy frontier patriots of the Revolution, who had snatched victory from the British standard at King's mountain—before Tennessee was born—grandsons as they were of the brave men who made ever memorable the names and deeds of the Horse-Shoe, of Talladega, and Emuckfau, and gave to immortality by their heroism at New Orleans the illustrious name of Jackson—participants, as many of them were, or sons of participants in the brilliant achievements of American arms in the Mexican war; receiving existence through patriot lineage, drawing infant nourishment from loyal breasts, and reared to manhood in the unfettered freedom of our grand old mountains, had ever associated the ideas of liberty of the grandest and most perfect Government, of security, happiness, and glory with the banner of the Union. The Decalogue graven in stone by the finger of God, and the Ark of the Covenant in the esteem of the ancient Jews were not more sacred than were the "Constitution and the Union" in the estimation of our East Tennessee population. Under the Constitution and within the Union they were born, and had enjoyed all the privileges, benefits, and blessings, all the security, liberty, and happiness any earth-born Government could confer, and knew the burdens of Government only in theory. The graves of their fathers, the homes of their childhood, their fertile fields and magnificent forests, their picturesque hills and nestling dells, their bubbling fountains whose laughing waters went dancing through green meadows, their rich broad valleys and towering mountains, sublimely majestic in their rugged vastness, among whose beetling crags the eagle builds her nest and rears her young ones, all the wild, ever-varying, and transcendently enchanting scenery on which they have gazed from childhood with an admiration and love too fond for utterance; their most cherished memories, their most joyous anticipations and hopes, all they ever had, and all they desired in the future, all were associated intimately and indissolubly with the Union. To "the Union" they were consecrated in infancy, to it they were betrothed in youth, in manhood wedded, and to it resolved to be religiously faithful unto death. To them secession was lunacy, rebellion an unpardonable sin, dismemberment impossible and absurd, whether peaceful or by force. Though surprised, they were not astonished at the war when it came, for no people were more thoroughly posted upon the issues that went before it.

They had sworn upon the altars of their sires they would die rather than strike at the bosom of their mother country, and right well they have kept their vows; for although many rugged, steep, and lofty mountains reared themselves like impassable barriers between their homes and the flag they loved, yet when the drum of the confederacy beat the alarm, when the shrill fife, calling the conscript to rebellion, echoed through their hills, everywhere the young men of East Tennessee sped from their once happy homes. Confederate cavalry and infantry already fill the land; guards are stationed; scouts are on the lookout; spies are prying and watching everywhere. The conscripts have all been enrolled. The day for the rendezvous is fixed when our boys must willingly or by force shoulder arms in the rebel cause and march. Night lets down her curtains of darkness once more before that fatal day. Ah! how many a scalding tear-drop, traced sorrows, pallid cheek, that night! How many a bitter curse was whispered out of young hearts, surcharged with righteous wrath, through parched lips! How many a prayer from breaking hearts was breathed in sighs into God's ear that awful night! Lift gently the latch and enter with me this rude dwelling here in the shadow of the hill. See! midnight has come. The hour of departure is here. That youthful conscript of twenty summers is taking his farewell—perhaps the last on earth—of the idols of his soul. About his neck are a sister's arms. He kneels to receive the benediction of his gray-haired sire, his mother's fond, fondest maternal kiss, her heart-breaking baptism of tears, the sobbing adieus of all: "Fly, my son," the old man cries; "seek the flag of your country, and if you must die, die in its defense and fill a Union soldier's grave. Your grandfather fell at King's mountain; your father heard Old Hickory at New Orleans, when he told us boys to take steady aim and hold our fire till we could see the whites of British eyes; then pull trigger and let fly the leaden storm. Be true to their memory, their country, and God. God bless you, my son. Away!" And away he breaks from all the sweetest endearments of life, through the darkness, to seek the pilot at his secret rendezvous.

Sir, could you have witnessed all the mournful scenes enacted in the humble homes of East Tennessee on that night of sad separations, and on many a similar night through that cruel war; could you have seen that knapsacked throng at their gathering place in the heart of that solemn forest at midnight, when each one entered with silent, stealthy tread, and reported to the guide in whispers; could you have read the history made that night by their bleeding hearts and the bleeding hearts they left at home trembling in the bosoms of grief-stricken, gray-haired parents, bereaved wives, and tender children, left unprotected and unprotected, you would comprehend the meaning of anguish, of sorrow, of agony, of heart-breaking; you could know something of the value of loyalty by estimating its price.

The next day came on rapid wings: But few Union boys were there to be mustered in! The undetailed conscripts have suddenly vanished! They answer not at roll-call, nor are they found at home. But where are they? Let me sketch you a picture, and you will see them in it starting from the canvas into life. The country is swarming with rebel soldiers, horse and foot. The towns, villages, and cross-roads, the fords and passes and paths are guarded. Troopers are scouring hill and valley, forest and field, searching attic and cellar, stable and out-house and barn. The sun is down; but the moon sends a subdued and uncertain light along the forest-crowned summit of yon tall mountain spur, which reaches northwesterly far down into Powell's valley and breaks the darkness of the laurel chaparral by chance rays that penetrate the leafy gloom. Beyond the foot of the ridge is heard the ceaseless noise of the river, whose waters are thick with floating ice. Still beyond is the bold outline of the Cumberland mountain, whose summit is the Kentucky line. A public highway traverses the valley northeast to southwest. Along this road at narrow intervals are stationed rebel guards who have already been posted for the night, while mounted men are galloping everywhere on watchful patrol. Now, if you will look narrowly toward the laurel covert near the summit of the mountain spur, you will perceive moving out among the trees upon the pathless crest of the spur, with cautious steps which sink into the snow that lingers there, one, two, three, ten, twenty men, with staves and knapsacks, in Indian file, under the command of a watchful and sagacious guide. During the day, as they have done every day since they left their homes, they have rested and slept in some unvisited forest or mountain gorge, and awaking at night-fall, have started again with the thickening shadows of twilight upon their perilous pilgrimage. This is the same group you saw that sorrowful night leaving their rendezvous to escape conscription and to seek their country's flag. Since you saw them they have threaded many a forest maze, dodged many a rebel camp, escaped many a squad of rebel scouts, waded many a stream, and climbed many a precipitous mountain ridge. Now, they are worn, weary, shivering with cold, on half rations, with a doubly guarded line of hostile bayonets to pass and a mad river, white with floating ice, to ford. The danger must be bravely met, the gauntlet of the valley run, the icy river crossed, and the steep barrier of the Cumberland surmounted before another dawn, or woe betide that little band. "March!" the word passes from front to rear along the line in whispers. Forward, each with his eye on his file leader so silently, so cautiously, you may see them move along the declining ridge, but you may not hear their tread. Now and again the pilot pauses, leans forward, peers intently before and around, listens, with a hand as a sounding board behind each ear, to catch the sound or sight of lurking dangers. His pause signals each, and all obey, and every eye and ear is acting sentinel. Halt! The edge of the wood, the foot of the ridge is reached, the dim line of the road is visible, and lo! there is the watch-fire of the rebel guard, and sentinels' muskets are visible; their footsteps in the frozen road are distinctly audible.

The pilot motions silence and glides off in the shadows of the forest edge. In a brief space heresumes his post. A short whisper is breathed along the line. Diverging at right angles to their line of march, keeping in the shadow of the wood and nearly parallel to the road, half bent and in perfect silence they creep rather than walk, four hundred yards to a point where the road touches the wood on their side of it, and is flanked by a cornfield on the north. A rebel guard fire is visible along the road east of them and one west. At the point they have reached the sentinels meet. Within thirty paces of this point our pilgrims await the advance and departure of the guards. Bout face, tramp, tramp, tramp! they are gone. But the frozen road still gives back the sound of their retreating footsteps. "Now boys," whispers the pilot, "now is our time, follow me in silence and do as you see me do." Like specters, bending almost to the ground, they glide tiptoe nearly to the road. Down on his hands and knees goes the guide, on hands and knees all follow. The road is reached. Here the pilot stretches himself full length upon his face and crawls across the road, and twenty men as noiselessly follow in his track. The fence is passed, the cornfield entered, the forest regained north of the road, the river is safely forded. The first spur of the Cumberland is reached, and wearily our little squad, rejoicing over their success in passing the last guarded line is toiling toward its summit. But hark! what mean those sounds in the distant rear? The rebel bugle loud and clear calls to rendezvous. Listen! those were musket shots. Again, again! They are, they must be signal guns.

Now pilgrims of liberty, haste, haste for life, pause not nor rest ye till the tall Cumberland is safely passed. Fly or ye are lost.

In crawling across the road a part of the contents of a haversack was spilled, over which a rebel sentinel stumbled. He strikes alight and there he finds the well-defined track of our travelers. Hence the bugle call, hence the signal guns. But thanks to rugged mountains and pathless forests, and signal calls, pursuit was vain.

The Cumberland is passed. Kentucky gained, and at last footsore and worn down with travel, and privation, hunger, and cold, our little company of loyal mountain boys hail the starry flag at Camp Nelson with unspeakable joy, enter at once the national service, and give themselves to their country to the end of the war.

This little picture, sir, with a thousand variations of thrilling and romantic incident, illustrates the principal facts in the experience of the great mass of the volunteer Union soldiery of East Tennessee. But it does not present a faint idea of the hardships, privations, perils, and sufferings of many hundreds of them who were captured in attempting to elude the conscription, escaped from the rebel armies or from prisons afterward, joined the national forces and fought to the end of the war with ropes around their necks, regarded as they were by the rebel authorities as deserters from their army, and liable to be court-martialed and punished as deserters whenever captured, as indeed some of them were.

But, sir, did these mountain boys prove worthy of the glorious banner they upheld in the war? Were they worthy sons of noble sires? Did they honor the land that gave them birth and shed luster upon the arms of the great Republic? Go ask Burnside and Rosecrans, Sherman and Thomas, Carter and Gillem, and Grant. Let Mill Spring and Murfreesboro, let Bean's Station, Mossy Creek, Blue Spring, and the siege of Knoxville answer. Let Chicamauga, and Mission Ridge respond in the hour of disaster and amid the shouts of victory. Let the bloody triumph of Donelson and the pealing thunders of Shiloh reply. Let Sherman's blazing march to the sea give answer.

Why did they not remain in their own country? It was not because there were premiums and rich rewards awaiting them if they would take the arms of the Union and fight under its flag. It was not that there were hopes of future promotion held out as beacons in the distance to allure them from their obscurity into distinction. No, sir; they were impelled by the spirit of devotion that burned within them toward the country and the Government of their fathers, and by no other feeling. But how many men do you suppose the mountains of East Tennessee furnished to the armies of the United States, most of them escaping in the way I have related? Out of three hundred thousand inhabitants and forty thousand voters, out of a Union-voting population of thirty-five thousand or less, there were, according to the best estimate that can be made, thirty thousand who bore the arms and wore the uniform of the United States, and fought under its banner.

Sir, I can say for Tennessee generally, and for my own section especially, that I never heard during the whole war of a case of a drafted man nor a hired substitute for the Union Army. They fought under the banner of their country because they wanted to save the nation; and thousands of them bit the dust in battle, and thus sealed their patriotism by their death.

But, sir, the services that these people rendered during the war history will never record. In the history of this great war, with its multiplicity of general facts, the various heroic acts performed by individuals and by small bodies of men among those mountains can never find a place. But that section for generations yet to come, for ages far in the distance, will teem with the records, unwritten it may be, but not the less romantic, not the less honorable to them—traditional legends, that will make classic the soil of that glorious Switzerland of America. Sir, every inch of it is classic ground already, for along its hillsides and its valleys the blood of patriots has sprinkled the dust, and the graves of heroes unknown to fame, with their bloody shrouds around their sleeping dust, sanctify the soil.

There the northern man and the Tennessean side by side, under the same starry banner, met the foe, and there together their blood mingled upon the green sod it made rich as it flowed; and beneath it to-day in the embrace of death the Northman and the Southman, the Tennessean and the New Englander, sleep side by side in the grave of glory where their patriotism and courage have laid them to rest. Go and gaze upon yonder tremendous scenes that greet the vision about the heights around Chattanooga. Rosecrans had met the foe and felt the power of his crushing steel, and disaster had come upon him, but the heroic Grant, whose name has ever been associated with success, followed close, and within three short months snatched from the jaws of defeat the shining banner of victory, and on Mission Ridge and the heights of Lookout mountain the stars and stripes waved triumphantly and gloriously once more. Follow the dauntless Thomas along his bloody, blazing track into the midst of the enemy; watch the impetuous and fiery Sherman as he leads his fearless corps along the slippery steepes of Mission Ridge and there secures imperishable fame; See the victorious Hooker as he follows the American eagle up the rock-ribbed sides of Lookout mountain, wins a great battle on its summit, and responds in thunder tones from the field of his freshly-won glory above the clouds of heaven, to the triumphant shouts of victory from the echoing thunder of the conquering armies in the valleys below, and then tell me, sir, if every foot of ground in East Tennessee is not classic ground. She goes down to fame also as an illustration of the strength, the vigor, the endurance, the fortitude, the fidelity, the courage, and the unflinching devotion of loyal hearts when thus left unprotected by the Government and without the banner and shield of the country over them.

But, sir, what have been the sufferings of these people? I have alluded to their services. They suffered the loss of all things but life and honor for the love of that flag and all that it represents. The richest in the progress of the war, because they loved their country, became as poor as the poorest. Rebels seized their property without paying for it, or paid with worthless paper, but when the Union forces came, of the remnant that was left, with cheerful spirit they divided with the Union soldier until their last spoonful of salt was gone, and until they had broken and divided their last biscuit, and they were left without food for their hungry children.

But if you would know something of the fortitude of the brave and the sufferings of the loyal for the cause they loved, I ask you to visit the dark and loathsome prisons of Madison, Macon, and Montgomery, Salisbury, Tuscaloosa, and Belle Isle, Knoxville, Nashville, and Andersonville, and ask the slumbering echoes to give back to your ear the sighs and groans and shrieks of despair and agony that once went up to the ear of God out of the bursting hearts and parching lips of Tennessee prisoners dying there by inches because they were loyal. Visit the silent, solemn burying grounds where the little white board with black letters tells the tale of woe and mortality, and in every one of them you will find the patriot Tennessean sleeping his last sleep. All those tell of the sufferings endured there by the old and middle-aged, snatched from home by the hand of ruthless power, taken from wives and little children and consigned to death through filth, vermin, and starvation. Methinks, sir, when you remember these you can form some idea of the sufferings of the loyal people of Tennessee. It is not fancy, sir, it is fact, and I dare not lift up the curtain to reveal it all; the picture is too dark for humanity to contemplate. I know, sir, these were the sad fruits of mania, the madness of secession and rebellion, and I recall them not now to stir up the indignation of any against the frantic perpetrators of such mad crimes; nor would I invoke upon the crushed and vanquished, ruined but repentant subjects of that lunacy, vindictive retaliation or revenge. Nor would I conceal my conviction that the fearful crimes resulting from rebellion were not approved nor justified nor even palliated by the great mass of our misguided citizens who were led or driven to abandon their allegiance. They lie at the door and crimson the souls of that potent commanding few who intelligently and freely of their own accord conceived and instituted secession and willfully plunged the nation into rebellion. Such are amenable to the laws and, in the hand of Him who hath said, "Vengeance is mine: I will repay."

But, sir, my object is to enforce upon the public mind and heart the superlative claims of loyal Tennesseans and all other loyal claimants in the rebel States to prompt and complete justice at the hands of the Government. All these things, sir, and much more which I have not hinted at, were suffered and endured on account of the loyalty of this people; and besides, they were bereft of all or nearly all their substance and reduced as a people in large part to absolute penury and want. Little heritage have we of East Tennessee to-day but our poverty and our patriotism. We thank God for the one, and by His blessing, if our country will but be just to us, we can survive the other.

Sir, these people contributed all they had left to the cause. They not only divided, but they gave all up out of love for their country. I tell but the simple truth when I say at the end of the war it was a matter of profoundest astonishment to me when I returned to East Tennessee to see anything or anybody living in the land. The storm of war had swept back and again throughout its length and breadth, through its narrow valleys, and over its hill-sides, until there was left in many cases nothing but the ruins of once happy homes, the blackened chimneys of burned dwellings, or the wasted, thrown-out fenceless farms where families had once lived that were now scattered and gone.

Now, when the Army of the United States came into that portion of the county, as I have already remarked, our people met the troops with an open hand and a generous and liberal heart, and gave most of all they had to assist their country. They gave their property, their toil, their labor, their suffering, and in a thousand instances their lives to their country. And they are now in poverty; not only the men who entered the Army and fought, but those also who remained at home to take care of the women and children; the great mass of them are in poverty.

Reconstruction—Mr. Banks.

39TH CONG....2D SESS.

Now, I ask is it demanding too much of this great and magnanimous Government when we come here and ask, not for any gratuity, for we do not bend the supple hinges of the knee and get down before Congress and sue for a donation; but we come here to Congress and demand that the Government shall pay its just debts, what it honestly owes to the patriotic mountaineers of East Tennessee and to the loyal people of the whole State. We say, pay us for our property used, consumed, damaged, or destroyed in defense of our common country; that is all we ask.

And how are we met? Nearly every day millions are voted of the public money for this that and the other public work. And we are so liberal that we can expend from two to three hundred million dollars a year in the ordinary expenditures of the Government. But when we present the case of the poor suffering patriotic citizen of Tennessee, one of those who not only shed their blood, but gave all their substance to assist the Government, we are to be put off from month to month and session to session, until at last our claims will become like those for French spoiliations, so old that no one will listen to them nor heed them.

We pay millions of dollars yearly for Indian annuities. You pay large sums to Missouri, allowed by military commissions; millions to West Virginia, Maryland, Pennsylvania, and why not adjust and pay the poor people of Tennessee, who have suffered all they could suffer but extinction, and lost all they could lose of estate except their land, and many even must lose that because this Government withholds justice.

Now, I ask, is that just, much less generous? I called at the beginning of this session upon the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DELANO,] the chairman of the Committee of Claims, to which committee had been referred a resolution presented by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TROWBRIDGE] during the last session, proposing the establishment of a commission to investigate the claims of the loyal people of Tennessee, and adjust and settle them, and put them in train for payment. But the chairman told me that the committee would not report that resolution. I then came to the House here and asked that the House should instruct the committee to report the resolution only that we might have an opportunity to act upon it. But the House would not even consider it. I have since urged, begged, and implored the chairman to report the proposition to the House, even if adversely, so that we might get it before the House and have an opportunity to present the facts, and let Congress determine whether or not these debts should be paid. But that was refused.

Now, I present this state of facts to the country, and I ask the American people if it is not an outrage that the patriotic people of Tennessee should be crushed by the injustice of the American Congress, and put off from month to month, and year to year, until they go to their graves with their just claims unpaid? "The day has come when Congress should act justly toward the people."

I call upon this Congress to do so. Send out a commission, and let that commission upon the ground examine into the merits of all cases. Let them hear and determine upon the claim of this man who asks twenty-five dollars only for the property your soldiers took from him, with or without his consent; or the claim of that loyal man of fifty dollars for his last cow, or of the other man of $100 for the mule which the Union Army took and carried away; and the claims for corn, wheat, hay, oats, and everything by the Union Army used, injured, consumed, or destroyed, belonging to loyal persons, and even the garments and bed-clothing which were taken from the women and children in order to cover shivering soldiers from the blasts of winter. I call upon Congress to send a commission out there to investigate, adjust, settle, and pay claims which this Government owes in honor and justice to the people of my State.

Asking pardon for having trespassed thus long upon the attention of the House at this hour of the night I will now close.

SPEECH OF HON. N. P. BANKS, OF MASSACHUSETTS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 9, 1867.

The House having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1143) to provide for the more effectual government of the insurrectionary States—

Mr. BANKS said:

Mr. SPEAKER: Nothing was further from my purpose than to enter into a discussion of this question at this time. My first intention was, as it always has been my desire, to support all measures reported by the Committee on Reconstruction. On reflection and a more careful examination of the military bill for the government of the insurgent States, it seemed I am compelled to change my purpose; and I wish to state briefly my reasons for that conclusion. It is my belief that the States lately in rebellion are still States of the Union. They have not lost their legal character as States. They were made States by the action of the people and of the General Government, and they cannot change that condition except by the consent of the General Government. That consent has never been given. The general grounds for this opinion I shall not attempt to enter upon at this time, but I venture to say that there is nothing in theory of law or fact which deprives them of their legal existence as States of the Union. But Congress, by the votes of two Houses, with approval of the President, by many acts from 1861 to 1865, have deprived the people of these States of all right to coöperate in the government of this country. The loyal and disloyal alike are denied this privilege. The States as they stand are left with a legal recognized existence, but the people are without power, as a matter of right, to participate in the Government.

Now, I understand the position of these people to be this, according to received doctrines of international law: there are three conditions of a Government. It may be at peace, at war, or in an intermediate condition of suspended war, which is called a state of siege. The people are in exercise of political privileges, more or less extensive, according to the will of the governing power, but without any absolute right of their own to control affairs. That is the condition of the people of the insurgent States. It is not one of peace or war; it is a state of siege. We hold them in this condition until governments shall be established by the consent of Congress in which they shall participate. This is a military condition. The fundamental law of these States is martial law. Whatever is done or has been done by Congress, by the President, or by military officers, has been done and will be done in virtue of the military power and the right given in the Constitution to declare war. We may allow them to exercise such power as may not be inconsistent with public safety. The limit of our power in this regard is that which is necessary for the safety and welfare of the Union according to the theory of our Government. This is the theory of continental writers upon international law, and it has been adopted by the law officers of this Government.

It is not my purpose to complain of what has been done. I am willing to assume that it has been done in good faith and with a proper regard for the rights of the Government and of the people. But this much I will say: the result of what has been done in the insurgent States is to bring the enemies of this country foremost into power, and to place under their jurisdiction and control all the loyal and well-disposed citizens of those States. To that result I object; and I am in favor of any measure the most stringent and the most thorough that shall reverse that condition of things, repress the enemies of the country, and elevate the well-disposed and loyal portion of that population.

Now, sir, I regret to be compelled to speak of the bill which has been reported by the joint Committee on Reconstruction as I shall do. It seems to me that any bill which shall place these States under military or martial law is proper; and I do not object to any measure which shall propose to accomplish that purpose. But this bill proposes to do more, much more. It establishes what may be termed a complete frame of civil government, to be administered by the regular Army without restriction or limitation of power except the discretion of its officers. The regular Army administering this power is without responsibility to the Constitution, to Congress, or to the people. It is responsible only to the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy and those charged with its administration. Whatever malfeasance may occur can be tried only by the officers, under its own rules and regulations of the Army.

Now, if I am mistaken in that interpretation of its terms, I shall willingly ask pardon of the committee. But if I am right, then I think that no member of this House will desire that this bill shall be a law without some modifications. I read from the third section of this bill, as follows:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of each officer assigned as aforesaid to protect all persons in their rights of person and property, to suppress insurrection, disorder, and violence, and to punish, or cause to be punished, all disturbers of the public peace and criminals, and to this end he may allow civil tribunals to take jurisdiction of and to try offenders, or, when in his judgment it may be necessary for the trial of offenders, he shall have power to organize military commissions or tribunals for that purpose, anything in the constitution and laws of the so-called States to the contrary notwithstanding; and all legislative or judicial proceedings or processes to prevent or control the proceedings of said military tribunals, and all interference by said pretended State governments with the exercise of military authority under this act, shall be void and of no effect.

This gives them the control of all questions of persons and property. It enables them to recognize existing State governments just so far as they shall choose. It enables them to make such reports of the condition and character of these governments as they please, and the people, without means to obtain other information, will be compelled to receive such reports as official, and to a great extent to accept their conclusions. It authorizes them, if dissatisfied with the State tribunals, to establish military commissions and tribunals of their own, "and all legislative or judicial proceedings or processes to prevent or control the proceedings of said military tribunals" is declared to be "void and of no effect."

That power is not qualified in any respect. If it is intended to have reference only to the Legislatures and the judiciary of the insurgent States, it is unobjectionable. But it is not so limited and is liable at least to the interpretation I have given it by those who are to administer it. There is no positive limitation to these State tribunals and Legislatures. On the contrary, the fourth section provides that no court or judicial officers of the United States shall issue writs of habeas corpus in behalf of persons in military custody "unless some commissioned officers shall certify in advance that he believes the detention to be wrongful. Now that, with the paragraph immediately preceding it, which I have read, would imply that Congress will have as little right to proceed against them in a legislative as in a judicial capacity.

I do not think that the members of this House will be willing to pass an act which will bear that construction, and I trust that so much of this bill as implies, if it does not establish, a frame of civil government which embraces all the powers given by the Constitution of the United States, except perhaps the right to treat with foreign nations, to be administered by the officers of the regular Army without responsibility except to any officers under Army regulations, will be stricken from the bill, or so modified as to obviate that objection. I repeat that any power of a military character which may be demanded for the protection of the people of that part of the country I shall be entirely willing to concede.

Mr. Speaker, I have another objection. There is not a line or a letter in the body of this bill which limits the duration of its operation or looks to the establishment of any other government except this which is to be administered by the regular Army. I know that in the preamble it is stated that this bill is to be in force until loyal and republican State governments can be legally established. But the preamble is no part of the law; and my conviction, founded upon personal experience, compels me to say that I do not think the administration of the officers of the regular Army will tend to the reestablishment of a loyal and republican government. History does not justify us in expecting the restoration of overthrown republican or democratic governments through the intervention of purely military governments or of standing armies. I have never known a tendency to such results, and I do not believe that if this bill shall be passed, with its unrestricted and unlimited power, it will have any other effect than to crush out the spirit of loyalty so far as that spirit has an existence in those States.

Mr. Speaker, it is my belief that the hope of this country for reconstruction of the Government is in the masses of the people, the uneducated, the poor, the powerless masses of the people of these States, whom we ought to educate and elevate. Whenever we shall have so far progressed in our work as to give them power and a comprehension of what they and their descendants are to gain from the Government of the United States, they will become the truest and best friends this Government has ever had. Against this democracy, this lower order of society in the insurgent States, there is the aristocracy, influential, educated, wealthy, powerful, and absolute in its control of public action beyond any aristocracy elsewhere existing. In the administration of purely military law I believe that the influence of the regular Army will fraternize with this aristocracy against this democracy; and so far as this occurs we shall be deprived of the only basis we can have for the restoration of a loyal or democratic Government in this country.

If there is any hope for the Government of the United States, (and, sir, I sometimes fear that we may be deprived of even that which was left to Alexander after he apportioned his estates to his favorites—hope,) if there be any hope, it is in the millions of the common people of the South; and if we have anything to fear from any portion of the population there, it is from those implacable public enemies who are wedded to the doctrines and the privileges of aristocracy, and to whom we owe exclusively all the sufferings and sorrows of the age in which we live.

Whatever measures, whatever form of government shall be adopted, I wish to place myself with the democracy and against the aristocracy of these States; and I fear that the machinery of this bill will not tend to that end.

I have another suggestion to make. The bill proposes to give to the General of the Army power to appoint these officers. I have no fear of General Grant. On the contrary, I am sorry to say that I believe he may be the only man to whom the country can turn in its present disturbed condition for safety. I say this with regret, not because I distrust him in the least degree, but because I am sorry it should even be said that there is but one man or that there are not multitudes of men to whom the people can turn for relief from our present trouble. It is easy for Governments to sacrifice public men. It is not impossible for the friends of General Grant to place him in such a position that he must either be sacrificed or be compelled to indorse conduct which no true friend of his could approve. If he acts with the President in the execution of this law we have not much to hope, unless the President's position be materially changed, the probability of which all gentlemen around me seem to doubt. He still retains the command of the Army. He can assign to such duties as he pleases all its officers. The superior and subordinate officers depend upon him for promotion, and covet his favor and patronage. If General Grant resists his views of public policy he will not unlikely find the superior and the subordinate officers in opposition. And with the higher officers against him and the lower officers against him, surrounded by hostile communities, if he is composed of mortal dust it is certain he will suffer, and with him the hopes of the country that rest upon him. Appeals from his decisions will be constantly made, his authority impaired, and his success defeated. There are men who have been in such machinery. It is an engine of destruction. Its power cannot be resisted or controlled. If the General of the Army, who is to be charged with the execution of this law, is required to run counter to the course of the Administration, and is undermined by the patronage and the promotions offered to the officers below him, he must submit to that power and be destroyed, or he must seize the military power of the Government and fight his way to a different result. Neither result, I am sure, can be desired for him or for the country if it can be avoided.

For these reasons I regret to say that I hesitate to give my vote for the bill; and I trust that it may be amended so as to relieve it from features to which I have referred, and to give to these States the protection of whatever military power is necessary for the protection of the people. But I desire that that military power shall be accompanied by a proposition to establish popular governments, based upon the loyal people in one or more of these States, as a condition precedent to the exercise of this military power; so the idea that the first object of the act is to establish governments for the loyal people will be forced upon the attention of the Executive, of the people, and of the Army.

And this, sir, leads me to speak for a few moments of the various propositions which have been made upon the subject of reconstruction. Take, for instance, the proposition of universal amnesty and universal suffrage.

Mr. BROMWELL. I would inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts if it will make any difference to General Grant whether the bill is amended in the respect he speaks of or not? It strikes me, if it is to grind General Grant between the upper and nether millstone, any amendment that may be made as to the character of powers conferred upon these military officers cannot relieve him.

Mr. BANKS. I propose one remedy for that difficulty, as for others. It is to separate the civil from the military government: to give the first to the loyal, the second to the Army, and to both the support and authority of the Government. I speak now of the question of universal amnesty and universal suffrage. Universal amnesty brings the rebels in power. If they have the control of those States no suffrage we can give to the lower classes will deprive them of that power. The South is not, and never has been, governed by public opinion. It is governed by force. All aristocracies govern by force. The South will never allow the colored people or the white people to take from their hands the power they have wielded so long, and to which they think they have indisputable right. We can never expect the colored vote of the southern States to take the power out of the hands of the ruling classes when they have been restored to full power by the Government of the United States.

I do not oppose suffrage for the colored people. What I say is, we ought under no circumstances restore the ruling class to political power until the sovereignty of the Government has been firmly and finally established. Universal amnesty and universal suffrage, in my opinion, will make the South a unit. It will be a unit now as when the institution of slavery existed. The North can never be united. The North is governed exclusively by public opinion; and there is not a State, a city, community, or family where there is not more or less of division. On the contrary, in the South there is no difference of opinion tolerated, and whenever the ruling class is threatened in the exercise of power they resort to their legitimate engines of force and fraud to maintain their position and to sustain their power.

The southern States—I do not speak of the ten insurgent States now out of the Union, but I speak of the former slave States—have a distinct interest, in which they are alone concerned, so powerful, so gigantic, that it is hardly possible they can ever divide if they are permitted a chance to regain control of public affairs. Their losses amount, according to their estimate, to $7,000,000,000. In the outset we require them to abandon all hope of recovering their losses. The debt of the United States is $3,000,000,000. While we refuse to recognize their debt or to pay for their loss in the emancipation of slaves or otherwise, we require them to pay their share of our public debt. Here is a gigantic financial interest of $10,000,000,000, at their estimate, made up of losses which they hope to recover, and public debts from which they hope to escape, and if they are permitted to consolidate the elements of political power with this object in view it is impossible to expect any one of the fifteen States shall resist any policy proposed for their advantage in this regard.

Take the case of Missouri; that is the strongest. Missouri is unquestionably a loyal State; yet if the rebels be restored to power, even with suffrage to the colored people, even proposing to the people of Missouri they are to recover their share of this loss of $7,000,000,000, and to escape the payment of taxes upon their share of a debt of $3,000,000,000, it is impossible any other party should maintain power except that identified with the southern interest. Hence you may expect to see every one of these States, Kentucky, Tennessee, Maryland, and Delaware ranged, as they were formerly, upon the side of the loyal States in support of different interests and results.

What is their power? They will have in the House of Representatives, if restored without restriction, ninety-eight votes. The ten insurgent States have fifty-eight and the border States now in the Union have twenty-eight votes; that does not include the three-fifths representation, which will give them twelve additional votes. They will have ninety-eight votes in favor of a policy which affects the condition of every individual and family of the South.

The number of members by statute is two hundred and forty-one; with the addition of two fifths of the colored people now unrepresentsented it will be two hundred and fifty-three. A majority will be one hundred and twenty-eight. They want but thirty votes from the North to give them that majority, and there can never be an election in the fifteen or twenty loyal States that will not give in the aggregate a minority of at least thirty votes, which, added to the united vote of the South, gives them the control of the Government of the United States.

What will they do? What would any party do with such interests and such united power? It will control the Electoral College, direct the choice of Cabinet officers, shape the decrees of the Supreme Court, and force the Chief Justice and the General of the Army from their positions or to do its will. They will have the power to do it.

Will they pay our debt? Many propositions have been made to secure its payment, but I think it is not in human power to put in language any statute or constitutional amendment which can compel to pay the debt. It may be repudiated in many ways: by increasing its volume to such extent as to make its liquidation impossible and absurd, as well as by a formal and authorized act of repudiation. Nothing can prevent this power, if installed in power here, from destroying in one session and at one blow all hope of the payment, either principal or interest, of the debt. The South is poor. It cannot pay. A Representative from the South, when asked whether he will or will not tax his constituents, will have indisputable power to say yes or no, as he or they may think just or expedient. If they are unwilling the debt shall be paid they will say no; and with a negative so powerful as that it is impossible to provide for the payment of the interest or the ultimate payment of the principal by any legislation or constitutional enactments.

But that is not the only difficulty. They have the power to increase the expenditures of the Government—possibly with the cooperation of the East or the West, perhaps the whole North—to such an extent as very soon to make it impossible to pay the debt. The remedy for this condition of things is the reorganization of political society in the insurgent States upon such a basis as to make it consistent with the interests of the people as well as with their wishes to maintain the credit, increase the prosperity, and perpetuate the power of the Government. It is to give power to its friends rather than its enemies. Upon this theory of universal amnesty and universal suffrage I see no hope of such reorganization, and nothing but disaster to the Government. I do not expect, I dare not hope, that if they have this power they will wield it for any other advantage than their own. And, sir, as a man representing a constituency, loyal, intelligent, and patriotic, I am obliged to say that if the tables were turned, if the rebel debt were to be fastened upon us and our own repudiated, and I, representing a portion of the people of Massachusetts, were permitted to say yes or no to the repudiation of our debt and the payment of the rebel debt incurred to destroy this country, in behalf of my constituents I should be obliged to say no. Nor do I expect that the rebels would do more or better; and therefore, and upon that ground, I impeach the right of the Representatives of the loyal people to restore them to power.

Gentlemen on the other side of the House have said, Why not admit the Representatives of the southern States upon condition that they take the oath prescribed by law—the test oath, as it is called? A political oath, Mr. Speaker, is no bar to political action. It necessarily depends upon the conscience of the person who takes it. It is a question between him and his God, and in this case we have been compelled to rest the conditions of the oath upon the will of the actor. That does not disqualify which is not voluntarily done. And when an agent is left at liberty to interpret his will for himself and say what has been and what has not been voluntarily done he is completely master of the situation. History does not exhibit many instances in which a Government has been served or a people saved by political oaths. In this view there is scarcely a man in the South who cannot take the test oath; and whenever this shall be required of them, either to retain property or to secure power, they will all, as one man, accept it. It is substantially to swear that they have not voluntarily entered into rebellion against the United States.

There are few persons in the South that will admit that they entered voluntarily into the war. Mr. Davis, the president of the confederacy, when he left the Senate of the United States, stated as the reason for his secession that he was "obliged" to take the course which he followed. It was a plea of compulsion. Taking the speech of Davis in the Senate and the language of the test oath, is it probable that the rebels would refuse it if made a condition of the restoration to power?

Mr. HISE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BANKS. Certainly, if for a question only; I cannot yield for general remarks.

Mr. HISE. It would be necessary for me to make some preliminary observations.

Mr. BANKS. I must decline to yield for any observations. The object of the southern leaders is to make the rebellion honorable. That is their object. They have no other purpose but to class the rebellion among the honorable events of our history. It is for this reason they refuse the oath and denounce those who accept it. The oath repudiates the rebellion as a dishonor. It is the purpose of the Government to stamp the rebellion as an ineffaceable disgrace upon those who led the country and its people to the brink of destruction. We therefore insist on the oath as a disclaimer, a badge of dishonor. We do not rely upon it for security. Whenever it becomes necessary for the insurgent States to accept the ecclesiastical authorities, an ecclesiastical convention will proclaim that what a man does in obedience to the command of his State is an involuntary act and is without sin. This is the established law of the church. Political conventions will declare that the allegiance of the citizen was to the State and not to the General Government, and that service which the State demanded he was compelled to render. The test oath is therefore no bar to political positions and no guarantee of safety as against public enemies.

Let me ask attention of the House for a single moment to a historical precedent. Mr. O'Connell, after a life of great experience and great trials, said, in a debate in Parliament, that that which shocked him most in public life was the fact that committees appointed by the House of Commons and sworn to do their duty were never regarded as men bound by an oath, but only as so many Tories and so many Whigs.

In 1772 the Jacobites were severely persecuted by the administration of that day. Nearly the whole nation were summoned to swear allegiance to the Government. Lord Mahon says it carried more disaffection to the king and his family than anything that happened during that reign. But men took the oath without any regard to the facts of the case, saying they had rather venture themselves in the hands of God than of such men as they had to do with. They all adhered to their principles, and the oath, however it might torture their consciences, did not control their conduct. The Jacobites applauded their leader, Mr. Shippen, because he had the courage to swear against his conscience on purpose to serve the good cause; and this was only to escape a tax. Such is the inevitable result of any oath imposed by any Government for its security. Swearing allegiance to King George did not shut the Jacobites out of Parliament; swearing allegiance to Louis Philippe did not shut out the Carlists from the French Chambers. The test oath will not exclude the rebels from the Halls of Congress. The Jacobites took the oath to escape a tax only; how can we expect more virtue in the rebels when it is the only bar to their restoration to power? "Although we might reasonably infer from theory," says Lord Mahon, "that men honorable and high-minded in private life would be scrupulously bound by the solemn and public obligation of an oath, experience will teach the reverse."

Gentlemen upon the other side have asked why not admit the Representatives from these States if they be loyal men? My answer to that question is this: the Representative is nothing; it is the people who speak here through us. If we disregard their wishes or interests they change their Representatives, as they ought to do. Now, a man from one of these southern States, though his personal career and character may have been spotless, must, if he represents his constituents, do what they desire, and I would just as leave that a rebel general or an ex-member of the rebel Congress, or even the president of the late rebel confederacy, should be here in person, as any man less conspicuous, who represents the same principles.

There is no course for us but to take the plain practical, simple method of reconstruction, which does not depend upon the leading men of the South or upon any arrangement of a temporary character. It is to reconstruct the political society of the insurgent States in such manner as to exclude every element of hostility to the existence of the Government. And such a measure is presented in the constitutional amendment adopted by this Congress at its last session. And in my opinion whenever three fourths of the States represented in this Congress shall have ratified it by their Legislatures, it will have become a part of the Constitution of the United States.

CHAP. IV.—An Act making Appropriations and to supply Deficiencies in the Appropriations for the Service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June thirtieth, eighteen hundred and sixty-seven, and for other purposes.

Office of Superintendent of Public Printing.

For public printing, eighty thousand dollars.

For paper for public printing, four hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

Bureau of Statistics.

For contingent expenses, viz:

Laborers, office furniture, carpets, files, and miscellaneous items, six thousand dollars.

Southeast Executive Building, including the Extension.

For fuel, light, and labor, twenty-three thousand dollars.

Office of the Sixth Auditor.

To refund to the office of the Sixth Auditor so much of the appropriation of seventeen thousand dollars, under the act of May seventeenth, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, appertaining to the office of the Sixth Auditor, transferred to the general salary account of the Post Office Department, eight thousand eight hundred dollars.

For Special Objects, estimated for by the Supervising Architect of the Treasury.

For fencing the grounds south of the Treasury building, and the President's Mansion, fifteen thousand dollars.

For repairs and preservation of public buildings, twenty-five thousand dollars.

For furniture, and repairs of furniture for the same, ten thousand dollars.

For furniture, carpets, and repairs of Treasury buildings in Washington, District of Columbia, twenty thousand dollars.

For heating apparatus for public buildings, ten thousand dollars.

For salaries of ten supervising and fifty-nine local inspectors, appointed under the act of August thirtieth, eighteen hundred and fifty-two, for the better protection of the lives of passengers by steamboats, with traveling and other expenses incurred by them, seven thousand dollars.

For a deficiency in flagging the furnace-room and repairs about the stable at the Executive Mansion, one thousand five hundred dollars.

Metropolitan Police.

For salaries of increased force, under act of July twenty-third, eighteen hundred and sixty-six, from November first, eighteen hundred and sixty-six, to June thirtieth, eighteen hundred and sixty-seven, viz:

One captain and inspector, at one thousand two hundred dollars per annum, seven hundred and ninety-eight dollars and ninety-one cents.

One clerk to major of police, at one thousand dollars per annum, six hundred and sixty-five dollars and seventy-six cents.

Twenty sergeants of police, at sixty-five dollars a month, ten thousand four hundred dollars.

Fifty privates of police, at sixty dollars a month, twenty-four thousand dollars.

And the compensation of said increased force is hereby increased fifty per centum upon the amount hereby appropriated, commencing on the first day of November, eighteen hundred and sixty-six; said increase to be borne by the cities of Washington and Georgetown, and the county of Washington, in the proportion equal to the number of privates allotted severally to the cities of Washington and Georgetown, and the county beyond the limits of said cities; and the corporate authorities of said cities of Washington and Georgetown and the levy court of said county be, and they are hereby, authorized and required to levy a special tax, not exceeding one quarter of one per centum, for the purpose aforesaid.

Department of the Interior.

For commutation of quarters and fuel to officer of corps of engineers, United States Army, in charge of engineer office, Department of the Interior, for present fiscal year, agreeable to Army regulations, one thousand two hundred and one dollars and ninety-five cents.

For repairing the damage done to the Washington aqueduct by freshets in the year eighteen hundred and sixty-six, twelve thousand dollars.

To enable the Commissioner of Public Buildings to pay three watchmen employed in the Smithsonian grounds for the fiscal year ending June thirty, eighteen hundred and sixty-seven, the sum of twenty-four hundred and seventy-five dollars is hereby appropriated.

To enable the Commissioner of Public Buildings to pay to the watchmen mentioned in the fifth section of the act appropriating for sundry civil expenses for the fiscal year ending June thirty, eighteen hundred and sixty-seven, the difference between their pay as fixed prior to the passage of that act and the allowance made by said section, two thousand dollars is hereby appropriated.

Department of State.

To supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the contingent expenses of foreign intercourse, for the fiscal year ending June thirtieth, eighteen hundred and sixty-seven, two hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

APPROVED, December 20, 1866.

CHAP. V.—An Act to amend an Act entitled “An Act granting Lands to the State of Oregon, to aid in the Construction of a Military Road from Eugene City to the eastern Boundary of said State.”

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That an act entitled “An act granting lands to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military road from Eugene City to the eastern boundary of said State” be amended as follows: That there be, and is hereby, granted to said State, for the purposes aforesaid, such odd sections or parts of odd sections not reserved or otherwise legally appropriated, within six miles on each side of said road, to be selected by the surveyor general of said State, as shall be sufficient to supply any deficiency in the quantity of said grant as described, occasioned by any lands sold or reserved, or to which the rights of preëmption or homestead have attached, or which for any reason were not subject to said grant within the limits designated in said act.

APPROVED, December 26, 1866.

CHAP. VI.—An Act to Regulate the Elective Franchise in the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, from and after the passage of this act, each and every male person, excepting paupers and persons under guardianship, of the age of twenty-one years and upward, who has not been convicted of any infamous crime or offense, and excepting persons who may have voluntarily given aid and comfort to the rebels in the late rebellion, and who shall have been born or naturalized in the United States, and who shall have resided in the said District for the period of one year, and three months in the ward or election precinct in which he shall offer to vote, next preceding any election therein, shall be entitled to the elective franchise, and shall be deemed an elector and entitled to vote at any election in said District, without any distinction on account of color or race.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That any person whose duty it shall be to receive votes at any election within the District of Columbia, who shall willfully refuse to receive, or who shall willfully reject, the vote of any person entitled to such right under this act, shall be liable to an action of tort by the person injured, and shall be liable, on indictment and conviction, if such act was done knowingly, to a fine not exceeding five thousand dollars, or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year in the jail of said District, or to both.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That if any person or persons shall willfully interrupt or disturb any such elector in the exercise of such franchise, he or they shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be fined in any sum not to exceed one thousand dollars, or be imprisoned in the jail in said District for a period not to exceed thirty days, or both, at the discretion of the court.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the several courts having criminal jurisdiction in said District to give this act in special charge to the grand jury at the commencement of each term of the court next preceding the holding of any general or city election in said District.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the mayors and aldermen of the cities of Washington and Georgetown, respectively, on or before the first day of March, in each year, shall prepare a list of the persons they judge to be qualified to vote in the several wards of said cities in any election; and said mayors and aldermen shall be in open session to receive evidence of the qualification of persons claiming the right to vote in any election therein, and for correcting said list, on two days in each year, not exceeding five days prior to the annual election for the choice of city officers, giving previous notice of the time and place of each session in some newspaper printed in said District.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That on or before the first day of March the mayors and aldermen of said cities shall post up a list of voters thus prepared in one or more public places in said cities, respectively, at least ten days prior to said annual election.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the officers presiding at any election shall keep and use the check-list herein required at the polls during the election of all officers, and no vote shall be received unless delivered by the voter in person, and not until the presiding officer has had opportunity to be satisfied of his identity, and shall find his name on the list and mark it, and ascertain that his vote is single.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That it is hereby declared unlawful for any person, directly or indirectly, to promise, offer, or give, or procure or cause to be promised, offered, or given, any money, goods, right in action, bribe, present, or reward, or any promise, understanding, obligation, or security for the payment or delivery of any money, goods, right in action, bribe, present, or reward, or any other valuable thing whatever, to any person with intent to influence his vote to be given at any election hereafter to be held within the District of Columbia; and every person so offending shall, on conviction thereof, be fined in any sum not exceeding two thousand dollars, or imprisoned not exceeding two years, or both, at the discretion of the court.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That any person who shall accept, directly or indirectly, any money, goods, right in action, bribe, present, or reward, or any promise, understanding, obligation, or security for the payment or delivery of any money, goods, right in action, bribe, present, or reward, or any other valuable thing whatever, to influence his vote at any election hereafter to be held in the District of Columbia, shall, on conviction, be imprisoned not less than one year and be forever disfranchised.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
January 7, 1867.

The President of the United States having returned to the Senate, in which it originated, the bill entitled "An act to regulate the elective franchise in the District of Columbia," with his objections thereto, the Senate proceeded in pursuance of the Constitution to reconsider the same, and

Resolved, That the said bill do pass, two thirds of the Senate agreeing to pass the same.
Attest: J. W. FORNEY,
Secretary of the Senate.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES, January 8, 1867.

The House of Representatives having proceeded, in pursuance of the Constitution, to reconsider the bill entitled "An act to regulate the elective franchise in the District of Columbia," returned to the Senate by the President of the United States, with his objections, and sent by the Senate to the House of Representatives, with the message of the President returning the bill:

Resolved, That the bill do pass, two thirds of the House of Representatives agreeing to pass the same.

Attest: EDWARD McPHERSON, Clerk.

CHAP. VII.—An Act suspending the Payment of Moneys from the Treasury as Compensation to Persons claiming the Service or Labor of Colored Volunteers or Drafted Men, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the final report of the commissioners provided for in the second section of the act of Congress entitled "An act making appropriation for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June thirtieth, eighteen hundred and sixty-seven, and for other purposes," approved July twenty-eight, eighteen hundred and sixty-six, shall be made, through the Secretary of War, to Congress; and no money shall be paid from the Treasury, or from any fund therein, upon the provisions of section twenty-four of the act approved February twenty-four, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes,'" approved March third, eighteen hundred and sixty-three, until such report shall be approved and confirmed by Congress.

APPROVED, January 14, 1867.

CHAP. VIII.—An Act to repeal section thirteen of "An Act to suppress Insurrection, to punish Treason and Rebellion, to seize and confiscate the Property of Rebels, and for other purposes," approved July seventeenth, eighteen hundred and sixty-two.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the thirteenth section of an act entitled "An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes," approved July seventeenth, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

SCHUYLER COLFAX,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
LA FAYETTE S. FOSTER,

Indorsed by the PRESIDENT: "Received Wednesday, January 9, 1867."

[NOTE BY THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE.—The foregoing act having been presented to the President of the United States for his approval, and not having been returned by him to the House of Congress in which it originated within the time prescribed by the Constitution of the United States, has become a law without his approval.]

CHAP. IX.—An Act setting aside certain Proceeds from Internal Revenue for the Erection of Penitentiaries in the Territories of Nebraska, Washington, Colorado, Idaho, Montana, Arizona, and Dakota.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the net proceeds of the internal revenue of the Territories of Nebraska, Washington, Colorado, Idaho, Montana, Arizona, and Dakota, for the fiscal years severally ending on the thirtieth day of June, eighteen hundred and sixty-six, the thirtieth day of June, eighteen hundred and sixty-seven, and the thirtieth day of June, eighteen hundred and sixty-eight, be, and the same hereby are, set aside and appropriated to and for the purpose of erecting, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, penitentiary buildings in said several Territories, at such places therein as have been or may be designated by the Legislatures thereof, and approved by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That the moneys so set aside and appropriated in each of said Territories shall be devoted exclusively to the erection of a penitentiary in the Territory in which the same has been and shall be collected, and not in any other, and that the same shall not exceed in amount the sum of twenty thousand dollars in said Territory of Washington, and forty thousand dollars in each of the said Territories of Nebraska, Colorado, Idaho, Montana, Arizona, and Dakota.

APPROVED, January 22, 1867.

CHAP. X.—An Act to fix the Times for the regular Meetings of Congress.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in addition to the present regular times of meeting of Congress, there shall be a meeting of the Fortieth Congress of the United States, and of each succeeding Congress thereafter, at twelve o'clock meridian, on the fourth day of March, the day on which the term begins for which the Congress is elected, except that when the fourth of March occurs on Sunday, then the meeting shall take place at the same hour on the next succeeding day.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That no person who was a member of the previous Congress shall receive any compensation as mileage for going to or returning from the additional session provided for by the foregoing section.

APPROVED, January 22, 1867.

CHAP. XI.—An Act in regard to the Compensation of Route Agents in the Post Office Department.

APPROVED, January 22, 1867.

CHAP. XII.—An Act to incorporate the National Safe Deposit Company of Washington, in the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That A. R. Shepherd, William S. Huntington, S. P. Brown, G. W. Riggs, Nathaniel Wilson, G. H. Plant, together with the subscribers to the stock of the association hereby created, and their successors and assigns, shall be, and they are hereby declared to be, a body politic and corporate, by the name and style of the National Safe Deposit Company of Washington, and by that name shall have succession, and be capable in law to sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, answer and be answered, defend and be defended in all courts of law and equity and elsewhere, to make and to use a common seal, and the same to alter or renew at pleasure, and generally to do and perform all things relative to the object of this institution, which is now or shall be lawful for any individual or body politic or corporate to do.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the capital stock of said company shall consist of a sum not exceeding two hundred thousand dollars, divided into two thousand shares, of one hundred dollars each, and that so soon as one fourth of the shares have been subscribed for, and twenty-five dollars per share paid at the time of subscribing, and the balance secured to be paid, then this company shall be competent to transact all kinds of business for which it is established.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the incorporators heretofore named, or any three of them, shall open books of subscription for the capital stock of this company hereby incorporated, at such time and in such suitable place in the city of Washington as they may think proper, and shall receive the installments on the stock of said company provided for in section second, and shall deliver the money so paid to the board of directors so soon as they shall be appointed and prepared to receive the same.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the stockholders composing this company, or their representatives by proxy, shall, on such day as they or a majority of them shall determine, choose by ballot from among said stockholders seven directors to serve for one year, or until others are chosen, each stockholder to have one vote for every five shares of stock, and the directors so chosen shall, at their first meeting, choose by ballot a president and vice president from among their own body, and in case of death, resignation, or disqualification of the president or vice president, or a director or directors, shall proceed to elect another or others to fill the vacancy for the remainder of the year.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the president, vice president, and directors of said company shall be, and they are hereby, authorized and empowered to receive and keep on special deposit all such valuables, gold, silver, or paper money, bullion, precious metals, jewels, plate, certificates of stock, or evidence of indebtedness, deeds, or muniments of title, or other valuable papers of any kind, or any other article or thing whatsoever, which may be left or deposited for safe-keeping with said company, and shall be entitled to charge such commissions or compensation therefor as may be agreed upon; and for the complete preservation and safe-keeping thereof shall construct, erect, lease, or purchase, such fire-proof and burglar-proof building or buildings, vaults, iron, or composition safes or other means which may become necessary, and generally to transact and perform all the business relating to the safe-keeping or preservation of all such articles or valuables as may be deposited with said company, and also to invest the capital or other funds belonging to the said company, from time to time, in the public funds of the United States, or in any stock or property whatsoever, and to dispose of the said stocks, money, and property in such manner (not contrary to law) as to them shall appear most advantageous to said company.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the president, vice president, and directors, shall declare dividends of the profits of the corporation, annually or semi-annually, as they may deem best; and in case of any loss or losses, whereby the capital shall be diminished, no subsequent dividend shall be made until a sum equal to such diminution, arising from the profits of the corporation or contributions of stockholders, shall be added to the capital.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the president, vice president, and directors of the corporation hereby created, shall have power to enact and adopt such rules, regulations, and by-laws for the government and management of the affairs of said corporation as they may deem advantageous to the interest thereof.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That nothing herein contained shall be taken or construed to give the corporation hereby created the power to issue or circulate as currency any bill, note, token, or evidence of indebtedness of its own creation; nor be deemed to authorize the said corporation to pay interest on deposits of money, securities, or any other property deposited with it; and the operations of this corporation shall be confined to the District of Columbia.

APPROVED, January 22, 1867.

CHAP. XV.—An Act to Regulate the Elective Franchise in the Territories of the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the passage of this act there shall be no denial of the elective franchise in any of the Territories of the United States, now, or hereafter to be organized, to any citizen thereof, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; and all acts or parts of acts, either of Congress or the Legislative Assemblies of said Territories, inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby declared null and void.

SCHUYLER COLFAX,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

LA FAYETTE S. FOSTER,

President of the Senate pro tempore.

Indorsed by the PRESIDENT: "Received on the 14th January, 1867."

[NOTE BY THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE.—The foregoing act having been presented to the President of the United States for his approval, and not having been returned by him to the House of Congress in which it originated within the time prescribed by the Constitution of the United States, has become a law without his approval.]

CHAP. XVI.—An Act to incorporate the Washington County Horse Railroad Company in the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Samuel P. Brown, Francis Mattingly, Noble D. Lerner, Marshall Brown, and Joseph L. Pearson, and their associates and assigns, be, and they are hereby, created a body-corporate under the name of the "Washington County Horse Railroad Company," with authority to construct and lay down a double or single track railway, with the necessary switches and turn-outs, in the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, as follows: Commencing at Boundary street, at its intersection with Fourteenth street, and along the Fourteenth street road in a northerly direction, to a point where said road intersects a new road recently opened by the levy court, and along said new road in an easterly direction, to the Seventh street turnpike, and along said turnpike in a southerly direction to Boundary street: Provided, That the consent of the board of directors of the Seventh Street Turnpike Company be first obtained for the use of their road, with the right to run public carriages thereon, and receiving therefor a rate of fare not exceeding ten cents a passenger for any distance on said road.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said railroad shall be deemed real estate, and it, with the other real and personal property of said body-corporate, shall be liable to taxation as other real estate and personal property in the county aforesaid, except as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the said railway shall be laid in the most approved manner adapted for street railways. And the tracks shall not be more than six nor less than four feet apart, and the gauge the same as that of the street railways in the city of Washington.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the tracks of the said railway shall be laid in such a manner as will least interfere with the ordinary travel of the roads over which the said tracks shall be laid.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That this act may at any time be altered, amended, or repealed by the Congress of the United States.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to authorize said body-corporate to issue any note, token, device, scrip, or other evidence of debt to be used as currency.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the capital stock of said company shall be not less than two nor more than five hundred thousand dollars, and that the stock shall be divided into shares of fifty dollars each, and shall be deemed personal property, transferable in such manner as the by-laws of said company may direct.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the said company shall place first-class cars on said railway, with all the modern improvements for the convenience and comfort of passengers; and shall run cars thereon daily as often as the public convenience may require.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That said company shall procure such passenger-rooms, ticket-offices, stables, and depots at such points as the business of the railroad and the convenience of the public may require. And the said company is hereby authorized to lay such rails as may be necessary for the purpose of connecting the said stables and depots with main tracks. And the said company is hereby authorized to purchase or lease such lands or buildings as may be necessary for passenger-rooms, ticket-offices, stables, and depots above mentioned.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That all articles of value that may be inadvertently left in the cars, or other vehicles of said company, shall be taken to their principal depot and entered in a book of record of unclaimed goods, which book shall be open to the inspection of the public at all reasonable hours of business.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That said corporation shall, on demand of the President of the United States, Secretary of War, or Secretary of the Navy, cause to be transported over said railway any freight cars laden with freight for the use of the United States; the officers causing such service to be done shall pay a reasonable compensation therefor.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That within thirty days after the passage of this act the corporators named in the first section, or a majority of them, or if any refuse or neglect to act, then a majority of the remainder, shall cause the books of subscription to the capital stock of said company to be opened and kept open in some convenient and accessible place in the city of Washington, from nine o'clock in the forenoon until three o'clock in the afternoon, for a period to be fixed by said corporators, not less than two days, and said corporators shall give public notice, by advertisement in the daily papers published in the city of Washington, of the time when and the place where said books shall be opened; and subscribers upon said books to the capital stock of the company shall be held to be stockholders: Provided, That every subscriber shall pay at the time of subscribing twenty-five per centum of the amount by him subscribed to the treasurer appointed by the corporators, or his subscription shall be null and void. If a larger amount than the capital stock of said company shall have been subscribed, the books shall be closed, and the said corporators named in the first section shall forthwith proceed to apportion said capital stock among the subscribers pro rata, and make public proclamation of the number of shares allotted to each, which shall be done and completed on the same day that the books are closed: Provided further, That nothing shall be received in payment of the twenty-five per centum, at the time of subscribing, except money. And when the books of subscription to the capital stock of said company shall be closed, the corporators named in the first section, or a majority of them, and in case any of them refuse or neglect to act, then a majority of the remainder, shall, within twenty days thereafter, call a meeting for the choice of directors, of which public notice shall be given for five days in two public newspapers published daily in the city of Washington, or by written personal notice to each stockholder by the clerk of the corporation; and in all meetings of the stockholders each share shall entitle the holder to one vote, to be given in person or by proxy.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That the government and direction of the affairs of the company shall be vested in a board of directors, seven in number, who shall be stockholders, and who shall hold their office for one year, and till others are duly elected and qualified to take their places as directors; and the said directors (a majority of whom, the president being one, shall be a quorum) shall elect one of their number to be president of the board, who shall also be president of the company, and they shall also choose a treasurer, who shall give bonds with surety to said company, in such sum as the said directors may require, for the faithful discharge of his trust. In case of a vacancy in the board of directors, by the death, resignation, or otherwise of any director, the vacancy occasioned thereby shall be filled by the remaining directors.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That the directors shall have full power to make and prescribe such by-laws, rules, and regulations as they shall deem needful and proper, touching the disposition and management of the stock, property, estate, and effects of the company, not contrary to the charter or to the laws of the United States.

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That there shall be an annual meeting of the stockholders, for choice of directors, to be holden at such time and place, under such conditions, and upon such notice as said company by their by-laws may prescribe, and said directors shall annually make a report to the stockholders and to Congress of their doings.

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That the said company shall have, at all times, the free and uninterrupted use of their roadway; and if any person or persons shall willfully and unnecessarily obstruct or impede the passage on or over said railway or any part thereof, or shall injure or destroy the cars, depot stations, or any property belonging to said railway company, the person or persons so offending shall forfeit and pay for every such offense the sum of twenty dollars to said company, and shall remain liable, in addition to the said penalty, for any loss or damage occasioned by his, her, or their act, as aforesaid, but no suit shall be brought unless commenced within sixty days after such offense shall have been committed.

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That the said company shall make and complete said railway within one year after the organization of the same.

SEC. 18. And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts heretofore passed which are inconsistent with any of the provisions for the purposes of this act are hereby repealed, so far as the same are inconsistent herewith.

SEC. 19. And be it further enacted, That the levy court of the county of Washington are hereby prohibited from doing any act or thing to hinder, delay, or obstruct the construction or operation of said railroad as herein authorized, but Congress may, at any time, alter, amend, or repeal this act.

APPROVED, January 31, 1867.

CHAP. XVII.—An Act to incorporate the First Congregational Society of Washington.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Oliver O. Howard, Silas H. Hodges, Daniel L. Eaton, Henry A. Brewster, Charles H. Bliss, Ezra L. Stevens, Benjamin F. Morris, Daniel Tyler, Llewellyn Deane, and Calvin S. Mattoon, and their associates, are hereby created a body politic and corporate, by the name of "The First Congregational Society of Washington;" and as such may purchase, hold, and convey real and personal estate, make contracts, sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, and may exercise all other powers incident to corporations, and usually enjoyed by them, and such as are requisite to enable them to sustain religious worship in Washington, in the District of Columbia, and to erect and maintain edifices for that purpose and parsonages; and said society shall be exempt from any taxes to be assessed upon their property, under the authority of Congress, or of the District of Columbia, or the city or county of Washington: Provided, That the amount of the value of the real estate shall not exceed one hundred thousand dollars.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the first meeting of said society shall be holden at the time and place at which a majority of the persons hereinabove named shall assemble for that purpose, and six days' notice shall be given each of said corporators; at which meeting, and at all annual meetings and at all meetings specially called for that object, said society may enact, amend, or repeal by-laws regulating the government of said society; prescribing the number, character, and duties of their officers, and the manner of their election; defining the terms on which members may be admitted to it, and shall cease to be such; and providing in all things for the management of the affairs of said society, or for securing its interests and welfare.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the powers of this corporation shall vest in a board of trustees, who shall be chosen as provided by the by-laws, and shall consist of five persons, and shall have perpetual succession, each one holding his office until his successor is chosen and qualified.

APPROVED, January 31, 1867.

CHAP. XXVI.—An Act to punish certain Crimes in relation to the Public Securities and Currency, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That if any person or persons shall buy, sell, exchange, transfer, receive, or deliver, any false, forged, counterfeited, or altered bond, bill, certificate of indebtedness, certificate of deposit, coupon, draft, check, bill of exchange, money order, indorsement, United States note, Treasury note, circulating note, postage stamp, revenue stamp, postage-stamp note, fractional note, or other obligation or security of the United States, or circulating note of any banking association organized or acting under the laws of the United States, which has been issued or may hereafter be issued under any act of Congress heretofore passed, or which may hereafter be passed, with the intent, expectation, or belief, that the same shall or will be passed, altered, published, or used as true and genuine, such person or persons so offending shall be deemed guilty of felony, and on conviction thereof shall be imprisoned not more than ten years, or fined not exceeding five thousand dollars, or both, at the discretion of the court.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall not be lawful to design, engrave, print, or in any manner make or execute, or to utter, issue, distribute, circulate, or use any business or professional card, notice, placard, circular, handbill, or advertisement, in the likeness or similitude of any bond, certificate of indebtedness, certificate of deposit, coupon, United States note, Treasury note, circulating note, fractional note, postage-stamp note, or other obligation or security of the United States, or of any banking association organized or acting under the laws thereof, which has been or may be issued under or authorized by any act of Congress heretofore passed or which may hereafter be passed. And any person or persons offending against the provisions of this section shall be subject to a penalty of one hundred dollars, to be recovered by an action of debt, one half to the use of the informer.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall not be lawful to write, print, or otherwise impress upon any bond, certificate of indebtedness, or other instrument specified in the last preceding section, any business or professional card, notice, or advertisement, or any notice or advertisement of any goods, wares, or merchandise, or of any drug or medicine, or of any invention or patent, or of any other matter or thing whatsoever; and any person or persons offending against the provisions of this section shall be subject to a penalty of one hundred dollars, to be recovered by an action for debt, one half to the use of the informer.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall, without authority from the United States, take, procure, make, or cause to be taken, procured, or made, upon lead, foil, wax, plaster, paper, or any other substance or material, an impression, stamp, or imprint of, from, or by the use of, any bed-plate, bed-piece, die, roll, plate, seal, type, or other tool, implement, instrument, or thing, used, or fitted or intended to be used, in printing, stamping, or impressing, or in making other tools, implements, instruments, or things to be used, or fitted or intended to be used, in printing, stamping, or impressing any kind or description of bond, bill, note, certificate, coupon, or other paper, obligation, security, or instrument now authorized, or hereafter to be authorized, by law, to be executed, altered, delivered, given, issued, or put in circulation by, for, or in behalf of the United States, such person shall be deemed guilty of felony, and, on conviction, be punished by imprisonment not more than ten years, or by fine not exceeding five thousand dollars, or both, at the discretion of the court.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall, with intent to defraud, have in his possession, keeping, custody, or control, without authority from the United States, any imprint, stamp, or impression, taken or made upon any substance or material whatsoever, of any tool, implement, instrument, or thing used or fitted, or intended to be used, for any or either of the purposes mentioned in the last foregoing section; or if any person shall, with intent to defraud, sell, give, or deliver any such imprint, stamp, or impression to any other person; such person so offending shall be deemed guilty of felony, and on conviction be punished by imprisonment not more than ten years, or by fine not exceeding five thousand dollars.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That if any person, whether employed under the United States or not, shall, without authority from the United States, secrete within, embezzle, or take and carry away from any building, room, office, apartment, vault, safe, or other place where the same is kept, used, employed, placed, lodged, or deposited by authority of the United States any bed-piece, bed-plate, roll, plate, die, seal, type, or other tool, implement, or thing used, or fitted to be used, in stamping or printing, or in making some other tool or implement used or fitted to be used in stamping or printing, any kind or description of bond, bill, note, certificate, coupon, postage stamp, revenue stamp, fractional currency note, or other paper, instrument, obligation, device, or document, now authorized or hereafter to be authorized by law to be printed, stamped, sealed, prepared, issued, uttered, or put in circulation by or on behalf of the United States; or shall, without such authority, so secrete, embezzle, or take and carry away any paper, parchment, or other material prepared and intended to be used in the making of any or either of such papers, instruments, obligations, devices, or documents; or shall, without such authority, so secrete, embezzle, or take and carry away any paper, parchment, or other material printed or stamped, in whole or in part, and intended to be prepared, issued, or put in circulation, by or on behalf of the United States, as one of the papers, instruments, or obligations hereinbefore named, or printed or stamped, in whole or in part, in the similitude of any such paper, instrument, or obligation, whether it be intended to issue or put the same in circulation or not, such person or persons so offending shall, on conviction, be punished by imprisonment not exceeding ten years, or by fine not exceeding five thousand dollars, or both, at the discretion of the court.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall take and carry away, without authority from the United States, from the place where it has been filed, lodged, or deposited, or where it may for the time being actually be kept by authority of the United States, any certificate, affidavit, deposition, written statement of facts, power of attorney, receipt, voucher, assignment, or other document, record, file, or paper, prepared, fitted, or intended to be used or presented in order to procure the payment of money from or by the United States, or any officer or agent thereof, or the allowance or payment of the whole or any part of any claim, account, or demand against the United States, whether the same has or has not already been so used or presented, and whether such claim, account, or demand, or any part thereof, has or has not already been allowed or paid; or if any person shall present or use, or attempt to use, any such document, record, file, or paper, so taken and carried away, in order to procure the payment of any money from or by the United States, or any officer or agent thereof, or the allowance or payment of the whole or any part of any claim, account, or demand against the United States, such person so offending shall be deemed guilty of felony, and on conviction be imprisoned not more than ten years, or fined not exceeding five thousand dollars, at the discretion of the court.

APPROVED, February 6, 1867.

CHAP. XXVII.—An Act amendatory of "An Act to amend an Act entitled 'An Act relating to Habeas Corpus, and regulating Judicial Proceedings in certain Cases,' approved May eleventh, eighteen hundred and sixty-six.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whenever in any suit or prosecution which has been or may be commenced in any State court, and which the defendant is authorized to have removed from said court to the circuit court of the United States, under and by virtue of the provisions of "An act relating to habeas corpus, and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases," approved March third, eighteen hundred and sixty-three, or by virtue of an act amendatory thereof, approved May eleventh, eighteen hundred and sixty-six, and all the acts necessary for the removal of said cause to the circuit court shall have been performed, and the defendant in any suit shall be in actual custody on process issued by said State court, it shall be the duty of the clerk of the said circuit court of the United States to issue a writ of habeas corpus cum causa; and it shall be the duty of the marshal, by virtue of the said writ of habeas corpus, to take the body of the defendant into his custody to be dealt with in said circuit court according to rules of law, and the orders of the said court, or of any judge thereof in vacation; and he shall file a duplicate copy of said writ of habeas corpus with the clerk of the State court in which said suit was commenced, or deliver said duplicate to the clerk of said court; and all attachments made, and all bail and other security given in any suit or prosecution which has been or shall be removed from any State court to the circuit court of the United States, in pursuance of law, shall be and continue in like force and effect as if the same suit had proceeded to final judgment and execution in the State court.

APPROVED, February 5, 1867.

CHAP. XXVIII.—An Act to amend "An Act to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States," approved September twenty-fourth, seventeen hundred and eighty-nine.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the several justices of the United States, and the several justices and judges of such courts, within their respective jurisdictions, in addition to the authority already conferred by law, shall have power to grant writs of habeas corpus in all cases where any person may be restrained of his or her liberty in violation of the Constitution, or of any treaty or law of the United States; and it shall be lawful for such person so restrained of his or her liberty to apply to either of said justices or judges for a writ of habeas corpus, which application shall be in writing and verified by affidavit, and shall set forth the facts concerning the detention of the party applying, in whose custody he or she is detained, and by virtue of what claim or authority, if known; and the said justice or judge to whom such application shall be made shall forthwith award a writ of habeas corpus, unless it shall appear from the petition itself that the party is not deprived of his or her liberty in contravention of the Constitution or laws of the United States. Said writ shall be directed to the person in whose custody the party is detained, who shall make return of said writ and bring the party before the judge who granted the writ, and certify the true cause of the detention of such person within three days thereafter, unless such person be detained beyond the distance of twenty miles; and if beyond the distance of twenty miles and not above one hundred miles, then within ten days; and if beyond the distance of one hundred miles, then within twenty days. And upon the return of the writ of habeas corpus a day shall be set for the hearing of the cause, not exceeding five days thereafter, unless the party petitioning shall request a longer time. The petitioner may deny any of the material facts set forth in the return, or may allege any fact to show that the detention is in contravention of the Constitution or laws of the United States, which allegations or denials shall be made on oath. The said return may be amended by leave of the court or judge before or after the same is filed, as also may all suggestions made against it, that thereby the material facts may be ascertained. The said court or judge shall proceed in a summary way to determine the facts of the case, by hearing testimony and the arguments of the parties interested, and if it shall appear that the petitioner is deprived of his or her liberty in contravention of the Constitution or laws of the United States, he or she shall forthwith be discharged and set at liberty. And if any person or persons to whom such writ of habeas corpus may be directed shall refuse to obey the same, or shall neglect or refuse to make return, or shall make a false return thereto, in addition to the remedies already given by law, he or they shall be deemed and taken to be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, on conviction before any court of competent jurisdiction, be punished by fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, and by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by either, according to the nature and aggravation of the case. From the final decision of any judge, justice, or court, inferior to the circuit court, an appeal may be taken to the circuit court of the United States for the district in which said cause is heard, and from the judgment of said circuit court to the Supreme Court of the United States, on such terms and under such regulations and orders, as well for the custody and appearance of the person alleged to be restrained of his or her liberty, as for sending up to the appellate tribunal a transcript of the petition, writ of habeas corpus, return thereto, and other proceedings, as may be prescribed by the Supreme Court, or, in default of such, as the judge hearing said cause may prescribe; and pending such proceedings or appeal, and until final judgment be rendered therein, and after final judgment of discharge in the same, any proceeding against such person so alleged to be restrained of his or her liberty in any State court, or by or under the authority of any State, for any matter or thing so heard and determined, or in process of being heard and determined, under and by virtue of such writ of habeas corpus, shall be deemed null and void.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That a final judgment or decree in any suit in the highest court of a State in which a decision in the suit could be had, where is drawn in question the validity of a treaty or statute of, or an authority exercised under, the United States, and the decision is against their validity, or where is drawn in question the validity of a statute of or an authority exercised under any State, on the ground of their being repugnant to the Constitution, treaties, or laws of the United States, and the decision is in favor of such their validity, or where any title, right, privilege, or immunity is claimed under the Constitution, or any treaty or statute of or commission held, or authority exercised under the United States, and the decision is against the title, right, privilege, or immunity specially set up or claimed by either party under such Constitution, treaty, statute, commission, or authority, may be reexamined and reversed or affirmed in the Supreme Court of the United States, upon a writ of error, the citation being signed by the Chief Justice, or judge, or chancellor of the court rendering or passing the judgment or decree complained of, or by a justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the same manner, and under the same regulations, and the writ shall have the same effect, as if the judgment or decree complained of had been rendered or passed in a court of the United States; and the proceeding upon the reversal shall also be the same, except that the Supreme Court may, at their discretion, proceed to a final decision of the same, and award execution, or remand the same to an inferior court. This act shall not apply to the case of any person who is or may be held in the custody of the military authorities of the United States, charged with any military offense, or with having aided or abetted rebellion against the Government of the United States prior to the passage of this act.

APPROVED, February 5, 1867.

CHAP. XXIX.—An Act to authorize the Extension, Construction, and Use of a lateral branch of the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad into and within the District of Columbia.

Whereas it is represented to this present Congress that the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company, incorporated by an act of the General Assembly of Maryland, entitled "An act to incorporate the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company," passed the sixth day of May, eighteen hundred and fifty-three, are desirous, under the powers which they claim to be vested in them by the provisions of the before-recited act, to construct a lateral branch from the said Baltimore and Potomac Railroad to the District of Columbia: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company, incorporated by the said act of the General Assembly of Maryland, shall be, and they are hereby, authorized to extend into and within the District of Columbia a lateral railroad, such as the said company shall construct or cause to be constructed in a direction toward the said District, in connection with the railroad which they are about to locate and construct from the city of Baltimore to the Potomac river, in pursuance of their said act of incorporation; and the said Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company are hereby authorized to exercise the same powers, rights, and privileges, and shall be subject to the same restrictions, in the extension and construction of the said lateral railroad into and within the said District, as they may exercise or are subject to under and by intent of their said charter or act of incorporation, in the extension and construction of any railroad within the State of Maryland; and shall be entitled to the same rights, compensation, benefits, and immunities, in the use of the said road, and in regard thereto, as are provided in their said charter, except the right to construct any lateral road or roads within the said District from the said lateral branch or road hereby authorized; it being expressly understood that the said Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company shall have power only to construct from the said Baltimore and Potomac Railroad one lateral road within the said District to some point or terminus within the city and county of Washington, to be determined in the manner hereinafter mentioned.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That before the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company aforesaid shall proceed to construct any railroad which they may lay out or locate on, through, or over any land or improvements, or to use, take for use, any earth, stone, or other materials necessary for the construction of said road, on any land within the said District, they shall first obtain the assent of the owner of such land, improvements, or materials; or if such owner shall be absent from said District, or shall refuse to give such assent on such terms as the said company shall approve, or because of infancy, coverture, insanity, or any other cause, shall be legally incapable of giving such assent, then it shall be lawful for the said company to apply to a justice of the peace of the county of Washington, who shall thereupon issue his warrant, under his hand and seal, directed to the marshal of the said District, requiring him to summon a jury of twenty citizens of the said District, none of whom shall be interested or related to any person interested in the land or materials required for the construction of the said railroad, or a stockholder, or related to any stockholder in the said company, to meet on the land, or near to the other property or materials so required, on a day named in such warrant, not less than ten nor more than twenty days after issuing the same, to proceed to value the damages which the owner or owners of any such land or other property will sustain by the use or occupation of the same required by the said company, and the proceedings, duty, and authority of the said marshal in regard to such warrant and jury, and the oath or affirmation to be administered, and inquisition to be made and returned, shall be the same as are directed and authorized in regard to the sheriff by the thirteenth section of the said act of the General Assembly of the State of Maryland, incorporating the said Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company; and all the other proceedings in regard to such jury, and the estimating and valuation of damages, and the payment or tender of payment of any damages ascertained by such valuation and effect thereof, and of the view of any lands or other property or materials, as to giving the said company a right to use the same for the use or construction of any railroad within the said District, as hereby authorized, shall in every case and in every respect be the same as is provided in and by the above-mentioned act of corporation, in regard to the railroad thereby authorized to be constructed by the said company: Provided, That whenever, by the said act, the inquisition of the jury is required to be returned to the clerk of the circuit court, to be confirmed by the said court at its next session, if not sufficient cause to the contrary be shown, the inquisitions under this act shall be returned by the marshal to the supreme court of the District of Columbia, which court shall have the same jurisdiction and powers over the subject-matter as the said circuit court have under the act aforesaid.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That whenever the said company, in the construction of a railroad into or within the said District, as authorized by this act, shall find it necessary to cross or intersect any established road, street, or other way, it shall be the duty of the said company so to construct the said railroad across such established road, street, or other way, as not to impede the passage or transportation of persons or property along the same; and where it shall be necessary to pass the said railroad through the land of any individuals within the said District, it shall be the duty of the said company to provide for such individuals proper wagon ways across the said railroad, from one part of his [their] land to another; but nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to authorize the entry by said company upon any lot or square, or upon any part of any lot or square owned by the United States within the limits of the city of Washington, for the purposes of locating or constructing the said road, or of excavating the same, or for the purpose of taking therefrom any material, or for any other purpose or uses whatsoever; but the said company, in passing into the District aforesaid, and constructing the said road within the same, shall enter the city of Washington at such place, and shall pass along such public street or alley, to such point or terminus within the said city as may be allowed by Congress upon presentation of survey and map of proposed location of said road: Provided, That the level of said road within the said city shall conform to the present graduation of the streets, unless Congress shall authorize a different level.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the rate actually charged and received on all that part of said road within the District shall not exceed eight cents per ton per mile for both tolls and transportation, and shall be the same each way: And provided also, That the privileges granted by this act to the aforesaid railroad company shall be upon the condition that the said company shall charge the same rate of toll upon the same articles going either way between Baltimore and Washington.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the said company are also hereby empowered to make such special contract, with any duly authorized officer or agent of the United States, for the conveyance of the mail, or the transportation of persons or property for the use of the United States, on any railroad which has been or shall be constructed by the said Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company, on such terms as shall be approved of by the competent officer or authority, and in all such instances to receive the compensation so agreed for, according to the terms of each contract.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the said railroad company may charge and receive for taking up and setting down any passenger or traveler within the District, conveyed a shorter distance than four miles, a sum not exceeding twelve cents.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That unless the said company shall commence the said lateral road within two years, and complete the same with at least one set of tracks within four years from the passage of this act, then this act, and all rights and privileges thereby granted, shall cease and determine.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prevent the Congress of the United States from granting the same or similar privileges to those hereby granted to any other company or companies incorporated or to be incorporated by the State of Maryland, or by Congress, or from authorizing, by any future law, such additional railroads or roads, in connection with the said road, so as to extend the same road, or to construct others connected therewith, to such parts of the District as from time to time may be required by the convenience of those parts of the District into which the said company are now restrained from carrying said road, or from enacting such rules and regulations prescribing the speed of cars or carriages passing over said road, and any other matters relating thereto, necessary for the security of the persons and property of the inhabitants of the District, in such manner as to the present or any future Congress shall seem expedient: And provided, nevertheless, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to give any rights or privileges to the said company beyond the limits of the District of Columbia: And provided further, That Congress shall have power to alter, amend, or repeal this act.

erty, being the property of a head of the family or householder, shall be exempt from distraint, attachment, levy, and sale on execution or decree of any court in the District of Columbia: Provided, however, That this exemption shall not interfere with the foreclosure of any mortgage or deed of trust executed before the passage of this act, to wit: All wearing apparel belonging to all persons, and to all heads of families, being householders; all beds, bedding, household furniture, stoves, cooking utensils, and so forth, not exceeding three hundred dollars in value; provisions for three months' support, whether provided or growing; fuel for three months; mechanics' tools and implements of the debtor's trade or business amounting to two hundred dollars in value, with two hundred dollars' worth of stock for carrying on the business of the debtor or his family; the library and implements of a professional man or artist to the value of three hundred dollars; one horse, mule, or yoke of oxen; one cart, wagon, or dray, and harness for such team; farming utensils, with food for such team for three months, and if the debtor be a farmer, any other farming tools of the value of one hundred dollars; all family pictures, and all the family library, not exceeding in value four hundred dollars; one cow, one swine, six sheep. And no deed of trust, bill of sale, or mortgage upon any of said exempted articles, shall be binding or valid unless signed by the wife of the debtor, if he be married and living with his wife; and these exemptions shall be valid when the said property is in transitu, the same as if the property were at rest: Provided, however, That no property named and exempted in this act shall be exempted from attachment or execution for any debt due for the wages of servants, common laborers, or clerks, except the wearing apparel, beds and bedding, and household furniture and provisions for the debtor and family.

APPROVED, February 5, 1867.

CHAP. XXXI.—An Act to punish Illegal Voting in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That any person not duly qualified to vote in the District of Columbia who, knowing that he is not so qualified, shall vote or offer to vote therein, or who shall procure or attempt to procure himself to be registered therein as a voter, shall be punished by imprisonment not exceeding six months and not less than two months.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That if any person, being a qualified voter in said District, shall knowingly vote or attempt to vote in any other ward or election precinct than that in which he shall be lawfully entitled to vote, or shall unlawfully and knowingly vote or attempt to vote more than once, or in more than one ward of election precinct, or shall so vote double therein, he shall be punished by imprisonment not exceeding six months and not less than two months, and shall be disqualified from voting thereafter in said District.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That there shall be five judges of elections within and for the city of Washington, and three within and for the city of Georgetown, the same to be appointed by the supreme court of the District of Columbia, who shall hold their offices for two years and until their successors shall be appointed and qualified, and whose duty it shall be, prior to each election, to prepare a list of the persons qualified to vote in the several wards of said cities in any election; and said judges shall be in open session in their respective cities, to receive evidence of the qualifications of persons claiming the right to vote in any election therein, and for correcting said lists, on two days, not exceeding five days prior to each election for the choice of city officers, giving prior notice of the time and place of each session in some newspaper.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That prior to said election the said judges in the respective cities shall post up a list of voters thus prepared in one or more public places in said cities, and at least ten days prior thereto.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

APPROVED, February 5, 1867.

CHAP. XXXII.—An Act to provide for the Payment of Pensions.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States shall be, and he is hereby, authorized to establish agencies for the payment of pensions granted by the United States, where ever, in his judgment, the public interests and the convenience of the pensioners require, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint all pension agents, who shall hold their offices for the term of four years and until their successors shall have been appointed and qualified, and who shall give bond, with good and sufficient sureties, for such amount and in such form as the Secretary of the Interior may approve: Provided, That the number of pension agencies in any State or Territory shall in no case be increased hereafter so as to exceed three, and that no such agency shall be established in addition to those now existing in any State or Territory in which the whole amount of pensions paid during the fiscal year next preceding shall not have exceeded the sum of five hundred thousand dollars: And provided further, That the term of office of all pension agents appointed since the first day of July, A. D. eighteen hundred and sixty-six, shall expire at the end of thirty days from the passage of this act; and the commissions of all other pension agents now in office shall continue for four years from the passage of this act, unless such agents are sooner removed.

APPROVED, February 5, 1867.

CHAP. XXXIV.—An Act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to receive into the Treasury the residuary Legacy of James Smithson, to authorize the Regents of the Smithsonian Institution to apply the Income of the said Legacy, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to receive into the Treasury, on the same terms as the original bequest, the residuary legacy of James Smithson, now in United States bonds, in the hands of said Secretary, namely: twenty-six thousand two hundred and ten dollars and sixty-three cents, together with such other sums as the regents may from time to time see fit to deposit, not exceeding, with the original bequest, the sum of one million dollars.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the increase which has accrued, or which may hereafter accrue, from said residuary legacy, shall be applied by the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution in the same manner as the interest on the original bequest, in accordance with the provisions of the act of August tenth, eighteen hundred and forty-six, establishing said Institution.

APPROVED, February 8, 1867.

CHAP. XXXVI.—An Act for the Admission of the State of Nebraska into the Union.

Whereas, on the twenty-first [nineteenth] day of March, [April,] Anno Domini eighteen hundred and sixty-four, Congress passed an act to enable the people of Nebraska to form a constitution and State government, and offered to admit said State, when so formed, into the Union, upon compliance with certain conditions therein specified; and whereas it appears that the said people have adopted a constitution which, upon due examination, is found to conform to the provisions and comply with the conditions of said act, and to be republican in its form of government, and that they now ask for admission into the Union: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the constitution and State government which the people of Nebraska have formed for themselves be, and the same is hereby, accepted, ratified, and confirmed, and that the said State of Nebraska shall be, and is hereby declared to be, one of the United States of America, and is hereby admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatsoever.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said State of Nebraska shall be, and is hereby declared to be, entitled to all the rights, privileges, grants, and immunities, and to be subject to all the conditions and restrictions of an act entitled "An act to enable the people of Nebraska to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," approved April nineteen, eighteen hundred and sixty-four.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That this act shall not take effect except upon the fundamental condition, that within the State of Nebraska there shall be no denial of the elective franchise, or of any other right, to any person, by reason of race or color, excepting Indians not taxed; and upon the further fundamental condition that the Legislature of said State, by a solemn public act, shall declare the assent of said State to the said fundamental condition, and shall transmit to the President of the United States an authentic copy of said act; upon receipt whereof the President, by proclamation, shall forthwith announce the fact, whereupon said fundamental condition shall be held as a part of the organic law of the State; and thereupon, and without any further proceeding on the part of Congress, the admission of said State into the Union shall be considered as complete. Said State Legislature shall be convened by the territorial Governor within thirty days after the passage of this act, to act upon the condition submitted herein.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the following sums, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same are hereby, appropriated for the year ending June thirtieth, eighteen hundred and sixty-eight, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated:

For the mail steamship service between the United States and Brazil, one hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

For the mail steamship service between San Francisco, Japan, and China, five hundred thousand dollars: Provided, That so much of the act of Congress, approved February seventeenth, eighteen hundred and sixty-five, authorizing said service, as requires the said steamship [s] to touch at Honolulu, in the Sandwich islands, shall be, and the same is hereby, repealed; upon the express condition, however, that the contractors for said steamship service shall enter into contract to the satisfaction of the Postmaster General, agreeing to establish, within five months from the passage of this act, in lieu of said service released, a branch line of steamship service, carrying the United States mails, between the port in Japan used by the main line of steamships and the port of Shanghai in China, making continuous regular trips, connecting with the main line, both on the outward and homeward voyages, under the direction of the Postmaster General; which service shall be performed by first-class American seagoing steamships, and without additional charge to the United States.

For the overland mail transportation between the Missouri river and Folsom, and for marine mail transportation between New York and California, nine hundred thousand dollars.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to transfer two clerks from the third class to class four in the office of the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post Office Department, and a sum sufficient to pay the increased compensation required by said transfer, for the remainder of the current year, and the fiscal year ending June thirtieth, eighteen hundred and sixty-eight, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

APPROVED, February 18, 1867.

CHAP. XLII.—An Act supplementary to an Act to prevent Smuggling, and for other purposes, approved July eighteen, eighteen hundred and sixty-six.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the provisions of the act of Congress approved July eighteen, eighteen hundred and sixty-six, entitled "An act to prevent smuggling, and for other purposes," shall be so construed as not to affect any right of suit or prosecution which may have accrued under any prior acts of Congress repealed or supplied by said act, previous to July eighteen, eighteen hundred and sixty-six; and all such suits or prosecutions as have been, or shall be, commenced under such prior acts, for acts committed previous to July eighteen, eighteen hundred and sixty-six, shall be tried and disposed of, and judgment or decree executed as if said act of July eighteen, eighteen hundred and sixty-six had not been passed, anything therein contained to the contrary notwithstanding.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That section twenty-six of the act aforesaid be so amended that the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized in his discretion, to make such regulations as shall enable vessels engaged in the coasting trade between ports and places upon Lake Michigan exclusively and laden with American productions and free merchandise only, to unlade their cargoes without previously obtaining a permit to unlade.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That section twenty-five of said act be hereby amended by inserting the word "March" in the place of "July," in said section.

APPROVED, February 18, 1867.

CHAP. XLIII.—An Act amendatory of the several Acts respecting Copyrights.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That every proprietor of a book, pamphlet, map, chart, musical composition, print, engraving, or photograph, for which a copyright shall have been secured, who shall fail to deliver to the Library of Congress at Washington, a printed copy of every such book, pamphlet, map, chart, musical composition, print, engraving, or photograph, within one month after publication thereof, shall, for every such default, be subject to a penalty of twenty-five dollars, to be collected, by the Librarian of Congress, in the name of the United States, in any district or circuit court of the United States within the jurisdiction of which the delinquent may reside or be found.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That every such proprietor may transmit any book, pamphlet, map, chart, musical composition, print, engraving, or photograph, for which he may have secured a copyright, to the Librarian of Congress, by mail free of postage, provided the words "copyright matter" be plainly written or printed on the outside of the package containing the same; and it shall be the duty of the several postmasters and deputy postmasters, to give a receipt for the same, if requested, and when such package shall be delivered to them, or any of them, to see that the same is safely forwarded to its destination by mail, without cost or charge to said proprietor.

APPROVED, February 18, 1867.

CHAP. XLIV.—An Act to authorize the Payment of Prize Money to certain Officers and Enlisted Men of the Signal Corps of the Army.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the officers and enlisted men of the Signal corps of the Army, who were assigned to and performed duty on the fleet under command of Admiral D. G. Farragut, while the said fleet was engaged in the action in Mobile Bay, on the fifth day of August, Anno Domini eighteen hundred and sixty-four, from any money not otherwise appropriated, such sum or sums as prize money, to each of them, respectively, as will be equal to what has been allowed in distribution to officers or sailors of the Navy of corresponding rank, the same as if their names had been, in any case, borne on the ship's books.

some competent person, who shall be a practical printer, to take charge of and manage the Government Printing Office.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the person so elected shall be deemed an officer of the Senate, and shall be designated "Congressional Printer." He shall superintend the printing and binding of the Journals and such other documents as shall be ordered by each House of Congress, and shall superintend the execution of all the printing and binding for the respective Departments of the Government now required by law to be executed at the Government Printing Office, and shall, in all respects, be governed by the laws in force in relation to the Superintendent of Public Printing and the execution of the printing and binding.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the passage of this act and the election of a Congressional Printer in pursuance thereof, the office of Superintendent of Public Printing shall be abolished, and the salary of the said officer shall be at the rate of four thousand dollars a year.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect from and after its passage, and all laws inconsistent with its provisions are hereby repealed.

APPROVED, February 22, 1867.

CHAP. LX.—An Act to Alter the Places of holding the Circuit Courts of the United States for the Rhode Island District.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the first day of July, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-seven, the circuit courts of the United States for the district of Rhode Island shall commence and be held at the United States court-room in the city of Providence, on the fifteenth day of November, and on the fifth day of June, annually, instead of the places heretofore established by law: Provided, That when either of the days last named shall fall on Sunday the session of said court then next to be held shall commence on the Monday next following.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That all indictments, informations, suits, or actions, and proceedings of every kind, whether of a civil or criminal nature, pending in the said circuit court on the first day of July, Anno Domini eighteen hundred and sixty-seven, shall thereafter have day in court, and be proceeded in, heard, tried, and determined, on the days and at the place herein appointed for holding the said court, in the same manner, and with the same effect, as if the said court had been holden on the days and at the places heretofore directed by law.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That all writs, suits, actions, or recognizances, or other proceedings, which are or shall be instituted, served, commenced, or taken to the said court to have been holden as heretofore, directed by law, shall be returnable to, entered in, heard, tried, and have day in court, in said court, to be holden at the times and place by this act directed, in the same manner as might and ought to have been done had the said court been holden at the times and places heretofore directed by law.

APPROVED, February 22, 1867.

CHAP. LXI.—An Act to Establish and to Protect National Cemeteries.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in the arrangement of the national cemeteries established for the burial of deceased soldiers and sailors, the Secretary of War is hereby directed to have the same inclosed with a good and substantial stone or iron fence; and to cause each grave to be marked with a small headstone, or block, with the number of the grave inscribed thereon, corresponding with the number opposite to the name of the party, in a Register of Burials to be kept at each cemetery and at the office of the Quartermaster General, which shall set forth the name, rank, company, regiment, and date of death of the officer or soldier; or, if unknown, it shall be so recorded.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to cause to be erected at the principal entrance of each of the national cemeteries aforesaid, a suitable building to be occupied as a porter's lodge; and it shall be his duty to appoint a meritorious and trustworthy superintendent, who shall be selected from enlisted men of the Army, disabled in service, and who shall have the pay and allowances of an ordnance sergeant, to reside therein, for the purpose of guarding and protecting the cemetery and giving information to parties visiting the same. The Secretary of War shall detail some officer of the Army, not under the rank of major, to visit annually all of said cemeteries, and to inspect and report to him the condition of the same, and the amount of money necessary to protect them, to sod the graves, gravel and grade the walks and avenues, and to keep the grounds in complete order; and the said Secretary shall transmit the said report to Congress at the commencement of each session, together with an estimate of the appropriation necessary for that purpose.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That any person who shall willfully destroy, mutilate, deface, injure, or remove any monument, gravestone, or other structure, or shall willfully destroy, cut, break, injure, or remove any tree, shrub, or plant within the limits of any of said national cemeteries, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof before any district or circuit court of the United States, within any State or district where any of said national cemeteries are situated, shall be liable to a fine of not less than twenty-five nor more than one hundred dollars, or to imprisonment of not less than fifteen nor more than sixty days, according to the nature and aggravation of the offense. And the superintendent in charge of any national cemetery is hereby authorized to arrest forthwith any person engaged in committing any misdemeanor herein prohibited, and to bring such person before any United States commissioner or judge of any district or circuit court of the United States within any State or district where any of said cemeteries are situated, for the purpose of holding said person to answer for said misdemeanor, and then and there shall make complaint in due form.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War to purchase from the owner or owners thereof, at such price as may be mutually agreed upon between the Secretary and such owner or owners, such real estate as in his judgment is suitable and necessary for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of this act, and to obtain from said owner or owners title in fee-simple for the same. And in case the Secretary of War shall not be able to agree with said owner or owners upon the price to be paid for any real estate needed for the purpose of this act, or to obtain from said owner or owners title in fee-simple for the same, the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to enter upon and appropriate any real estate, which, in his judgment, is suitable and necessary for the purposes of this act.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War, or the owner or owners of any real estate thus entered upon and appropriated, are hereby authorized to make application for an appraisement of said real estate thus entered upon and appropriated to any district or circuit court within any State or district where such real estate is situated; and any of said courts is hereby authorized and required upon such application, and in such mode and under such rules and regulations as it may adopt, to make a just and equitable appraisement of the cash value of the several interests of each and every owner of the real estate and improvements thereon entered upon and appropriated for the purposes of this act, and in accordance with its provisions.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the fee-simple of all real estate thus entered upon and appropriated for the purposes of this act, and of which appraisement shall have been made under the order and direction of any of said courts, shall, upon payment to the owner or owners, respectively, of the appraised value, or in case said owner or owners refuse or neglect for thirty days after the appraisement of the cash value of the said real estate or improvements by any of said courts to demand the same from the Secretary of War, upon depositing the said appraised value in the said court making such appraisement to the credit of said owner or owners, respectively, be vested in the United States, and its jurisdiction over said real estate shall be exclusive and the same as its jurisdiction over real estate purchased, ceded, or appropriated for the purposes of navy-yards, forts, and arsenals. And the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and required to pay to the several owner or owners, respectively, the appraised value of the several pieces or parcels of real estate, as specified in the appraisement of any of said courts, or to pay into any of said courts by deposit, as hereinbefore provided, the said appraised value; and the sum necessary for such purpose may be taken from any moneys appropriated for the purposes of this act.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the sum of seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars is hereby appropriated to carry out the purposes of this act out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

APPROVED, February 22, 1867.

CHAP. LXII.—An Act to amend an Act entitled "An Act to incorporate the National Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphan Home," approved July twenty-fifth, eighteen hundred and sixty-six.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the board of trustees of the National Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphan Home shall hereafter consist of seven persons, a majority of whom shall constitute a quorum to do business; and D. K. Carter, Henry D. Cooke, Amos B. Eaton, J. W. Alvord, Horatio Bridge, Byron Sunderland, and Franklin A. Dick are hereby declared to be the trustees of said corporation, and they and their successors shall have the entire control and management of all property, moneys, and other securities now held or used for the benefit of said corporation, or which shall hereafter belong to it; and the said board of trustees shall have power to fill any vacancies occurring by death, resignation, or otherwise.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That immediately upon their organization the trustees shall elect a board of lady managers, consisting of thirteen persons, who shall have power to superintend and manage the internal affairs of the asylum, and to fill vacancies in their own board, to make their own by-laws, rules, and regulations, to hold their offices till the second Wednesday in January, eighteen-hundred and sixty-eight; their successors to be elected annually by the board of managers in the manner which their by-laws shall prescribe.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the surviving parent or legal guardian of any child placed under charge of said corporation may withdraw such child therefrom, and any minor over sixteen years of age, upon his or her request in writing, shall be discharged therefrom, at the discretion of the managers.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That so much of the act to which this is amendatory as is inconsistent with this act be, and the same is hereby repealed.

APPROVED, February 22, 1867.

CHAP. LXIII.—An Act to regulate Proceedings before Justices of the Peace in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That justices of the peace in the District of Columbia shall have jurisdiction in all cases where the amount claimed to be due for debt or damages arising out of contracts, express or implied, or damages for wrongs or injuries to persons or property, does not exceed one hundred dollars, except in cases involving the title to real estate, actions to recover damages for assault, or assault and battery, or for malicious prosecution, or actions against justices of the peace or other officers for misconduct in office, or in actions for slander, verbal or written.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the supreme court of said District shall make and establish rules of practice, and prepare and publish forms of pleadings for bringing all forms of actions and the trial thereof before said justices of the peace, and shall fix and determine a bill of fees and costs to be taxed and charged by the said justices, and by the constables of said District of Columbia in all civil suits in said District.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That there shall be no stay of execution on any judgment obtained before any justice of the peace for the wages of any servant or common laborer, or upon any judgment for less than five dollars; but execution may issue for the collection thereof immediately, and judgments shall be entered within two days after the trial of the action. But on all judgments or fines, except as aforesaid, stay of execution shall be entered as follows: for the sum of five dollars and not exceeding twenty dollars, one month; for all sums over twenty dollars and not exceeding forty dollars, two months; for all sums over forty dollars and not exceeding seventy-five dollars, four months; for all sum exceeding seventy-five dollars, six months: Provided, good and sufficient security be entered by a person or persons who may be at the time the owner of sufficient property located in said District, above all liabilities and exemptions, to secure said debt, costs, and interest.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That all justices of the peace may issue original writs, civil, and criminal, returnable before themselves; but any party or agent or attorney thereof may have the cause removed to the nearest justice upon filing an affidavit with said justice on the return day or day of trial of said action, that he or she does not believe said justice will give him or her a fair and impartial trial on account of prejudice or other reasonable cause.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That no person in said District shall be fined or imprisoned for disorderly conduct, unless such person was personally and individually guilty of acts disorderly in themselves; and any officer in said District who uses unnecessary and wanton severity in arresting or imprisoning any person shall be deemed guilty of assault and battery, and upon conviction thereof punished therefor.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That in all criminal cases or offences charged, the justice having jurisdiction thereof shall allow the defendant reasonable time to prepare for defense or obtain bail, and no exorbitant bail shall in any case be required.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That non-residents of said District shall not commence suit before any justice of the peace therein without first giving sufficient security for costs.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That when any person or persons shall be arrested on a warrant for committing an assault, or an assault and battery, or an affray, issued on the complaint of the party injured by any justice of the peace of said District, or in the case of an affray, on the complaint of any person who shall have seen the same, every such person or persons shall be taken before the justice who issued the warrant, or if he be absent or otherwise incapable of acting, then before the nearest other justice in said District; and he or they shall be admitted to plead guilty of the charge preferred, and the said justice before whom such plea may be pleaded shall have power, and he is hereby authorized, to assess such fine or penalty as is authorized by law, and enter judgment therefor against the person so pleading guilty and for cost, and issue execution thereon as in civil cases.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That all acts or parts of acts of the Legislature of Maryland, or of Congress, now in force, inconsistent with the provisions of this act, are hereby repealed; and this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

APPROVED, February 22, 1867.

CHAP. LXIV.—An Act to amend the Law of the District of Columbia in Relation to Judicial Proceedings therein.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That no appeal shall be allowed from a judgment of a justice of the peace, unless the appellant, with sufficient surety or sureties, approved by the justice, enter into an undertaking to satisfy and pay all intervening damages and costs arising on the appeal.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That when such undertaking has been entered into, the justice shall immediately file the original papers, including a copy of his docket entries, in the office of the clerk of the supreme court of the District of Columbia; and thereupon, as soon as the appellant shall have made the deposit for costs required by law, or obtained leave from one of the justices or from the court, to prosecute his appeal without a deposit, the clerk shall docket the cause, and shall issue a summons for the appellee to appear at the next trial term of the court, and thereafter the cause shall be proceeded with in the manner prescribed by the act of March one, eighteen hundred and twenty-three, entitled "An act to extend the jurisdiction of justices of the peace in the recovery of debts in the District of Columbia," except that the appellant need not file a petition as directed by said act.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That if the appellant fails to prosecute his appeal, the appellee may, upon making the aforesaid deposit for costs, have the cause docketed, and move for affirmance of the justice's judgment, or he may have a trial of the cause upon its merits.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That there shall be no supersedeas or stay of execution of the judgments of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, otherwise than by injunction or upon proceedings in error to the Supreme Court of the United States.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That mutual debts between the parties to an action, or between the testator or intestate of both parties, or either party, may be set off against each other by plea in bar, whether the said debts be of the same or a different nature; and if either debt arose by reason of a penalty, the exact sum to be set off shall be stated in the plea.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the plea of set-off may be: "That the plaintiff, at the commencement of the suit, was, and still is, indebted to the defendant in the sum of—dollars, for —, as appears by the particulars of the said debt, hereunto annexed; and he is willing that the same may be set off against the plaintiff's demand." And upon the trial of an issue upon said plea, judgment shall be for the balance found due, whether to the plaintiff or defendant, with costs. Mutual judgments recovered in said in said court may be set off against each other on motion of either party; and the court shall award execution for the balance found due against the party chargeable therewith.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That publication may be substituted for personal service of process upon any defendant who cannot be found, in suits for partition, divorce, by attachment, for the foreclosure of mortgages and deeds of trust, and for the enforcement of mechanics' liens and all other liens against real or personal property, and in all actions at law or in equity which have for their immediate object the enforcement or establishment of any lawful right, claim, or demand to or against any real or personal property within the jurisdiction of the court.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That no order for the substitution of publication for personal service shall be made till a summons for the defendant shall have been issued and returned "not to be found." And when an order for publication shall be made, it shall be in the following or equivalent form:

"In the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, the — day of —, 18—.
A. B., plaintiff,
v.
C. D., defendant. } (At law,) (In equity,) No.—.

On motion of the plaintiff, by Mr. —, his attorney, it is ordered that the defendant cause his appearance to be entered herein on or before the first rule day occurring forty days after this day; otherwise the cause will be proceeded with as in case of default."

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That all sales duly made in cases in which publication is substituted for personal service of process shall be good and valid, and shall vest any purchaser with a perfect title.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That the proceeding to enforce any lien shall be by bill or petition in equity, and the decree, besides subjecting the thing upon which the lien has attached to the satisfaction of the plaintiff's demand against the defendant, shall adjudge that the plaintiff recover his demand against the defendant, and that he may have execution thereof as at law.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That in actions against foreign corporations doing business in the District of Columbia, all process may be served on the agent of such corporation or person conducting its business aforesaid, or in case he is absent and cannot be found, by leaving a copy thereof at the principal place of business in the District, and such service shall be effectual to bring the corporation before the court.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That the power claimed and exercised as of common right by every landlord, of seizing, by his own authority, the personal chattels of his tenant for rent arrear, is hereby abolished, and, instead of it, the landlord shall have a tacit lien upon such of the tenant's personal chattels, upon the premises, as are subject to execution for debt, to commence with the tenancy and continue for three months after the rent is due, and until the termination of any action for such rent brought within said three months. And this lien may be enforced—

1. By attachment, to be issued upon affidavit that the rent is due and unpaid; or, if not due, that the defendant is about to remove or sell all or some of said chattels; or,

2. By judgment against the tenant and execution, to be levied on said chattels or any of them, in whosoever hands they may be found; or,

39TH CONG....2D SESS.

Laws of the United States.

3. By action against any purchaser of any of said chattels, with notice of the lien, in which action the plaintiff may have judgment for the value of the chattels purchased by the defendant, but not exceeding the rent arrear and damages.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That the declaration in replevin shall be in the following or equivalent form: "The plaintiff sues the defendant for (wrongfully taking and detaining,) (unjustly detaining) his, said plaintiff's goods and chattels, to wit: (describe them) of the value of $—. And the plaintiff claims that the same be taken from the defendant and delivered to him; or if they are eloiigned, that he may have judgment of their said value, and all mesne profits and damages, which he estimates at $—, besides costs." And at the time of filing the declaration the plaintiff, his agent or attorney, shall file an affidavit, sworn to before the clerk, stating—

1. That, according to affiant's information and belief, the plaintiff is entitled to recover possession of the chattels proposed to be replevied, being the same described in the declaration.

2. That the defendant has seized and detains, or detains the same.

3. That said chattels were not subject to such seizure or detention, and were not taken upon any writ of replevin. And he shall at the same time enter into an undertaking with surety, approved by the clerk, to abide by and perform the judgment of the court in the premises.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That if the officer's return of the writ of replevin be that he has served the defendant with copies of the declaration, notice to plead and summons, but that he could not get possession of the goods and chattels sued for, the plaintiff may prosecute the action for the value of the same and damages for detention; or he may renew the writ in order to get possession of the goods and chattels themselves. If the officer's return be that he has taken possession of the goods and chattels sued for, but that the defendant is not to be found, the court may order that the defendant appear to the action by some fixed day; and of this order the plaintiff shall cause notice to be given by publication in some newspaper of the District at least three times, the first of which shall be at least twenty days before the day fixed for the defendant's appearance; and if the defendant fail to appear, the court may proceed as in case of default after personal service.

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That if the defendant appear, he may plead not guilty, in which case all special matters of defense may be given in evidence, or he may plead specially.

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That whether the defendant plead, and the issue thereon joined is found against him; or his plea is held bad on demurrer; or he make default after personal service or after publication, the plaintiff's damages shall be ascertained by the jury trying the issue, where one is joined, or by a jury of inquest, where there is no issue of fact; and those damages shall be the full value of the goods, if eloiigned by the defendant, including in every case the loss sustained by the plaintiff by reason of the detention; and judgment shall pass for the plaintiff accordingly.

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That if the issue be found for the defendant, or the plaintiff dismiss or fail to prosecute his suit, the judgment shall be that the goods, if delivered to the plaintiff, be returned to the defendant with damages, or on failure, that the defendant recover against the plaintiff and his surety the damages by him sustained, to be assessed by the jury trying the issue; or, where the plaintiff dismisses or fails to prosecute his suit, by the jury of inquest.

SEC. 18. And be it further enacted, That if the defendant has eloiigned the things sued for, the court may instruct the jury, if they find for the plaintiff, to assess such damages as may compel the defendant to return the things; and the judgment shall be that the plaintiff recover against the defendant the value of the goods as found, to be discharged by the return of the things, with damages for detention, which the jury shall also assess.

SEC. 19. And be it further enacted, That where a suit is brought upon an open account, verified by the plaintiff's or his agent's affidavit, that the amount claimed by the plaintiff is justly payable by the defendant to the plaintiff, and the defendant fails to defend the suit, the plaintiff may have judgment final by default for said amount, with interest from the day specified in the declaration, without an inquiry of damages. If the affidavit be made before an officer, of whose authority to administer oaths the court cannot take notice, his authority must be verified by the certificate under official seal, if he have one, of the officer having authority to give such certificate.

SEC. 20. And be it further enacted, That where money is payable by two or more persons jointly or severally, as by joint obligors, covenantors, makers, drawers, or indorsers, one action may be sustained and judgment recovered against all or any of said parties, by whom the money is payable, at the option of the plaintiff. But an action against one or some of the parties by whom the money is payable may, while the litigation therein continues, be pleaded in bar of another action against another or others of said parties.

SEC. 21. And be it further enacted, That in case of the sale of things, real or personal, under a decree in equity, the decree confirming the sale shall divest the right, title, or interest sold out of the former owner, party to the suit, and vest it in the purchaser, without any conveyance by the officer or agent of the court conducting the sale. And of this transfer of title the decree shall be notice to all the world, when a copy thereof shall be registered among the land records of the District. Nevertheless, the court may order its officer or agent aforesaid to make a conveyance, if that mode be deemed preferable, in particular cases.

SEC. 22. And be it further enacted, That if the declaration state a cause of action of which the court has jurisdiction, but the verdict finds the money payable by the defendant to the plaintiff to be less than the lowest sum of which the court has jurisdiction, the plaintiff shall have judgment for the amount found due to him from the defendant, but without costs.

SEC. 23. And be it further enacted, That all laws and parts of laws in conflict with these provisions are repealed.

APPROVED, February 22, 1867.

CHAP. LXV.—An Act providing for the Punishment of certain Crimes therein named in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That if any person shall steal any money or other personal goods or chattels, the property of another, of the value of thirty-five dollars or upward, the person so offending shall be deemed guilty of larceny, and upon conviction thereof, shall be imprisoned in the penitentiary, and kept at hard labor not more than three years nor less than one year.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall steal or maliciously and feloniously destroy any bank bill, promissory note or notes, bill of exchange, order, receipt, warrant, draft, check, or bond, given for the payment of money, or receipt acknowledging the receipt of money or other property, or any Government bonds or other securities, or stamps, United States Treasury notes, or any public stocks, of the value of thirty-five dollars or upward, knowing the same to be such, any such person shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be imprisoned in the penitentiary, and kept at hard labor not more than three years nor less than one year.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall receive or buy any goods, or chattels, or bank bill or bills, or promissory note or notes, bill of exchange, order, receipt, draft, warrant, check, or bond, given for the payment of money, or any Government bond, United States Treasury note or notes, or other securities, or Government stamps, or stocks, of the value of thirty-five dollars or upward, which have been stolen, knowing the same to be stolen, with intent to defraud the owners thereof, every person so offending shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be imprisoned in the penitentiary, and kept at hard labor not more than three [years,] nor less than one year.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall steal any money, or other goods and chattels of any kind whatever, of less value than thirty-five dollars, the property of another, or shall steal or maliciously destroy any bank bill, promissory note, bill of exchange, order, warrant, draft, check, or bond, or any accountable receipt for money, given for the payment or acknowledgment of any sum under thirty-five dollars, or any United States Treasury note, or Government stamps of less value than thirty-five dollars, the property of another, or shall receive or buy the same, knowing the same to be stolen, for the purpose of defrauding the owner thereof, every such person so offending, on conviction thereof, shall make restitution to the party injured in twofold the value of the property stolen or destroyed, and be fined in any sum not exceeding two hundred dollars, or shall be imprisoned in the jail of said District for any time not exceeding six months, or both, at the discretion of the court.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That if any clerk, or servant of any private person, or any copartnership, (except persons within the age of sixteen years,) or any officer, agent, clerk, or servant of any incorporated company, shall embezzle or convert to his own use, or fraudulently take, make way with, or secrete with intent to embezzle or fraudulently convert to his own use, without the assent of his master or employers, any money, goods, rights of action, Government bonds, United States Treasury notes, or Government stamps, or other valuable security or effects whatever, belonging to any other person, which shall come into his possession, or under his care by virtue of such employment or office, he shall, upon conviction, be punished in the manner prescribed by law for feloniously stealing property of the value of the article or property so embezzled, taken, or secreted, or of the value of any sum of money payable or due upon any right in action so embezzled.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That every embezzlement of any evidence of debt, negotiable by delivery only, and actually executed by the master or employer of any such clerk, agent, officer, or servant, but not delivered or issued as a valid instrument, shall be deemed an offense within the meaning of the last preceding section.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That every person who shall buy, or in any way receive any money, goods, rights in action, Government bonds, United States Treasury notes, or other valuable security or effects whatever, or Government stamps, knowing the same to have been embezzled, taken, or secreted, contrary to the provisions of the two last sections, shall, upon conviction, be punished in the same manner, and to the same extent as therein prescribed upon a conviction of a servant, clerk, or agent for such embezzlement.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That if any carrier or other person, to whom any goods, money, right in action, or any valuable personal property or effects shall have been delivered to be transported or carried for hire, or any person employed in such transportation or carrying, shall, without the assent of his employer, take, embezzle, or convert to his own use such goods, money, right in action, property, or effects, or any part of them, and before delivery of such article at the place or to the person entitled to receive them, he shall, upon conviction, be punished in the manner prescribed by law for feloniously stealing property of the value of the article so taken, embezzled, converted, or secreted.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That all persons sentenced to imprisonment in the jail of said District may be employed at such labor, and under such regulations, as may be prescribed by the supreme court of said District, and the proceeds thereof applied to defray the expenses of the trial and conviction of any such person.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the supreme court of said District to make such rules for the government and discipline of the prisoners confined in said jail as shall be deemed necessary for the health, security, and the protection of said prisoners from cruel treatment by any person in charge thereof.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That on the trial of any person charged with a crime, the punishment whereof may be confinement in the penitentiary or District jail, the defendant shall be entitled to four peremptory challenges of jurors.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That in all criminal trials the said supreme court, or the judge trying the case, may allow such number of witnesses on behalf of the defendant as may appear necessary, and the fees thereof, with the costs of service, to be paid in the same manner as Government witnesses are now paid.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That all laws of said District inconsistent with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and that this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

APPROVED, February 22, 1867.

CHAP. LXVI.—An Act to restore Lieutenant Joseph P. Fyffe to his Grade in Active Service of the Navy.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be authorized to nominate, and with the advice and consent of the Senate to appoint, Lieutenant Joseph P. Fyffe to the active list of the Navy, and to restore him to the rank to which he may be entitled thereon.

APPROVED, February 22, 1867.

CHAP. LXVII.—An Act fixing the Compensation for the Bailiffs and Criers of the Courts of the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the bailiffs and criers, who are required by the marshal or courts of the District of Columbia to attend upon the district, circuit, or criminal court of said District, shall be paid by said marshal three dollars and fifty cents per day for each day's attendance, (instead of two dollars, as now provided by law,) commencing with the first of January, eighteen hundred and sixty-six.

APPROVED, February 22, 1867.

CHAP. LXXVI.—An Act to authorize the Construction of a Submerged Tubular Bridge across the Mississippi River at the City of Saint Louis.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the "Mississippi Submerged Tubular Bridge Company," a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Missouri, be, and the same is hereby, empowered to construct, maintain, and operate a submerged iron tubular bridge across the Mississippi river, between the city of Saint Louis, in the State of Missouri, and the city of East Saint Louis, in the State of Illinois, subject to all the conditions contained in said act of incorporation and not inconsistent with the provisions of this act. And in case of any litigation arising from any obstruction, or alleged obstruction, to the free navigation of said waters, the cause may be tried before the district court of the United States of any State in which any portion of said obstruction or bridge touches.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That any bridge built under the provisions of this act shall be tubular in construction, and sunk below the bed of said river, so that the top of said structure shall be below the bed of the channel of the Mississippi river, and so that the same shall in nowise interfere with or obstruct navigation when completed, or prevent a safe and expeditious transit for all classes of vessels upon said river during construction.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That any bridge erected under the provisions of this act shall be a lawful structure, and shall be recognized and known as a post-route, upon which also no higher charge shall be made for the transmission over the same of the mails, the troops, the munitions of war of the United States, than the rate per mile which the railroad companies terminating at either end receive for such services.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That no exclusive right or privilege shall ever be granted to any of the steam railroads now concentrating at Saint Louis or East Saint Louis by the said bridge company to use the same, but it shall be equally open to all, under such regulations and at such charges as may be fixed, not to exceed those now charged by the Wiggins Ferry Company.

CHAP. LXXVII.—An Act granting Lands to the State of Oregon to aid in the Construction of a Military Wagon-Road from Dalles City, on the Columbia river, to Fort Boise, on the Snake river.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there be, and hereby is, granted to the State of Oregon, to aid in the construction of a military wagon-road from Dalles City, on the Columbia river, by way of Camp Watson, Cañon City, and Mormon or Humboldt Basin, to a point on Snake river opposite Fort Boise, in Idaho Territory, alternate sections of public lands, designated by odd numbers, to the extent of three sections in width on each side of said road: Provided, That the lands hereby granted shall be exclusively applied to the construction of said road, and to no other purpose; and shall be disposed of only as the work progresses: And provided further, That any and all lands heretofore reserved to the United States, or otherwise appropriated by act of Congress or other competent authority, be, and the same are hereby, reserved from the operation of this act, except so far as it may be necessary to locate the route of said road through the same, in which case the right of way to the width of one hundred feet is granted: And provided further, That the grant hereby made shall not embrace any mineral lands of the United States.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the lands hereby granted to said State shall be disposed of by the Legislature thereof for the purpose aforesaid, and for no other; and the said road shall be and remain a public highway for the use of the Government of the United States, free from tolls and other charges upon the transportation of any property, troops, or mails of the United States.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That said road shall be constructed with such width, gradation, and bridges as to permit of its regular use as a wagon-road, and in such other special manner as the State of Oregon may prescribe.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the State of Oregon is authorized to locate and use in the construction of said road an additional amount of public lands, not previously reserved to the United States nor otherwise disposed of, and not exceeding ten miles in distance from it, equal to the amount reserved from the operation of this act in the first section of the same, to be selected in alternate odd sections as provided in section first of this act.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That lands hereby granted to said State shall be disposed of only in the following manner, that is to say: when the Governor of said State shall certify to the Secretary of the Interior that ten continuous miles of said road are completed, then a quantity of the land hereby granted, not to exceed thirty sections, may be sold, and so on from time to time until said road shall be completed; and if said road is not completed within five years no further sales shall be made, and the lands remaining unsold shall revert to the United States.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the United States surveyor general for the district of Oregon shall cause said lands so granted to be surveyed at the earliest practicable period after said State shall have enacted the necessary legislation to carry this act into effect.

APPROVED, February 25, 1867.

CHAP. LXXVIII.—An Act to amend the twenty-first section of an Act entitled "An Act further to prevent smuggling, and for other purposes," approved July eighteenth, eighteen hundred and sixty-six.

APPROVED, February 25, 1867.

CHAP. LXXIX.—An Act to amend section twelve, chapter two hundred and ninety-nine, of the Laws of the First Session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the last clause of section twelve, of chapter two hundred and ninety-nine, of the laws of first session Thirty-Ninth Congress, approved July twenty-eighth, eighteen hundred and sixty-six, is hereby amended by repealing all after and including the words "until otherwise provided by law," so as to place the judge advocates thereby authorized to be retained in service upon the same footing in respect to tenure of office and otherwise as other officers of the Army of the United States.

APPROVED, February 25, 1867.

CHAP. LXXX.—An Act to amend an Act granting the Right of Way over the Military Reserve at Fort Gratiot, Michigan.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the act entitled "An act granting the right of way over, and depot grounds upon, the military reserve at Fort Gratiot, in the State of Michigan," passed February the eighth, eighteen hundred and fifty-nine, be, and the same is hereby amended by inserting in the last proviso, after the word "wood," the words "or fire-proof," so that the same shall read, "that all buildings to be erected upon said reservation shall be of wood or fire-proof."

APPROVED, February 25, 1867.

CHAP. LXXXI.—An Act to change certain Collection Districts in Maryland and Virginia.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the districts of Oxford and Vienna, in the State of Maryland, be, and the same are hereby, abolished, and the office of collector of both said districts is hereby discontinued.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the district of Oxford, in said State, shall be annexed to the district of Baltimore; and all that part of the district of Vienna, in said State, bordering on the sea-coast, and all the waters which flow into the sea or bays on the east side of said district of Vienna, be, and the same are hereby, annexed to the district of Cherrystone, in the State of Virginia, and that all the residue of said district of Vienna be, and the same is hereby, made a new district, to be called the eastern district, and that the collector of said eastern district shall receive an annual salary of twelve hundred dollars, and shall reside at Crisfield, which shall be the port of entry for said new district.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the offices of surveyor at Snow Hill, and of deputy collector at Annamasset and Deal's Island be, and the same are hereby, discontinued.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

APPROVED, February 25, 1867.

CHAP. LXXXII.—An Act relative to Collection Districts in North Carolina.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the first day of October, Anno Domini eighteen hundred and sixty-six, there shall be in the State of North Carolina four collection districts, to wit: one, to be called the district of Albemarle, which shall include Albemarle, Currituck, and Croatan sounds, and all the waters, shores, harbors, rivers, creeks, bays, and inlets adjacent to and flowing into the said sounds, together with that part of Pamlico sound north of and including Loggerhead inlet, and all waters and shores appertaining thereto. And the port of entry for said district shall be at Plymouth. Another to be called the district of Pamlico, which shall include Pamlico sound, and all the waters, shores, harbors, rivers, creeks, bays, and inlets adjacent to and flowing into said sound, exclusive of the district of Albemarle, and including the south line of Neuse river to the northern entrance of Core sound, and the port of entry for said district of Pamlico shall be at Newbern. Another to be called the district of Beaufort, which shall include all the waters, shores, harbors, creeks, bays, and inlets south of the district of Pamlico, and north of and including New river and inlet; and the port of entry for said district of Beaufort shall be at Beaufort. And another to be called the district of Wilmington, which shall include all waters, shores, harbors, creeks, bays, and inlets south of the district of Beaufort to the southern boundary of the said State, and the port of entry for said district of Wilmington shall be at Wilmington. And the collector of each of said districts shall reside at the port of entry thereof, and shall be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and receive a salary at the rate of one thousand dollars per annum in addition to the fees of office: Provided, That such compensation shall in no case exceed the sum of twenty-five hundred dollars per annum in the aggregate.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury, should it at any time hereafter seem to him necessary, may change the port of entry in the district of Beaufort from Beaufort to Morehead city; and that all acts and parts of acts conflicting with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

APPROVED, February 25, 1867.

CHAP. LXXXIII.—An Act to amend the Act entitled "An Act further to provide for the Safety of the Lives of Passengers on board of Vessels propelled in whole or in part by Steam, to regulate the Salaries of Steamboat Inspectors, and for other purposes," approved July 25, 1866.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section nine of the act entitled "An act to amend the act entitled 'An act further to provide for the safety of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, to regulate the salaries of steamboat inspectors, and for other purposes,'" approved July twenty-five, eighteen hundred and sixty-six, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That all vessels navigating the bays, [bays,] inlets, rivers, harbors, and other waters of the United States, except vessels subject to the jurisdiction of a foreign Power, and engaged in foreign trade, and not owned in whole or in part by a citizen of the United States, shall be subject to the navigation laws of the United States; and all vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and navigating as aforesaid, shall also be subject to all rules and regulations consistent therewith, established for the government of steam vessels in passing, as provided in the twenty-ninth section of an act relating to steam vessels, approved the thirtieth day of August, eighteen hundred and fifty-two. And every sea-going steam vessel now subject or hereby made subject to the navigation laws of the United States, and to the rules and regulations aforesaid, shall, when under way, except upon the high seas, be under the control and direction of pilots licensed by the inspectors of steam vessels; vessels of other countries and public vessels of the United States only excepted: Provided, however, That nothing in this act, or in the act of which it is amendatory, shall be construed to annul or affect any regulation established by the existing law of any State requiring vessels entering or leaving a port in such State to take a pilot duly licensed or authorized by the laws of such State, or of a State situate upon the waters of the same port.

APPROVED, February 25, 1867.

CHAP. XCVIII.—An Act declaring Clinton Bridge, across the Mississippi River, at Clinton, in the State of Iowa, a Post Route.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the bridge across the Mississippi river, erected by the Albany Bridge Company and the Chicago, Iowa, and Nebraska Railroad Company, under the authority of the State[s] of Iowa and Illinois, between the towns of Clinton, Iowa, and Albany, Illinois, shall be a lawful structure, and shall be recognized and known as a post route, upon which also no higher charge shall be made for the transmission over the same of the mails, the troops, and the munitions of war of the United States, than the rate per mile paid for their transportation over the railroads or public highways leading to the said bridge.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the draw of said bridge shall be opened promptly upon reasonable signal for the passage of boats whose construction shall not be such as to admit of their passage under the permanent spans of said bridge, except when trains are passing over the same; but in no case shall unnecessary delay occur in opening the said draw during or after the passage of trains.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That in case of any litigation hereafter arising from any alleged obstruction to the free navigation of said river, the cause may be tried before the circuit court of the United States of any State in which any portion of said obstruction or bridge touches.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the right to alter or amend this act so as to prevent or remove all material obstructions to the navigation of said river, by the construction of said bridge, is hereby expressly reserved.

APPROVED, February 27, 1867.

APPROVED, February 28, 1867.

CHAP. CII.—An Act for the Relief of certain Drafted Men.

Whereas certain persons, drafted into the military service under the calls of the President of the United States, made February first, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, and March fourteenth, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, paid the sum of three hundred dollars each, being the amount of commutation fixed for such service under the fifth section of the amendatory enrollment act of February twenty-fourth, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, and the same persons were afterward again drafted, under the call of December nineteenth, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, (being within one year of the previous draft, and before the filling of the quotas assigned under the two calls first named above,) and were then required to enter the service or furnish substitutes; and whereas the true intent and meaning of the fifth section of the amendatory act aforesaid was to exempt persons thus paying commutation from further draft until that quota should be filled, and not exceeding one year: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to refund to each person drafted as aforesaid, who paid commutation and was also required to enter the service or furnish a substitute as aforesaid, the sum of three hundred dollars, being the sum of money so as aforesaid paid by him; and there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sum sufficient to make such payments.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War is authorized and required to refund from the commutation money the amount, (not exceeding three hundred dollars in any one case) paid by any person drafted during the late war who furnished a substitute or paid commutation money, wherever it shall appear that, under the decisions and rules of the War Department governing at the time, the said person was entitled to discharge from the obligation to render personal service under the draft for which he paid money or furnished a substitute, and to refund, in like manner, in all cases wherein it shall appear that a person so having paid commutation money or furnished a substitute was not legally liable to draft: Provided, That this section shall apply only to claims received at the War Department prior to its passage.

APPROVED, February 28, 1867.

CHAP. CIII.—An Act relative to the Port of Camden, New Jersey.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the port of Camden, in the State of New Jersey, be, and the same is hereby, annexed to the collection district of Philadelphia, and that an assistant collector, to be appointed in accordance with the laws of the United States, shall reside at Camden, who shall have power to enter and clear vessels in like manner as the collector of Philadelphia is authorized to do, but such assistant collector shall nevertheless act in conformity to such instructions and regulations as he shall from time to time receive from the collector of Philadelphia; and that the said assistant collector shall receive for his annual salary fifteen hundred dollars in full for all services to be by him performed, and in lieu of commissions and fees.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the assistant collector, appointed under this act, be, and he hereby is, authorized to enroll and license, according to the laws of the United States, all vessels engaged in the coasting trade and fisheries, owned in whole or in part by residents of that portion of the Bridgeton district lying north of Alloway's creek, in the county of Salem, in the State of New Jersey. And all such enrollments and licenses shall be as valid and effectual as if they had been effected in any other port of the United States; and the said assistant collector, in the enrollment and licensing of vessels, shall be subject to the laws of the United States, and liable to all the penalties and responsibilities imposed upon collectors in like cases.

APPROVED, February 28, 1867.

CHAP. CXLIII.—An Act to quiet Title to Land in the Towns of Santa Clara and Petaluma, in the State of California.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all the right and title of the United States to the land situated within the corporate limits of the towns of Santa Clara and Petaluma, in the State of California, as defined in the acts of the Legislature of that State incorporating said towns, be, and the same are hereby, relinquished and granted to the corporate authorities of said towns and their successors, in trust, for and with authority to convey so much of said land as is in the bona fide occupancy of parties upon the passage of this act, by themselves or tenants, to such parties: Provided, That this grant shall not extend to any reservation of the United States, nor prejudice any valid adverse right or claim, if such exist, to said land or any part thereof, nor preclude a judicial examination and adjustment thereof.

APPROVED, March 1, 1867.

CHAP. CXLIV.—An Act making Appropriation for the Repair, Preservation, and Completion of certain Public Works heretofore commenced under the authority of law, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following sums of money be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction and superintendence of the Secretary of War, for the repair, preservation, and completion of the following works heretofore commenced under the authority of law, and for the other purposes hereinafter named, that is to say:

For examination and survey of works of improvement for which appropriations have been heretofore made, and concerning which no sufficient information is now in possession of the Department, and for examination and survey at other points in the fourth and fifth sections of this act specified, that is to say: on the Atlantic coast, thirty thousand dollars; on the Pacific coast, twenty-five thousand dollars; on the northwestern lakes, seventy-five thousand dollars; on the western and northwestern rivers, one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars. And the Secretary of War, when the public interests require it, shall cause examinations or reexaminations to be made, with suitable surveys, of the works aforesaid and all other works provided for by this act, and shall make such changes or modifications of the plans heretofore adopted for their improvement as shall be necessary and proper. And he shall cause such needful examination of other harbors and places in the fourth and fifth sections of this act specified, upon the sea and lake coasts and on western rivers, to be made as will enable him to determine what improvements thereof are required to render them safe and convenient for the navigation of the naval and commercial vessels of the United States, and the costs of such improvements; and he shall make full report thereof, and of the plans deemed advisable therefor, to Congress on the first Monday of December next, for such action as may be judged expedient and right. And if, upon such examination and survey of works first herein named, being works now existing or in process of completion, and concerning which no information is now in the possession of the Department, there shall remain an unexpended balance of appropriation, properly applicable thereto, from the sums herein appropriated, which may, in the judgment of the Secretary of War, be judiciously applied toward the economical and needful continuation or completion of such works, the Secretary of War shall direct such balance to be applied and used accordingly; but no moneys shall be used for such purposes, excepting from the balances remaining from appropriations herein made for the specific examination and survey of such works.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the appropriation of seventy-five thousand dollars for constructing works, and improving the entrance into the harbor of Michigan City, Indiana, made in and by the act, approved June twenty-third, eighteen hundred and sixty-six, shall be expended for the purposes aforesaid, upon the terms, and in the manner hereinafter provided for other appropriations under this act: Provided, That it shall be first shown to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War that the sum of one hundred thousand dollars has been expended by the Michigan City Harbor Company in the construction of a safe and convenient harbor at that place: And provided, That the passage of vessels to and from said harbor shall be free, and not subject to toll or charge, and the money appropriated by this act shall be so applied as to complete or make the nearest approximation to completing the work for which each specific appropriation is made; and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War to apply the sums herein appropriated for other purposes than for examinations and surveys by contract: Provided, however, That when, from the nature of the work to be done, the same cannot, in the judgment of the Secretary, be made the subject of contract, the necessary expenditure may be otherwise ordered: Provided, That no contract shall be made except after public advertisement for proposals, in such form and manner as to secure general notice thereof, and the same shall only be made with the lowest responsible bidder therefor, upon security deemed sufficient in the judgment of the Secretary. And it shall be the duty of the said Secretary, at the earliest practicable time, to report to Congress the result of any survey or resurvey, with the plan adopted and the items of expenditure under said plan; and he shall make report of all action taken under the provisions of this act, and he shall accompany said report with a statement of the amount and date of all former appropriations for each work, and a full estimate for its entire and permanent completion, with the amount that can be profitably expended in the next fiscal year; and he shall also state in what collection district each work is located, and at or near what port of entry, light-house, or port, what amount of revenue was collected at the nearest port of entry for the last fiscal year, and, as far as practicable, what amount of commerce and navigation would be benefited by the completion of each particular work: Provided, That he shall continue to make such a report the first Monday of December, annually, until the works herein provided for shall be completed.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That whenever the Secretary of War shall invite proposals for any works, or for any material or labor for any works, there shall be separate proposals and separate contracts for each work, and also for each class of material or labor for each work, and he shall report to Congress, on the first Monday of December next, all the bids with the names of the bidders. All persons not holding commissions in the regular Army of the United States, who shall be intrusted with the disbursement of the funds appropriated for the works named in this act, shall be required to give bond and ample security for the faithful application of the same, and no such disbursing officer in the Army of the United States shall receive any commission or compensation for making such disbursements. And the moneys hereinbefore appropriated shall remain and be at the disposal of the Secretary of War, and subject to his control for the purposes named in this act, until the several works and improvements herein provided for are completed, any law or regulation to the contrary notwithstanding.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to cause examinations or surveys, or both, as aforesaid, to be made at the following points, namely: at the harbor of San Francisco, California, with a view to the removal of "Blossom Rock," if the same should be found necessary and essential to commerce; at Crescent City harbor, California; at Duxbury beach, Massachusetts; at mouth of Menomonee river, Green bay; at Saugatuck harbor, mouth of Kal[amegon] river, in Michigan; at Port Clinton, in Ohio; at Pultneyville, Lake Ontario, New York; and of the Tennessee river from Chattanooga to its mouth; at Reedy Island and Liston (tree) point, in the Delaware river and bay; at Richmond's Island, Cape Elizabeth, the Union river, and the Gut opposite the city of Bath, Maine; the Connecticut river, between Hartford and its mouth; at Block Island, in the State of Rhode Island; the reefs in Lake Michigan, near the harbor of Racine, in Wisconsin, with a view to a light-house and breakwater thereon; and the Potomac river, in the District of Columbia.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to cause a continuance of examinations or surveys, or both, at the following points, namely: of the Mississippi river, above the falls of Saint Anthony and between the falls of Saint Anthony and Rock Island rapids; of the Wisconsin river, and to continue the survey of the Illinois river, in accordance with the recommendation of General J. H. Wilson, in his report of January twelve, eighteen hundred and sixty-seven. And he is also directed to cause plans and estimates to be made of the most practicable and effective mode of improving the harbor at Galveston, Texas, and of erecting suitable breakwater at that point.

and the same is hereby, continued in full force and effect for three years from and after the close of the rebellion, as announced by the President of the United States by proclamation, bearing date the twentieth day of August, eighteen hundred and sixty-six.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the provisions of the joint resolution approved July twenty-fifth, eighteen hundred and sixty-six, entitled "A joint resolution in regard to rations of Union soldiers held as prisoners of war," shall be extended so as to allow commutation of rations at cost prices in the settlement of the accounts of all enlisted men of the Army, Navy, and Marine corps, who died while held as prisoners of war in the rebel States, or who, having been so held as prisoners of war, have died or may die subsequent to release; to be paid, however, only to the widow of such deceased person, if such widow remain unmarried, or in case there be no such widow, then to the surviving children of the deceased; or if there be no such widow or children, then to the parent or parents of the deceased; or if there be no such widow, children, parent, or parents, then to the brothers and sisters of the deceased.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That section one of the "act providing for the better organization of the military establishment," approved August third, eighteen hundred and sixty-one, authorizing the President to appoint an Assistant Secretary of War, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That so much of the act entitled "An act to increase and fix the military peace establishment of the United States, approved July twenty-eight, eighteen hundred and sixty-six, as relates to the promotion of assistant surgeons after three years' service, shall be amended so as to read "and persons who have served as surgeons or assistant surgeons three years in the volunteer force shall be eligible for promotion to the grade of captain."

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the act entitled "An act more effectually to provide for the national defense by establishing a uniform militia throughout the United States," approved May eight, seventeen hundred and ninety-two, and the several acts amendatory thereof, be, and they are hereby, amended by striking out the word "white."

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That (excepting the ordnance storekeeper and paymaster at the Springfield armory, who has the rank, pay, and allowances of a major of cavalry) all storekeepers of the Army shall hereafter have the rank, pay, and allowances of captains of cavalry, and the post chaplains now in service, or hereafter to be appointed, shall be commissioned by the President, and all vacancies occurring in the grade of chaplain, which is hereby established to rank as captain of infantry, shall be filled by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and all Army chaplains shall hereafter be on the same footing as to tenure of office, retirement, allowances for service and pensions, as now provided by law for other officers of the Army.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That in any case where a person entitled to receive payment of bounty, under the provisions of any law, shall make application therefor, or where such application shall be made by the proper representatives of such person, being deceased, and the discharge of such person has been lost, it shall be competent for the accounting officers to receive, in lieu of the actual production of such discharge, proof of the actual loss of the same, and secondary proof of its issue and contents, together with proof of the identity of the claimant or person deceased, under such rules defining the character and form of the evidence as the Paymaster General shall prescribe.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That section fifteen of the "act to increase the present military establishment of the United States, and for other purposes," approved July fifth, eighteen hundred and thirty-eight, be amended so that general officers shall not hereafter be excluded from receiving the additional ration for every five years' service; and it is hereby further provided that officers on the retired list of the Army shall have the same allowance of additional rations for every five years' service as officers in active service.

APPROVED, March 2, 1867.

CHAP. CXLVI.—An Act in relation to Persons Imprisoned under Sentence for Offenses against the Laws of the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all prisoners who have been, or shall hereafter be, convicted of any offense against the laws of the United States, and confined in any State prison or penitentiary in execution of the judgment or sentence upon such conviction, who so conduct themselves that no charge for misconduct shall be sustained against them, shall have a deduction of one month in each year made from the term of their sentence, and shall be entitled to their discharge so much the sooner, upon the certificate of the warden or keeper of such prison or penitentiary, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

APPROVED, March 2, 1867.

CHAP. CXLVII.—An Act for the Relief of certain Contractors for the Construction of Vessels-of-War and Steam Machinery.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized and directed to investigate the claims of all contractors for building vessels-of-war and steam machinery for the same under contracts made after the first day of May, eighteen hundred and sixty-one, and prior to the first day of January, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, and said investigation to be made upon the following basis: he shall ascertain the additional cost which was necessarily incurred by each contractor in the completion of his work by reason of any changes or alterations in the plans and specifications required, and delays in the prosecution of the work occasioned by the Government, which were not provided for in the original contract; but no allowance for any advance in the price of labor or material shall be considered, unless such advance occurred during the prolonged time for completing the work rendered necessary by the delay resulting from the action of the Government aforesaid, and then only when such advance could not have been avoided by the exercise of ordinary prudence and diligence on the part of the contractor, and from such additional cost, to be ascertained as aforesaid, there shall be deducted such sum as may have been paid each contractor for any reason heretofore over and above the contract price, and shall report to Congress a tabular statement of each case, which shall contain the name of the contractor, a description of the work, the contract price, the whole increased cost of the work over the contract price, and the amount of such increased cost caused by the delay and action of the Government as aforesaid, and the amount already paid the contractor over and above the contract price: Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy, under the resolution, shall investigate the claim of W. H. Webb for constructing the steamer Dunderberg, applying the provisions of this resolution in such investigation, except that proper consideration shall be given to the increased cost incurred by said Webb by reason of any alteration in the plans and specifications for the Dunderberg made during the progress of the work, whether such alterations were provided for in the original contract or not, when payment for the same was not embraced in the contract price.

APPROVED, March 2, 1867.

CHAP. CXLVIII.—An Act to amend an Act entitled "An Act to extend the Time for the Reversion to the United States of the Lands granted by Congress to aid in the Construction of a Railroad from Amboy, by Hillsdale and Lansing, to some Point on or near Traverse Bay, in the State of Michigan, and for the Completion of said Road," approved July three, eighteen hundred and sixty-six.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the first section of the act entitled "An act to extend the time for the reversion to the United States of the lands granted by Congress to aid in the construction of a railroad from Amboy, by Hillsdale and Lansing, to some point on or near Traverse bay, in the State of Michigan, and for the completion of said road," approved July three, eighteen hundred and sixty-six, be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the word "February," where it occurs in said section, and inserting the word "July" in lieu thereof.

APPROVED, March 2, 1867.

CHAP. CXLIX.—An Act to authorize the Building of Light-Houses therein mentioned, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to provide, by contract, for building light-houses at the following points, to wit:

For building a light-house on a proper site at Trowbridge Point, in Thunder bay, in the State of Michigan, at a cost not exceeding ten thousand dollars.

For building a light-house on a proper site at Mendota, on Lake Superior, in the State of Michigan, at a cost not exceeding fourteen thousand dollars.

For building a light-house on a proper site at Santa Cruz, in the State of California, at a cost not exceeding ten thousand dollars.

For building a light-house at Pigeon river, or vicinity, Lake Superior, Minnesota, fifteen thousand dollars.

For building a light-house on a proper site at or near Braddock's Point, Georgia, at a cost not exceeding fifteen thousand dollars.

For building a light-house to mark Tybee Island Knoll, Georgia, at a cost not exceeding fifteen thousand dollars.

For building range-lights on Morris Island, as guides in crossing Charleston bar, South Carolina, at a cost not exceeding fifteen thousand dollars.

For rebuilding the light-house on a proper site at Deepwater shoals, in James river, Virginia, at a cost not exceeding sixteen thousand dollars.

For rebuilding light-house tower and keeper's dwelling on a proper site at Saint Simon's, Georgia, at a cost not exceeding forty-five thousand dollars.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Light-House Board is hereby directed to make a survey, if no survey has been made, at Crossledge shoal, or at some other point in the Delaware bay, in the neighborhood of said shoal, and report on the survey to be made, or which has already been made, to the next Congress as to the feasibility of erecting thereon a permanent light-house, and an estimate of the amount necessary to be appropriated therefor.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That no contract shall be made except after public advertisement for proposals in such form and manner as to secure general notice thereof, and the same shall only be made with the lowest bidder therefor, upon security deemed sufficient in the judgment of the Secretary.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the passage of this act, the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to regulate and fix the salaries of the respective keepers of light-houses in such manner as he shall deem just and proper: Provided, That the whole sum allowed shall not exceed an average of six hundred dollars to each keeper.

APPROVED, March 2, 1867.

CHAP. CL.—An Act amendatory of "An Act to provide a Temporary Government for the Territory of Montana," approved May twenty-six, eighteen hundred and sixty-four.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Legislative Assemblies of the several Territories of the United States shall not, after the passage of this act, grant private charters or especial privileges, but they may, by general incorporation acts, permit persons to associate themselves together as bodies corporate for mining, manufacturing, and other industrial pursuits.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the probate courts of the Territory of Montana, in their respective counties, in addition to their probate jurisdiction, are hereby authorized to hear and determine civil causes wherein the damage or debt claimed does not exceed five hundred dollars, and such criminal cases arising under the laws of the Territory as do not require the intervention of a grand jury: Provided, That they shall not have jurisdiction in any matter in controversy when the title or right to the peaceable possession of land may be in dispute, or chancery or divorce causes: And provided further, That in all cases an appeal may be taken from any order, judgment, or decree of said probate court to the district court.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the chief justice and associate justices of said Territory and the Territory of Idaho shall each receive an annual salary of thirty-five hundred dollars.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the judges of the supreme court of said Territory, or a majority of them, shall, when assembled at the seat of government of said Territory, define the judicial districts of said Territory, and assign the judges who may be appointed for said Territory to the several districts, and shall also fix and appoint the times and places for holding the courts in the several counties or subdivisions in each of said judicial districts, and alter the times and places of holding the courts as to them shall seem proper and convenient, but not less than two terms shall be held at each place of holding court each year.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That for the purpose of reviving the legislative functions of the Territory of Montana, which have been adjudged therein to have lapsed, the Governor of said Territory be, and he is hereby, authorized, on or before the first day of July, eighteen hundred and sixty-seven, to divide said Territory into legislative districts for the election of members of the Council and House of Representatives, and to apportion among said districts the number of members of the Legislative Assembly provided for in the organic act of said Territory, and the election of said members of the Legislative Assembly shall be held at such time and shall be conducted in the manner prescribed by the Legislative Assembly of said Territory at the session thereof, begun and holden at the city of Bannack, in eighteen hundred and sixty-four and eighteen hundred and sixty-five, and the qualifications of voters shall be the same as that prescribed by said organic act, saving and excepting the distinction therein made on account of race or color, and the Legislative Assembly, so elected, shall convene at the time prescribed by said Legislative Assembly at the session last aforesaid. The apportionment provided for in this section shall be based upon such an enumeration of the qualified electors of the several legislative districts as shall appear from the election returns in the office of the secretary of said Territory, and from such other sources of information as will enable the Governor, without taking a new census, to make an apportionment which shall fairly represent the people of the several districts in both Houses of the Legislative Assembly, but the Legislature may at any time change the legislative districts of the Territory as fixed by the Governor.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That all acts passed at the two sessions of the so-called Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Montana, held in eighteen hundred and sixty-six, are hereby disapproved and declared null and void, except such acts as the Legislative Assembly herein authorized to be elected shall by special act in each case reenact: Provided, however, That in all claims of vested rights thereunder, the party claiming the same shall not, by reason of anything in this section contained, be precluded from making and testing said claim in the courts of said Territory: And provided further, That no legislation or pretended legislation in said Territory since the adjournment of the first Legislative Assembly shall be deemed valid until the election of the Legislative Assembly herein provided for shall take place.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That from and after the first day of April next the salary of each of the judges of the several supreme courts in each of the organized Territories (except Montana and Idaho) shall be two thousand five hundred dollars.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

APPROVED, March 2, 1867.

CHAP. CLI.—An Act to amend an Act entitled "An Act to provide a Temporary Government for the Territory of Idaho," approved March three, eighteen hundred and sixty-three.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the judges of the supreme court of said Territory, or a majority of them, shall, when assembled at the seat of government of said Territory, define the judicial districts of said Territory, and assign the judges who may be appointed for said Territory to the several districts; and shall also fix and appoint the times and places for holding court in the several counties or subdivisions in each of said judicial districts, and alter the times and places of holding the courts, as to them shall seem proper and convenient.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the next session of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Idaho shall be held commencing on the first Monday in December, A. D. eighteen hundred and sixty-eight, and thereafter the Legislative Assembly of said Territory shall be held biennially. And the next election for members of the Legislative Assembly of said Territory shall be held on the second Monday in August, A. D. eighteen hundred and sixty-eight, and thereafter said election shall be held biennially.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the members of the House of Representatives of said Legislative Assembly shall be elected for the term of two years; and the members of the Council of said Legislative Assembly shall be elected for the term of four years: Provided, That at the first election hereafter one half of the members of said Council shall be elected for the term of two years, and the remaining half for the term of four years; and the districts wherein members of the Council are to be elected for the term of two years and the districts wherein members of the Council are to be elected for the term of four years at the next election shall be determined by proclamation of the Governor of said Territory: Provided, That in all counties and election districts which shall be entitled to elect two members of the Council, one of said members shall be elected for two years and the other for four years.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

APPROVED, March 2, 1867.

CHAP. CLII.—An Act to amend an Act entitled "An Act authorizing the Construction of a Jail in and for the District of Columbia," approved June [July] twenty-five, eighteen hundred and sixty-six.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That so much of the sixth section of the act entitled "An act authorizing the construction of a jail in and for the District of Columbia," approved June [July] twenty-five, eighteen hundred and sixty-six, as specifies the amounts to be raised and paid into the Treasury of the United States by the cities of Washington and Georgetown, respectively, before the completion of said jail, is hereby repealed.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the proper authorities of the city of Washington, and they are hereby required, to raise, by tax or otherwise, and pay into the Treasury of the United States, at or before the time of the completion of said jail, the sum of seventy-eight thousand dollars; and it shall be the like duty of the proper authorities of the city of Georgetown, and they are hereby required, to raise, by tax or otherwise, and pay into the Treasury of the United States, at or before the time of the completion of said jail, the sum of twelve thousand dollars.

APPROVED, March 2, 1867.

CHAP. CLIII.—An Act to provide for the more efficient Government of the Rebel States.

Whereas no legal State governments or adequate protection for life or property now exists in the rebel States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Mississippi, Alabama, Louisiana, Florida, Texas, and Arkansas; and whereas it is necessary that peace and good order should be enforced in said States until loyal and republican State governments can be legally established: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That said rebel States shall be divided into military districts and made subject to the military authority of the United States as hereinafter prescribed, and for that purpose Virginia shall constitute the first district; North Carolina and South Carolina the second district; Georgia, Alabama, and Florida the third district; Mississippi and Arkansas the fourth district; and Louisiana and Texas the fifth district.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the President to assign to the command of each of said districts an officer of the Army, not below the rank of brigadier general, and to detail a sufficient military force to enable such officer to perform his duties and enforce his authority within the district to which he is assigned.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of each officer assigned as aforesaid to protect all persons in their rights of person and property, to suppress insurrection, disorder, and violence, and to punish, or cause to be punished, all disturbers of the public peace and criminals; and to this end he may allow local civil tribunals to take jurisdiction of and to try offenders, or, when in his judgment it may be necessary for the trial of offenders, he shall have power to organize military commissions or tribunals for that purpose, and all interference under color of State authority with the exercise of military authority under this act shall be null and void.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That all persons put under military arrest by virtue of this act shall be tried without unnecessary delay, and no cruel or unusual punishment shall be inflicted, and no sentence of any military commission or tribunal hereby authorized, affecting the life or liberty of any person, shall be executed until it is approved by the officer in command of the district, and the laws and regulations for the government of the Army shall not be affected by this act, except in so far as they conflict with its provisions: Provided, That no sentence of death under the provisions of this act shall be carried into effect without the approval of the President.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That when the people of any one of said rebel States shall have formed a constitution of government in conformity with the Constitution of the United States in all respects, framed by a convention of delegates elected by the male citizens of said State, twenty-one years old and upward, of whatever race, color, or previous condition, who have been resident in said State for one year previous to the day of such election, except such as may be disfranchised for participation in the rebellion or for felony at common law, and when such constitution shall provide that the elective franchise shall be enjoyed by all such persons as have the qualifications herein stated for electors of delegates, and when such constitution shall be ratified by a majority of the persons voting on the question of ratification who are qualified as electors for delegates, and when such constitution shall have been submitted to Congress for examination and approval, and Congress shall have approved the same, and when said State, by a vote of its Legislature, elected under said constitution, shall have adopted the amendment to the Constitution of the United States, proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and known as article fourteen, and when said article shall have become a part of the Constitution of the United States, said State shall be declared entitled to representation in Congress, and Senators and Representatives shall be admitted therefrom on their taking the oath prescribed by law, and then and thereafter the preceding sections of this act shall be inoperative in said State: Provided, That no person excluded from the privilege of holding office by said proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States shall be eligible to election as a member of the convention to frame a constitution for any of said rebel States, nor shall any such person vote for members of such convention.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That, until the people of said rebel States shall be by law admitted to representation in the Congress of the United States, any civil governments which may exist therein shall be deemed provisional only, and in all respects subject to the paramount authority of the United States at any time to abolish, modify, control, or supersede the same; and in all elections to any office under such provisional governments all persons shall be entitled to vote, and none others, who are entitled to vote, under the provisions of the fifth section of this act; and no person shall be eligible to any office under any such provisional governments who would be disqualified from holding office under the provisions of the third article of said constitutional amendment.

CHAP. CLIV.—An Act regulating the Tenure of certain Civil Offices.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That every person holding any civil office to which he has been appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and every person who shall hereafter be appointed to any such office, and shall become duly qualified to act therein, is, and shall be entitled to hold such office until a successor shall have been in like manner appointed and duly qualified, except as herein otherwise provided: Provided, That the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of War, of the Navy, and of the Interior, the Postmaster General, and the Attorney General, shall hold their offices respectively for and during the term of the President by whom they may have been appointed and for one month thereafter, subject to removal by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That when any officer appointed as aforesaid, excepting judges of the United States courts, shall, during a recess of the Senate, be shown, by evidence satisfactory to the President, to be guilty of misconduct in office, or crime, or for any reason shall become incapable or legally disqualified to perform its duties, in such case, and in no other, the President may suspend such officer and designate some suitable person to perform temporarily the duties of such office until the next meeting of the Senate, and until the case shall be acted upon by the Senate, and such person so designated shall take the oaths and give the bonds required by law to be taken and given by the person duly appointed to fill such office; and in such case it shall be the duty of the President, within twenty days after the first day of such next meeting of the Senate, to report to the Senate such suspension, with the evidence and reasons for his action in the case, and the name of the person so designated to perform the duties of such office. And if the Senate shall concur in such suspension and advise and consent to the removal of such officer, they shall so certify to the President, who may thereupon remove such officer, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint another person to such office. But if the Senate shall refuse to concur in such suspension, such officer so suspended shall forthwith resume the functions of his office, and the powers of the person so performing its duties in his stead shall cease, and the official salary and emoluments of such officer shall, during such suspension, belong to the person so performing the duties thereof, and not to the officer so suspended: Provided, however, That the President, in case he shall become satisfied that such suspension was made on insufficient grounds, shall be authorized, at any time before reporting such suspension to the Senate as above provided, to revoke such suspension and reinstate such officer in the performance of the duties of his office.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the President shall have power to fill all vacancies which may happen during the recess of the Senate, by reason of death or resignation, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session thereafter. And if no appointment, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall be made to such office so vacant or temporarily filled as aforesaid during such next session of the Senate, such office shall remain in abeyance, without any salary, fees, or emoluments attached thereto, until the same shall be filled by appointment thereto, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and during such time all the powers and duties belonging to such office shall be exercised by such other officer as may by law exercise such powers and duties in case of a vacancy in such office.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to extend the term of any office the duration of which is limited by law.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall, contrary to the provisions of this act, accept any appointment to or employment in any office, or shall hold or exercise or attempt to hold or exercise, any such office or employment, he shall be deemed, and is hereby declared to be, guilty of a high misdemeanor, and, upon trial and conviction thereof he shall be punished therefor by a fine not exceeding ten thousand dollars, or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That every removal, appointment, or employment, made, had, or exercised, contrary to the provisions of this act, and the making, signing, sealing, countersigning, or issuing of any commission or letter of authority for or in respect to any such appointment or employment, shall be deemed, and are hereby declared to be, high misdemeanors, and, upon trial and conviction thereof, every person guilty thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding ten thousand dollars, or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or both said punishments, in the discretion of the court: Provided, That the President shall have power to make out and deliver, after the adjournment of the Senate, commissions for all officers whose appointment shall have been advised and consented to by the Senate.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Senate, at the close of each session thereof, to deliver to the Secretary of the Treasury, and to each of his assistants, and to each of the Auditors, and to each of the Comptrollers in the Treasury, and to the Treasurer, and to the Register of the Treasury, a full and complete list, duly certified, of all the persons who shall have been nominated to and rejected by the Senate during such session, and a like list of all the offices to which nominations shall have been made and not confirmed and filled at such session.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That whenever the President shall, without the advice and consent of the Senate, designate, authorize, or employ any person to perform the duties of any office, he shall forthwith notify the Secretary of the Treasury thereof; and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury thereupon to communicate such notice to all the CHAP. CLV.—An Act to declare valid and conclusive certain Proclamations of the President, and acts done in pursuance thereof, or of his Orders, in the Suppression of the late Rebellion against the United States.

or as guilty of any disloyal practice in aid thereof, or of any violation of the laws or usages of war, or of affording aid and comfort to rebels against the authority of the United States, and all proceedings and acts done or had by courts-martial or military commissions, or arrests and imprisonments made in the premises by any person by the authority of the orders or proclamations of the President, made as aforesaid, or in aid thereof, are hereby approved in all respects, legalized, and made valid, to the same extent and with the same effect as if said orders and proclamations had been issued and made, and said arrests, imprisonments, proceedings, and acts had been done under the previous express authority and direction of the Congress of the United States, and in pursuance of a law thereof previously enacted and expressly authorizing and directing the same to be done. And no civil court of the United States, or of any State, or of the District of Columbia, or of any district or Territory of the United States, shall have or take jurisdiction of, or in any manner reverse any of the proceedings had or acts done as aforesaid, nor shall any person be held to answer in any of said courts for any act done or omitted to be done in pursuance or in aid of any of said proclamations or orders, or by authority or with the approval of the President within the period aforesaid, and respecting any of the matters aforesaid; and all officers and other persons in the service of the United States, or who acted in aid thereof, acting in the premises shall be held prima facie to have been authorized by the President; and all acts and parts of acts heretofore passed, inconsistent with the provisions of this act, are hereby repealed.

APPROVED, March 2, 1867.

CHAP. CLVI.—An Act to provide for the Allotment of the Members of the Supreme Court among the Circuits, and for the Appointment of a Marshal for the Supreme Court.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Chief Justice of the United States and the associate justices of the Supreme Court shall be allotted among the circuits now existing by order of the court; and whenever a new allotment shall be required or found expedient by reason of alteration of one or more circuits, or of the new appointment of a Chief Justice or associate justice, or otherwise, it shall the duty of the court to make the same; and if a new allotment shall become necessary at any other time than during the term, such allotment shall be made by the Chief Justice, and shall be binding until the next term, and until a new allotment by the court.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Supreme Court may appoint a marshal for said court, whose compensation shall be three thousand five hundred dollars per annum; and said marshal shall take charge of all property of the United States used by said court or its members, and shall serve and execute all processes and orders issuing out of said court, or made by the Chief Justice or an associate justice, in pursuance of law; and shall pay into the Treasury of the United States all fees and compensation allowed by law, and render a true account thereof, at the close of each term, to the Secretary of the Interior; and the said marshal, with the approval of the Chief Justice, may appoint assistants and messengers in place of the crier and messengers now employed, with such compensation as is or may be allowed to officers of the House of Representatives of similar grade; and all acts and parts of acts now in force relating to the marshal of the District of Columbia, shall apply to the said marshal of the Supreme Court, except so far as in this act otherwise provided.

APPROVED, March 2, 1867.

CHAP. CLVII.—An Act to amend an Act entitled "An Act to continue, alter, and amend the Charter of the City of Washington," approved May seventeen, eighteen hundred and forty-eight.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

APPROVED, March 2, 1867.

CHAP. CLVIII.—An Act to establish a Department of Education.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there shall be established, at the city of Washington, a Department of Education, for the purpose of collecting such statistics and facts as shall show the condition and progress of education in the several States and Territories, and of diffusing such information respecting the organization and management of schools and school systems, and methods of teaching, as shall aid the people of the United States in the establishment and maintenance of efficient school systems, and otherwise promote the cause of education throughout the country.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a Commissioner of Education, who shall be intrusted with the management of the Department herein established, and who shall receive a salary of four thousand dollars per annum, and who shall have authority to appoint one chief clerk of his Department, who shall receive a salary of two thousand dollars per annum, one clerk who shall receive a salary of eighteen hundred dollars per annum, and one clerk who shall receive a salary of sixteen hundred dollars per annum, which said clerks shall be subject to the appointing and removing power of the Commissioner of Education.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Education to present annually to Congress a report embodying the results of his investigations and labors, together with a statement of such facts and recommendations as will, in his judgment, subserve the purpose for which this Department is established. In the first report made by the Commissioner of Education under this act, there shall be presented a statement of the several grants of land made by Congress to promote education, and the manner in which these several trusts have been managed, the amount of funds arising therefrom, and the annual proceeds of the same, as far as the same can be determined.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner of Public Buildings is hereby authorized and directed to furnish proper offices for the use of the Department herein established.

APPROVED, March 2, 1867.

CHAP. CLIX.—An Act declaring and fixing the Rights of Volunteers as a part of the Army.

ment of additional or longevity rations he is entitled to, and also in fixing the relative rank to be given to an officer as between himself and others having the same grade and date of appointment and commission, there shall be taken into account and credited to such officer whatever time he may have actually served, whether continuously or at different periods, as a commissioned officer of the United States, either in the regular Army, or, since the nineteenth day of April, eighteen hundred and sixty-one, in the volunteer service, either under appointment or commission from the Governor of a State, or from the President of the United States; and the provision herein contained as to relative rank shall apply to all appointments that have already been made under the "Act to fix the military peace establishment of the United States," approved July twenty-eight, eighteen hundred and sixty-six.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That in all matters relating to pay, allowances, rank, duties, privileges, and rights of officers and soldiers of the Army of the United States, the same rules and regulations shall apply without distinction for such time as they may be or have been in the service, alike to those who belong permanently to that service and to those who, as volunteers, may be or have been commissioned or mustered into the military service under the laws of the United States for a limited period. But nothing in this act shall be construed as affecting or in any way relating to the militia of the several States when called into the service of the United States.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the act entitled "An act to increase the pay of soldiers in the United States Army, and for other purposes," approved June twentieth, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, shall not be so construed as to increase the emoluments of the commissioned officers of the Army at the date of its passage, and the first section of the act entitled "An act to amend the several acts heretofore passed to provide for the enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March third, eighteen hundred and sixty-five, was not intended to be retrospective or retroactive in its operation, and shall not be so construed.

APPROVED, March 2, 1867.

CHAP. CLX.—An Act to grant certain Privileges to the Alexandria, Washington, and Georgetown Railroad Company, in the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the consent of Congress be, and the same is hereby, granted to the Alexandria, Washington, and Georgetown Railroad Company to use steam power in drawing the cars of said company on the structure across the Potomac river erected by said company, under the provisions of the act entitled "An act to extend the charter of the Alexandria and Washington Railroad Company, and for other purposes," approved March three, eighteen hundred and sixty-three, and along the railway now laid by said company, or which may be hereafter laid, under the provisions of the said act, along Maryland avenue, in the city of Washington, to the present depot of the Washington branch of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, subject always, and in all particulars, to such restrictions and regulations concerning the use of such steam power as the corporation of Washington may, by its ordinances, at any time impose upon, or at any time require of, the said railroad company.

APPROVED, March 2, 1867.

CHAP. CLXI.—An Act authorizing Limited Partnerships in the District of Columbia.

for the transaction of any mercantile, mechanical, or manufacturing business within the District of Columbia may be formed by two or more persons upon the terms, with the rights and powers, and subject to the conditions and liabilities herein prescribed.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That such partnership may consist of one or more persons, who shall be called general partners, and who shall be jointly and severally responsible as general partners are by law, and of one or more persons, who shall contribute in actual cash payments a specific sum as capital to the common stock, who shall be called special partners, and who shall not be liable for the debts of the partnership beyond the fund so contributed by him or them to the capital; but the number of special partners shall in no partnership exceed six.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That persons desirous of forming such partnerships shall make and severally sign a certificate, which shall contain the name or firm under which such partnership is to be conducted; the general nature of the business intended to be transacted; the names of all the general and special partners intended therein, distinguishing which are general and which are special partners, and their respective places of residence; the amount of capital which each special partner shall have contributed to the common stock; the period at which the partnership is to commence, and the period at which it is to terminate.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the certificate shall be acknowledged by the several persons signing the same before a notary public or a judge of any court in the District of Columbia, and such acknowledgments shall be made and certified in the same manner as the acknowledgments of deeds of land, and when so acknowledged and certified shall be filed in the office of the clerk of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and shall be recorded by him at large in a book kept for that purpose open to public inspection.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That at the time of filing the original certificate, with the evidence of the acknowledgment thereof, as before directed, an affidavit of one or more of the general partners shall also be filed therewith in the same office, stating that the sums specified in the certificate to have been contributed by each of the special partners to the common stock have been actually and in good faith paid in cash.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That no such partnership shall be deemed to have been formed until a certificate shall have been made, acknowledged, filed, and recorded, nor until an affidavit shall have been made and filed as above directed; and if any false statement (not the result of accident or mistake) shall be made in such certificate or affidavit, all the persons interested in such partnership shall be liable for all the engagements thereof as general partners.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the partners shall publish the terms of the partnership, when registered, three times a week for at least four weeks, immediately after such registry, in two newspapers to be designated by the clerk of the court in which such registry shall be made, the first publication to appear within one week after the registry, and if such publication be not made, the partnership shall be deemed general. The affidavits of the publication of such notice by the editors or publishers of the newspapers in which the same shall have been published shall be filed with the clerk directing the same, and shall be prima facie evidence of the facts therein contained; the affidavit of any one editor or publisher of each newspaper being sufficient.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That every renewal or continuance of such partnership beyond the time originally fixed for its duration shall be certified, acknowledged, and recorded, and an affidavit of a general partner be made and filed, and notice be given in the manner herein required for its original formation; and every such partnership which shall be otherwise renewed and continued shall be deemed a general partnership.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That every alteration which shall be made in the names of the partners, in the nature of the business, or in the capital or shares thereof, or in any other matter specified in the original certificate, shall be deemed a dissolution of the partnership; and every such partnership which shall in any manner be carried on after any such alteration shall have been made shall be deemed a general partnership, unless renewed as a special partnership, under the provisions of the last preceding section.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That the business of the partnership may be conducted under the name of any one or more of the general partners, and with or without the addition of the word Co. or company, as the parties may determine; and in any action or suit to be brought on any contract or engagement of the partnership, or to enforce any liability of the same, the general partner or partners whose name or names shall be used in said firm or business shall be the only necessary defendants; and any judgment or decree recovered against said defendant or defendants shall have the same legal effect and operation, and execution thereon shall be enforced and have like effect against the partnership assets as if the judgment or decree had been recovered against the general partners.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That if the name of any special partner shall be used in the firm with his privacy, he shall be deemed a general partner, and the general partners only shall transact the business; and if a special partner shall interfere, contrary to this provision, he shall be deemed a general partner, but he may from time to time examine into the state and progress of the partnership concerns and advise as to their management.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That no part of the sum which any special partner shall have contributed to the capital stock shall be withdrawn by him or paid or transferred to him in the shape of dividends, profits, or otherwise, during the continuance of the partnership, but any partner may annually receive lawful interest on the sum so contributed by him if the payment of such interest shall not reduce the original amount of such capital; and if, after payment of such interest, any profits shall remain to be divided, he may also receive his portion of such profits.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That if it shall appear that, by the payment of interest or profits to any special partner, the original capital has been reduced, the partner receiving the same shall be bound to restore the amount necessary to make good his share of capital, with interest, on being notified thereof.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That every sale, assignment, or transfer of any property or effects of such partnership, or of any general partner, made by such partnership or general partner when insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency, or after or in contemplation of the insolvency of any general partner, with the intent of giving a preference to any creditor of such partnership or insolvent partner, and every judgment confessed, lien created, or security given by such partnership or general partner under the like circumstances and with the like intent, shall be void as against the creditors of such partnership.

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That every special partner who shall violate any of the provisions of the last two sections, or who shall concur in or assent to any such violation by the partnership or by any individual partner, shall be liable as a general partner.

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That in case of the insolvency or bankruptcy of the

Laws of the United States.

39TH CONG....2D SESS.

partnership no special partner shall, under any circumstances, be allowed to claim as a creditor until the claims of all the other creditors of the partnership shall be satisfied.

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That all suits respecting the business of the partnership shall be brought by and against the general partners only, except in those cases in which provision is hereinbefore made that special partners shall be deemed general partners and special partnerships general partnerships, when all persons so becoming general partners may be joined with those originally general partners in any suit brought against such partnerships, and except, also, the case provided for in section number ten.

SEC. 18. And be it further enacted, That if, in any case or suit brought against general and special partners, and at the trial of the cause, it shall appear that the special partners or any of them are not liable to the writ of the plaintiff, the court may proceed to judgment or decree against the partners who may appear to be liable, in the same manner as if such partners were the only parties defendant to the writ, excepting that the partners who may be deemed not liable shall recover their legal costs against the plaintiffs; and if creditors shall have recovered a judgment or obtained a decree against general partners only, and shall afterward discover that special partners or some one or more of them have become liable as general partners, he may bring a new suit against such special partner or partners; and in such suit the judgment recovered as aforesaid shall be prima facie evidence of the amount due by the partnership, and the partnership debt shall not be merged in any judgment or decree recovered or obtained against any partner or partners, as against any other partner or partners.

SEC. 19. And be it further enacted, That no dissolution of such partnership by act of the partners shall take place previous to the time specified in the certificate of its formation, or in the certificate of its renewal, unless in consequence of the death of one of the partners, or insolvency of the partnership, or of one of the general partners, nor until a notice of such dissolution shall have been filed and recorded in the clerk's office in which the original certificate was recorded, and published once a week for four weeks in two newspapers, to be designated by the clerk of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, which publication may be proved by affidavit and recorded as hereinbefore prescribed for the publication of the certificate for the formation of such partnership.

SEC. 20. And be it further enacted, That the general partners shall be liable to account to each other and to the special partners for the management of the concern, both in law and equity.

APPROVED, March 2, 1867.

The salary of the district judge of the district of Massachusetts, northern, southern, and eastern districts of New York, eastern and western districts of Pennsylvania, the district of Maryland, northern district of Illinois, southern district of Ohio, and the district of New Jersey, shall be four thousand dollars each; and the salaries of the district judges of every other district shall be three thousand five hundred dollars each; and said salaries shall be in full compensation for all official services performed by such judges, and shall take effect at the commencement of the next fiscal year, and no other allowance or payment shall be made to them for travel, expenses, or otherwise; and the amount necessary to pay the increased compensation herein provided for shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That if the Supreme Court shall in any one year direct its reporter to publish a second volume, for such year, of its decisions, and if such second volume shall be published accordingly, an additional sum of fifteen hundred dollars shall be paid said reporter therefor on the delivery by said reporter to the Secretary of the Interior for distribution, according to existing laws, of three hundred copies of such second volume of said reports; and the amount necessary to pay the same is hereby appropriated.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That the notice required by the fourth section of the act entitled "An act to pay in part for publishing the debates in Congress, and for other purposes," approved July fourth, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, is hereby given that Congress will, in two years from the close of the present Congress, abrogate the provisions of the first and second sections of said act.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to appoint in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions, in addition to the clerks now authorized in said office, twenty-eight clerks of class one; twenty-four of class two; eighteen of class three; and ten of class four; said clerkships to expire at the end of two years, and a sum sufficient to pay the salaries of said clerks from the date of their appointment to the thirtieth of June, eighteen hundred and sixty-seven, and for the fiscal year ending the thirtieth of June, eighteen hundred and sixty-eight, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated.

APPROVED, March 2, 1867.

CHAP. CLXIX.—An Act to amend existing Laws relating to Internal Revenue, and for other purposes.

* Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all acts in relation to the assessment, return, collection, and payment of the income tax, special tax, and other annual taxes now by law required to be performed in the month of May, shall hereafter be performed on the corresponding days in the month of March in each year; all acts required to be performed in the month of June, in relation to the collection, return, and payment of said taxes, shall hereafter be performed on the corresponding days of the month of April of each year: Provided, That on and after the first day of September, eighteen hundred and sixty-seven, a tax of two and one half cents per pound only shall be levied, collected, and paid on any cotton produced within the United States.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That apothecaries, butchers, confectioners, and plumbers, and gas-fitters, whose annual sales exceed twenty-five thousand dollars, shall pay, in addition to the special tax now required by law, one dollar for every thousand dollars in excess of said twenty-five thousand dollars; and the taxes on such excess shall be assessed and paid in the manner provided in the case of wholesale dealers.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That in all suits or proceedings arising under the internal revenue laws, to which the United States is party, and in all suits or proceedings against a collector or other officer of the internal revenue, wherein a district attorney shall appear for the purpose of prosecuting or defending, it shall be the duty of said attorney, instead of reporting to the Solicitor of the Treasury, immediately at the end of every term of the court in which said suit or proceeding is or shall be instituted, to forward to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue a full and particular statement of the condition of all such suits or proceedings appearing upon the docket of said court: Provided, That upon the institution of any such suit or proceeding it shall be the duty of said attorney to report to said Commissioner the full particulars relating to such suit or proceeding; and it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, (with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury,) to establish such rules and regulations, not inconsistent with law, for the observance of revenue officers, district attorneys, and marshals, respecting suits arising under the internal revenue laws, in which the United States is a party, as may be deemed necessary for the just responsibility of those officers and the prompt collection of all revenues and debts due and accruing to the United States under such laws.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall have charge of all real estate which has been or shall be assigned, set off, or conveyed, by purchase or otherwise, to the United States, in payment of debts arising under the laws relating to internal revenue, and of all trusts created for the use of the United States, in payment of such debts due them; and, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may sell and dispose of, at public vendue, upon not less than twenty days' notice, lands assigned or set off to the United States in payment of such debts, or vested in them by mortgage or other security, for the payment of such debts; and in cases where real estate has already become the property of the United States by conveyance or otherwise, in payment of or as security for a debt arising under the laws relating to internal revenue, and such debt shall have been paid, together with the interest thereon, at the rate of one per centum per month, to the United States, within two years from the date of the acquisition of such real estate, it shall be lawful for the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, to release by deed, or otherwise convey, such real estate to the debtor from whom it was taken, or to his heirs or other legal representatives.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That if the manufacturer of any article upon which a tax is required to be paid by means of a stamp shall have sold or removed for sale any such articles without the use of the proper stamp, in addition to the penalties now imposed by law for such sale or removal, it shall be the duty of the proper assessor or assistant assessor, within a period of not more than two years after such removal or sale, upon such information as he can obtain, to estimate the amount of the tax which has been omitted to be paid, and to make an assessment therefor, and certify the same to the collector; and the subsequent proceedings for collection shall be in all respects like those for the collection of taxes upon manufactures and productions.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, whenever he shall deem it expedient, to designate one or more of the assistant assessors in any collection district to make assessments in any part of such collection district for all such taxes as may be due upon any specified objects of taxation, and in such case it shall be the duty of the other assistant assessors of such collection district to report to the assistant assessor thus specially designated all matters which may come to their knowledge relative to any assessments to be made by him: Provided, That whenever two or more districts or parts of districts are embraced within one county it may be lawful for such assistant assessor or assessors to make assessment anywhere within such county upon such specified objects of taxation as he may be by said Commissioner required: Provided further, That such assessment shall be returned to the assessor of the district in which such taxes are payable.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, is hereby authorized to pay such sums, not exceeding in the aggregate the amount appropriated therefor, as may in his judgment be deemed necessary for detecting and bringing to trial and punishment persons guilty of violating the internal revenue laws, or conniving at the same in cases where such expenses are not otherwise provided for by law. And for this purpose there is hereby appropriated one hundred thousand dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That hereafter for any failure to pay any internal revenue tax at the time and in the manner required by law, where such failure creates a liability to pay a penalty of ten per centum additional upon the amount of tax so due and unpaid, the person or persons so failing or neglecting to pay said tax, instead of ten per centum as aforesaid, shall pay a penalty of five per centum, together with interest at the rate of one per centum per month upon said tax from the time the same became due, but no interest for any fraction of a month shall be demanded.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June thirty, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, as subsequently amended, be, and the same is hereby, amended as follows, viz:

That section twenty-two be amended by striking out after the words "assistant assessor," and before the word "actually," the words "four dollars for every day," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "five dollars for every day;" and further by striking out the following words: "And assistant assessors may be allowed, in the settlement of their accounts, such sum as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall approve, not exceeding three hundred dollars per annum, for office rent; but no account for such office rent shall be allowed or paid until it shall have been verified in such manner as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may require, and shall have been audited and approved by the proper officers of the Treasury Department; and assistant assessors, when employed outside of the town in which they reside, in addition to the compensation which they are now allowed by law, shall, during such time so employed, receive one dollar per day." This amendment shall take effect upon compensation for the month of March, eighteen hundred and sixty-seven, and thereafter.

That section twenty-four be amended by inserting in the proviso to said section, after the word "spirits," wherever it occurs, the words "or other articles."

That section forty be amended by striking out the following words: "That in case a collector shall die, resign, or be removed," and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "That in case of a vacancy occurring in the office of collector by reason of death, or any other cause."

That section seventy-three be amended by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting in lieu thereof the following: that any person who shall exercise or carry on any trade, business, or profession, or do any act hereinafter mentioned, for the exercising, carrying on, or doing of which a special tax is imposed by law, without payment thereof, as in that behalf required, shall, for every such offense, besides being liable to the payment of the tax, be subject to a fine or penalty of not less than ten nor more than five hundred dollars. And if such person shall be a manufacturer of tobacco, snuff, or cigars, or a wholesale or retail dealer in liquor, he shall be further liable to imprisonment for a term not less than sixty days and not exceeding two years.

That section seventy-nine be amended as follows: in paragraph four, by striking out the following words: "In quantities of more than three gallons at one and the same time to the same purchaser, or." In paragraph five, by striking out the following words: "In quantities of three gallons or less." In paragraph thirty-one by adding thereto the following: "Provided, That no special tax shall be required of any person for the manufacture of butter or cheese." In paragraph thirty-two, by inserting after the words "garden" and before the word "who" the words "or traveling on foot and peddling fruits, vegetables, pies, cakes, and confectionery."

That section ninety be amended by inserting after the word "cigars," and before the first proviso in said section, the words "and all proceedings relating to forfeiture and sale of distilled spirits shall apply to tobacco, snuff, and cigars."

That section ninety-four be amended as follows:

By striking out in the paragraph relating to gas, the words "and until the thirtieth day of April, eighteen hundred and sixty-seven."

[By striking out] the paragraphs relating to "sugar and sugar refiners," and inserting in lieu thereof the words:

"On all sugars produced from the sugar-cane, and not from sorghum or imphee, other than those produced by the refiner, a tax of one cent per pound."

"On refined sugars, and on the products of sugar refineries, not including sirup or molasses, a tax of two per centum ad valorem: Provided, That every person shall be regarded as a sugar refiner, and pay the taxes required by law, whose business it is to advance the quality and value of sugar by melting and recrystallization, or by liquoring, claying, or other washing process, or by any other chemical or mechanical means, or who shall by boiling or other process extract sugar from or advance the quality or value of molasses, concentrated molasses, or melado."

Also, in the paragraph relating to wood screws, by striking out the word "ten" and inserting "five;"

Also, by striking out the paragraph relating to "gunpowder," and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"On gunpowder, canister powder, five cents per pound; sporting powder in kegs, one cent per pound; blasting powder in kegs or casks, one half cent per pound."

Also, by striking out all from the words "cigarettes or small cigars," in the first paragraph relating to cigars, down to and including the words "twenty per centum ad valorem on the market value thereof," in the last paragraph relating to cigars, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"On cigarettes, cigars, and cheroots of all descriptions, made of tobacco or any substitute therefor, five dollars per thousand."

That section ninety-four be further amended so that in lieu of the taxes now provided by law upon the goods, wares, and merchandise hereinafter mentioned, which shall be produced and sold, or be manufactured or made and sold, or be consumed or used by the manufacturer or producer thereof, or removed for consumption or use, or for delivery for others than agents of the manufacturer or producer within the United States or Territories thereof, there shall be assessed, collected, and paid the following taxes, to be paid by the producer or manufacturer thereof, that is to say:

On boots and shoes, made wholly or in part of India-rubber, two per centum ad valorem.

On hats, caps, bonnets, and hoods of all descriptions, two per centum ad valorem.

On hoop-skirts, two per centum ad valorem.

On leather of all descriptions, and goat, deer, calf, kid, sheep, horse, hog, and dog skins, tanned or partially tanned, curried, finished, or in the rough, two and one half per centum ad valorem.

On manufactures exclusively of glass, other than window glass, three per centum ad valorem.

On manufactures of wool, or of which wool is the chief component material, or the component material of chief value, two and a half per centum ad valorem.

That section ninety-four be amended by adding to the end of said section the following words: "But no tax shall be imposed upon the redy[e]ing or reprinting of cloths or other articles."

That section ninety-six be amended by inserting after the words "and also all goods, wares, and merchandise, and articles," and before the words "made or manufactured from materials," the words "not specially named and taxed, and which are."

That section one hundred and three be amended by striking out the word "three" where it occurs in the second proviso, and inserting the words "two and a half," and by striking out the words "until the thirtieth day of April, eighteen hundred and sixty-seven."

That schedule B, in relation to stamp duties, named in section one hundred and fifty-one, be amended by striking out of said schedule the words "legal documents," and all thereafter, and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "Provided, That the stamp duties imposed by the foregoing schedule (B) on manifests, bills of lading, and passage tickets, shall not apply to steamboats or vessels plying between ports of the United States and ports of British North America: And provided further, That all affidavits shall be exempt from stamp duty."

Also by inserting at the end of the last paragraph relating to "probate of will" the following words: "Provided, That no stamp either for probate of wills, or letters testamentary, or of administration, or on administrator or guardian bond, shall be required when the value of the estate and effects, real and personal, does not exceed one thousand dollars: Provided further, That no stamp tax shall be required upon any papers necessary to be used for the collection from the Government of claims by soldiers or their legal representatives of the United States for pensions, back pay, bounty, or for property lost in the service. The reduction of taxes provided in this section shall take effect on and after March one, eighteen hundred and sixty-seven."

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That the act amendatory to the act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June thirty, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, approved July thirteen, eighteen hundred and sixty-six, be amended as follows, viz:

That section ten be amended by adding after the word "pupils," in the sixth paragraph of said section, the words "but not including distilled spirits, mineral oil, tobacco, snuff, and cigars."

Also, by striking out in the paragraph relating to monuments, after the word "monuments," where it first occurs, the words "of stone."

That section eighteen be amended by adding thereto the following: "Provided, That the exemption herein shall not apply to tobacco, snuff, and cigars manufactured, or spirits distilled, or petroleum refined, either in or for such schools and colleges."

That section nineteen is hereby amended by adding the following thereto: "And no suit for the purpose of restraining the assessment or collection of tax shall be maintained in any court."

That section forty-three be amended by striking out the last two sentences.

Amend section forty-eight of the act relating to internal revenue, approved July thirteenth, eighteen hundred and sixty-six, so as to insert in the proviso the word "thirds" after [the] word "halves," and before the word "quar-

Provided, That the exemptions aforesaid shall, in all cases, be confined exclusively to said articles in the state and condition specified in the foregoing enumeration, and shall not extend to articles in any other form, nor to manufactures from said articles.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That there shall be levied, collected, and paid on brandy made from grapes, one dollar per gallon; and if any person shall knowingly manufacture, compound, put up, sell, or dispose of, or cause to be manufactured, compounded, put up, sold, or disposed of, or aid or assist therein, any fluid as or for or under or with the name of brandy made from grapes which shall not be really such, he shall, on conviction thereof, be punished for each offense by a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, and by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both said punishments, in the discretion of the court, and any such simulated or compounded fluid as aforesaid shall be forfeited to the United States.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That the act entitled “An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes,” approved June thirty, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, and as subsequently amended, be further amended as follows, namely:

Income.—That section one hundred and sixteen be amended by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting, in lieu thereof, as follows: that there shall be levied, collected, and paid annually upon the gains, profits, and income of every person residing in the United States, or of any citizen of the United States residing abroad, whether derived from any kind of property, rents, interest, dividends, or salaries, or from any profession, trade, employment, or vocation, carried on in the United States, or elsewhere, or from any other source whatever, a tax of five per centum on the amount so derived over one thousand dollars, and a like tax shall be levied, collected, and paid annually upon the gains, profits, and income of every business, trade, or profession carried on in the United States by persons residing without the United States, and not citizens thereof. And the tax herein provided for shall be assessed, collected, and paid upon the gains, profits, and income for the year ending the thirty-first day of December next preceding the time for levying, collecting, and paying said tax.

That section one hundred and seventeen be amended by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting, in lieu thereof, the following: that, in estimating the gains, profits, and income of any person, there shall be included all income derived from interest upon notes, bonds, and other securities of the United States; profits realized within the year from sales of real estate purchased within the year or within two years previous to the year for which income was [is] estimated; interest received or accrued upon old [all] notes, bonds, and mortgages, or other forms of indebtedness bearing interest, whether paid or not, if good and collectable, less the interest which has become due from said person during the year; the amount of all premium on gold and coupons; the amount of sales of live stock, sugar, wool, butter, che[e]se, pork, beef, mutton, or other meats, hay and grain, or other vegetable or other productions, being the growth or produce of the estate of such person, not including any part thereof consumed directly by the family; all other gains, profits, and income derived from any source whatever, except the rental value of any homestead used or occupied by any person or by his family in his own right or in the right of his wife; and the share of any person of the gains and profits of all companies, whether incorporated or partnership, who would be entitled to the same, if divided, whether divided or otherwise, except the amount of income received from institutions or corporations whose officers, as required by law, withhold a per centum of the dividends made by such institutions, and pay the same to the officer authorized to receive the same; and except that portion of the salary or pay received for services in the civil, military, naval, or other service of the United States, including Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress, from which the tax has been deducted. And in addition to one thousand dollars exempt from income tax, as hereinbefore provided, all national, State, county, and municipal taxes paid within the year shall be deducted from the gains, profits, or income of the person who has actually paid the same, whether such person be owner, tenant, or mortgagor; losses actually sustained during the year arising from fires, shipwreck, or incurred in trade, and debts ascertained to be worthless, but excluding all estimated depreciation of values and losses within the year on sales of real estate purchased two years previous to the year for which income is estimated; the amount actually paid for labor or interest by any person who rents lands or hires labor to cultivate land, or who conducts any other business from which income is actually derived; the amount actually paid by any person for the rent of the house or premises occupied as a residence for himself or his family; the amount paid out for usual or ordinary repairs: Provided, That no deduction shall be made for any amount paid out for new buildings, permanent improvements or betterments, made to increase the value of any property or estate: And provided, further, That only one deduction of one thousand dollars shall be made from the aggregate income of all the members of any family, composed of one or both parents, and one or more minor children, or husband and wife; that guardians shall be allowed to make such deduction in favor of each and every ward, except that in case where two or more wards are comprised in one family, and have joint property interest, only one deduction shall be made in their favor: And provided, further, That in cases where the salary or other compensation paid to any person in the employment or service of the United States shall not exceed the rate of one thousand dollars per annum, or shall be by fees, or uncertain or irregular in the amount or in the time during which the same shall have accrued or been earned, such salary or other compensation shall be included in estimating the annual gains, profits, or income of the person to whom the same shall have been paid.

Laws of the United States.

That section one hundred and eighteen be amended by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting, in lieu thereof, the following: that it shall be the duty of all persons of lawful age to make and render a list or return, on or before the day prescribed by law, in such form and manner as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, to the assistant assessor of the district in which they reside, of the amount of their income, gains, and profits, as aforesaid; and all guardians and trustees, executors and administrators, or any person acting in any other fiduciary capacity, shall make and render a list or return, as aforesaid, to the assistant assessor of the district in which such person acting in a fiduciary capacity resides, of the amount of income, gains, and profits of any minor or person for whom they act; and the assistant assessor shall require every list or return to be verified by the oath or affirmation of the party rendering it, and may increase the amount of any list or return, if he has reason to believe that the same is understated; and in case any such person shall neglect or refuse to make and render such list or return, or shall render a false or fraudulent list or return, it shall be the duty of the assessor or the assistant assessor to make such list, according to the best information he can obtain, by the examination of such person, or his books or accounts, or any other evidence, and to add fifty per centum as a penalty to the amount of the tax due on such list in all cases of willful neglect or refusal to make and render a list or return; and, in all cases of a false or fraudulent list or return having been rendered, to add one hundred per centum, as a penalty, to the amount of tax ascertained to be due, the tax and the additions thereto as a penalty to be assessed and collected in the manner provided for in other cases of willful neglect or refusal to render a list or return, or of rendering a false and fraudulent return: Provided, That any party, in his or her own behalf, or as such fiduciary, shall be permitted to declare, under oath or affirmation, the form and manner of which shall be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, that he or she, or his or her ward or beneficiary was not possessed of an income of one thousand dollars, liable to be assessed according to the provisions of this act; or may declare that he or she has been assessed and paid an income tax elsewhere in the same year, under authority of the United States, upon his or her income, gains, and profits, as prescribed by law; and if the assistant assessor shall be satisfied of the truth of the declaration, shall thereupon be exempt from income tax in the said district; or if the list or return of any party shall have been increased by the assistant assessor, such party may exhibit his books and accounts, and be permitted to prove and declare, under oath or affirmation, the amount of income liable to be assessed; but such oaths and evidence shall not be considered as conclusive of the facts, and no deductions claimed in such cases shall be made or allowed until approved by the assistant assessor. Any per- son feeling aggrieved by the decision of the assistant assessor in such cases may appeal to the assessor of the district, and his decision thereon, unless reversed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, shall be final, and the form, time, and manner of proceedings shall be subject to rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue: Provided further, That no penalty shall be assessed upon any person for such neglect or refusal, or for making or rendering a false or fraudulent return, except after reasonable notice of the time and place of hearing, to be regulated by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, so as to give the person charged an opportunity to be heard.

That section one hundred and nineteen be amended by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting, in lieu thereof, the following: that the taxes on incomes herein imposed shall be levied on the first day of March, and be due and payable on or before the thirtieth day of April, in each year, until and including the year eighteen hundred and seventy, and no longer; and to any sum or sums annually due and unpaid after the t[h]irtieth of April, as aforesaid, and for ten days after notice and demand thereof by the collector, there shall be levied in addition thereto the sum of five per centum on the amount of taxes unpaid and interest at the rate of one per centum per month upon said tax from the time the same became due, as a penalty, except from the estates of deceased, insane, or insolvent persons: Provided, That the tax on incomes for the year eighteen hundred and sixty-six shall be levied on the day this takes effect.

That section one hundred and twenty-three be amended by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting, in lieu thereof, the following: that there shall be levied, collected, and paid on all salaries of officers, or payments for services to persons in the civil, military, naval, or other employment or service of the United States, including Senators and Representatives and Delegates in Congress, when exceeding the rate of one thousand dollars per annum, a tax of five per centum on the excess above the said one thousand dollars; and it shall be the duty of all paymasters and all disbursing officers under the Government of the United States, or persons in the employ thereof, when making any payment to any officers or persons as aforesaid, whose compensation is determined by a fixed salary, or upon settling or adjusting the accounts of such officers or persons to deduct and withhold the aforesaid tax of five per centum; and the pay-roll, receipts, or account of officers or persons paying such tax as aforesaid shall be made to exhibit the fact of such payment. And it shall be the duty of the accounting officers of the Treasury Department, when auditing the accounts of any paymaster or disbursing officer, or any officer withholding his salary from moneys received by him, or when settling or adjusting the accounts of any such officer, to require evidence that the taxes mentioned in this section have been deducted and paid over to the Treasurer of the United States, or other officer authorized to receive the same: Provided, That payments of prize money shall be regarded as income from salaries, and the tax thereon shall be adjusted and collected in like manner: Provided further, That this section shall not apply to payments made to mechanics or laborers employed upon public works: And provided further, That in case it should become necessary for showing the true receipts of the Government under the operations of this section upon the books of the Treasury Department, the requisite amount may be carried from unappropriated moneys in the Treasury to the credit of said account; and this section shall take effect upon salary and compensation for the month of March, eighteen hundred and sixty-seven.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That there shall be levied, collected, and paid on all distilled spirits, upon which no tax has been paid according to law, a tax of two dollars upon each and every proof gallon, to be paid by the distiller, owner, or any person having possession thereof, and every proprietor and possessor of a still, distillery, or distilling apparatus, shall be jointly and severally liable for the taxes imposed by law upon the spirits distilled therein; and the tax shall be a lien upon the spirits distilled, on the distillery used for distilling the same, with the stills, vessels, fixtures, and tools therein, and on the lot or tract of land whereon the said distillery is situated, together with any building thereon, from the time said spirits are distilled until the said tax shall be paid: Provided, That the tax upon any spirits distilled and removed from the place where the same were distilled, and not deposited in bonded warehouse as required by law, shall, at any time, upon knowledge of such fact obtained by the assessor or assistant assessor of the district where such spirits were distilled, be assessed by him upon the distiller of the same, and certified or returned to the collector, who shall immediately demand payment of such tax, and upon the neglect or refusal of payment by the distiller, shall proceed to collect the same by distraint. But this provision shall not exclude any other remedy or proceeding provided by law: Provided further, That the tax on all spirits shall be collected at no lower rate than the basis of first proof, and shall be increased in proportion for any greater strength than the strength of first proof.

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That proof spirit shall be held and taken to be that alcoholic liquor which contains one half its volume of alcohol of a specific gravity of seven thousand nine hundred and thirty-nine (7939) ten thousandths at sixty degrees Fahrenheit; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to adopt, procure, and prescribe for use such hydrometers, weighing and gauging instruments, meters, or other means for ascertaining the strength and quality of spirits subject to tax, or for the prevention or detection of frauds by distillers of spirits, and to prescribe such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary to insure a uniform and correct system of inspection, weighing, and gauging of spirits subject to tax throughout the United States. And whenever the Secretary of the Treasury shall adopt and prescribe for use any meter or meters, it shall be the duty of every owner, agent, or superintendent of a distillery, to make application to the collector of his district for such meter or meters, to be used in his distillery, and the same shall be furnished and attached to the distillery at the expense of the distiller, whose duty it shall be to furnish all the pipes, materials, labor, and facilities necessary to complete such attachment in accordance with the regulations of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who is hereby further authorized to order and require such changes of or additions to distilling apparatus, connecting pipes, pumps, or cisterns, or any machinery connected with or used in or on the distillery premises, or may require to be put on any of the stills, tubs, cisterns, pipes, or other vessels, such fastenings, locks, or seals as he may deem necessary. And in all sales of spirits hereafter made, where not otherwise specially agreed, a gallon shall be taken to be a gallon of first proof, according to the foregoing standard set forth and declared for the inspection and gauging of spirits throughout the United States.

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That every person, firm, or corporation who distills or manufactures spirits or alcohol, or who brews or makes mash, wort, or wash, for distillation or the production of spirits, shall be deemed a distiller. And the making or keeping by any person of grain, mash, wash, wort, or beer, prepared or fit for distillation, together with the possession by such person of a still or other apparatus capable of use for distilling upon the same premises, shall be deemed and taken as presumptive evidence that such person is a distiller.

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That hereafter all distilled spirits, before being removed from the distillery, shall be inspected and gauged by a general inspector of spirits, who shall mark the barrels or packages in the manner required by law; and so much of the act approved July thirteen, eighteen hundred and sixty-six, as requires the appointment of an inspector for each distillery established according to law is hereby repealed: Provided, That such other duties as have heretofore been imposed upon inspectors of distilleries may be performed by such other duly appointed officers as may be designated by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

SEC. 18. And be it further enacted, That whenever, in the judgment of the collector, there shall be a general bonded warehouse so located as to be conveniently accessible to a distillery, and in the same collection district, the said collector shall direct all spirits which may be stored in the bonded warehouse attached to such distillery to be transferred directly to a general bonded warehouse; and all spirits thereafter produced in such distillery shall be removed to a general bonded warehouse within the time and in the manner heretofore required for the removal to the bonded warehouse attached to the distillery.

SEC. 19. And be it further enacted, That no spirits shall be removed in any cask or package containing more than ten gallons from any premises or building in which the same may have been distilled, redistilled, rectified, or manufactured, nor from any place of storage at any other times than after sun-rising and before sun-setting, on pain of forfeiture of such spirits, and every person who shall violate this provision shall be liable to a penalty of one hundred dollars for each cask, barrel, or package of spirits removed. Any officer of internal revenue may be specially authorized by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to seize any property which may by law be subject to seizure, and for that purpose such officer shall have all the power conferred by law upon collectors of internal revenue, and such special authority shall be limited in respect of time, place, and kind or class of property as the said Commissioner may specify.

SEC. 20. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for any internal revenue officer to seize and detain any barrels, casks, or packages containing, or supposed to contain, distilled spirits, when such officer has reason to believe the tax imposed by law upon the same has not been paid, or that they are being removed in violation of law, and such packages may be detained by such officer in a safe place until it can be satisfactorily ascertained by the proper officers whether the articles so seized are liable to be proceeded against for violations of the internal revenue laws.

SEC. 21. And be it further enacted, That whenever any distilled spirits so found elsewhere than in a bonded warehouse shall be sold or offered for sale at a less price than the tax imposed by law thereon, such selling or offering for sale as aforesaid shall be taken and deemed as prima facie evidence that said spirits have not been removed from a bonded warehouse according to law, and that the tax imposed by law on the same has not been paid, and the same shall without further evidence be liable to seizure and forfeiture: Provided, That this section shall not apply to spirits sold at public sale by an auctioneer who has paid the special tax as such under such rules and regulations, and upon such public notice as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, nor to sales made by judicial or executive officers under the order or decree of any court.

SEC. 22. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of every person who empties or draws off, or causes to be emptied or drawn off, distilled spirits or other article subject by law to tax, from a cask, barrel, or package, bearing any of the marks or brands required by law, or marks intended for or purporting to be, or designed to have the effect of, such marks, immediately upon such cask, barrel, or package being emptied, to efface and obliterate said marks or brands; and any person who shall violate this provision shall be liable to a penalty of ten dollars for each offense; and any such cask, barrel, or package, from which said marks are not so effaced and obliterated as herein required, shall be liable to forfeiture, and may be seized by any officer of internal revenue wherever found.

SEC. 23. And be it further enacted, That in case any bond under which any distilled spirits shall have been withdrawn from a bonded warehouse is forfeited by failure to furnish or produce at the proper time the evidence required by law or regulation that the articles named in the bond were duly received and actually stored in the warehouse or district to which they were shipped, or by other breach of the obligation, the obligors in the bond shall pay the total amount of duties upon the articles removed under the bond, together with fifty per centum upon that amount, and the collector of the district in which such bond is or may be given may forthwith distrain upon any property, real or personal, subject to distraint or seizure, belonging to said obligors; and in case no such property can be found, the collector shall immediately forward the bond to the United States district attorney for the proper district for suit, and notice of the breach of the obligation of any such bond shall be forthwith forwarded by the collector of the district to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

SEC. 24. And be it further enacted, That the forty-fourth section of the act of July thirteen, eighteen hundred and sixty-six, aforesaid, be amended by adding thereto as follows: Provided, That when any still used or fit for use in the production of distilled spirits, the same not exceeding one thousand dollars in value, has been or shall be seized for any violation of the laws relating to internal revenue, the same shall not be released by the court to the claimant, or any other intervening party, before judgment; and if declared forfeited, such still shall be so destroyed as to prevent its use for the purpose aforesaid, and the materials thereof shall be sold as other forfeited property. In case of seizure, as above, of a still exceeding in value the sum of one thousand dollars, its release to the claimant or any other intervening party, before judgment, shall be at the discretion of the court.

SEC. 25. And be it further enacted, That the owner, agent, or superintendent of any still, boiler, or other vessel used in the distillation of spirits, who shall neglect or refuse to make true and exact entry and report of the same, or to do or cause to be done any of the things by law required to be done concerning distilled spirits, shall, in addition to other fines and penalties now by law provided, forfeit for every such neglect or refusal all the spirits made by or for him, and all the vessels used in making the same, and the stills, boilers, and other vessels used in distillation, and all materials fit for use in distillation found on the premises, together with the sum of five hundred dollars for each offense, to be recovered with costs of suit, and shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be subject to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year; which said spirits, with the vessels containing the same, with all the vessels used in making the same, and all said materials, may be seized by the collector and held by him until a decision shall be had thereon according to law: Provided, That proceedings to enforce said forfeiture shall be commenced by such collector within twenty days after the seizure thereof. And the proceedings to enforce said forfeiture of said property shall be in the nature of a proceeding in rem, in the circuit or district [court] of the United States for the district where such seizure is made, or in any other court of competent jurisdiction.

SEC. 26. And be it further enacted, That if any collector, deputy collector, assessor, assistant assessor, inspector, district attorney, marshal, or other officer, agent, or person charged with the execution or supervision of the execution, or supervision of the execution of any of the provisions of this act, or of the act to which this is amendatory, shall demand, or accept, or attempt to collect, directly or indirectly, as payment or gift, or otherwise, any sum of money or other property of value for the compromise, adjustment, or settlement of any charge or complaint for any violation, or alleged violation, of any of the said provisions, except as expressly authorized by law so to do, he shall be held to be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall for every such offense be liable to indictment and trial in any court of the United States having competent jurisdiction, and on conviction thereof shall be fined in double the sum or value of the money or property received or demanded, and be imprisoned for a period of not less than one year nor more than ten years.

SEC. 27. And be it further enacted, That no distilled spirits which have been forfeited to the Government in accordance with law shall be sold for a price less than the amount of the tax required thereon by law at the time of such sale. And if the officer having such spirits in charge shall have been unable, for a period of ninety days, to [sell] the same for a price equal to the tax, such spirits shall be destroyed, under such rules and regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may prescribe.

SEC. 28. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall falsely represent himself to be a revenue officer of the United States, and shall in such assumed character demand or receive any money or other article of value from any person for any duty or tax due to the United States, or for any violation or pretended violation of any revenue law of the United States, such person shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and on conviction thereof shall be liable to a fine of five hundred dollars, and to imprisonment not less than six months and not exceeding two years, at the discretion of the court.

SEC. 29. And be it further enacted, That no person shall mix for sale naphtha and illuminating oils, or shall knowingly sell or keep for sale or offer for sale such mixture, or shall sell or offer for sale oil made from petroleum for illuminating purposes, inflammable at less temperature or fire test than one hundred and ten degrees Fahrenheit, and any person so doing shall be held to be guilty of [a] misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof by indictment or presentment in any court of the United [States] having competent jurisdiction, shall be punished by a fine of not less than one hundred dollars nor more than five hundred dollars, and by imprisonment for a term of not less than six months nor more than three years.

SEC. 30. And be it further enacted, That if two or more persons conspire either to commit any offense against the laws of the United States, or to defraud the United States in any manner whatever, and one or more of said parties to said conspiracy shall do any act to effect the object thereof, the parties to said conspiracy shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be liable to a penalty of not less than one thousand dollars and not more than ten thousand dollars, and to imprisonment not exceeding two years. And when any offense shall be begun in one judicial district of the United States and completed in another, every such offense shall be deemed to have been committed in either of the said districts, and may be dealt with, inquired of, tried, determined, and punished in either of the said districts, in the same manner as if it had been actually and wholly committed therein.

SEC. 31. And be it further enacted, That all inspectors appointed under the provisions of the act or acts of which this is amendatory shall be required to give bonds, with security, approved by the Secretary of the Treasury or assessor of the district, in a sum not less than five thousand dollars, conditioned for the faithful discharge of the duties of such inspector.

SEC. 32. And be it further enacted, That any person who shall sell, give away, or otherwise dispose of, any empty cigar box or boxes which have been stamped, without first defacing or destroying such stamps, or shall refill any cigar box without first defacing or destroying such stamp, shall, on conviction of either offense, be liable to a penalty of one hundred dollars or to imprisonment not exceeding sixty days, or both, in the discretion of the court, with the costs of the trial; and it shall be lawful for any cigar inspector or revenue officer to destroy any empty cigar box upon which a cigar stamp shall be found.

SEC. 33. And be it further enacted, That the tonnage duty now imposed on all ships, vessels, or steamers engaged in foreign or domestic commerce, shall be levied but once within one year, and when paid by such ship, vessel, or steamer, no further tonnage tax shall be collected within one year from the date of such payment.

SEC. 34. And be it further enacted, That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with this act, and all acts and parts of acts imposing any tax upon advertisements, or the gross receipts of toll-roads, are hereby repealed: Provided, That this act shall not be construed to affect any act done, right accrued, or penalty incurred, under former acts, but every such right is hereby saved; and all suits and prosecutions for acts already done in violation of any former act or acts of Congress relating to the subjects embraced in this act may be commenced or proceeded with in like manner as if this act had not been passed; and all penal clauses and provisions in existing laws relating to the subjects embraced in this act shall be deemed applicable thereto.

APPROVED, March 2, 1867.

CHAP. CLXX.—An Act making Appropriations for the Support of the Army for the year ending June thirtieth, eighteen hundred and sixty-eight, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the support of the Army for the year ending the thirtieth of June, eighteen hundred and sixty-eight:

sum hereinbefore appropriated to the Miamies of Indiana, or which shall hereafter be appropriated to them, shall only be paid to such persons as may be, upon the opinion of the Attorney General, legally entitled to the same under the provisions of the treaty with said Indians of June fifth, eighteen hundred and fifty-four, and Senate amendments thereto, regardless of any subsequent legislation.

APPROVED, March 2, 1867.

CHAP. CLXXIV.—An Act to amend certain Acts in Relation to the Navy.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That so much of the "Act to establish the grade of vice admiral in the United States Navy," approved December twenty-one, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, as provides that the vice admiral shall be the ranking officer in the Navy of the United States, shall be considered as having been repealed by the act approved July twenty-five, eighteen hundred and sixty-six, establishing the grade of admiral, who shall be the ranking officer of the Navy; and the sixth section of the act last named is hereby so amended that the secretary of the admiral shall be entitled to the rank, sea pay, and allowances of a lieutenant in the Navy, such pay and allowances to date from the acceptance of his appointment, deducting any pay already received by him under said appointment.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That so much of the "Act to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to provide for the education of naval constructors and steam engineers, and for other purposes," approved July four, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, as provides that cadet engineers, when appointed, shall be under eighteen years of age, and shall have been employed at least two years in the actual fabrication of steam machinery, is hereby repealed.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the officers of the volunteer naval service who are, or may be, transferred to the regular Navy, or Marine corps, shall be credited with the sea service performed by them as volunteer officers, and shall receive all the benefits of such duty in the same manner as if they had been during such service in the regular Navy or Marine corps; and all marine officers shall be credited with the length of time they may have been employed as officers or enlisted men in the volunteer service of the United States.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the storekeeper at the Naval Academy shall hereafter be detailed from the paymasters' corps of the Navy, and he shall have authority, with the approval of the Secretary of the Navy, to procure clothing and other necessities for the midshipmen, in the same manner as supplies are now furnished the Navy, to be issued under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the fourth section of the "Act to provide a more efficient discipline for the Navy," approved March second, eighteen hundred and fifty-five, be, and hereby is, so amended that the authority therein given to the commander of any vessel in the Navy to convene summary courts-martial, shall require the approval of the proceedings by the commander-in-chief, when present in port, and, in his absence, that of the senior officer present, in all cases before carrying the sentence into execution; and in all cases where the sentence involves loss of pay, that part of such sentence shall be subject to the approval or disapproval of the Secretary of the Navy.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That to carry out the provisions of the eleventh section of the "Act for the better government of the Navy of the United States," approved July seventeen, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, directing the surplus income from the naval pension fund to "be applied to the making of further provision for the comfort of disabled officers, seamen, and marines," there shall be paid out of said fund to every person who, from age or infirmity, is disabled from sea service, but who has served as an enlisted person in the Navy or Marine corps for the period of twenty years, and not been discharged for misconduct, in lieu of being provided with a home in the Naval Asylum, Philadelphia, if he shall so elect, a sum equal to one half the pay of his rating at the time he was discharged, to be paid to him quarterly, under the direction of the Commissioner of Pensions; and application for such pension shall be made to the Secretary of the Navy, who, upon being satisfied that the applicant comes within the provisions of this act, shall certify the same to the Commissioner of Pensions, and said certificate shall be his warrant for making payment as herein authorized: And provided further, That any disabled person who has served in the Navy or Marine corps as an enlisted man for a period not less than ten years, and not been discharged for misconduct, may apply to the Secretary of the Navy for aid from the surplus income of the naval pension fund; and the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to convene a board of not less than three naval officers, one of whom shall be a surgeon, to examine into the condition of the applicant, and to recommend a suitable amount for his relief, and for a specified time, and upon the approval of such recommendation by the Secretary of the Navy, and certificate thereof to the Commissioner of Pensions, the amount shall be paid in the same manner as is provided in this section for the payment to persons disabled by long service in the Navy; but no allowance so made shall exceed the rate of a pension for full disability corresponding to the grade of the applicant, nor, if in addition to a pension, exceed one fourth the rate of such pension.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the commandant of the Marine corps shall have the rank and pay of a brigadier general of the Army.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the number of midshipmen allowed at the Naval Academy shall be one for every Member and Delegate of the House of Representatives, one for the District of Columbia, ten appointed annually at large, and ten to be selected annually from boys enlisted in the Navy, and who have been one year in the service on board a naval vessel, should so many be found qualified: Provided, however, That the reduction in the number of midshipmen herein provided for shall not affect any already appointed, nor any vacancy already existing: And provided further, That so much of the act of July fourteen, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, and of July sixteen, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, as provides for the number of midshipmen that may be appointed to the Naval Academy be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That officers on the retired and reserved lists of the Navy shall be entitled to promotion as their several dates upon the active list are promoted; but such promotion shall not entitle them to any pay beyond that to which they were entitled when retired, unless upon active duty, when they shall receive the full pay of their respective grades: Provided, That no promotion shall be made to the grade of rear admiral upon the retired list while there shall be in that grade the full number allowed by law.

APPROVED, March 2, 1867.

CHAP. CLXXV.—An Act relating to Brevets in the Army of the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President is hereby authorized, with the advice and consent of the Senate, to confer brevet rank on officers in the Army of the United States, on account of gallant, meritorious, or faithful conduct in the volunteer service, prior to appointment in said Army of the United States.

APPROVED, March 2, 1867.

CHAP. CLXXVI.—An Act to establish a Uniform System of Bankruptcy throughout the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the several district courts of the United States be, and they hereby are, constituted courts of bankruptcy, and they shall have original jurisdiction in their respective districts in all matters and proceedings in bankruptcy, and they are hereby authorized to hear and adjudicate upon the same according to the provisions of this act. The said courts shall be always open for the transaction of business under this act, and the powers and jurisdiction hereby granted and conferred shall be exercised as well in vacation as in term time, and a judge sitting at chambers shall have the same powers and jurisdiction, including the power of keeping order and of punishing any contempt of his authority, as when sitting in court. And the jurisdiction hereby conferred shall extend to all cases and controversies arising between the bankrupt and any creditor or creditors who shall claim any debt or demand under the bankruptcy; to the collection of all the assets of the bankrupt; to the ascertainment and liquidation of the liens and other specific claims thereon; to the adjustment of the various priorities and conflicting interests of all parties; and to the marshaling and disposition of the different funds and assets, so as to secure the rights of all parties and due distribution of the assets among all the creditors; and to all acts, matters, and things to be done under and in virtue of the bankruptcy, until the final distribution and settlement of the estate of the bankrupt, and the close of the proceedings in bankruptcy. The said courts shall have full authority to compel obedience to all orders and decrees passed by them in bankruptcy, by process of contempt and other remedial process, to the same extent that the circuit courts now have in any suit pending therein in equity. Said courts may sit, for the transaction of business in bankruptcy, at any place in the district, of which place and the time of holding court they shall have given notice, as well as at the places designated by law for holding such courts.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the several circuit courts of the United States, within and for the districts where the proceedings in bankruptcy shall be pending, shall have a general superintendence and jurisdiction of all cases and questions arising under this act; and, except when special provision is otherwise made, may, upon bill, petition, or other proper process, of any party aggrieved, hear and determine the case in a court of equity. The powers and jurisdiction hereby granted may be exercised either by said court or by any justice thereof in term time or vacation. Said circuit courts shall also have concurrent jurisdiction with the district courts of the same district of all suits at law or in equity which may or shall be brought by the assignee in bankruptcy against any person claiming an adverse interest, or by such person against such assignee, touching any property or rights of property of said bankrupt transferable to or vested in such assignee; but no suit at law or in equity shall in any case be maintainable by or against such assignee, or by or against any person claiming an adverse interest, touching the property and rights of property aforesaid, in any court whatsoever, unless the same shall be brought within two years from the time the cause of action accrued, for or against such assignee: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall revive a right of action barred at the time such assignee is appointed.

Of the Administration of the Law in Courts of Bankruptcy.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the judges of the district courts of the United States, within and for the several districts, to appoint in each congressional district in said districts, upon the nomination and recommendation of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, one or more registers in bankruptcy, to assist the judge of the district court in the performance of his duties under this act. No person shall be eligible to such appointment unless he be a counselor of said court, or of some one of the courts of record of the State in which he resides. Before entering upon the duties of his office, every person so appointed a register in bankruptcy shall give a bond to the United States, with condition that he will faithfully discharge the duties of his office, in a sum not less than one thousand dollars, to be fixed by said court, with sureties satisfactory to said court, or to either of the said justices thereof; and he shall, in open court, take and subscribe the oath prescribed in the act entitled "An act to prescribe an oath of office, and for other purposes," approved July second, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, and also that he will not, during his continuance in office, be, directly or indirectly, interested in or benefited by the fees or emoluments arising from any suit or matter pending in bankruptcy, in either the district or circuit court in his district.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That every register in bankruptcy, so appointed and qualified, shall have power, and it shall be his duty, to make adjudication of bankruptcy, to receive the surrender of any bankrupt, to administer oaths in all proceedings before him, to hold and preside at meetings of creditors, to take proof of debts, to make all computations of dividends, and all orders of distribution, and to furnish the assignee with a certified copy of such orders, and of the schedules of creditors and assets filed in each case, to audit and pass accounts of assignees, to grant protection, to pass the last examination of any bankrupt in cases whenever the assignee or a creditor do not oppose, and to sit in chambers and dispatch there such part of the administrative business of the court and such uncontested matters as shall be defined in general rules and orders, or as the district judge shall in any particular matter direct; and he shall also make short memoranda of his proceedings in each case in which he shall act, in a docket to be kept by him for that purpose, and he shall forthwith, as the proceedings are taken, forward to the clerk of the district court a certified copy of said memoranda, which shall be entered by said clerk in the proper minute-book to be kept in his office, and any register of the court may act for any other register thereof: Provided, however, That nothing in this section contained shall empower a register to commit for contempt, or to hear a disputed adjudication, or any question of the allowance or suspension of an order of discharge; but in all matters where an issue of fact or of law is raised and contested by any party to the proceedings before him, it shall be his duty to cause the question or issue to be stated by the opposing parties in writing, and he shall adjourn the same into court for decision by the judge. No register shall be of counsel or attorney, either in or out of court, in any suit or matter pending in bankruptcy in either the circuit or district court of his district, nor in an appeal therefrom; nor shall he be executor, administrator, guardian, commissioner, appraiser, divider, or assignee of or upon any estate within the jurisdiction of either of said courts of bankruptcy, nor be interested in the fees or emoluments arising from either of said trusts. The fees of said registers, as established by this act, and by the general rules and orders required to be framed under it, shall be paid to them by the parties for whom the services may be rendered in the course of proceedings authorized by this act.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the judge of the district court may direct a register to attend at any place within the district for the purpose of hearing such voluntary applications under this act as may not be opposed, of attending any meeting of creditors, or receiving any proof of debts, and, generally, for the prosecution of any bankruptcy or other proceedings under this act; and the traveling and incidental expenses of such register, and of any clerk or other officer attending him, incurred in so acting, shall be set[tled] by said court in accordance with the rules prescribed under the tenth section of this act, and paid out of the assets of the estate in respect of which such register has so acted; or if there be no such assets, or if the assets shall be insufficient, then such expenses shall form a part of the costs in the case or cases in which the register shall have acted in such journey, to be apportioned by the judge, and such register, so acting, shall have and exercise all powers, except the power of commitment, vested in the district court for the summoning and examination of persons or witnesses, and for requiring the production of books, papers, and documents: Provided, always, That all depositions of persons and witnesses taken before said register, and all acts done by him, shall be reduced to writing, and be signed by him, and shall be filed in the clerk's office as part of the proceedings. Such register shall be subject to removal by the judge of the district court, and all vacancies occurring by such removal, or by resignation, change of residence, death, or disability, shall be promptly filled by other fit persons, unless said court shall deem the continuance of the particular office unnecessary.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That any party shall, during the proceedings before a register, be at liberty to take the opinion of the district judge upon any point or matter arising in the course of such proceedings, or upon the result of such proceedings, which shall be stated by the register in the shape of a short certificate to the judge, who shall sign the same if he approve thereof; and such certificate, so signed, shall be binding on all the parties to the proceeding; but every such certificate may be discharged or varied by the judge at chambers or in open court. In any bankruptcy, or in any other proceedings within the jurisdiction of the court, under this act, the parties concerned, or submitting to such jurisdiction, may at any stage of the proceedings, by consent, state any question or questions in a special case for the opinion of the court, and the judgment of the court shall be final unless it be agreed and stated in such special case that either party may appeal, if, in such case, an appeal is allowed by this act. The parties may also, if they think fit, agree, that upon the question or questions raised by such special case being finally decided, a sum of money, fixed by the parties, or to be ascertained by the court, or in such manner as the court may direct, or any property, or the amount of any disputed debt or claim, shall be paid, delivered, or transferred by one of such parties to the other of them either with or without costs.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That parties and witnesses summoned before a register shall be bound to attend in pursuance of such summons at the place and time designated therein, and shall be entitled to protection, and be liable to process of contempt in like manner as parties and witnesses are now liable thereto in case of default in attendance under any writ of subpoena, and all persons willfully and corruptly swearing or affirming falsely before a register shall be liable to all the penalties, punishments, and consequences of perjury. If any person examined before a register shall refuse or decline to answer, or to swear to or sign his examination when taken, the register shall refer the matter to the judge, who shall have power to order the person so acting to pay the costs thereby occasioned, if such person be compellable by law to answer such question or to sign such examination, and such person shall also be liable to be punished for contempt.

Of Appeals and Practice.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That appeals may be taken from the district to the circuit courts in all cases in equity, and writs of error may be allowed to said circuit courts from said district courts in cases at law under the jurisdiction created by this act, when the debt or damages claimed amount to more than five hundred dollars, and any supposed creditor, whose claim is wholly or in part rejected, or an assignee who is dissatisfied with the allowance of a claim may appeal from the decision of the district court to the circuit court from the same district; but no appeal shall be allowed in any case from the district to the circuit court unless it is claimed, and notice given thereof to the clerk of the district court, to be entered with the record of the proceedings, and also to the assignee or creditor, as the case may be, or to the defeated party in equity, within ten days after the entry of the decree or decision appealed from. The appeal shall be entered at the term of the circuit court which shall be first held within and for the district next after the expiration of ten days from the time of claiming the same. But if the appellant in writing waives his appeal before any decision thereon, proceedings may be had in the district court as if no appeal had been taken; and no appeal shall be allowed unless the appellant at the time of claiming the same shall give bond in man[ner] now required by law in cases of such appeals. No writ of error shall be allowed unless the party claiming it shall comply with the statutes regulating the granting of such writs.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That in cases arising under this act no appeal or writ of error shall be allowed in any case from the circuit courts to the Supreme Court of the United States, unless the matter in dispute in such case shall exceed two thousand dollars.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That the justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, subject to the provisions of this act, shall frame general orders for the following purposes:

For regulating the practice and procedure of the district courts in bankruptcy, and the several forms of petitions, orders, and other proceedings to be used in said courts in all matters under this act;

For regulating the duties of the various officers of said courts;

For regulating the fees payable and the charges and costs to be allowed, except such as are established by this act or by law, with respect to all proceedings in bankruptcy before said courts, not exceeding the rate of fees now allowed by law for similar services in other proceedings;

For regulating the practice and procedure upon appeals;

For regulating the filing, custody, and inspection of records;

And generally for carrying the provisions of this act into effect.

After such general orders shall have been so framed, they or any of them may be rescinded or varied, and other general orders may be framed in manner aforesaid; and all such general orders so framed shall from time to time be reported to Congress, with such suggestions as said justices may think proper.

any person residing within the jurisdiction of the United States, owing debts provable under this act exceeding the amount of three hundred dollars, shall apply by petition addressed to the judge of the judicial district in which such debtor has resided or carried on business for the six months next immediately preceding the time of filing such petition, or for the longest period during such six months, setting forth his place of residence, his inability to pay all his debts in full, his willingness to surrender all his estate and effects for the benefit of his creditors, and his desire to obtain the benefit of this act, and shall annex to his petition a schedule, verified by oath before the court or before a register in bankruptcy, or before one of the commissioners of the circuit court of the United States, containing a full and true statement of all his debts, and, as far as possible, to whom due, with the place of residence of each creditor, if known to the debtor, and if not known the fact to be so stated, and the sum due to each creditor; also, the nature of each debt or demand, whether founded on written security, obligation, contract, or otherwise, and also the true cause and consideration of such indebtedness in each case, and the place where such indebtedness accrued, and a statement of any existing mortgage, pledge, lien, judgment, or collateral or other security given for the payment of the same; and shall also annex to his petition an accurate inventory, verified in like manner, of all his estate, both real and personal, assignable under this act, describing the same and stating where it is situated, and whether there are any, and if so, what encumbrances thereon, the filing of such petition shall be an act of bankruptcy, and such petitioner shall be adjudged a bankrupt: Provided, That all citizens of the United States petitioning to be declared bankrupt shall on filing such petition, and before any proceedings thereon, take and subscribe an oath of allegiance and fidelity to the United States, which oath shall be filed and recorded with the proceedings in bankruptcy. And the judge of the district court, or, if there be no opposing party, any register of said court, to be designated by the judge, shall forthwith, if he be satisfied that the debts due from the petitioner exceed three hundred dollars, issue a warrant, to be signed by such judge or register, directed to the marshal of said district, authorizing him forthwith, as messenger, to publish notices in such newspapers as the warrant specifies; to serve written or printed notice, by mail or personally, on all creditors upon the schedule filed with the debtor's petition, or whose names may be given to him in addition by the debtor, and to give such personal or other notice to any persons concerned as the warrant specifies, which notice shall state:

First. That a warrant in bankruptcy has been issued against the estate of the debtor.

Second. That the payment of any debts and the delivery of any property belonging to such debtor to him or for his use, and the transfer of any property by him, are forbidden by law.

Third. That a meeting of the creditors of the debtor, giving the names, residences, and amounts, so far as known, to prove their debts and choose one or more assignees of his estate, will be held at a court of bankruptcy, to be holden at a time and place designated in the warrant, not less than ten nor more than ninety days after the issuing of the same.

Of Assignments and Assignees.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That at the meeting held in pursuance of the notice one of the registers of the court shall preside, and the messenger shall make return of the warrant and of his doings thereon; and if it appears that the notice to the creditors has not been given as required in the warrant the meeting shall forthwith be adjourned, and a new notice given as required. If the debtor dies after the issuing of the warrant, the proceedings may be continued and concluded in like manner as if he had lived.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That the creditors shall, at the first meeting held after due notice from the messenger, in presence of a register designated by the court, choose one or more assignees of the estate of the debtor; the choice to be made by the greater part in value and in number of the creditors who have proved their debts. If no choice is made by the creditors at said meeting the judge, or if there be no opposing interest the register, shall appoint one or more assignees. If an assignee, so chosen or appointed, fails within five days to express in writing his acceptance of the trust, the judge or register may fill the vacancy. All elections or appointments of assignees shall be subject to the approval of the judge; and when in his judgment it is for any cause needful or expedient he may appoint additional assignees or order a new election. The judge at any time may, and upon the request in writing of any creditor who has proved his claim shall, require the assignee to give good and sufficient bond to the United States, with a condition for the faithful performance and discharge of his duties; the bond shall be approved by the judge or register by his indorsement thereon, shall be filed with the record of the case, and inure to the benefit of all creditors proving their claims, and may be prosecuted in the name and for the benefit of any injured party. If the assignee fails to give the bond within such time as the judge orders, not exceeding ten days after notice to him of such order, the judge shall remove him and appoint another in his place.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That as soon as said assignee is appointed and qualified the judge, or, where there is no opposing interest, the register, shall, by an instrument under his hand, assign and convey to the assignee all the estate, real and personal, of the bankrupt, with all his deeds, books, and papers relating thereto, and such assignment shall relate back to the commencement of said proceedings in bankruptcy, and thereupon, by operation of law, the title to all such property and estate, both real and personal, shall vest in said assignee, although the same is then attached on mesne process as the property of the debtor, and shall dissolve any such attachment made within four months next preceding the commencement of said proceedings: Provided, however, That there shall be excepted from the operation of the provisions of this section the necessary household and kitchen furniture, and such other articles and necessities of such bankrupt as the said assignee shall designate and set apart, having reference in the amount to the family, condition, and circumstances of the bankrupt, but altogether not to exceed in value, in any case, the sum of five hundred dollars; and also the wearing apparel of such bankrupt, and that of his wife and children, and the uniform, arms, and equipments of any person who is or has been a soldier in the militia, or in the service of the United States; and such other property as now is, or hereafter shall be, exempted from attachment or seizure, or levy on execution by the laws of the United States, and such other property not included in the foregoing exceptions as is exempted from levy and sale upon execution or other process or order of any court by the laws of the State in which the bankrupt has his domicile at the time of the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, to an amount not exceeding that allowed by such State exemption laws in force in the year eighteen hundred and sixty-four: Provided, That the foregoing exception shall operate as a limitation upon the conveyance of the property of the bankrupt to his assignees; and in no case shall the property hereby excepted pass to the assignees, or the title of the bankrupt thereto be impaired or affected by any of the provisions of this act; and the determination of the assignee in the matter shall, on exception taken, be subject to the final decision of the said court: And provided further, That no mortgage of any vessel or of any other goods or chattels, made as security for any debt or debts, in good faith and for present considerations and otherwise valid, and duly recorded, pursuant to any statute of the United States or of any State, shall be invalidated or affected hereby; and all the property conveyed by the bankrupt in fraud of his creditors; all rights in equity, choses in action, patents and patent rights and copyrights; all debts due him, or any person for his use, and all liens and securities therefor; and all his rights of action for property or estate, real or personal, and for any cause of action which the bankrupt had against any person arising from contract or from the unlawful taking or detention, or of injury to the property of the bankrupt, and all his rights of redeeming such property or estate, with the like right, title, power, and authority to sell, manage, dispose of, sue for, and recover or defend the same, as the bankrupt might or could have had if no assignment had been made, shall, in virtue of the adjudication of bankruptcy and the appointment of his assignee, be at once vested in such assignee; and he may sue for and recover the said estate debts and effects, and may prosecute and defend all suits at law or in equity, pending at the time of the adjudication of bankruptcy, in which such bankrupt is a party in his own name, in the same manner and with the like effect as they might have been presented or defended by such bankrupt; and a copy, duly certified by the clerk of the court, under the seal thereof, of the assignment made by the judge or register, as the case may be, to him as assignee, shall be conclusive evidence of his title as such assignee to take, hold, sue for, and recover the property of the bankrupt, as hereinbefore mentioned; but no property held by the bankrupt in trust shall pass by such assignment. No person shall be entitled to maintain an action against an assignee in bankruptcy for anything done by him as such assignee, without previously giving him twenty days' notice of such action, specifying the cause thereof, to the end, that such assignee may have an opportunity of tendering amends, should he see fit to do so. No person shall be entitled, as against the assignee, to withhold from him possession of any books of account of the bankrupt, or claim any lien thereon; and no suit in which the assignee is a party shall be abated by his death or removal from office; but the same may be prosecuted and defended by his successor, or by the surviving or remaining assignee, as the case may be. The assignee shall have authority, under the order and direction of the court, to redeem or discharge any mortgage or conditional contract, or pledge or deposit, or lien upon any property, real or personal, whenever payable, and to tender due performance of the condition thereof, or to sell the same subject to such mortgage, lien, or other encumbrances. The debtor shall also, at the request of the assignee and at the expense of the estate, make and execute any instruments, deeds, and writings which may be proper to enable the assignee to possess himself fully of all the assets of the bankrupt. The assignee shall immediately give notice of his appointment, by publication at least once a week for three successive weeks in such newspapers as shall for that purpose be designated by the court, due regard being had to their general circulation in the district or in that portion of the district in which the bankrupt and his creditors shall reside, and shall, within six months, cause the assignment to him to be recorded in every registry of deeds or other office within the United States where a conveyance of any lands owned by the bankrupt ought by law to be recorded; and the record of such assignment, or a duly certified copy thereof, shall be evidence thereof in all courts.

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That the assignee shall demand and receive, from any and all persons holding the same, all the estate assigned, or intended to be assigned, under the provisions of this act; and he shall sell all such unencumbered estate, real and personal, which comes to his hands, on such terms as he thinks most for the interest of the creditors; but upon petition of any person interested, and for cause shown, the court may make such order concerning the time, place, and manner of sale as will, in its opinion, prove to the interest of the creditors; and the assignee shall keep a regular account of all money received by him as assignee, to which every creditor shall, at reasonable times, have free resort.

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That the assignee shall have the like remedy to recover all said estate, debts, and effects in his own name, as the debtor might have had if the decree in bankruptcy had not been rendered and no assignment had been made. If, at the time of the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, an action is pending in the name of the debtor for the recovery of a debt or other thing which might or ought to pass to the assignee by the assignment, the assignee shall, if he requires it, be admitted to prosecute the action in his own name, in like manner and with like effect as if it had been originally commenced by him. No suit pending in the name of the assignee shall be abated by his death or removal; but upon the motion of the surviving or remaining or new assignee, as the case may be, he shall be admitted to prosecute the suit in like manner and with like effect as if it had been originally commenced by him. In suits prosecuted by the assignee a certified copy of the assignment made to him by the judge or register shall be conclusive evidence of his authority to sue.

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That the assignee shall, as soon as may be after receiving any money belonging to the estate, deposit the same in some bank in his name as assignee, or otherwise keep it distinct and apart from all other money in his possession; and shall, as far as practicable, keep all goods and effects belonging to the estate separate and apart from all other goods in his possession, or designated by appropriate marks, so that they may be easily and clearly distinguished, and may not be exposed or liable to be taken as his property or for the payment of his debts. When it appears that the distribution of the estate may be delayed by litigation or other cause, the court may direct the temporary investment of the money belonging to such estate in securities to be approved by the judge or a register of said court, or may authorize the same to be deposited in any convenient bank upon such interest, not exceeding the legal rate, as the bank may contract with the assignee to pay thereon. He shall give written notice to all known creditors, by mail or otherwise, of all dividends, and such notice of meetings, after the first, as may be ordered by the court. He shall be allowed, and may retain out of money in his hands, all the necessary disbursements made by him in the discharge of his duty, and a reasonable compensation for his services, in the discretion of the court. He may, under the direction of the court, submit any controversy arising in the settlement of demands against the estate, or of debts due to it, to the determination of arbitrators, to be chosen by him and the other party to the controversy, and may, under such direction, compound and settle any such controversy, by agreement with the other party, as he thinks proper and most for the interest of the creditors.

SEC. 18. And be it further enacted, That the court, after due notice and hearing, may remove an assignee for any cause which, in the judgment of the court, renders such removal necessary or expedient. At a meeting called by order of the court in its discretion for the purpose, or which shall be called upon the application of a majority of the creditors in number and value, the creditors may, with consent of [the] court, remove any assignee by such a vote as is hereinbefore provided for the choice of assignee. An assignee may, with the consent of the judge, resign his trust and be discharged therefrom. Vacancies caused by death or otherwise in the office of assignee may be filled by appointment of the court, or at its discretion by an election by the creditors, in the manner hereinbefore provided, at a regular meeting, or at a meeting called for the purpose, with such notice thereof in writing to all known creditors, and by such person as the court shall direct. The resignation or removal of an assignee shall in no way release him from performing all things requisite on his part for the proper closing up of his trust and the transmission thereof to his successors, nor shall it affect the liability of the principal or surety on the bond given by the assignee. When, by death or otherwise, the number of assignees is reduced, the estate of the debtor not lawfully disposed of shall vest in the remaining assignee or assignees, and the persons selected to fill vacancies, if any, with the same powers and duties relative thereto as if they were originally chosen. Any former assignee, his executors or administrators, upon request, and at the expense of the estate, shall make and execute to the new assignee all deeds, conveyances, and assurances, and do all other lawful acts requisite to enable him to recover and receive all the estate. And the court may make all orders which it may deem expedient to secure the proper fulfillment of the duties of any former assignee, and the rights and interests of all persons interested in the estate. No person who has received any preference contrary to the provisions of this act shall vote for or be eligible as assignee; but no title to property, real or personal, sold, transferred, or conveyed by an assignee, shall be affected or impaired by reason of his ineligibility. An assignee refusing or unreasonably neglecting to execute an instrument when lawfully required by the court, or disobeying a lawful order or decree of the court in the premises, may be punished as for a contempt of court.

Of Debts and Proof of Claims.

SEC. 19. And be it further enacted, That all debts due and payable from the bankrupt at the time of the adjudication of bankruptcy, and all debts then existing but not payable until a future day, a rebate of interest being made when no interest is payable by the terms of the contract, may be proved against the estate of the bankrupt. All demands against the bankrupt for or on account of any goods or chattels wrongfully taken, converted, or withheld by him may be proved and allowed as debts to the amount of the value of the property so taken or withheld, with interest. If the bankrupt shall be bound as drawer, indorser, surety, bail, or guarantor upon any bill, bond, note, or any other specialty or contract, or for any debt of another person, and his liability shall not have become absolute until after the adjudication of bankruptcy, the creditor may prove the same after such liability shall have become fixed, and before the final dividend shall have been declared. In all cases of contingent debts and contingent liabilities contracted by the bankrupt, and not herein otherwise provided for, the creditor may make claim therefor, and have his claim allowed, with the right to share in the dividends, if the contingency shall happen before the order for the final dividend; or he may at any time apply to the court to have the present value of the debt or liability ascertained and liquidated, which shall then be done in such manner as the court shall order, and he shall be allowed to prove for the amount so ascertained. Any person liable as bail, surety, guarantor, or otherwise for the bankrupt, who shall have paid the debt, or any part thereof, in discharge of the whole, shall be entitled to prove such debt or to stand in the place of the creditor if he shall have proved the same, although such payments shall have been made after the proceedings in bankruptcy were commenced. And any person so liable for the bankrupt, and who has not paid the whole of said debt, but is still liable for the same or any part thereof, may, if the creditor shall fail or omit to prove such debt, prove the same either in the name of the creditor or otherwise, as may be provided by the rules, and subject to such regulations and limitations as may be established by such rules. Where the bankrupt is liable to pay rent or other debt falling due at fixed and stated periods, the creditor may prove for a proportionate part thereof up to the time of the bankruptcy, as if the same grew due from day to day, and not at such fixed and stated periods. If any bankrupt shall be liable for unliquidated damages arising out of any contract or promise, or on account of any goods or chattels wrongfully taken, converted, or withheld, the court may cause such damages to be assessed in such mode as it may deem best, and the sum so assessed may be proved against the estate. No debts other than those above specified shall be proved or allowed against the estate.

SEC. 20. And be it further enacted, That, in all cases of mutual debts or mutual credits between the parties, the account between them shall be stated, and one debt set off against the other, and the balance only shall be allowed or paid, but no set-off shall be allowed of a claim in its nature not provable against the estate: Provided, That no set-off shall be allowed in favor of any debtor to the bankrupt of a claim purchased by or transferred to him after the filing of the petition. When a creditor has a mortgage or pledge of real or personal property of the bankrupt, or a lien thereon for securing the payment of a debt owing to him from the bankrupt, he shall be admitted as a creditor only for the balance of the debt after deducting the value of such property, to be ascertained by agreement between him and the assignee, or by a sale thereof, to be made in such manner as the court shall direct; or the creditor may release or convey his claim to the assignee upon such property, and be admitted to prove his whole debt. If the value of the property exceeds the sum for which it is so held as security, the assignee may release to the creditor the bankrupt's right of redemption therein on receiving such excess; or he may sell the property, subject to the claim of the creditor thereon; and in either case the assignee and creditor, respectively, shall execute all deeds and writings necessary or proper to consummate the transaction. If the property is not so sold or released and delivered up the creditor shall not be allowed to prove any part of his debt.

SEC. 21. And be it further enacted, That no creditor proving his debt or claim shall be allowed to maintain any suit at law or in equity therefor against the bankrupt, but shall be deemed to have waived all right of action and suit against the bankrupt, and all proceedings already commenced, or unsatisfied judgments already obtained thereon, shall be deemed to be discharged and surrendered thereby; and no creditor whose debt is provable under this act shall be allowed to prosecute to final judgment any suit at law or in equity therefor against the bankrupt until the question of the debtor's discharge shall have been determined; and any such suit or proceedings shall, upon the application of the bankrupt, be stayed to await the determination of the court in bankruptcy on the question of the discharge, provided there be no unreasonable delay on the part of the bankrupt in endeavoring to obtain his discharge, and provided, also, that if the amount due the creditor is in dispute, the suit, by leave of the court in bankruptcy, may proceed to judgment for the purpose of ascertaining the amount due, which amount may be proved in bankruptcy, but execution shall be stayed as aforesaid. If any bankrupt shall, at the time of adjudication, be liable upon any bill of exchange, promissory note, or other obligation in respect of distinct contracts as a member of two or more firms carrying on separate and distinct trades, and having distinct estates to be wound up in bankruptcy, or as a sole trader and also [as] a member of a firm, the circumstance that such firms are in whole or in part composed of the same individuals, or that the sole contractor is also one of the joint contractors, shall not prevent proof and receipt of dividend in respect of such distinct contracts against the estates respectively liable upon such contracts.

SEC. 22. And be it further enacted, That all proofs of debts against the estate of the bankrupt, by or in behalf of creditors residing within the judicial district where the proceedings in bankruptcy are pending, shall be made before one of the registers of the court in said district, and by or in behalf of non-resident debtors before any register in bankruptcy in the judicial district where such creditors or either of them reside, or before any commissioner of the circuit court authorized to administer oaths in any district. To entitle a claimant against the estate of a bankrupt to have his demand allowed, it must be verified by a deposition in writing on oath or solemn affirmation before the proper register or commissioner setting forth the demand, the consideration thereof, whether any and what securities are held therefor, and whether any and what payments have been made thereon; that the sum claimed is justly due from the bankrupt to the claimant; that the claimant has not, nor has any other person, for his use, received any security or satisfaction whatever other than that by him set forth, that the claim was not procured for the purpose of influencing the proceedings under this act, and that no bargain or agreement, express or implied, has been made or entered into, by or on behalf of such creditor, to sell, transfer, or dispose of the said claim, or any part thereof, against such bankrupt, or take or receive, directly or indirectly, any money, property, or consideration whatever, whereby the vote of such creditor for assignee, or any action on the part of such creditor, or any other person in the proceedings under this act, is or shall be in any way affected, influenced, or controlled, and no claim shall be allowed unless all the statements set forth in such deposition shall appear to be true. Such oath or solemn affirmation shall be made by the claimant, testifying of his own knowledge, unless he is absent from the United States or prevented by some other good cause from testifying, in which cases the demand may be verified in like manner by the attorney or authorized agent of the claimant testifying to the best of his knowledge, information, and belief, and setting forth his means of knowledge; or if in a foreign country, the oath of the creditor may be taken before any minister, consul, or vice consul of the United States; and the court may, if it shall see fit, require or receive further pertinent evidence either for or against the admission of the claim. Corporations may verify their claims by the oath or solemn affirmation of their president, cashier, or treasurer. If the proof is satisfactory to the register or commissioner, it shall be signed by the deponent, and delivered or sent by mail to the assignee, who shall examine the same and compare it with the books and accounts of the bankrupt, and shall register, in a book to be kept by him for that purpose, the names of creditors who have proved their claims, in the order in which such proof is received, stating the time of receipt of such proof, and the amount and nature of the debts, which books shall be open to the inspection of all the creditors. The court may, on the application of the assignee, or of any creditor, or of the bankrupt, or without any application, examine upon oath the bankrupt, or any person tendering or who has made proof of claims, and may summon any person capable of giving evidence concerning such proof, or concerning the debt sought to be proved, and shall reject all claims not duly proved, or where the proof shows the claim to be founded in fraud, illegality, or mistake.

SEC. 23. And be it further enacted, That when a claim is presented for proof before the election of the assignee, and the judge entertains doubts of its validity or of the right of the creditor to prove it, and is of opinion that such validity or right ought to be investigated by the assignee, he may postpone the proof of the claim until the assignee is chosen. Any person who, after the approval of this act, shall have accepted any preference, having reasonable cause to believe that the same was made or given by the debtor, contrary to any provision of this act, shall not prove the debt or claim on account of which the preference was made or given, nor shall he receive any dividend therefrom until he shall first have surrendered to the assignee all property, money, benefit, or advantage received by him under such preference. The court shall allow all debts duly proved, and shall cause a list thereof to be made and certified by one of the registers; and any creditor may act at all meetings by his duly constituted attorney the same as though personally present.

SEC. 24. And be it further enacted, That a supposed creditor who takes an appeal to the circuit court from the decision of the district court, rejecting his claim in whole or in part, shall, upon entering his appeal in the circuit court, file in the clerk's office thereof a statement in writing of his claim, setting forth the same, substantially, as in a declaration for the same cause of action at law, and the assignee shall plead or answer thereto in like manner, and like proceedings shall thereupon be had in the pleadings, trial, and determination of the cause, as in action at law commenced and prosecuted, in the usual manner, in the courts of the United States, except that no execution shall be awarded against the assignee for the amount of a debt found due to the creditor. The final judgment of the court shall be conclusive, and the list of debts shall, if necessary, be altered to conform thereto. The party prevailing in the suit shall be entitled to costs against the adverse party, to be taxed and recovered as in suits at law; if recovered against the assignee, they shall be allowed out of the estate. A bill of exchange, promissory note, or other instrument, used in evidence upon the proof of a claim, and left in court or deposited in the clerk's office, may be delivered, by the register or clerk having the custody thereof, to the person who used it, upon his filing a copy thereof, attested by the clerk of the court, who shall indorse upon it the name of the party against whose estate it has been proved, and the date and amount of any dividend declared thereon.

Of Property Perishable and in Dispute.

SEC. 25. And be it further enacted, That when it appears to the satisfaction of the court that the estate of the debtor, or any part thereof, is of a perishable nature, or liable to deteriorate in value, the court may order the same to be sold, in such manner as may be deemed most expedient, under the direction of the messenger or assignee, as the case may be, who shall hold the funds received in place of the estate disposed of; and whenever it appears to the satisfaction of the court that the title to any portion of an estate, real or personal, which has come into possession of the assignee, or which is claimed by him, is in dispute, the court may, upon the petition of the assignee, and after such notice to the claimant, his agent or attorney, as the court shall deem reasonable, order it to be sold, under the direction of the assignee, who shall hold the funds received in place of the estate disposed of; and the proceeds of the sale shall be considered the measure of the value of the property in any suit or controversy between the parties in any courts. But this provision shall not prevent the recovery of the property from the possession of the assignee by any proper action commenced at any time before the court orders the sale.

Examination of Bankrupts.

SEC. 26. And be it further enacted, That the court may, on the application of the assignee in bankruptcy, or of any creditor, or without any application, at all times require the bankrupt, upon reasonable notice, to attend and submit to an examination, on oath, upon all matters relating to the disposal or condition of his property, to his trade and dealings with others, and his accounts concerning the same, to all debts due to or claimed from him, and to all other matters concerning his property and estate and the due settlement thereof according to law, which examination shall be in writing, and shall be signed by the bankrupt and filed with the other proceedings; and the court may, in like manner, require the attendance of any other person as a witness, and if such person shall fail to attend, on being summoned thereto, the court may compel his attendance by warrant directed to the marshal, commanding him to arrest such person and bring him forthwith before the court, or before a register in bankruptcy, for examination as such witness. If the bankrupt is imprisoned, absent, or disabled from attendance, the court may order him to be produced by the jailor, or any officer in whose custody he may be, or may direct the examination to be had, taken, and certified at such time and place and in such manner as the court may deem proper, and with like effect as if such examination had been had in court. The bankrupt shall at all times, until his discharge, be subject to the order of the court, and shall, at the expense of the estate, execute all proper writings and instruments, and do and perform all acts required by the court touching the assigned property or estate, and to enable the assignee to demand, recover, and receive all the property and estate assigned, wherever situated; and for neglect or refusal to obey any order of the court, such bankrupt may be committed and punished as for a contempt of court. If the bankrupt is without the district, and unable to return and personally attend at any of the times or do any of the acts which may be specified or required pursuant to this section, and if it appears that such absence was not caused by wilful default, and if, as soon as may be after the removal of such impediment, he offers to attend and submit to the order of the court in all respects, he shall be permitted so to do, with like effect as if he had not been in default. He shall also be at liberty, from time to time, upon oath to amend and correct his schedule of creditors and property, so that the same shall conform to the facts. For good cause shown the wife of any bankrupt may be required to attend before the court, to the end that she may be examined as a witness; and if such wife do not attend at the time and place specified in the order, the bankrupt shall not be entitled to a discharge unless he shall prove to the satisfaction of the court that he was unable to procure the attendance of his wife. No bankrupt shall be liable to arrest during the pendency of the proceedings in bankruptcy in any civil action, unless the same is founded on some debt or claim from which his discharge in bankruptcy would not release him.

Of the Distribution of the Bankrupt's Estate.

SEC. 27. And be it further enacted, That all creditors whose debts are duly proved and allowed shall be entitled to share in the bank-rupt's property and estate pro rata, without any priority or preference whatever, except that wages due from him to any operative, or clerk, or house servant, to an amount not exceeding fifty dollars, for labor performed within six months next preceding the adjudication of bankruptcy, shall be entitled to priority, and shall be first paid in full: Provided, That any debt proved by any person liable, as bail, surety, guarantor, or otherwise, for the bankrupt, shall not be paid to the person so proving the same until satisfactory evidence shall be produced of the payment of such debt by such person so liable, and the share to which such debt would be entitled may be paid into court, or otherwise held for the benefit of the party entitled thereto, as the court may direct. At the expiration of three months from the date of the adjudication of bankruptcy in any case, or as much earlier as the court may direct, the court, upon request of the assignee, shall call a general meeting of the creditors, of which due notice shall be given, and the assignee shall then report, and exhibit to the court and to the creditors just and true accounts of all his receipts and payments, verified by his oath, and he shall also produce and file vouchers for all payments for which vouchers shall be required by any rule of the court; he shall also submit the schedule of the bankrupt's creditors and property as amended, duly verified by the bankrupt, and a statement of the whole estate of the bankrupt as then ascertained, of the property recovered and of the property outstanding, specifying the cause of its being outstanding, also what debts or claims are yet undetermined, and stating what sum remains in his hands. At such meeting the majority in value of the creditors present shall determine whether any and what part of the net proceeds of the estate, after deducting and retaining a sum sufficient to provide for all undetermined claims which, by reason of the distant residence of the creditor, or for other sufficient reason, have not been proved, and for other expenses and contingencies, shall be divided among the creditors; but unless at least one half in value of the creditors shall attend such meeting, either in person or by attorney, it shall be the duty of the assignee so to determine. In case a dividend is ordered, the register shall, within ten days after such meeting, prepare a list of creditors entitled to dividend, and shall calculate and set opposite to the name of each creditor who has proved his claim the dividend to which he is entitled out of the net proceeds of the estate set apart for dividend, and shall forward by mail to every creditor a statement of the dividend to which he is entitled, and such creditor shall be paid by the assignee in such manner as the court may direct.

SEC. 28. And be it further enacted, That the like proceedings shall be had at the expiration of the next three months, or earlier, if practicable, and a third meeting of creditors shall then be called by the court, and a final dividend then declared, unless any action at law or suit in equity be pending, or unless some other estate or effects of the debtor afterwards come to the hands of the assignee, in which case the assignee shall, as soon as may be, convert such estate or effects into money, and within two months after the same shall be so converted the same shall be divided in manner aforesaid. Further dividends shall be made in like manner as often as occasion requires; and after the third meeting of creditors no further meeting shall be called, unless ordered by the court. If at any time there shall be in the hands of the assignee any outstanding debts or other property, due or belonging to the estate, which cannot be collected and received by the assignee without unreasonable or inconvenient delay or expense, the assignee may, under the direction of the court, sell and assign such debts or other property in such manner as the court shall order. No dividend already declared shall be disturbed by reason of debts being subsequently proved, but the creditors proving such debts shall be entitled to a dividend equal to those already received by the other creditors before any further payment is made to the latter. Preparatory to the final dividend, the assignee shall submit his account to the court and file the same, and give notice to the creditors of such filing, and shall also give notice that he will apply for a settlement of his account, and for a discharge from all liability as assignee, at a time to be specified in such notice, and at such time the court shall audit and pass the accounts of the assignee, and such assignee shall, if required by the court, be examined as to the truth of such account, and if found correct he shall thereby be discharged from all liability as assignee to any creditor of the bankrupt. The court shall thereupon order a dividend of the estate and effects, or of such part thereof as it sees fit, among such of the creditors as have proved their claims, in proportion to the respective amount of their said debts. In addition to all expenses necessarily incurred by him in the execution of his trust, in any case, the assignee shall be entitled to an allowance for his services in such case on all moneys received and paid out by him therein, for any sum not exceeding one thousand dollars, five per centum thereon; for any larger sum, not exceeding five thousand dollars, two and a half per centum on the excess over one thousand dollars; and for any larger sum, one per centum on the excess over five thousand dollars, and if, at any time, there shall not be in his hands a sufficient amount of money to defray the necessary expenses required for the further execution of his trust, he shall not be obliged to proceed therein until the necessary funds are advanced or satisfactorily secured to him. If by accident, mistake, or other cause, without fault of the assignee, either or both of the said second and third meetings should not be held within the times limited, the court may, upon motion of an interested party, order such meetings, with like effect as to the validity of the proceedings as if the meeting had been duly held. In the order for a dividend, under this section, the following claims shall be entitled to priority or preference, and to be first paid in full in the following order:

First. The fees, costs, and expenses of suits, and the several proceedings in bankruptcy under this act, and for the custody of property, as herein provided.

Second. All debts due to the United States, and all taxes and assessments under the laws thereof.

Third. All debts due to the State in which the proceedings in bankruptcy are pending, and all taxes and assessments made under the laws of such State.

Fourth. Wages due to any operative, clerk, or house servant, to an amount not exceeding fifty dollars, for labor performed within six months next preceding the first publication of the notice of proceedings in bankruptcy.

Fifth. All debts due to any persons who, by the laws of the United States, are or may be entitled to a priority or preference, in like manner as if this act had not been passed: Always provided, That nothing contained in this act shall interfere with the assessment and collection of taxes by the authority of the United States or any State.

Of the Bankrupt's Discharge and its Effect.

SEC. 29. And be it further enacted, That at any time after the expiration of six months from the adjudication of bankruptcy, or if no debts have been proved against the bankrupt, or if no assets have come to the hands of the assignee, at any time after the expiration of sixty days, and within one year from the adjudication of bankruptcy, the bankrupt may apply to the court for a discharge from his debts, and the court shall thereupon order notice to be given by mail to all creditors who have proved their debts, and by publication at least once a week in such newspapers as the court shall designate, due regard being had to the general circulation of the same in the district, or in that portion of the district, in which the bankrupt and his creditors shall reside, to appear on a day appointed for that purpose, and show cause why a discharge should not be granted to the bankrupt. No discharge shall be granted, or, if granted, be valid, if the bankrupt has willfully sworn falsely in his affidavit annexed to his petition, schedule, or inventory, or upon any examination in the course of the proceedings in bankruptcy, in relation to any material fact concerning his estate or his debts, or to any other material fact; or if he has concealed any part of his estate or effects, or any books or writings relating thereto, or if he has been guilty of any fraud or negligence in the care, custody, or delivery to the assignee of the property belonging to him at the time of the presentation of his petition and inventory, excepting such property as he is permitted to retain under the provisions of this act, or if he has caused, permitted, or suffered any loss, waste, or destruction thereof; or if, within four months before the commencement of such proceedings, he has procured his lands, goods, money, or chattels to be attached, sequestered, or seized on execution; or if, since the passage of this act, he has destroyed, mutilated, altered, or falsified any of his books, documents, papers, writings, or securities, or has made or been privy to the making of any false or fraudulent entry in any book of account or other document, with intent to defraud his creditors; or has removed or caused to be removed any part of his property from the district, with intent to defraud his creditors; or if he has given any fraudulent preference contrary to the provisions of this act, or made any fraudulent payment, gift, transfer, conveyance, or assignment of any part of his property, or has lost any part thereof in gaming, or has admitted a false or fictitious debt against his estate; or if, having knowledge that any person has proved such false or fictitious debt, he has not disclosed the same to his assignee within one month after such knowledge; or if, being a merchant or tradesman, he has not, subsequently to the passage of this act, kept proper books of account; or if he, or any person in his behalf, has procured the assent of any creditor to the discharge, or influenced the action of any creditor at any stage of the proceedings, by any pecuniary consideration or obligation; or if he has, in contemplation of becoming bankrupt, made any pledge, payment, transfer, assignment, or conveyance of any part of his property, directly or indirectly, absolutely or conditionally, for the purpose of preferring any creditor or person having a claim against him, or who is or may be under liability for him, or for the purpose of preventing the property from coming into the hands of the assignee, or of being distributed under this act in satisfaction of his debts; or if he has been convicted of any misdemeanor under this act, or has been guilty of any fraud whatever contrary to the true intent of this act; and before any discharge is granted, the bankrupt shall take and subscribe an oath to the effect that he has not done, suffered, or been privy to any act, matter, or thing specified in this act as a ground for withholding such discharge, or as invalidating such discharge if granted.

SEC. 30. And be it further enacted, That no person who shall have been discharged under this act, and shall afterwards become bankrupt, on his own application shall be again entitled to a discharge whose estate is insufficient to pay seventy per centum of the debts proved against it, unless the assent in writing of three fourths in value of his creditors who have proved their claims is filed at or before the time of application for discharge; but a bankrupt who shall prove to the satisfaction of the court that he has paid all the debts owing by him at the time of any previous bankruptcy, or who has been voluntarily released therefrom by his creditors, shall be entitled to a discharge in the same manner and with the same effect as if he had not previously been bankrupt.

SEC. 31. And be it further enacted, That any creditor opposing the discharge of any bankrupt may file a specification in writing of the grounds of his opposition, and the court may in its discretion order any question of fact so presented to be tried at a stated session of the district court.

SEC. 32. And be it further enacted, That if it shall appear to the court that the bankrupt has in all things conformed to his duty under this act, and that he is entitled, under the provisions thereof, to receive a discharge, the court shall grant him a discharge from all his debts except as hereinafter provided, and shall give him a certificate thereof under the seal of the court, in substance as follows:

District Court of the United States, District of _____. Whereas _____ has been duly adjudged a bankrupt under the act of Congress establishing a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, and appears to have conformed to all the requirements of law in that behalf, it is therefore ordered by the court that said _____ be forever discharged from all debts and claims which by said act are made provable against his estate, and which existed on the _____ day of _____, on which day the petition for adjudication was filed by (or against) him; excepting such debts, if any, as are by said act excepted from the operation of a discharge in bankruptcy. Given under my hand and the seal of the court at _____, in the said district, this _____ day of _____, A. D. _____.
(Seal) _____, Judge.

SEC. 33. And be it further enacted, That no debt created by the fraud or embezzlement of the bankrupt, or by his defalcation as a public officer, or while acting in any fiduciary character, shall be discharged under this act; but the debt may be proved, and the dividend thereon shall be a payment on account of said debt; and no discharge granted under this act shall release, discharge, or affect any person liable for the same debt for or with the bankrupt, either as partner, joint contractor, indorser, surety, or otherwise. And in all proceedings in bankruptcy commenced after one year from the time this act shall go into operation, no discharge shall be granted to a debtor whose assets do not pay fifty per centum of the claims against his estate, unless the assent in writing of a majority in number and value of his creditors who have proved their claims is filed in the case at or before the time of application for discharge.

SEC. 34. And be it further enacted, That a discharge duly granted under this act shall, with the exceptions aforesaid, release the bankrupt from all debts, claims, liabilities, and demands which were or might have been proved against his estate in bankruptcy, and may be pleaded, by a simple averment that on the day of its date such discharge was granted to him, setting the same forth in hæc verba, as a full and complete bar to all suits brought on any such debts, claims, liabilities, or demands, and the certificate shall be conclusive evidence in favor of such bankrupt of the fact and [the] regularity of such discharge: Always provided, That any creditor or creditors of said bankrupt, whose debt was proved or provable against the estate in bankruptcy, who shall see fit to contest the validity of said discharge on the ground that it was fraudulently obtained, may, at any time within two years after the date thereof, apply to the court which granted it to set aside and annul the same. Said application shall be in writing, shall specify which, in particular, of the several acts mentioned in section twenty-nine it is intended to give evidence of against the bankrupt, setting forth the grounds of avoidance, and no evidence shall be admitted as to any other of the said acts; but said application shall be subject to amendment at the discretion of the court. The court shall cause reasonable notice of said application to be given to said bankrupt, and order him to appear and answer the same, within such time as to the court shall seem fit and proper. If, upon the hearing of said parties, the court shall find that the fraudulent acts, or any of them, set forth as aforesaid by said creditor or creditors against the bankrupt, are proved, and that said creditor or creditors had no knowledge of the same until after the granting of said discharge, judgment shall be given in favor of said creditor or creditors, and the discharge of said bankrupt shall be set aside and annulled. But if said court shall find that said fraudulent acts and all of them, set forth as aforesaid, are not proved, or that they were known to said creditor or creditors before the granting of said discharge, then judgment shall be rendered in favor of the bankrupt, and the validity of his discharge shall not be affected by said proceedings.

SEC. 35. And be it further enacted, That if any person, being insolvent, or in contemplation of insolvency, within four months before the filing of the petition by or against him, with a view to give a preference to any creditor or person having a claim against him, or who is under any liability for him, procures any part of his property to be attached, sequestered, or seized on execution, or makes any payment, pledge, assignment, transfer, or conveyance of any part of his property, either directly or indirectly, absolutely or conditionally, the person receiving such payment, pledge, assignment, transfer, or conveyance, or to be benefited thereby, or by such attachment, having reasonable cause to believe such person is insolvent, and that such attachment, payment, pledge, assignment, or conveyance is made in fraud of the provisions of this act, the same shall be void, and the assignee may recover the property, or the value of it, from the person so receiving it, or so to be benefited; and if any person, being insolvent, or in contemplation of insolvency or bankruptcy, within six months before the filing of the petition by or against him, makes any payment, sale, assignment, transfer, conveyance, or other disposition of any part of his property to any person who then has reasonable cause to believe him to be insolvent, or to be acting in contemplation of insolvency, and that such payment, sale, assignment, transfer, or other conveyance is made with a view to prevent his property from coming to his assignee in bankruptcy, or to prevent the same from being distributed under this act, or to defeat the object of, or in any way impair, hinder, impede, or delay the operation and effect of, or to evade any of the provisions of this act, the sale, assignment, transfer, or conveyance shall be void, and the assignee may recover the property, or the value thereof, as assets of the bankrupt. And if such sale, assignment, transfer, or conveyance is not made in the usual and ordinary course of business of the debtor, the fact shall be prima facie evidence of fraud. Any contract, covenant, or security made or given by a bankrupt or other person with, or in trust for, any creditor, for securing the payment of any money as a consideration for or with intent to induce the creditor to forbear opposing the application for discharge of the bankrupt, shall be void; and if any creditor shall obtain any sum of money or other goods, chattels, or security from any person as an inducement for forbearing to oppose, or consenting to, such application for discharge, every creditor so offending shall forfeit all right to any share or dividend in the estate of the bankrupt, and shall also forfeit double the value or amount of such money, goods, chattels, or security so obtained to be recovered by the assignee for the benefit of the estate.

Bankruptcy of Partnerships and of Corporations.

SEC. 36. And be it further enacted, That where two or more persons who are partners in trade shall be adjudged bankrupt, either on the petition of such partners or any one of them, or on the petition of any creditor of the partners, a warrant shall issue in the manner provided by this act, upon which all the joint stock and property of the copartnership, and also all the separate estate of each of the partners, shall be taken, excepting such parts thereof as are hereinbefore excepted; and all the creditors of the company, and the separate creditors of each partner, shall be allowed to prove their respective debts; and the assignee shall be chosen by the creditors of the company, and shall also keep separate accounts of the joint stock or property of the copartnership and of the separate estate of each member thereof; and after deducting out of the whole amount received by such assignee the whole of the expenses and disbursements, the net proceeds of the joint stock shall be appropriated to pay the creditors of the copartnership, and the net proceeds of the separate estate of each partner shall be appropriated to pay his separate creditors; and if there shall be any balance of the separate estate of any partner, after the payment of his separate debts, such balance shall be added to the joint stock for the payment of the joint creditors; and if there shall be any balance of the joint stock after payment of the joint debts, such balance shall be divided and appropriated to and among the separate estates of the several partners according to their respective right and interest therein, and as it would have been if the partnership had been dissolved without any bankruptcy; and the sum so appropriated to the separate estate of each partner shall be applied to the payment of his separate debts; and the certificate of discharge shall be granted or refused to each partner as the same would or ought to be if the proceedings had been against him alone under this act; and in all other respects the proceedings against partners shall be conducted in the like manner as if they had been commenced and prosecuted against one person alone. If such copartners reside in different districts, that court in which the petition is first filed shall retain exclusive jurisdiction over the case.

SEC. 37. And be it further enacted, That the provisions of this act shall apply to all moneyed business or commercial corporations and joint stock companies, and that upon the petition of any officer of any such corporation or company, duly authorized by a vote of a majority of the corporators at any legal meeting called for the purpose, or upon the petition of any creditor or creditors of such corporation or company, made and presented in the manner hereinafter provided in respect to debtors, the like proceedings shall be had and taken as are hereinafter provided in the case of debtors; and all the provisions of this act which apply to the debtor, or set forth his duties in regard to furnishing schedules and inventories, executing papers, submitting to examinations, disclosing, making over, secreting, concealing, conveying, assigning, or paying away his money or property, shall in like manner, and with like force, effect, and penalties, apply to each and every officer of such corporation or company in relation to the same matters concerning the corporation or company, and the money and property thereof. All payments, conveyances, and assignments declared fraudulent and void by this act when made by a debtor, shall in like manner, and to the like extent, and with like remedies, be fraudulent and void when made by a corporation or company. No allowance or discharge shall be granted to any corporation or joint stock company, or to any person or officer or member thereof: Provided, That whenever any corporation by proceedings under this act shall be declared bankrupt, all its property and assets shall be distributed to the creditors of such corporations in the manner provided in this act in respect to natural persons.

Of Dates and Depositions.

SEC. 38. And be it further enacted, That the filing of a petition for adjudication in bankruptcy, either by a debtor in his own behalf, or by any creditor against a debtor; upon which an order may be issued by the court, or by a register in the manner provided in section four, shall be deemed and taken to be the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy under this act: the proceedings in all cases of bankruptcy shall be deemed matters of record, but the same shall not be required to be recorded at large, but shall be carefully filed, kept, and numbered in the office of the clerk of the court, and a docket only, or short memorandum thereof, kept in books to be provided for that purpose, which shall be open to public inspection. Copies of such records, duly certified under the seal of the court, shall in all cases be prima facie evidence of the facts therein stated. Evidence or examination in any of the proceedings under this act may be taken before the court, or a register in bankruptcy, viva voce or in writing, before a commissioner of the circuit court, or by affidavit, or on commission, and the court may direct a reference to a register in bankruptcy, or other suitable person, to take and certify such examination, and may compel the attendance of witnesses, the production of books and papers, and the giving of testimony in the same manner as in suits in equity in the circuit court.

Involuntary Bankruptcy.

SEC. 39. And be it further enacted, That any person residing and owing debts as aforesaid, who, after the passage of this act, shall depart from the State, district, or Territory of which he is an inhabitant, with intent to defraud his creditors, or, being absent, shall, with such intent, remain absent; or shall conceal himself to avoid the service of legal process in any action for the recovery of a debt or demand provable under this act; or shall conceal or remove any of his property to avoid its being attached, taken, or sequestered on legal process; or shall make any assignment, gift, sale, conveyance, or transfer of his estate, property, rights, or credits, either within the United States or elsewhere, with intent to delay, defraud, or hinder his creditors; or who has been arrested and held in custody under or by virtue of mesne process of execution, issued out of any court of any State, district, or Territory, within which such debtor resides or has property founded upon a demand in its nature provable against a bankrupt's estate under this act, and for a sum exceeding one hundred dollars, and such process is remaining in force and not discharged by payment, or in any other manner provided by the law of such State, district, or Territory applicable thereto, for a period of seven days; or has been actually imprisoned for more than seven days in a civil action, founded on contract, for the sum of one hundred dollars or upward; or who, being bankrupt or insolvent, or in contemplation of bankruptcy or insolvency, shall make any payment, gift, grant, sale, conveyance, or transfer of money or other property, estate, rights, or credits, or give any warrant to confess judgment; or procure or suffer his property to be taken on legal process, with intent to give a preference to one or more of his creditors, or to any person or persons who are or may be liable for him as indorsers, bail, sureties, or otherwise, or with the intent, by such disposition of his property, to defeat or delay the operation of this act; or who, being a banker, merchant, or trader, has fraudulently stopped or suspended and not resumed payment of his commercial paper, within a period of fourteen days, shall be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy, and, subject to the conditions hereinafter prescribed, shall be adjudged a bankrupt, on the petition of one or more of his creditors, the aggregate of whose debts provable under this act amount to at least two hundred and fifty dollars, provided such petition is brought within six months after the act of bankruptcy shall have been committed. And if such person shall be adjudged a bankrupt, the assignee may recover back the money or other property so paid, conveyed, sold, assigned, or transferred contrary to this act, provided the person receiving such payment or conveyance had reasonable cause to believe that a fraud on this act was intended, or that the debtor was insolvent, and such creditor shall not be allowed to prove his debt in bankruptcy.

SEC. 40. And be it further enacted, That upon the filing of the petition authorized by the next preceding section, if it shall appear that sufficient grounds exist therefor, the court shall direct the entry of an order requiring the debtor to appear and show cause, at a court of bankruptcy to be holden at a time to be specified in the order, not less than five days from the service thereof, why the prayer of the petition should not be granted; and may also, by its injunctions, restrain the debtor, and any other person, in the mean time, from making any transfer or disposition of any part of the debtor's property not excepted by this act from the operation thereof and from any interference therewith; and if it shall appear that there is probable cause for believing that the debtor is about to leave the district, or to remove or conceal his goods and chattels or his evidence of property, or make any fraudulent conveyance or disposition thereof, the court may issue a warrant to the marshal of the district, commanding him to arrest the alleged [bankrupt] and him safely keep, unless he shall give bail to the satisfaction of the court for his appearance from time to time, as required by the court, until the decision of the court upon the petition or the further order of the court, and forthwith to take possession provisionally of all the property and effects of the debtor, and safely keep the same until the further order of the court. A copy of the petition and of such order to show cause shall be served on such debtor by delivering the same to him personally, or leaving the same at his last or usual place of abode; or, if such debtor cannot be found, or his place of residence ascertained, service shall be made by publication in such manner as the judge may direct. No further proceedings, unless the debtor appear, and consent thereto, shall be had until proof shall have been given, to the satisfaction of the court, of such service or publication; and if such proof be not given on the return day of such order, the proceedings shall be adjourned and an order made that the notice be forthwith so served or published.

SEC. 41. And be it further enacted, That on such return day or adjourned day, if the notice has been duly served or published, or shall be waived by the appearance and consent of the debtor, the court shall proceed summarily to hear the allegations of the petitioner and debtor, and may adjourn the proceedings from time to time, on good cause shown, and shall, if the debtor on the same day so demand in writing, order a trial by jury at the first term of the court at which a jury shall be in attendance, to ascertain the fact of such alleged bankruptcy; and if upon such hearing or trial, the debtor proves to the satisfaction of the court or of the jury, as the case may be, that the facts set forth in the petition are not true, or that the debtor has paid and satisfied all liens upon his property, in case the existence of such liens were the sole ground of the proceeding, the proceedings shall be dismissed and the respondent shall recover costs.

SEC. 42. And be it further enacted, That if the facts set forth in the petition are found to be true, or if default be made by the debtor to appear pursuant to the order, upon due proof of service thereof being made, the court shall adjudge the debtor to be a bankrupt, and, as such, subject to the provisions of this act, and shall forthwith issue a warrant to take possession of the estate of the debtor. The warrant shall be directed, and the property of the debtor shall be taken thereon, and shall be assigned and distributed in the same manner and with similar proceedings to those hereinbefore provided for the taking possession, assignment, and distribution of the property of the debtor upon his own petition. The order of adjudication of bankruptcy shall require the bankrupt forthwith, or within such number of days, not exceeding five after the date of the order or notice thereof, as shall by the order be prescribed, to make and deliver, or transmit by mail, post-paid, to the messenger, a schedule of the creditors and an inventory of his estate in the form and verified in the manner required of a petitioning debtor by section thirteen. If the debtor has failed to appear in person, or by attorney, a certified copy of the adjudication shall be forthwith served on him by delivery or publication in the manner hereinbefore provided for the service of the order to show cause; and if the bankrupt is absent or cannot be found, such schedule and inventory shall be prepared by the messenger and the assignee from the best information they can obtain. If the petitioning creditor shall not appear and proceed on the return day, or adjourned day, the court may, upon the petition of any other creditor, to the required amount, proceed to adjudicate on such petition, without requiring a new service or publication of notice to the debtor.

Of Superseding the Bankrupt Proceedings by Arrangement.

SEC. 43. And be it further enacted, That if at the first meeting of creditors, or at any meeting of creditors to be specially called for that purpose, and of which previous notice shall have been given for such length of time and in such manner as the court may direct, three fourths in value of the creditors whose claims have been proved shall determine and resolve that it is for the interest of the general body of the creditors that the estate of the bankrupt should be wound up and settled, and distribution made among the creditors by trustees, under the inspection and direction of a committee of the creditors, it shall be lawful for the creditors to certify and report such resolution to the court, and to nominate one or more trustees to take and hold and distribute the estate, under the direction of such committee. If it shall appear to the court, after hearing the bankrupt and such creditors as may desire to be heard, that the resolution was duly passed, and that the interests of the creditors will be promoted thereby, it shall confirm the same; and upon the execution and filing, by or on behalf of three fourths in value of all the creditors whose claims have been proved, of a consent that the estate of the bankrupt be wound up and settled by said trustees according to the terms of such resolution, the bankrupt, or his assignee in bankruptcy, if appointed, as the case may be, shall, under the direction of the court, and under oath, convey, transfer, and deliver all the property and estate of the bankrupt to the said trustee or trustees, who shall, upon such conveyance and transfer, have and hold the same in the same manner, and with the same powers and rights, in all respects, as the bankrupt would have had or held the same if no proceedings in bankruptcy had been taken, or as the assignee in bankruptcy would have done had such resolution not been passed; and such consent and the proceedings thereunder shall be as binding in all respects on any creditor whose debt is provable, who has not signed the same, as if he had signed it, and on any creditor whose debt, if provable, is not proved, as if he had proved it; and the court, by order, shall direct all acts and things needful to be done to carry into effect such resolution of the creditors, and the said trustees shall proceed to wind up and settle the estate under the direction and inspection of such committee of the creditors, for the equal benefit of all such creditors, and the winding up and settlement of any estate under the provisions of this section shall be deemed to be proceedings in bankruptcy under this act; and the said trustees shall have all the rights and powers of assignees in bankruptcy. The court, on the application of such trustees, shall have power to summon and examine, or [on] oath or otherwise, the bankrupt and any creditor, and any person indebted to the estate, or known or suspected of having any of the estate in his possession, or any other person whose examination may be material or necessary to aid the trustees in the execution of their trust, and to compel the attendance of such persons and the production of books and papers in the same manner as in other proceedings in bankruptcy under this act; and the bankrupt shall have the like right to apply for and obtain a discharge after the passage of such resolution and the appointment of such trustees as if such resolution had not been passed, and as if all the proceedings had continued in the manner provided in the preceding sections of this act. If the resolution shall not be duly reported, or the consent of the creditors shall not be duly filed, or if, upon its filing, the court shall not think fit to approve thereof, the bankruptcy shall proceed as though no resolution had been passed, and the court may make all necessary orders for resuming the proceedings. And the period of time which shall have elapsed between the date of the resolution and the date of the order for assuming proceedings shall not be reckoned in calculating periods of time prescribed by this act.

Penalties against Bankrupts.

SEC. 44. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act if any debtor or bankrupt shall, after the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, secrete or conceal any property belonging to his estate, or part with, conceal, or destroy, alter, mutilate, or falsify, or cause to be concealed, destroyed, altered, mutilated, or falsified, any book, deed, document, or writing relating thereto, or remove, or cause to be removed, the same or any part thereof out of the district, or otherwise dispose of any part thereof, with intent to prevent it from coming into the possession of the assignee in bankruptcy, or to hinder, impede, or delay either of them in recovering or receiving the same, or make any payment, gift, sale, assignment, transfer, or conveyance of any property belonging to his estate with the like intent, or spends any part thereof in gaming; or shall, with intent to defraud, willfully and fraudulently conceal from his assignee or omit from his schedule any property or effects whatsoever; or if, in case of any person having, to his knowledge or belief, proved a false or fictitious debt against his estate, he shall fail to disclose the same to his assignee within one month after coming to the knowledge or belief thereof; or shall attempt to account for any of his property by fictitious losses or expenses; or shall, within three months before the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, under the false color and pretense of carrying on business and dealing in the ordinary course of trade, obtain on credit from any person any goods or chattels with intent to defraud; or shall, with intent to defraud his creditors, within three months next before the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, pawn, pledge, or dispose of, otherwise than by bona fide transactions in the ordinary way of his trade, any of his goods or chattels which have been obtained on credit and remain unpaid for, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof in any court of the United States, shall be punished by imprisonment, with or without hard labor, for a term not exceeding three years.

Penalties against Officers.

SEC. 45. And be it further enacted, That if any judge, register, clerk, marshal, messenger, assignee, or any other officer of the several courts of bankruptcy shall, for anything done or pretended to be done under this act, or under color of doing anything thereunder, willfully demand or take, or appoint or allow any person whatever to take for him or on his account, or for or on account of any other person, or in trust for him or for any other person, any fee, emolument, gratuity, sum of money, or anything of value whatever, other than is allowed by this act, or which shall be allowed under the authority thereof, such person, when convicted thereof, shall forfeit and pay the sum of not less than three hundred dollars and not exceeding five hundred dollars, and be imprisoned not exceeding three years.

SEC. 46. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall forge the signature of a judge, register, or other officer of the court, or shall forge or counterfeit the seal of the courts, or knowingly concur in using any such forged or counterfeit signature or seal for the purpose of authenticating any proceeding or document, or shall tender in evidence any such proceeding or document with a false or counterfeit signature of any such judge, register, or other officer, or a false or counterfeit seal of the court, subscribed or attached thereto, knowing such signature or seal to be false or counterfeit, any such person shall be guilty of felony, and upon conviction thereof shall be liable to a fine of not less than five hundred dollars and not more than five thousand dollars, and to be imprisoned not exceeding five years, at the discretion of the court.

Fees and Costs.

SEC. 47. And be it further enacted, That in each case there shall be allowed and paid, in addition to the fees of the clerk of the court as now established by law, or as may be established by general order, under the provisions of this act, for fees in bankruptcy, the following fees, which shall be applied to the payment for the services of the registers:

For issuing every warrant, two dollars.

For each day in which a meeting is held, three dollars.

For each order for a dividend, three dollars.

For every order substituting an arrangement by trust deed for bankruptcy, two dollars.

For every bond with sureties, two dollars.

For every application for any meeting in any matter under this act, one dollar.

For every day's service while actually employed under a special order of the court, a sum not exceeding five dollars, to be allowed by the court.

For taking depositions, the fees now allowed by law.

For every discharge when there is no opposition, two dollars.

Such fees shall have priority of payment over all other claims out of the estate, and, before a warrant issues, the petitioner shall deposit with the senior register of the court, or with the clerk, to be delivered to the register, fifty dollars as security for the payment thereof; and if there are not sufficient assets for the payment of the fees, the person upon whose petition the warrant is issued, shall pay the same, and the court may issue an execution against him to compel payment to the register.

Before any dividend is ordered, the assignee shall pay out of the estate to the messenger the following fees, and no more:

First. For service of warrant, two dollars.

Second. For all necessary travel, at the rate of five cents a mile, each way.

Third. For each written note to creditor named in the schedule, ten cents.

Fourth. For custody of property, publication of notices, and other services, his actual and necessary expenses upon returning the same in specific items, and making oath that they have been actually incurred and paid by him, and are just and reasonable, the same to be taxed or adjusted by the court, and the oath of the messenger shall not be conclusive as to the necessity of said expenses.

For cause shown, and upon hearing thereon, such further allowance may be made as the court, in its discretion, may determine.

The enumeration of the foregoing fees shall not prevent the judges, who shall frame general rules and orders, in accordance with the provisions of section ten, from prescribing a tariff of fees for all other services of the officers of courts of bankruptcy, or from reducing the fees prescribed in this section in classes of cases to be named in their rules and orders.

Of Meaning of Terms and Computation of Time.

SEC. 48. And be it further enacted, That the word "assignee," and the word "creditor" shall include the plural also; and the word "messenger" shall include his assistant or assistants, except in the provision for the fees of that officer. The word "marshal" shall include the marshal's deputies; the word "person" shall also include "corporation;" and the word "oath" shall include "affirmation." And in all cases in which any particular number of days is prescribed by this act, or shall be mentioned in any rule or order of court or general order which shall at any time be made under this act, for the doing of any act, or for any other purpose, the same shall be reckoned, in the absence of any expression to the contrary, exclusive of the first, and inclusive of the last day, unless the last day shall fall on a Sunday, Christmas day, or on any day appointed by the President of the United States as a day of public fast or thanksgiving, or on the Fourth of July, in which case the time shall be reckoned exclusive of that day also.

SEC. 49. And be it further enacted, That all the jurisdiction, power, and authority conferred upon and vested in the district court of the United States by this act in cases in bankruptcy are hereby conferred upon and vested in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and in and upon the supreme courts of the several Territories of the United States, when the bankrupt resides in the said District of Columbia or in either of the said Territories. And in those judicial districts which are not within any organized circuit of the United States, the power and jurisdiction of a circuit court in bankruptcy may be exercised by the district judge.

SEC. 50. And be it further enacted, That this act shall commence and take effect as to the appointment of the officers created hereby, and the promulgation of rules and general orders, from and after the date of its approval: Provided, That no petition or other proceeding under this act shall be filed, received, or commenced before the first day of June, anno Domini eighteen hundred and sixty-seven.

pied as a town site, and therefore not subject to entry under the agricultural preemption laws, it shall be lawful, in case such town shall be incorporated, for the corporate authorities thereof, and if not incorporated for the judge of the county court for the county in which such town may be situated, to enter at the proper land office, and at the minimum price, the land so settled and occupied, in trust for the several use and benefit of the occupants thereof, according to their respective interests: the execution of which trust, as to the disposal of the lots in such town, and the proceeds of the sales thereof, to be conducted under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the legislative authority of the State or Territory in which the same may be situated: Provided, That the entry of the land intended by this act to be made shall be made, or a declaratory statement of the purpose of the inhabitants to enter it as a town site under this act shall be filed with the register of the proper land office, prior to the commencement of the public sale of the body of land in which it is included, and that the entry or declaratory statement shall include only such lands as is actually occupied by the town and the title to which is in the United States. If upon surveyed lands the entry shall in its exterior limit be made in conformity to the legal subdivisions of the public lands authorized by the act of twenty-fourth April, one thousand eight hundred and twenty; and where the inhabitants are in number one hundred and less than two hundred, shall embrace not exceeding three hundred and twenty acres; and in cases where the inhabitants of such town are more than two hundred and less than one thousand, shall embrace not exceeding six hundred and forty acres; and where the number of inhabitants is one thousand and over one thousand, shall embrace not exceeding twelve hundred and eighty acres: Provided, That for each additional one thousand inhabitants, not exceeding five thousand in all, a further grant of three hundred and twenty acres shall be allowed: And provided further, That in any Territory in which a land office may not have been established, declaratory statements as hereinbefore provided may be filed with the surveyor general of the surveying district in which the lands are situate, who shall transmit said declaratory statement to the General Land Office: And provided further, That any act of said trustees not made in conformity to the rules and regulations herein alluded to shall be void; effect to be given to the foregoing provisions according to such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior: And provided further, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to military or other reservations heretofore made by the United States, nor to reservations for light-houses, custom-houses, mints, or such other public purposes as the interests of the United States may require, whether held under reservations through the land office by title derived from the Crown of Spain, or otherwise: And provided further, That no title shall be acquired under the provisions of this act to any mine of gold, silver, cinnabar, or copper.

APPROVED, March 2, 1867.

CHAP. CLXXXVIII.—An Act allowing the Duties on Foreign Merchandise imported into the Port of Albany to be secured and paid at that place.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Albany, in the State of New York, and within the collection district of New York, be, and is hereby, declared to be a port of delivery within the aforesaid district, and there shall be appointed a surveyor of customs, to reside at said port, who shall, in addition to the customary duties performed by that officer in other places, perform the duties prescribed in an act entitled "An act allowing the foreign merchandise imported into Pittsburgh, Wheeling, Cincinnati, Louisville, Saint Louis, Nashville, and Natchez to be secured and paid at those places," approved March two, eighteen hundred and thirty-one. The said surveyor, before taking the oath of office, shall give security to the United States for the faithful performance of his duties in the sum of ten thousand dollars, and shall receive, in addition to the customary fees and emoluments of his office, an annual salary of six hundred dollars.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the same privileges granted to the ports of delivery mentioned in the first section of this act, and the restrictions created by the said act, are hereby extended and made applicable to all goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States at any port of entry and destined to said port of Albany.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall be, and he is hereby, authorized to extend the privileges of the warehouse acts of August six, eighteen hundred and forty-six, and March twenty-eight, eighteen hundred and fifty-four, and the regulations of the Treasury Department relating thereto, to the said port of Albany.

APPROVED, March 2, 1867.

CHAP. CLXXXIX.—An Act to create the Office of Surveyor General in the Territory of Montana, and establish a Land Office in the Territories of Montana and Arizona.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President, by the advice and consent of the Senate, shall be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint a surveyor general for Montana, whose annual salary shall be three thousand dollars, and whose power, authority, and duties shall be the same as those provided by law for the surveyor general of Oregon. He shall have proper allowances for clerk hire, office rent, and fuel, what is now allowed by law to the surveyor general of Oregon.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the public lands within the Territories of Montana and Arizona, to which the Indian title is or shall be extinguished, shall each respectively constitute a new land district, to be called the Montana district and the Arizona district respectively, and the President is hereby authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a register and receiver of public moneys for each of said districts respectively, who shall be required to reside at the places at which said offices shall be located, and they shall have the same powers, perform the same duties, and be entitled to the same compensation as are or may be prescribed by law in relation to land offices of the United States in other Territories.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to locate said offices of surveyor general and registers and receivers of public moneys.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the Territory of Arizona is hereby attached to the surveying district of California.

APPROVED, March 2, 1867.

CHAP. CLXXX.—An Act supplementary to the several Acts of Congress abolishing Imprisonment for Debt.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whenever, upon mesne process or execution issuing out of any of the courts of the United States, any defendant therein is arrested or imprisoned, he shall be entitled to discharge from such arrest or imprisonment in the same manner as if he was so arrested or imprisoned on like process of the State courts in the same district. And the same oath may be taken, and the same length of notice thereof shall be required, as is provided by such State laws; and all modifications, conditions, and restrictions upon imprisonment for debt, now existing by the laws of any State, shall be applicable to process issuing out of the courts of the United States therein, and the same course of proceedings shall be adopted as now are or may be in the courts of such States. But all such proceedings shall be had before some one of the commissioners appointed by the United States circuit court to take bail and affidavits.

APPROVED, March 2, 1867.

CHAP. CLXXXI.—An Act authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to transfer the United States iron-clad "Onondaga," to George Quintard, of New York.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to deliver to George Quintard, of New York, for his own use and behoof, the United States iron-clad Onondaga, upon payment by said Quintard, his heirs and assigns, to the Treasury of the United States, the sum of seven hundred and fifty-nine thousand six hundred and seventy-three dollars.

APPROVED, March 2, 1867.

CHAP. CLXXXII.—An Act to authorize the Establishment of Ocean Mail Steamship Service between the United States and the Hawaiian Islands.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized to invite proposals, by public advertisement, for the period of sixty days, in one or more newspapers published in the cities of Washington, New York, Boston, and San Francisco, respectively, for mail steamship service between the port of San Francisco, in the United States, and the port of Honolulu, in the Hawaiian islands, by means of a monthly line of first-class American sea-going steamships, to be of not less than one thousand tons, Government measurement, each, and of sufficient number to perform twelve round trips per annum, between said ports; and to contract with the lowest responsible bidder for said service, for a term of not more than ten years, to begin from the day the first steamship of the said line shall depart from the port of San Francisco with the mails for the Hawaiian islands: Provided, That no bids shall be considered which shall amount to more than seventy-five thousand dollars for the twelve round trips per annum, nor unless the same be from a citizen or citizens of the United States, and accompanied by an offer of good and sufficient sureties (also citizens of the United States) for the faithful performance of such contract: And provided further, That before the acceptance of the said steamships by the Postmaster General, for the said service, they shall be subject to inspection any [and] survey by an experienced naval constructor, to be detailed for that purpose by the Secretary of the Navy, whose report shall be made to the Postmaster General.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That any contract which the Postmaster General may execute under the authority of this act shall go into effect on or before the first day of January, eighteen hundred and sixty-eight, and shall, in addition to the usual stipulations of ocean mail steamship contracts, provide that the Government of the United States shall be entitled to have transported, free of expense, on each and every steamer, a mail agent to take charge of and arrange the mail matter, to whom suitable accommodations for that purpose shall be assigned; that in case of failure, from any cause, to perform any of the monthly voyages stipulated for in this contract, a pro rata deduction may be made from the compensation on account of such omitted voyage or voyages; that suitable fines and penalties may be imposed for delays and irregularities in the performance of the service; and that the Postmaster General shall have the power, at any time, to determine the contract in case of its being underlet or assigned to any other party.

APPROVED, March 2, 1867.

CHAP. CLXXXIII.—An Act to amend an Act entitled "An Act concerning the Fire Department of Washington City," approved February eighteen, eighteen hundred and sixty-seven.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That so much of the act entitled "An act concerning the fire department of Washington city," approved February eighteen, eighteen hundred and sixty-seven, as provides for the use and occupation of the Union engine-house by the city of Washington, is hereby repealed.

APPROVED, March 2, 1867.

CHAP. CLXXXIV.—An Act to extend the provisions of an Act entitled "An Act for the final Adjustment of Private Land Claims in the States of Florida, Louisiana, and Missouri, and for other purposes."

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the provisions of the act entitled "An act for the final adjustment of private land claims in the States of Florida, Louisiana, and Missouri, and for other purposes," approved June twenty-second, eighteen hundred and sixty, be, and the same are hereby, extended, and the same shall continue in force for a period of three years from and after the passage of this act.

APPROVED, March 2, 1867.

CHAP. CLXXXV.—An Act relating to Appeals and Writ of Error to the Supreme Court.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That where any appeal or writ of error has been brought to the Supreme Court from any final judgment or decree of an inferior court of the United States for any judicial district in which, subsequently to the rendition of such judgment or decree, the regular sessions of such court have been suspended or interrupted by insurrection or rebellion, such appeal or writ of error shall be valid and effectual, notwithstanding the time limited by law for bringing the same may have previously expired; and in cases where no appeal or writ of error has been brought from any such judgment or decree, such appeal or writ of error may be brought within one year from the passage of this act. The provisions of this act shall not apply to any case in which the right to bring an appeal or writ of error had expired before such suspension or interruption of the regular sessions of the court.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That where an appeal has been or may be taken from any final judgment, decree, or order of the district court of the United States for any district to a circuit court, the cause appealed by consent of parties may be heard and disposed of by the circuit court held by the district judge at any time after the appeal, in case of the absence at such term of the Chief Justice of the United States or the associate justice allotted to those circuit courts for such district.

APPROVED, March 2, 1867.

CHAP. CLXXXVI.—An Act to regulate the Disposition of an Irregular Fund in the Custody of the Freedmen's Bureau.

Whereas the Commissioner of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands reports a retained bounty fund, derived from a portion of the State bounties of certain colored soldiers enlisted in Virginia and North Carolina during the years eighteen hundred and sixty-four and eighteen hundred and sixty-five, and by virtue of general order number ninety, department of Virginia and North Carolina, series of eighteen hundred and sixty-four, holden by the superintendent of freedmen's affairs, but turned over to the said Freedmen's Bureau upon its organization; and whereas the said Commissioner has in possession the names of those soldiers from whom the said money was taken; and whereas he has uniformly returned the same upon the application or discovery of legal representatives, but retains a considerable portion thereof belonging to soldiers who are either deceased or who cannot be found: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the said Commissioner of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, or his successor in office, be, and he is hereby, constituted the lawful custodian of said retained bounty fund, and appointed trustee of the same for the benefit of said colored soldiers or their lawful representatives.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said Commissioner be, and he is hereby, specially authorized and empowered to invest the said fund, or any portion thereof, in bonds of the United States, for the exclusive benefit of the said colored soldiers or their legal representatives: Provided, however, That a sufficient amount of the same in cash be retained uninvested to meet all lawful claims thereupon that will probably be presented for payment: And provided further, That any portion of the said fund which may remain unexpended when the said bureau shall cease to exist shall be accounted for by said Commissioner to the Treasury of the United States.

APPROVED, March 2, 1867.

CHAP. CLXXXVII.—An Act to Abolish and forever Prohibit the System of Peonage in the Territory of New Mexico and other parts of the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the holding of any person to service or labor under the system known as peonage is hereby declared to be unlawful, and the same is hereby abolished and forever prohibited in the Territory of New Mexico, or in any other Territory or State of the United States; and all acts, laws, resolutions, orders, regulations, or usages of the Territory of New Mexico, or of any other Territory or State of the United States, which have heretofore established, maintained, or enforced, or by virtue of which any attempt shall hereafter be made to establish, maintain, or enforce, directly or indirectly, the voluntary or involuntary service or labor of any persons as peons, in liquidation of any debt or obligation, or otherwise, be, and the same are hereby, declared null and void; and any person or persons who shall hold, arrest, or return, or cause to be held, arrested, or returned, or in any manner aid in the arrest or return of any person or persons to a condition of peonage, shall, upon conviction, be punished by fine not less than one thousand nor more than five thousand dollars, or by imprisonment not less than one nor more than five years, or both, at the discretion of the court.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of all persons in the military or civil service in the Territory of New Mexico to aid in the enforcement of the foregoing section of this act; and any person or persons who shall obstruct or attempt to obstruct, or in any way interfere with or prevent the enforcement of this act, shall be liable to the pains and penalties hereby provided; and any officer or other person in the military service of the United States who shall so offend, directly or indirectly, shall, on conviction before a court-martial, be dishonorably dismissed the service of the United States, and shall thereafter be ineligible to reappointment to any office of trust, honor, or profit under the Government.

APPROVED, March 2, 1867.

CHAP. CLXXXVIII.—An Act to regulate the Disposition of the Proceeds of Fines, Penalties, and Forfeitures incurred under the Laws relating to the Customs, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from the proceeds of fines, penalties, and forfeitures incurred under the provisions of the laws relating to the customs, there shall be deducted such charges and expenses as are by law in each case authorized to be deducted; and in addition, in case of the forfeiture of imported merchandise of a greater value than five hundred dollars on which duties have not been paid, or in case of a release thereof, upon payment of its appraised value, or of any fine or composition in money, there shall also be deducted an amount equivalent to the duties in coin upon such merchandise, (including the additional duties, if any,) which shall be credited in the accounts of the collector as duties received, and the residue of the proceeds aforesaid shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States, and distributed, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, in the manner following, to wit: one half to the United States; one fourth to the person giving the information which has led to the seizure, or to the recovery of the fine or penalty, and if there be no informer other than the collector, naval officer, or surveyor, then to the officer making the seizure; and the remaining one fourth to be equally divided between the collector, naval officer, and surveyor, or such of them as are appointed for the district in which the seizure has been made, or the fine or penalty incurred, or, if there be only a collector, then to such collector. But where any fine, penalty, or forfeiture, incurred by virtue of the laws relating to customs, shall be recovered in consequence of any information given by an officer of a revenue-cutter, the proceeds thereof shall, after the legal deductions, including the deductions herein authorized, have been made, be disposed of as follows: one fourth to the United States, one fourth to the officers of the customs, as hereinbefore provided; and the remainder to the officers of such revenue-cutter, to be divided among them in proportion to their pay.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That whenever it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the judge of the district court for any district in the United States, by complaint and affidavit, that any fraud on the revenue has been committed by any person or persons interested, or in any way engaged, in the importation or entry of merchandise at any port within such district, said judge shall forthwith issue his warrant directed to the marshal of the district, requiring said marshal, by himself or deputy, to enter any place or premises where any invoices, books, or papers are deposited relating to the merchandise in respect to which such fraud is alleged to have been committed, and to take possession of such books or papers and produce them before the said judge; and any invoices, books, or papers

Laws of the United States.

so seized shall be subject to the order of said judge, who shall allow the examination of the same by the collector of customs of the port into which the alleged fraudulent importation shall have been made, or by any officer duly authorized by said collector. And such invoices, books, or papers may be retained by said judge as long as in his opinion the retention thereof may be necessary; but no warrant for such seizure shall be issued, unless the complainant shall set forth the character of the fraud alleged, the nature of the same, and the importations in respect to which it was committed, and the papers to be seized. And the warrant issued on such complaint, with report of service and proceedings thereon, shall be returned as other warrants to the court of the district within which such judge presides.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That whenever the collector or other chief officer of the customs of any port shall be notified in writing by the owner or consignee of any vessel or vehicle, arriving from any foreign port or place, of a lien for freight on any merchandise imported in such vessel or vehicle, and remaining in his custody, such collector or other officer is hereby authorized and empowered to refuse the delivery of such merchandise from any public or bonded warehouse, or other place in which the same shall be deposited, until proof to his satisfaction shall be produced that the freight due thereon has been paid or secured; but the rights of the United States shall not be prejudiced thereby, nor shall the United States or its officers be in any manner liable for losses consequent upon such refusal to deliver; and if merchandise so subject to a lien, regarding which notice has been filed as aforesaid, shall be forfeited to the United States and sold, the freight due thereon shall be paid from the proceeds of such sale in the same manner as other charges and expenses now authorized by law to be paid therefrom.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the seventh section of "An act to prevent and punish frauds upon the revenue, to provide for the more certain and speedy collection of claims in favor of the United States, and for other purposes," approved March three, eighteen hundred and sixty-three; the seventeenth section of the "Act further to prevent smuggling, and for other purposes," approved July eighteen, eighteen hundred and sixty-six, and all other laws or parts of laws inconsistent with, or supplied by the provisions of this act, be, and they are hereby, repealed. And the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe all needful regulations to carry out and enforce the provisions of this act.

APPROVED, March 2, 1867.

CHAP. CLXXXIX.—An Act granting Lands to aid in the Construction of a Railroad from the City of Stockton to the Town of Copperopolis, in the State of California.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the right of way through the public lands be, and the same is hereby, granted to the Stockton and Copperopolis Railroad Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of California, its successors and assigns, for the construction of a railroad from the city of Stockton to the town of Copperopolis, in the State of California, by the most feasible route, to be selected by said company; and the right is hereby given to said company to take from the public lands adjacent to the line of said road material for the construction thereof. Said right of way is granted to said company to the extent of one hundred feet in width on each side of said road where it may pass through the public domain; also all necessary ground for station buildings, work-shops, depots, machine-shops, switches, side-tracks, turn-tables, and water-stations: Provided, That all the rights conferred upon said railroad company by this act are made upon the express condition that said company shall first be designated by the Legislature of the State of California as the company to be vested with the rights, privileges, franchises, and grants created or conferred by this act.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That there be, and is hereby, granted to the State of California, for the construction of the said Stockton and Copperopolis railroad, its successors and assigns, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of the said railroad, upon the condition prescribed in section one of this act, and to secure the safe and speedy transportation of the mails, troops, munitions of war, and public stores over the route of said line of railway, every alternate section of public land designated by odd numbers to the extent of five alternate sections on each side of said railroad line as said company may adopt, whenever on the line thereof the United States have full title, not reserved, sold, granted, or otherwise appropriated, and free from preemption or other claims or rights at the time the line of said road is definitely fixed and a plot thereof filed in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office. And whenever, prior to said time, any of said sections or parts of sections shall have been granted, sold, reserved, or covered by private land grants, or occupied by homestead settlers, or preempted or otherwise disposed of, other lands shall be selected by said company, in lieu thereof, on the line of said road, within twenty miles of the same, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, in alternate sections, and designated by odd numbers: Provided, That all lands containing gold or silver, or copper, be, and the same are hereby, excluded from the operations of this act, and in lieu thereof a like quantity of unoccupied and unappropriated lands, in odd-numbered sections, within the said twenty miles of the line of said road, may be selected as above provided: And provided further, That the word "mineral," when it occurs in this act, shall not be held to include iron or coal.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That whenever said railroad company shall have ten consecutive miles of any portion of said railroad ready for the service contemplated, the Pacific railroad commissioners shall examine the same; and if it shall appear that ten miles of said road have been completed in a good and substantial manner, and in all respects as required by this act, the commissioners shall so report to the President of the United States, and patents of lands, as aforesaid, shall be issued to said company, confirming to said company the right and title to said lands hereinbefore granted, situated opposite to and continuous with said completed section of said road, within twenty miles thereof. And from time to time, whenever ten additional miles shall have been constructed, completed, and in readiness as aforesaid, and verified by the commissioners to the President of the United States, then patents shall be issued to said company, conveying the additional sections of land as aforesaid, and so on as fast as every ten miles of said road is completed. The services of said commissioners under this act shall be paid by said company.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That said railroad shall be constructed in a substantial and workmanlike manner, with all the necessary draws, culverts, bridges, viaducts, crossings, turnouts, stations, and watering places, and all other appurtenances, including furniture and rolling stock, equal in all respects to railroads of the first class when prepared for business, with rails of the best quality; and a uniform gauge with the Pacific railroad shall be established the entire length of the road.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States shall cause the lands to be surveyed for twenty miles in width on both sides of the entire line of the said road, after the general route shall be fixed, and as fast as may be required by the construction of said railroad; and the odd sections of land hereby granted shall not be liable to sale or entry or preemption, before or after they are surveyed, except by said company, as provided in this act; but the provisions of the act of September, eighteen hundred and forty-one, granting preemption rights, and the acts amendatory thereof, and of the act entitled "An act to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public domain," approved May twenty, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, shall be, and the same are hereby, extended to all other lands on the line of said road when surveyed, excepting those hereby granted to said company; and the sections and parts of sections which shall remain in the United States within ten miles of said railroad on each side thereof shall not be sold for less than two dollars and fifty cents per acre.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That each and every grant, right, and privilege are so made and given to and accepted by said Stockton and Copperopolis Railroad Company upon and subject to the following conditions, namely: that the said company shall commence the work on said road within two years from the approval of this act by the President, and shall complete not less than ten miles per year after the second year, and shall construct, furnish, equip, and complete the whole road by the fourth day of July, eighteen hundred and seventy-two; and upon a failure of said company to comply with either of said conditions, the lands then unpatented to said company shall revert to the United States.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the United States make the several conditioned grants herein, and that the said Stockton and Copperopolis Railroad Company accept the same, upon the further condition that if the said company make any breach of the conditions thereof, and allow the same to continue for upwards of one year, then, in such case, at any time hereafter, Congress may do any and all acts and things which may be needful and necessary to insure a speedy completion of said road.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That said Stockton and Copperopolis railroad, or any part thereof, shall be a post route and military railroad, subject to the use of the United States for postal, military, naval, and all other Government service, and also subject to such regulations as Congress may impose restricting the charges for such Government transportation, and all troops and munitions of war of the United States shall be transported over the said railroad free of all expense or charge to the Government therefor, whenever the same shall be required by the Government of the United States.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the acceptance of the terms, conditions, and impositions of this act by the said Stockton and Copperopolis Railroad Company, shall be signified in writing, under the corporate seal of the said company, duly executed pursuant to the direction of its board of directors first had and obtained, which acceptance shall be made within two years after the passage of this act, and not afterward, and shall be served on the President of the United States, and filed in the office of the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That unless the said Stockton and Copperopolis Railroad Company shall obtain bona fide subscription to the stock of said company to the amount of two hundred thousand dollars, with five per centum paid within two years after the passage and approval of this act, it shall be null and void.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That Congress may, at any time, having due regard for the rights of said railroad company, add to, alter, amend, or repeal this act.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That lots in towns and villages shall be exempt from the provisions of this act.

APPROVED, March 2, 1867.

CHAP. CXC.—An Act to incorporate the Joint Stock Company of the Young Men's Christian Association of Washington.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That S. P. Chase, O. O. Howard, John R. Elvans, S. L. Brown, H. D. Cooke, James Harlan, George P. Fisher, O. H. Browning, James A. Ekin, A. R. Shepherd, B. H. Stinemetz, William Ballantyne, A. C. Richards, F. A. Lutz, L. Clephane, and Samuel Norment, all of the District of Columbia, and their associates and successors, are hereby erected into a body-corporate in deed and in law, by the name, style, and title of the Joint Stock Company of the Young Men's Christian Association, for the purpose of erecting a suitable building for the meetings of the association, with a hall, free reading-rooms, and library for the employes of the public Departments and the citizens of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said corporation, by the same name and title, shall have a capital stock of two hundred thousand dollars ($200,000) in shares of twenty-five dollars ($25) each, and be able to sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, in all courts of law, and elsewhere, and shall be capable and able, in law and equity, to take, purchase, hold, and receive to them and their successors, for the use of said company, lands, tenements, choses in action, goods and chattels of whatever kind, nature, or quality, real, personal, or mixed, which now are or hereafter may become the property of said corporation or be held for their use, by gift, grant, bargain, sale, conveyance, devise, bequest, or otherwise from any person whomsoever capable of making the same: Provided, [That] the value of the real and personal estate held by this corporation shall never exceed the said sum of two hundred thousand dollars. The said corporation may have a common seal, and at pleasure alter, change, or renew the same, and in general do all things which may be necessary for the well-being and due management of said corporation.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the corporation hereby erected shall have power to elect a board of directors and such officers for its government, the management of its property, and the superintendence of its affairs, and make such by-laws as they may deem proper, not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States, and to change or modify them at pleasure.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the board of directors shall receive all rents and revenues arising from the building, and shall from the rents and revenues received by them declare and pay an annual interest of not exceeding six per cent. upon the capital stock of said corporation.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That when the rents and revenues of the building shall exceed the amount necessary to pay the interest upon the capital stock, the board of directors shall pay over to the Young Men's Christian Association the surplus of rents and revenues, which surplus shall be used by the association to purchase the stock hereby authorized at rates not exceeding its par value, and for no other purpose.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That when the Young Men's Christian Association shall have purchased and absorbed all the stock issued by the joint stock company, the board of directors shall transfer to the association the real and personal estate held by it, and all books and papers relating to its transactions; after which transfer the full title and interest in such building and property shall vest and be in the Young Men's Christian Association of Washington; and the corporation hereby created shall then be dissolved; and the rents and revenues of the building shall thereafter be used exclusively to sustain, improve, and enlarge the public hall, library, parlors, and gymnasium, and for the moral and intellectual improvement of young men.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the building and grounds, the rents and revenues of the same, and the stock issued to erect such building shall be forever exempt from taxation.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That Congress may alter, amend, or repeal this act at will.

APPROVED, March 2, 1867.

CHAP. CXCH.—An Act to Incorporate the National Capital Insurance Company.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Green Adams, Erastus Poulson, Joseph J. Coombs, Robert Leech, John B. Clark, jr., J. P. Reznor, Fergus M. Blair, Robert L. Owen, and Joseph W. Parish, and others who may become members, are hereby created a body politic and corporate, by the name and style of the "National Capital Insurance Company," for the purpose of carrying on the business of insurance at the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, and elsewhere, subject to the laws of the several States, and shall and may have perpetual succession, and shall be capable in law of contracting and being contracted with, and of suing and being sued, pleading and being impleaded, in all courts of competent jurisdiction, either in law or equity, in this District or elsewhere, subject to the laws of the States as aforesaid, and they and their successors shall and may have a common seal, and may change the same at their will and pleasure; and may also, from time to time, at any meeting of their directors, by a majority of votes as hereinafter provided, ordain, establish, and put in execution such by-laws, ordinances, rules, and regulations, the same not being contrary to this act or the laws of the United States, as may appear to them necessary or expedient for the management of said corporation, its business and affairs, and may from time to time alter or repeal the same or any of them.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said company shall have power to make insurance upon the lives and health of persons, and against accidents of any and all kinds; to issue tickets, or policies, or both, as the board of directors may determine; and to cause themselves to be insured, when deemed expedient, against risks upon which they may have made insurance.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the affairs of said company shall be managed by a board of directors, consisting of not less than five members or stockholders, three of whom shall constitute a quorum; said directors shall be elected by ballot from among the members and stockholders of said company, in general meeting assembled, at such times and places as said corporation in its by-laws shall appoint; of which election public notice shall be given ten days preceding such election, which shall be held under the inspection of members or stockholders, to be appointed for the purpose, for the first election, by the persons named in the first section of this act, and thereafter by members and stockholders, not being directors, to be appointed previous to every election by the board of directors, and such election shall be made by ballot, and by a plurality of the votes of the members or stockholders, or their proxies, present, allowing to each member or stockholder one vote for every fifty dollars in capital stock represented in said company. All vacancies in said board may be filled for the unexpired terms by the remaining directors, and the persons chosen to fill such vacancies shall continue in office until others shall be chosen in their places; and other elections shall be held on the first day of April of each year for the choice of new directors. The said board of directors shall elect, viva voce, a president, vice president, secretary, treasurer, and general agent, who may hold their offices for and during the term of one year, unless sooner removed by the board of directors, or until others are elected in their places.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the funds of this company, however derived, may be invested in or loaned on stock or real security. But the stockholders of this company shall not be liable for any loss, damage, or responsibility beyond the amount of stock subscribed by them respectively, and any profits accruing therefrom and undivided.

39TH CONG....2D SESS.

Laws of the United States.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That suits at law or in equity may be maintained by said corporation against any of its stockholders for the collection of any assessment on their stock or for any other cause relating to the business of said corporation, and may be prosecuted and maintained by any member or stockholder against said corporation for losses or damages insured against, if payment is withheld more than three months after the losses are duly proved, and notified to the company, agreeably to the conditions of the policy.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the president, secretary, and treasurer of the company, and such other stockholders as may be added by the board, shall constitute an executive committee, and, when the board of directors are not in session, may exercise all the powers vested in the company, (except as shall be otherwise provided by the board of directors in the by-laws of the company,) a majority of whom may constitute a quorum to do business.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the capital stock of the company shall not be less than one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, nor more than one million dollars, in shares of fifty dollars each, which first-named amount of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars shall be paid in previous to effecting insurances.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the directors shall have power to declare such dividends of the profits of the company as they shall deem proper: Provided, That no dividend shall be declared when, in the opinion of the directors or a majority thereof, the capital stock would be impaired thereby.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the company shall be located at the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, and may establish agencies elsewhere in the United States, subject to the laws of the several States.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the president or vice president and secretary of said company annually, on or before the first day of February, to prepare, under oath, and deposit in the office of the Secretary of the Interior, a detailed report of their transactions for the preceding year, and also cause to be published, in some daily newspaper published in the District of Columbia, for at least ten days, a statement exhibiting the total amount of profits received and the total amount of losses paid and ascertained, including expenses during the year; also, the amount of debts owing by said company, at the date of the statement, and the amount of claims against the company for losses; also, a statement of the funds of the company and the gross amount of outstanding risks thereon, together with the amount of stock subscribed and the amount actually paid in.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That Congress may at any time alter, amend, or revoke the said incorporation.

APPROVED, March 2, 1867.

CHAP. CXCHII.—An act to Define and Punish certain Crimes therein named.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That if any person shall rob another of any kind or description of personal property belonging to the United States, or shall feloniously take and carry away the same, the person so offending shall, on conviction, be punished by fine not exceeding five thousand dollars, or by imprisonment at hard labor, not less than one, nor more than ten years, or by both, at the discretion of the court.

APPROVED, March 2, 1867.

CHAP. CXCV.—An Act to provide Ways and Means for the payment of Compound-Interest Notes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That for the purpose of redeeming and retiring any compound-interest notes outstanding the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to issue temporary loan certificates in the manner prescribed by section four of the act entitled "An act to authorize the issue of United States notes and for the redemption or funding thereof, and for funding the floating debt of the United States," approved February twenty-fifth, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, bearing interest at a rate not exceeding three per centum per annum, principal and interest payable in lawful money on demand; and said certificates of temporary loan may constitute and be held, by any national bank holding or owning the same, as a part of the reserve provided for in sections thirty-one and thirty-two of the act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June three, eighteen hundred and sixty-four: Provided, That not less than two fifths of the entire reserve of such bank shall consist of lawful money of the United States: And provided further, That the amount of such temporary certificates at any time outstanding shall not exceed fifty millions of dollars.

APPROVED, March 2, 1867.

CHAP. CXCV.—An Act to pay and discharge certain Debts and Expenditures to the Corporation of the City of Washington.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to pay to the proper authorities of the city of Washington, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of thirty-one thousand nine hundred and seventy-one dollars and thirty-four cents, in full for all claims which the city of Washington now has against the United States on account of moneys expended in improving the streets, avenues, alleys, public grounds, in the city of Washington, or for repairing any of the bridges crossing the Potomac river, prior to May fifth, eighteen hundred and sixty-four: Provided, That before paying the sum aforesaid the mayor of the city of Washington shall present to the Commissioner of Public Buildings an account embracing each item of charge which said city has against the United States for expenditures herein referred to, which account the said Commissioner shall certify to be correct and just: Provided further, That no money shall be paid under this act until after a full examination of all the items by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, and proof under oath that the work was done at fair and reasonable prices: And provided further, That before any money shall be paid under this act the city of Washington shall file with the Treasurer of the United States a receipt to the effect that the city has received the amount to be paid by virtue of this act in full of all claims against the Government for the grading, paving, and constructing sewers in the streets of said city to the date of May twenty-third, eighteen hundred and sixty-five.

APPROVED, March 2, 1867.

CHAP. CXCVI.—An Act to amend an Act entitled "An Act for the removal of Causes in certain Cases from State Courts," approved July twenty-seven, eighteen hundred and sixty-six.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the act entitled "An act for the removal of causes in certain cases from State courts," approved July twenty-seven, eighteen hundred and sixty-six, be, and the same is hereby, amended as follows: that where a suit is now pending, or may hereafter be brought, in any State court, in which there is controversy between a citizen of the State in which the suit is brought and a citizen of another State, and the matter in dispute exceeds the sum of five hundred dollars, exclusive of costs, such citizen of another State, whether he be plaintiff or defendant, if he will make and file, in such State court, an affidavit stating that he has reason to and does believe that, from prejudice or local influence, he will not be able to obtain justice in such State court, may, at any time before the final hearing or trial of the suit, file a petition in such State court for the removal of the suit into the next circuit court of the United States to be held in the district where the suit is pending, and offer good and sufficient surety for his entering in such court, on the first day of its session, copies of all process, pleadings, depositions, testimony, and other proceedings in said suit, and doing such other appropriate acts as, by the act to which this act is amendatory, are required to be done upon the removal of a suit into the United States court; and it shall be, thereupon, the duty of the State court to accept the surety and proceed no further in the suit; and the said copies being entered as aforesaid in such court of the United States, the suit shall there proceed in the same manner as if it had been brought there by original process; and all the provisions of the act to which this act is amendatory respecting any bail, attachment, injunction, or other restraining process, and respecting any bond of indemnity, or other obligation given upon the issuing or granting of any attachment, injunction, or other restraining process, shall apply with like force and effect in all respects to similar matters, process, or things in the suits for the removal of which this act provides.

APPROVED, March 2, 1867.

CHAP. CXCVII.—An Act to provide Increased Revenue from Imported Wool, and for other purposes.

CLASS 1.—Clothing Wool.

That is to say, merino, mestiza, metz, or metis wools, or other wools of merino blood, immediate or remote; down clothing wools, and wools of like character with any of the preceding, including such as have been heretofore usually imported into the United States from Buenos Ayres, New Zealand, Australia, Cape of Good Hope, Russia, Great Britain, Canada, and elsewhere, and also including all wools not hereinafter described or designated in classes two and three.

CLASS 2.—Combing Wools.

That is to say, Leicester, Cotswold, Lincolnshire, down combing wools, or other like combing wools of English blood, and usually known by the terms herein used; and also all hair of the alpaca, goat, and other like animals.

CLASS 3.—Carpet Wools, and other similar Wools.

Such as Donskoi, native South American, Cordova, Valparaiso, native Smyrna, and including all such wools of like character as have been heretofore usually imported into the United States from Turkey, Greece, Egypt, Syria, and elsewhere.

ber of distinctive samples of the various kinds of wool or hair embraced in each of the three classes above named, selected and prepared under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, and duly verified by him, (the standard samples being retained in the Treasury Department,) shall be deposited in the custom-houses and elsewhere, as he may direct, which samples shall be used by the proper officers of the customs to determine the classes above specified, to which all imported wools belong. And upon wools of the first class, the value whereof at the last port or place whence exported to the United States, excluding charges in such port, shall be thirty-two cents or less per pound, the duty shall be ten cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, eleven per centum ad valorem; upon wools of the same class, the value whereof at the last port or place whence exported to the United States, excluding charges in such port, shall exceed thirty-two cents per pound, the duty shall be twelve cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, ten per centum ad valorem. Upon wools of the second class, and upon all hair of the alpaca, goat, and other like animals, the value whereof at the last port or place whence exported to the United States, excluding charges in such port, shall be thirty-two cents or less per pound, the duty shall be ten cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, eleven per centum ad valorem; upon wools of the same class, the value whereof at the last port or place whence exported to the United States, excluding charges in such port, shall exceed thirty-two cents per pound, the duty shall be twelve cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, ten per centum ad valorem. Upon wools of the third class, the value whereof at the last port or place whence exported into the United States, excluding charges in such port, shall be twelve cents or less per pound, the duty shall be three cents per pound; upon wools of the same class, the value whereof at the last port or place whence exported to the United States, excluding charges in such port, shall exceed twelve cents per pound, the duty shall be six cents per pound: Provided, That any wool of the sheep, or hair of the alpaca, goat, and other like animals, which shall be imported in any other than the ordinary condition as now and heretofore practiced, or which shall be changed in its character or condition, for the purpose of evading the duty, or which shall be reduced in value by the admixture of dirt, or any other foreign substance, shall be subject to pay twice the amount of duty to which it would be otherwise subjected, anything in this act to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided further, That when wool of different qualities is imported in the same bale, bag, or package, it shall be appraised by the appraiser, to determine the rate of duty to which it shall be subjected, at the average aggregate value of the contents of the bale, bag, or package; and when bales of different qualities are embraced in the same invoice at the same prices whereby the average price shall be reduced more than ten per centum below the value of the bale of the best quality, the value of the whole shall be appraised according to the value of the bale of the best quality; and no bale, bag, or package shall be liable to a less rate of duty in consequence of being invoiced with wool of lower value: And provided further, That the duty upon wool of the first class which shall be imported washed shall be twice the amount of duty to which it would be subjected if imported unwashed, and that the duty upon wool of all classes which shall be imported scoured shall be three times the amount of the duty to which it would be subjected if imported unwashed. On sheep skins and Angora goat skins, raw or unmanufactured, imported with the wool on, washed or unwashed, the duty shall be thirty per centum ad valorem; and on woolen rags, shoddy, mungo, waste, and flocks, the duty shall be twelve cents per pound.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That in lieu of the duties heretofore imposed by law on the articles hereinafter mentioned, and on such as may now be exempt from duty, there shall be levied, collected, and paid on the goods, wares, and merchandise, herein enumerated and provided for, imported from foreign countries, the following duties and rates of duty, that is to say:

No. 28.—A Resolution to provide for the Ascertainment and Apportionment of the proper Quota of the Direct Tax of eighteen hundred and sixty-one to the State of West Virginia, and for other purposes.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in ascertaining the quota of the State of West Virginia of the direct tax imposed by the act of August fifth, eighteen hundred and sixty-one, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to charge the said State with such proportion of the said tax apportioned to the State of Virginia as the value of the real estate of the counties now composing the State of West Virginia, including Berkeley and Jefferson, bears to the value of all the real estate of the then State of Virginia, as ascertained by the assessment for State taxation of the real estate of the said State of Virginia in the year eighteen hundred and sixty, giving credit to the State of West Virginia for such part of its proportion so ascertained as has been already paid.

SEC. 2. And be it further resolved, That the State of West Virginia is hereby made liable to all the duties in relation to said direct tax which are imposed by law upon, and is entitled to all the privileges in the same relation which are by law allowed to other loyal States: Provided, That no liability or burden whatever is hereby imposed or shall be imposed by said State, arising in any way out of said tax, upon lands included within the present limits of the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson, or upon the inhabitants as such, for the time being, within said limits, except upon terms accepted by a majority vote of legal voters resident within said limits.

SEC. 3. And be it further resolved, That the board of direct tax commissioners for the State of Virginia shall have and continue to have the same authority to assess and collect the before-mentioned direct tax in the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson as if those counties still formed a part of the State of Virginia.

SEC. 4. And be it further resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall be authorized to refund to persons from whom money has been received without warrant of law, as in payment of dues under the direct tax laws, the sums so illegally collected; such refunding to be ordered on the presentation in each case of satisfactory evidence of the illegal collection.

SEC. 5. And be it further resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to suspend the further collection within the State of West Virginia of any part of the direct tax imposed by the act of August five, eighteen hundred and sixty-one, until the first day of June next, unless the claims of the said State against the United States are sooner adjusted.

SEC. 6. And be it further resolved, That section two of an act entitled "An act further to amend an act entitled 'An act for the collection of direct taxes in the insurrectionary States within the United States, and for other purposes,' approved June seven, eighteen hundred and sixty-two," approved March third, eighteen hundred and sixty-five, be, and the same is hereby, repealed, and certificates of sale shall be received in all courts and places as prima facie evidence of the regularity and validity of said sale and of the title of purchaser or purchasers under the same, as provided in section seven of an act entitled "An act for the collection of direct taxes in insurrectionary districts within the United States, and for other purposes," approved June seven, eighteen hundred and sixty-two.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Paymaster General of the United States Army be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to settle and pay, out of any money appropriated, or hereafter to be appropriated, for the payment of the Army, the account of Elias Beale, late a captain of company H, eighth regiment Tennessee volunteer infantry, for his services and all allowances as captain in said regiment in the service of the United States, from the twenty-fifth day of July, eighteen hundred and sixty-three, to the thirtieth day of June, eighteen hundred and sixty-five, being to the time he was mustered out of said service, deducting from the same all moneys that have been paid to him as a private in said service during said time.

APPROVED, March 2, 1867.

CHAP. CCXIV.—An Act for the Relief of Thomas D. Burrall.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the letters-patent granted to Thomas D. Burrall, on the sixth day of December, one thousand eight hundred and forty-five, for improvements in corn-shell-ers, and which was extended by the Commissioner of Patents and afterward surrendered and reissued, which reissue bears date the tenth day of October, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-five, and which will expire on the sixth day of December, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-six, be, and the same is hereby, extended for the term of seven years, commencing on the said sixth day of December, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-six, and ending on the sixth day of December, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-three, for the benefit of the said Burrall, his heirs and legal representatives, upon the conditions hereinafter set forth. And the Commissioner of Patents is hereby directed, upon the presentation of said patent and the payment of the fees and charges provided by law, to extend said patent by making a certificate thereon, or upon a certified copy thereof, of such extension in the name of the said Thomas D. Burrall, if in his judgment upon full hearing that the same should be granted. And the said Commissioner is hereby further directed to cause said extension, if perfected, to be entered on the record of the Patent Office. And the said patent, so extended, shall have the same effect as if originally granted for the term extending to the end of the term to which it is extended by this act: Provided, however, That said extended patent shall be open to legal inquiry and decision in the same manner as if issued under the general law relating to patents: And provided further, That all persons enjoying the lawful use of the improvements secured by said patent, and the purchaser of any machine so in use, may continue to use the same as if this act had not passed.

APPROVED, March 2, 1867.

CHAP. CCXV.—An Act to extend to, and for the Benefit of, Eliza Wells, Letters-Patent, heretofore issued to Henry A. Wells, deceased.

Whereas Henry A. Wells, late of the city of New York, did obtain letters-patent of the United States for valuable "improvements in the process of and machinery for making hat-bodies," which letters-patent bore date the twenty-fifth day of April, eighteen hundred and forty-six, and were granted for the term of fourteen years from said date; and whereas the said Henry A. Wells departed this life on the twenty-seventh day of March, eighteen hundred and fifty-one, leaving Eliza Wells, of the said city of New York, his widow, to whom letters of administration on the estate of said Henry A. Wells were duly granted; and whereas the said letters-patent were reissued to Charles St. John and others, assignees, in two divisions, one bearing date the thirtieth day of September, eighteen hundred and fifty-six, and numbered three hundred and ninety-six, and the other bearing date the seventh day of October, eighteen hundred and fifty-six, and numbered four hundred; and whereas the said reissued letters-patent were duly extended by the Commissioner of Patents on the twenty-fifth day of April, eighteen hundred and sixty, for the term of seven years from said last-mentioned date, for the benefit of the said Eliza Wells, administratrix as aforesaid; and whereas on the fourth day of December, eighteen hundred and sixty, said reissued and extended letters-patent were surrendered and again reissued to Henry A. Burr, assignee, in two divisions, numbered ten hundred and eighty-six and ten hundred and eighty-seven; and whereas said reissued letters-patent, numbered ten hundred and eighty-six, were surrendered and again reissued on the seventeenth day of June, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, said reissued letters-patent being numbered thirteen hundred and eighteen; and whereas said extended term will expire the twenty-fifth day of April, eighteen hundred and sixty-seven; and whereas it appears that said invention is of great value and importance to the public, and that the said Henry A. Wells, in his lifetime, and the said Eliza Wells, administratrix as aforesaid, since his decease, failed to receive from the use and sale of said invention a reasonable remuneration for the time, ingenuity, and expense bestowed upon the same, and the introduction thereof into use: Now, therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the said reissued letters-patent, numbered one thousand and eighty-seven, and bearing date the fourth day of December, eighteen hundred and sixty, and said reissued letters-patent, numbered one thousand three hundred and eighteen, and bearing date the seventeenth day of June, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, be, and the same are hereby, extended to and for the benefit of the said Eliza Wells, as administratrix of the estate of the said Henry A. Wells, deceased, for the further term of seven years from and after the twenty-fifth day of April, eighteen hundred and sixty-seven.

APPROVED, March 2, 1867.

CHAP. CCXVI.—An Act for the Relief of Hugh Leddy.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and required to pay Hugh Leddy, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of six hundred and eighty-two dollars and forty cents, in full for liquors wrongfully seized, by order of the provost-marshal, on the second of September, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, and appropriated to the use of Government through the medical department.

APPROVED, March 2, 1867.

RESOLUTIONS.

No. 2.—A Resolution in Relation to the Settlement of the Accounts of William P. Wingate, Collector at the Port of Bangor, Maine.

Whereas certain goods (molasses and salt) were imported by Fisk and Dale, Josiah Towle, and Morse and Company, and held in bond at the custom-house in Bangor, Maine, on the second day of May, anno Domini eighteen hundred and sixty-four, and were on that day released and withdrawn upon payment of the duties imposed thereon prior to the enactment of the joint resolution of April twenty-nine, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, the collector not then having received official notice of such enactment; and whereas the said collector is now charged with fifty per centum additional to the amount already paid upon said goods, and claims to hold the importers to pay the same to him: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed, in the settlement of the accounts of William P. Wingate, collector at the port of Bangor, Maine, not to exact from him the payment of the additional duty of fifty per centum imposed by the joint resolution of April twenty-ninth, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, on the merchandise withdrawn for consumption by the parties aforesaid on the second day of May, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, and to order the cancellation of the several bonds given by the importers in the above cases.

APPROVED, January 5, 1867.
